Specifically, the federation wants Congress to examine the role of mergers and acquisitions in increasing economic concentration, the interlocking relationships among the giant corporations and banks, their control of key parts of the U.S. economy, their effects on prices, income distribution, America's position in the world economy, and the impact of these tremendous aggregations of economic power on democratic institutions.

The nation's 400,000 manufacturing firms account for less than 4 percent of all business enterprises, for instance; but this 4 percent accounts for 40 percent of all business receipts. And these manufacturing firms have a very high degree of concentration, Roberts notes.

A very small number of manufacturing operations — the top 100—get about 50 percent of all profits in manufacturing, according to the Federal Trade Commission. The top 200 get 70 percent and the top 500 get 80 percent.

He points out, for example, that about 3,000 of the nation's 14,000 private commercial banks are affiliated with bank-holding companies. The 100 biggest banks hold more than 50 percent of all bank assets.

In addition, a 1968 staff report by the House Banking Committee revealed that the 49 biggest banks held 5 percent leverage control in more than 5,000 major corporations as well as 8,000 interlocking directorships in more than 6,500 major business corporations.

"These banks also control billions in trust fund dollars, including pension funds," Roberts notes.

A 1973 report of the Senate Government Operations Committee noted a very high degree of concentration in stockholdings in a whole range of companies—energy, manufacturing, transportation, communications and retail trade—among a handful of New York bank trust departments.

Aggregate concentration of corporate assets, corporate profits and employment by corporate giants is one thing. Market concentration is another. In many industries, such as autos, there is a concentration of production, shipments and sales by the top three or four corporations.

This kind of oligopolistic "competition" often results in anti-competitive "administered" pricing actions, sometimes in violation of federal antitrust laws, "and almost always results in raising prices above competitive levels," Roberts notes.

The FTC estimates that because of this monopoly power U.S. consumers pay as much as an extra $80-$100 billion each year in higher prices—out of total purchases of $900 billion.

Mergers, which first swept the nation in 1897, largely explain the concentration in the industrial sector of the economy, Roberts observes. A second merger wave occurred in the late 1920s and a third round began in the 1950s.

"A new twist of this third merger movement was the conglomerate pattern of acquisitions of companies totally unrelated to the product lines of the acquiring company," Roberts notes.

The big U.S.-based multinational corporations spawned by the conglomerate movement operate through 10,000 subsidiaries and foreign affiliates all over the world and with no effective regulation, Roberts points out.

Often, such corporations make profitable deals directly with Communist governments. They export production and jobs of American workers, and they export capital and technology developed in the United States at the expense of the American taxpayer.

"This is eroding the nation's industrial base, and the shutdowns of U.S. plants—as production and jobs are shifted abroad — are undermining the strength of large and small communities throughout America," Roberts stresses.

Studies indicate a slowdown in productive efficiency, invention and innovation in big corporations and in highly concentrated industries, the author adds.

Thus, he notes, there is a strong economic argument for government policy on economic concentration —in addition to the basic social and political need to control and, wherever possible, to prevent gigantic concentrations of business power that can undermine democratic institutions.

Labor Studies Center Sets Schedule for June

A five-day institute on major problems in grievance arbitration will highlight the June program at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, Silver Spring, Md.

Ronald Haughton of Detroit, vice president of Wayne State University and a veteran arbitrator in the auto, airline and other industries, will cap the week's discussion with a professional's view of recent arbitration developments.

The institute is open to full-time officers and staff members of AFL-CIO unions. Participants will study the issues of subcontracting, seniority, promotions and management rights. They will examine trends emerging from recent cases and the latest technical developments, such as Expedited Arbitration.

The Arbitration Institute will open at 4 p.m., Sunday, June 1, and conclude on Friday, June 6.

During the month, four AFL-CIO unions will use the Labor Studies Center campus for staff and officer training. The schedule:

Paperworkers—A program to help local union officers recognize and deal with occupational health and safety problems in the paper converting industry. From 4 p.m., Sunday, June 8, through Friday, June 13.

Transport Workers—A seminar on grievance processing for TWU Flight Attendants. They will study each step in grievance handling. From 9 a.m., Wednesday, June 18, through Friday, June 20.

Meat Cutters—A seminar for local and international union organizers. Participants will examine the mechanics of each stage in an organizing campaign with special attention to small group communications, one-on-one organizing, committee meetings, mass meetings and campaign planning. From 4 p.m., Sunday, June 22, through Friday, June 27.

Graphic Arts—A seminar for the Graphic Arts International Union staff to examine union policy and legislative issues and to study arbitration methods, public speaking, organizing and affirmative action. From 4 p.m., Sunday, June 22, through Friday, June 27.

One off-campus institute on Collective Bargaining Techniques is scheduled for June in cooperation with the University of California at Berkeley. Participants will study testing skills, analyze both union and management tactics and key contract clauses, and review new developments in collective bargaining. From 9 a.m., Monday, June 9, through Friday, June 13.

More information on these and other center programs may be obtained from Executive Director Fred Hoehler, AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Telephone 301/431-6400.

Broad Goals for Miners Charted by ILO Parley

Geneva—A blueprint for providing miners and their families better living standards was adopted at a 22-nation International Labor Organization conference here.

Trade union, employer and government delegates unanimously agreed that the improvements they charted during the 11-day session in social, educational and other facilities for miner families were in "no way to be regarded as a substitute for the payment of a fair salary."

The conference also emphasized that the supplying of such services was not to "prejudice the basic rights of workers," particularly the right to establish free trade unions and bargain collectively.

Addressing the session's final meeting on behalf of the worker delegates, Joseph Miller, international representative of the Operating Engineers, complimented all participants for the no-holds-barred discussion that resulted in a "job well done in all respects."

Miller represented the worker delegates on the conference's key steering committee and on the committee dealing with the welfare of miners.

His fellow delegate on the U.S. delegation was Frank S. McKee, director of Steelworkers District 38, while Dean K. Clowes, also of the Steelworkers, completed the AFL-CIO team as an adviser.

Commenting on the conclusions reached by the conference for submission to the ILO Governing Body, Miller said that a major advance was made in "clearly establishing the responsibility of governments and employers for providing social services and assuring safety practices."

"But at the same time," he continued, "the right of workers to participate in all phases of the planning of such services and the drafting of safety measures was firmly recognized."

McKee, who served on a committee dealing with vocational training as well as job retraining, said that he came away with the impression that the employers "conceded that there should be a worker input in the preparing of programs in these fields."

"The employers recognized," he said, "that it is not their responsibility alone to prepare workers for the industry and to retrain those who must shift to new jobs, but that the workers themselves must participate in all phases of this task."

When detailing the social services that should be available to mine workers and their families, the conference said that the primary aim must always be to assure them "decent living conditions and allow the development of normal community life."

Vocational training programs, the conference urged, should be provided with the intention of insuring that "employment offered by the mining industry reflects the best possible conditions and rates of pay."

The conference urged that special attention be given at the next session on the mining industry to trade union rights and collective bargaining, as well as to the impact of the working environment and of technological changes on miners' health.

Industry Line Laid to Head Of Price Panel

Chicago—Retail Clerks President James T. Housewright charged in an address here that the head of the Ford Administration's Council on Wage & Price Stability "has swallowed the food industry's propaganda — hook, line and sinker."

Housewright said the director of the council, Albert Rees, seemed to parrot the industry's line in favor of removal of prices from individual grocery items when he spoke recently to the National Canners Association.

Discussing RCIA's support of the consumer movement's efforts to keep product price marking, Housewright noted: "It is ludicrous to charge that price marking legislation will impede the introduction of automated checkout systems.

"At least 85 percent of the 'savings' that industry anticipates will be gained through introduction of the new technology could still be realized even if item price marketing were continued," he said.

"The cost to the consumer for price marking will be minuscule, while the protection afforded will be appreciable."

In his address to the National Canners Association, Rees also was critical of some recent collective bargaining agreements in the retail food industry, stating that he was "disturbed both by the size . . . and by new impediments to the improvement of productivity." He cited settlements amounting to 12 to 16 cents an hour in wages and fringe benefits.

OSHA's Vinyl Rule Clears Court Test

Organized labor maintained in its briefs that the industry had more than enough time to gear for the improved working standard. In issuing the standard several months earlier, OSHA said it was post-dating it to allow employers to make the needed technological changes.

OSHA had determined that vinyl chloride was a carcinogen following Labor Dept. hearings a year ago which brought out extensive evidence linking fatal liver cancer to exposure to vinyl chloride. Thirteen deaths among workers in manufacturing and fabricating plants had been traced to their exposure to vinyl chloride.

At the time of the hearings, the government permitted an exposure level in workplaces of 500 ppm. The level was reduced to 50 ppm as an emergency temporary standard last April.

But even before the temporary standard went into effect, a number of vinyl chloride producers had reduced exposure levels for workers to below 10 ppm because of the mounting medical evidence that the gas was carcinogenic.

Although the allowable exposure is set at 1 ppm for an eight-hour period, the concentration of vinyl chloride may go to 5 ppm for 15-minute peak periods. Where employers cannot achieve the 1 ppm level, they are required to supply worker with respirators.

The use of respirators by workers is currently optional where concentrations of the gas go up to 25 ppm, but will become mandatory next Jan. 1.

Other key provisions of the standard require employers to:

- Conduct monitoring programs to determine where exposure levels exceed 0.5 ppm.
- Give workers and their union representatives "reasonable opportunity" to observe monitoring and measuring.
- Provide workers with protective clothing and equipment.
- Forbid any direct worker contact with liquefied vinyl chloride.
- Provide for periodic medical examinations of workers and maintenance of their medical records for at least 30 years.

The vinyl chloride rule covers an estimated 6,500 workers in vinyl chloride production and about 350,000 in plastics fabricating.

Social Security Benefits Due To Rise 8%

Thirty-five million Americans on the social security rolls will receive an 8 percent cost-of-living increase this summer despite efforts by the Ford Administration to impose a 5 percent ceiling.

After Congress made clear that it would not pass legislation to put a cap on the automatic increase that is linked to the consumer price index, Health, Education & Welfare Secretary Caspar Weinberger announced the 8 percent boost.

It will be contained in checks for June that normally are delivered on July 3.

A comparable increase will go to persons who receive Supplemental Security Income payments, starting in July. That will raise the minimum benefit to any individual without other resources to $157.70 a month and $233.60 to a couple. However, states that add an additional supplement to the federal payment have the option of lowering the state payment by the amount of the federal increase.

Weinberger complained that the refusal of Congress to limit the social security increase to 5 percent "will add inflationary pressures to the economy."

Labor and senior citizen groups had contended that the nation's economy needs the stimulus of added spending power—particularly a group that has been severely hurt by inflation.

Social security recipients also have received or soon will receive the $50 special payments voted by Congress earlier this year as part of the tax cut bill.

Each person on the benefit rolls is entitled to a payment. Thus, a widow with two dependent children would get a $150 check in addition to her regular social security benefit.

The $50 payments are a one-time benefit and are not incorporated in the monthly payments. The Treasury Dept. has mailed some of the checks but the mailing won't be completed until about June 20.

76 Senators Urge Ford To Meet Israel's Needs

Three-fourths of the members of the U.S. Senate have formally called upon President Ford to submit to Congress a foreign aid request for fiscal year 1976 that "will be responsive to Israel's urgent military and economic needs."

In a letter signed by 76 senators, Ford also was urged in any "reassessment" of Middle East policy to "make it clear, as we do," that the United States stands firmly with Israel in the search for peace.

"We believe that preserving the peace requires that Israel obtain a level of military and economic support adequate to deter a renewal of war by Israel's neighbors," the letter declared.

"Withholding military equipment from Israel would be dangerous, discouraging accommodation by Israel's neighbors, and encouraging a resort to force."

The President is expected to send his foreign-aid requests to Capitol Hill in the next few weeks.

The senators' letter followed close on the heels of a statement on Israel adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its spring meeting earlier this month.

In the statement, the council reiterated the AFL-CIO's "full support" for Israel, and called on the Ford Administration to "reassert, not reassess, America's commitment to democracy in the Middle East, to Israel."

Among those signing the Senate letter were 12 of the 17 members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Generally, the letter supported the major Israeli policy positions in the Middle East.

"We believe that a strong Israel constitutes a most reliable barrier to domination of the area by outside parties," the senators declared. "Given the recent heavy flow of Soviet weaponry to Arab states, it is imperative that we not permit the military balance to shift against Israel."

The senators noted the "desirability" of greater participation by Congress in the formulation of American foreign policy, adding that cooperation between the Executive and Legislative Branches "is essential for America's effectiveness in the world."

They emphasized their support of the President's efforts to strengthen U.S. ties with countries which share democratic traditions and help to safeguard American interests.

"We believe that the special relationship between our countries and Israel does not prejudice improved relations with other nations in the (Middle East)," the senators stressed.

New Arguments Set On Wage-Hour Issue

gency federal wage controls."

Justice William H. Rehnquist was the only direct dissenter from the opinion written by Justice Thurgood Marshall. However, Justice William O. Douglas did not join in the majority opinion, stating that he didn't think the court should act in the case since the stabilization law had expired and there was no continuing bar to the payment of the salary increases.

The court had been expected to rule in its current term on the contention of the National League of Cities that Congress exceeded its authority in bringing all public employes under the wage-hour law, and particularly in applying overtime standards to police officers and fire fighters.

Instead, it scheduled additional oral arguments in the case for next fall. Meanwhile regulations implementing the overtime provisions for fire and police departments remain suspended.

The AFL-CIO, in a brief to the Supreme Court, defended the right of Congress to cover these public employees and said it has been "a national disgrace" that hundreds of thousands of state and local government workers have been paid below-poverty wages.

In another case of interest to labor, the Supreme Court has agreed to decide whether a disability insurance plan illegally discriminates against women workers if it treats pregnancy different from other conditions that prevent an employe from working.

The Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit last February ruled that a plan that denied income protection to employes unable to work during pregnancy and that required women to return to work within a specified time after childbirth violated employer obligations under the Civil Rights Act.

Arbitration Group Offers Mediation

New York—The American Arbitration Association announced it will now provide mediators and factfinders for disputes in both private and government employment.

The AAA has been the major non-governmental source for labor arbitrators for nearly 50 years.

AAA President Robert Coulson noted that most labor mediators will continue to be drawn from the professional staffs of government agencies. However, "we hope to supplement this important public service by offering a viable private alternative for appropriate cases," he said.

Officials of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, as well as former FMCS directors David L. Cole and William E. Simkin, expressed their support.

Labor Spurs House Action On Voting Law

arisen out of the committee's attempt to eliminate voting barriers for "language minorities," primarily Spanish-speaking Americans but in some areas including orientals and American Indians.

One section of the bill would require that bilingual election and registration information be provided in communities where the language minority population is 5 percent or higher.

Under the committee bill, if bilingual election information is not available and the total voter turnout of a community with a significant language minority is less than 50 percent of the vote in the last previous presidential election, federal voting supervision would be established as has been done to ensure black voting rights in the South.

There appears to be less controversy over making permanent the ban nationwide on literacy tests that is now part of the law.

The Judiciary Committee report quoted from a Supreme Court decision upholding the temporary nationwide ban on literacy tests the statement that "the tests have been used at times as a discriminatory weapon against some minorities, not only Negroes but Americans of Mexican ancestry and American Indians; that radio and television have made it possible for a person to be well informed even though he may not be able to read and write."

As to the case for continuing federal supervision, the House committee report noted that there is still a wide gap between black and white voter registration in some rural areas, despite a general improvement.

It cited evidence developed in committee hearings of such barriers as limited and inconvenient times for registration, discourtesy to applicants and discriminatory purges of voting rolls.

Dues Rebate Appeals Set By AFSCME

Three labor relations experts have agreed to serve on a panel established by the State, County & Municipal Employees to review requests for per capita tax rebates by non-members who are represented by the union but object to its partisan legislative activities.

The three members of AFSCME's Rebate Review Panel are David A. Morse, impartial chairman of the Coat & Suit Industry of New York and former director-general of the International Labor Organization; Donald W. Haughton, vice president for urban affairs of Wayne State University, and Harry T. Edwards, professor of law at the University of Michigan Law School and a labor arbitrator.

The panel will decide on appeals for per capita tax rebates by non-members covered by agency shop agreements. Under the union's constitution, both members and non-members may appeal to the AFSCME Judicial Panel for rebates. Members may appeal decisions of the Judicial Panel to the union's conventions while non-members will take their appeals to the Rebate Review Panel.

House Fails to Reverse Job Fund Veto

Override Beaten By GOP Shifts

President Ford made his veto of a job-financing bill stick as the House failed by five votes to muster the two-thirds majority needed to override the veto.

In the crunch, most Republicans who had voted two weeks earlier for the emergency job funds—a key element in efforts to restore full employment to the economy—bowed to White House pressure and abandoned the bill.

On the 277-145 vote, 258 Democrats and 19 Republicans voted to override the veto. They were blocked by 123 Republicans and 22 Democrats.

The vetoed bill would have appropriated $5.3 billion to finance an estimated 900,000 jobs. There was added money for public works projects, for public service employment, summer youth jobs, work-study programs and an assortment of other quick-stimulus projects.

In a letter sent to all House members before the vote, AFL-CIO President George Meany had urged Congress "to restore compassion and economic sense to this nation's economic policy by voting to override the President's veto."

Meany termed the measure "of vital importance to the 8 million unemployed and their families" and "an absolute first step if the human recession of unemployment is to be turned around."

Meany stressed that "the answer to America's economic problems is jobs" and a vote to override the veto represents a vote for jobs.

To President Ford, however, the bill "would exacerbate both budgetary and economic pressures" and provide "too much stimulus" for the economy. Besides, the President said, economic recovery will be "well underway" later this year.

Ford followed up his veto action with a phoned message to House Republicans made from the plane taking him to West Point for a commencement speech. Ford's message, relayed by Republican Leader John J. Rhodes, was that his program to combat inflation and recession depended on sustaining the veto.

Later, House Republican Conference Chairman John B. Anderson (R-Ill.) described the outcome as "the sweetest victory the President has had."

When the House voted final approval of the bill in mid-May, despite strong indications of a

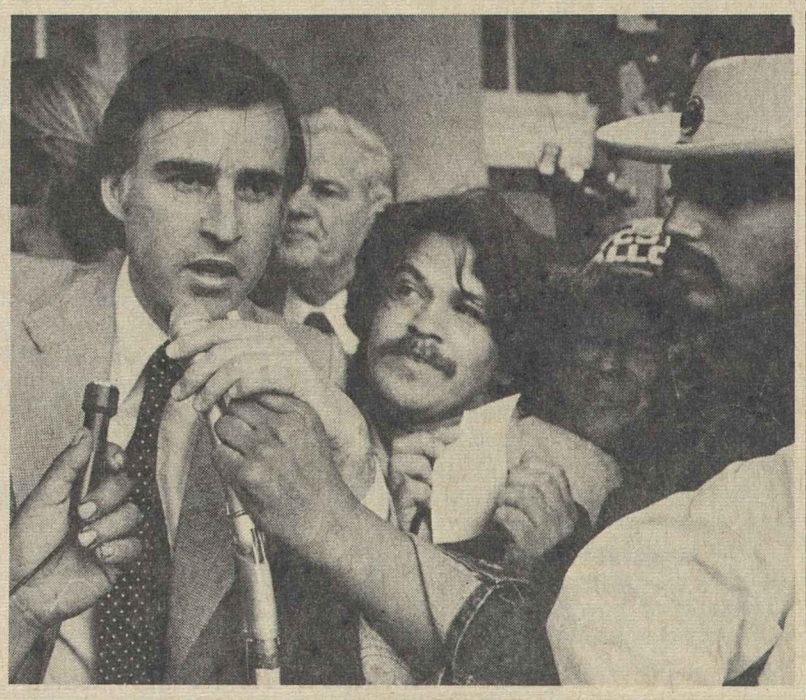
Severe Joblessness Hits Record 127 Major Areas



JUBILANT FARM WORKERS, gathered on the steps of the California state capitol building in Sacramento, hear Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr., announce full agreement on collective bargaining legislation for agriculture. Behind the governor is John F. Henning, executive secretary-treasurer of the State AFL-CIO, who pledged full support to the UFW in representation elections for field workers. The new law becomes effective Aug. 28.

Sharp Increase Adds 22 Centers in Month

Substantial unemployment—defined as a jobless rate of 6 percent or more that is expected to continue for at least two more months—engulfed the nation's key job centers in April.

The number of major labor areas classified by the Labor Dept. as having substantial joblessness rose sharply to a record 127 in April with the addition of 22 new areas.

"The rise from 105 in March to 127 among the 150 major areas surveyed each month marked the second month in a row that the figure was the highest since the present classification system was started in May 1955," the Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration noted.

In April 1974, the number of job markets that fitted the Labor Dept.'s definition of substantial unemployment was 43. The list of areas with substantial joblessness reached the previous high of 101 in April 1961, but that was topped in March when the list swelled to 105.

The 22 newly listed areas raising the total to 127 in April are Birmingham and Mobile, Ala.; Little Rock-North Little Rock, Ark.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Baton Rouge, La.; Baltimore; Minneapolis-St. Paul; Manchester, N.H.; Rochester, N.Y.; Columbus, Ohio; Harrisburg, Lancaster and Reading, Pa.; Charleston and Greenville-Spartanburg, S.C.; Chattanooga, Memphis and Nashville, Tenn.; Beaumont-Port Arthur-Orange, Corpus Christi and San Antonio in Texas, and Charleston, W.Va.

In all of the newly classified areas except Mobile, Jacksonville, Baton Rouge, Charleston, S.C., San Antonio, and Charleston, W.Va.,

House Acts To Extend Voting Law

The House approved a 10-year extension of the Voting Rights Act and widened its jurisdiction to include Spanish-speaking Americans and other "language minorities" as well as southern blacks.

Also in the bill that now goes to the Senate is a permanent nationwide ban on the use of literacy tests as a qualification for voting.

The original Voting Rights Act, in 1965, barred literacy tests in sections of the country where they had been used as a subterfuge to keep Negroes from registering to vote.

When the law was renewed for another five years, in 1970, Congress wrote in a nationwide ban on literacy tests to run until Aug. 6, 1975, when the present law expires. The House-passed bill would make the ban permanent.

Breakthrough in California:

Bargaining Law Set For Farm Workers

Sacramento—A new collective bargaining law will give California's farm workers the right to pick the union they want to represent them, starting Aug. 28. They will vote in state-supervised collective bargaining elections, to be held within seven days after workers on a farm have petitioned for union representation.

All segments of labor supported the new farm labor law—including the United Farm Workers, other AFL-CIO affiliates with members who could be affected, and the Teamsters.

It also had the backing of major farm employers, including a number of growers who had signed contracts with the Teamsters in an effort to push out or keep out the UFW.

Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr., who helped shape the bill, called the legislature into special session so that it could be passed as an emergency measure and take effect after 90 days. Otherwise, it would have been delayed until 1976.

The astonishingly broad support for the bill after some last-minute clarifications was reflected in the bipartisan 31-7 vote in the state Senate, followed by 64-10 approval in the Assembly. Brown signed the measure on June 5th.

If the bill works as its sponsors anticipate, workers on each farm will decide which union, if any, will bargain for them through a procedure that is similar but not identical to federal labor law.

Existing contracts, most of them held by the Teamsters, will not be bars to a representation election

White House Forecast Grim on Job Outlook

The Ford Administration presented new economic forecasts acknowledging that the recession is worse than it anticipated in February and that the prospect of a return to full employment in this decade is virtually nil.

In its midyear review of the 1976 budget and related economic data, the White House predicted joblessness for 1975 as a whole will average 8.7 percent, or about 8 million unemployed workers, instead of the 8.1 percent estimated earlier.

Chairman Alan Greenspan of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, briefing reporters on the revised outlook, predicted the nation's unemployment rate—8.9 percent in April—would peak at a level "modestly above" 9 percent "in the next several months" before turning downward.

The White House also predicted a larger drop in the nation's 1975 real gross national product—the value of the total output of goods and services adjusted for inflation.

Labor Protests Moves For Tariff Concessions

The AFL-CIO called for the tightening of tariff regulations on job-eroding imports while urging Congress to reject Trade Act amendments that would expand the list of countries qualifying for duty-free shipments of products to U.S. markets.

In a statement submitted to a House Trade subcommittee and to the International Trade Commission, the federation warned that the American economy could not absorb the additional shock of zero tariffs at this time.

With the nation's official unemployment rate at 8.9 percent, the statement noted, a program of encouraging more imports into the United States would result in more lost jobs and continued unemployment for millions of American workers.

It said Congress should repeal Title V of the 1974 Trade Act under which tariff-free preferences could be extended to all but a few countries. Proposals now before Congress would lift the restrictions against most of the remaining countries and thus widen the list of countries in line for preferred tariff treatment.

"Opening U.S. markets to more imported products at a time of record U.S. joblessness is not simply momentary bad timing," the

Labor Publications Face New Postal Rate Boost

A proposal to cut the cost of mailing a first-class letter from 10 cents to 8½, making up the lost revenue by raising rates on other types of mail, has aroused strong opposition from users of the U.S. Postal Service and from the service itself. Among other things, the recommendation poses the prospect of sharply higher mailing costs for union publications.

The proposal was advanced by Seymour Wenner, chief administrative law judge (hearing officer) for the Postal Rate Commission, who for the last 20 months has been hearing testimony on an application by USPS for a higher rate schedule.

In accordance with the terms of the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970, the rates asked by USPS back in 1973 have been in effect on a "temporary" basis ever since. It had been expected that they would be made permanent, with minor modifications, by the rate commission and the USPS board of governors—and that after a 100-day wait required by law, USPS would petition for a new rate increase, featuring a 13 cent stamp for letters.

Wenner's decision, if it survives the review and appeals procedures ahead, would block that plan. The law limits any single hike on first-class mail to one-third the old rate; 8½ cents could go only to 11⅓.

However, most of the controversy involves the impact of Wenner's proposal on other classes of mail. For example:

- The present schedule of rate increases on trade union periodicals and others that travel under non-profit second class permits, which provides for annual increments through 1987, is already considered by the International Labor Press Association, AFL-CIO, to be a heavy burden for most unions. Wenner would raise that schedule at an accelerating pace—20 percent this year, 42 percent next year, 63 percent by 1987, at which time a one-ounce labor paper would cost about 4.2 cents to mail. (In 1970 it cost 0.2 cents.)
- Parcel post, though suffering from the competition of the privately-run United Parcel Service, would have to raise its rates 57 percent.
- Air mail letters which USPS wants to abandon in favor of an all-air first class—now the general practice—would go to 15 cents an ounce, but airmail post cards would drop from 11 cents to 10.
- Third class bulk mail, mostly "occupant" advertising, would rise only 7 percent.
- Regular second class mail, nearly all made up of commercial magazines, would pay 24 percent more on editorial content immediately, and 51 percent more—15.7 cents a pound total—at the end of its five-year phasing period. The per-piece charge would reach 3.5 cents. Advertising content would pay proportionate increases on a substantially higher base.

Wenner arrived at these proposals by dismissing the USPS system of calculating postal costs and substituting his own. The key to both systems is how much of each postal cost is "attributable" to the various classes of mail.

The 1970 postal act says that each class of mail must bear the direct and indirect costs attributable to it, plus a "reasonably assignable" share of other costs. But certain preferred classes—nonprofit second class and in-county second class are the major ones—only need to pay their attributable costs.

USPS has calculated attributable costs at just under 50 percent. Wenner says they are 98 percent. Thus the "preferred" classes would get scarcely any preference. Ultimately, under Wenner's theory, a one-ounce labor paper would pay only a bit less than a one-ounce letter.

Wenner's decision is now open to the various parties in the rate case—USPS and nearly 40 private organizations, including ILPA—to file their views with the Postal Rate Commission and argue them orally.

At Anniversary Celebration:

Meany Tribute to ILGWU Hails 75 Years of Progress

New York — Leaders of labor and government joined in the 75th birthday party of the Ladies' Garment Workers, and AFL-CIO President George Meany led the tributes to a union that has pioneered in a host of progressive causes.

Meany spoke of the changes the ILGWU has brought to the garment industry and to the lives of its workers.

Still shockingly vivid, Meany said, is his teen-age recollection of the 1911 Triangle fire in New York that took the lives of 146 workers, most of them young girls.

He remembers also, he told the 1,500 guests at the union's anniversary dinner, "the anger, the militancy, the demonstrations" that led to changes and reforms.

The ILG has been fortunate in its leaders over the years, Meany said. He spoke of his long personal friendship with David Dubinsky, the union's president from 1932 to 1966, and of the leadership of his successor, Louis Stulberg, and Sol C. Chaikin, who is president-elect of the ILGWU and its secretary-treasurer.

Stulberg, recuperating from an operation, was unable to attend the anniversary dinner. But he sent, through Executive Vice President Wilbur Daniels, toastmaster at the dinner, a message of "love and thanks" to the membership and to the men and women who had given the ILG "the strength of their hopes, their dreams, their sacrifices, their courage."

Chaikin pledged to continue to move the union ahead as Dubinsky and Stulberg have done and to work to organize the unorganized.

"Too many of our people live in lousy homes," he said. "Too many of our people go to bed hungry at night."

Meany, the evening's principal speaker, stressed the broad concerns that have marked the ILG's history.

"It was vitally concerned with hours, wages and working conditions for its membership, reflected in better and better collective bargaining agreements," Meany said.

"But the union was concerned with much more—the health of its members, educational and cultural activities for its members."

While virtually the entire labor movement now is aware of the need for political activity, Meany noted that the Ladies' Garment Workers was one of the unions that "led the way."

He quoted as an example of the philosophy that has marked the ILG from its earliest years a 1904 charter asserting that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity."

In furtherance of that "global philosophy," Meany noted the union's support for victims of the Nazi dictatorship in the 1930s and its successful efforts in 1948 to help prevent a Communist takeover of Italy.

The ILG was a leader in achieving women's rights, Meany noted. He suggested that some of today's "well-to-do women's libbers" might read the union's history or look up the record of the Women's Trade Union League "and the role it played in helping to lift women out of the sweatshops."

Some of the early battles are still continuing, Meany noted. The hazard to an earlier generation of workers wasn't just from factory fires, he said. "It was also tuberculosis and the kind of accidents that result from fatigue—the kind of fatigue that comes from working 60 hours a week and then going home to take care of your children."

Meany added: "You would think that by now employers and the government would have fully recognized their responsibility in maintaining a safe working environment. But the fact is that we are still in this fight—with employers constantly seeking ways of undermining and crippling the Occupational Safety & Health Act."

New York's Gov. Hugh Carey and Mayor Abraham Beame were on hand to express their admiration for a union that has played such an important role in the affairs of the city and state. Other prominent public officials from areas where the union's members work sent messages of congratulation.

ANNIVERSARY BANQUET marking the founding of the Ladies' Garment Workers 75 years ago is addressed by AFL-CIO President George Meany in New York. The dinner, attended by numerous labor and government officials, was one of a series of anniversary events the ILGWU is staging.

Steelworkers Endorse Coke Oven Standards

The Steelworkers have called for speedy adoption of a proposed Labor Dept. standard to reduce worker exposure to hazardous coke oven emissions.

The proposal, which has the full endorsement of the USWA, was drafted by an advisory committee of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration that includes three labor representatives.

Recommendations of the advisory panel would provide for fixed standards of air quality, transfer of workers from coke oven areas without loss of pay or seniority, mandatory engineering controls and work practices, and workers' access to their own medical records.

The USWA noted that the recommendations do not cover all the safeguards it had sought, but said the proposed standard would be a long step forward in protecting the health of coke oven workers. The union which represents most of the nation's coke oven workers in the basic steel industry, urged Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop to put the standard into effect as soon as possible since "action is long overdue."

USWA President I. W. Abel had called for the development of coke oven emission standards as far back as July 1971, shortly after OSHA came into being. But little had been done until nine months ago when the advisory committee was formed — largely the result of USWA pressure.

Under the committee's recommendations, a worker could demand to be removed from a coke oven area without affecting his pay or seniority if he felt his health was being endangered by continued exposure to coke oven emissions. If a disagreement developed between the worker and the company, an outside physician would make the final determination.

The recommendations also call for the eventual reduction of coke-oven emissions to 0.2 micrograms of benzo-a-pyrene per cubic meter of air in the work environment. Benzo-a-pyrene is a known cancer-producing agent, the USWA pointed out.

The air quality standard would require detailed monitoring of work areas twice a year for particulates and annually for measuring levels of benzo-a-pyrene.

Employers would have to provide specific medical examinations for all coke oven workers and, for the first time, employes' physicians would have access to the medical records.

Representing the USWA on the advisory committee are District 15 Director Joseph Odorcich and Safety Rep. Daniel Hannan. Steven Wodka of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, is the other labor representative.

Bargaining Law Set For Farm Workers

although they will remain in effect pending a change in union.

Election petitions will be considered only during high-season employment, when the workforce is at least half of the farm's peak employment during the year. The effective date of the law will correspond with high levels of employment in both the lettuce and grape fields—the key areas of competition between the Farm Workers and the Teamsters.

A union can obtain an election by petition of 50 percent of the workforce and a rival union can get a place on the ballot with a 20 percent showing.

Strikes for representation without an election are prohibited and the seven-day time limit between petition and election is intended to preclude delaying tactics that are common under the federal National Labor Relations Act.

An impartial five-member Agricultural Labor Relations Board, whose members are appointed by the governor, will supervise the elections and hear complaints of unfair labor practices.

Once a union is certified, it is free to strike at any time—including the harvest period. For years, farm employer groups had sought to prohibit harvest period strikes in exchange for any form of collective bargaining.

Unfair labor practices under the California law generally follow the precedents of federal labor law.

In the controversial "secondary boycott" area, the California law makes these distinctions:

- Actions by a union to keep struck goods from reaching the market place, such as using picketing to prevent store employes from handling the product, are prohibited.
- Picketing aimed solely at consumers, urging them not to buy a product, is permitted when done by a union that has been certified as the bargaining representative of the striking workers.
- Publicity other than picketing, such as peaceful distribution of leaflets, which asks the public not to buy certain products because the union considers the employer unfair would be allowed only if the union has not lost an election at the establishment producing the boycotted product within the preceding 12 months and no other union has been certified as the representative of the workers there.

One of the problems of interpretation that had concerned some AFL-CIO affiliates was worked out at a conference convened by the State AFL-CIO and incorporated into an amendment added to the bill with agreement of all parties. It makes clear that craft workers, such as building tradesmen using heavy equipment and constructing or repairing structures, will be able to maintain separate bargaining units.

John F. Henning, executive secretary-treasurer of the California AFL-CIO, brought together UFW Director Cesar Chavez, President James Lee of the State Building & Construction Trades Council, and Jerry Breshears, executive officer of a Fruit & Vegetable Workers union affiliated with the Meat Cutters. The fruit and vegetable packing workers will be able to retain their separate units.

The agreement on the final terms of the bill brought a telegram of congratulations from AFL-CIO President George Meany to Henning for "a great job well done."

An enthusiastic rally of 2,000 UFW members and supporters at the state capitol cheered word that all obstacles to the bill's passage had been cleared.

Henning pledged the full support of the state's labor movement in the election campaigns that lie ahead.

Supreme Court Ruling Narrows Antitrust Exemptions for Unions

A 5-4 majority of the Supreme Court opened the door to possible prosecution of unions under federal antitrust laws despite strong precedents and two lower court decisions to the contrary.

The dispute arose when a general contractor in Dallas—the Connell Construction Co.—sought to void an agreement it signed "under protest" promising not to employ non-union plumbing subcontractors in its work. The firm agreed after a local of the Plumbers picketed the jobsite and the contractor's workers walked off the job.

A federal district court ruled that picketing to secure a subcontracting clause is not unlawful and rejected the Connell firm's contention that the union was guilty of illegal restraint of trade.

An appellate court panel last year took the same position, terming the local union's goal of organizing non-union subcontractors legitimate and declaring that the local's efforts to achieve that goal were immune from antitrust penalties.

When the Supreme Court agreed to reivew the case, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce filed a brief in support of the antitrust argument and the AFL-CIO submitted a legal argument on the other side.

The AFL-CIO stressed that Congress and the courts have clearly established that a union's efforts to protect wages and working conditions do not violate antitrust laws, even if the intent is to eliminate competition based on wages and benefits paid to workers. There was no allegation, the federation noted, that the union action was the result of any "conspiracy" between the union and organized subcontractors.

The Supreme Court majority, which included all four appointees of former President Nixon, contended that the union action was subject to antitrust laws because it "indiscriminately excluded nonunion subcontractors from a portion of the market, even if their competitive advantages were not derived from substandard wages and working conditions."

Congress in 1959 specifically excluded the construction and garment industry from the labor law's ban on so-called hot cargo agreements. But the court majority sought to get around that exemption by contending that it only applied when the union seeking protection against use of non-union subcontractors has a collective bargaining relationship with the prime contractor. In this case, the Plumbers did not bargain for the Connell firm's direct employes, who were in other building trades.

The court did not hold that the antitrust laws had been violated, but it sent the case back to the lower court for trial on the issue. The four Nixon appointees were joined by Justice Byron R. White in the decision.

A dissent by the four other justices stressed that Congress clearly regulated union economic pressure against a "secondary" employer under the National Labor Relations Act and has repeatedly rejected attempts to bring such cases under the antitrust laws.

The majority decision of the Supreme Court was hailed by the Chamber of Commerce in a statement declaring that it "reaffirms the Chamber's long-held view that organized labor does not operate outside antitrust laws."

Both the Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers have campaigned for years to bring unions under antitrust laws—a return to the era when workers banding together for their economic protection were regarded as engaged in a "conspiracy" in restraint of trade.

In an 8-1 decision in another labor case, the Supreme Court limited the extent of judicial review of a decision by the Secretary of Labor not to order a new election for union office under the Landrum-Griffin Act.

The case involved a claim by a defeated candidate for district director of the Steelworkers in a 1973 election which he lost by 907 votes out of 24,000 cast.

After a Labor Dept. investigation, the losing candidate was told that a new election would not be warranted. He sought to challenge the refusal in court, was turned down by a federal district judge but an appellate court sent the case back for a trial-type inquiry into the reasons for the Secretary of Labor's decision.

The Supreme Court held that the courts may not substitute their judgment for that of the Secretary of Labor and their only role is to examine the statement of reasons given by the Secretary of Labor to determine whether his decision is "irrational" and "arbitrary and capricious."

Clothing Workers Divert Pay Raise To Bolster Health Insurance Fund

New York—Members of the Clothing Workers employed in the men's and boys' clothing industry have voted to forego temporarily a wage increase due them June 2 to keep their health and welfare benefits program solvent.

Under the ACWA's agreement with the industry, workers were slated to receive a 27.5 cent hourly wage boost from June 2 to Sept. 29, as well as a cost-of-living increase amounting to another 4 cents.

As ratified recently by the union's members, the 31.5-cent raise will go instead to ACWA's social insurance fund to cover members and their dependents for the next four months. The wage boost will be reflected in workers' paychecks after Sept. 29.

The temporary diversion "will secure the stability of the union's welfare fund in the face of catastrophic economic conditions and will assure ACWA members in the men's and boys' clothing industry and their dependents, both working and laid off, a continuation of vital health, welfare and pension benefits," President Murray H. Finley and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman declared.

The union noted that coverage for workers in the men's and boys' clothing field was in danger of being severely curtailed or suspended due to several factors. The recession, the worst since the end of World War II, has been particularly devastating in the men's and boys' clothing industry.

"Unemployment in the industry has reached over 25 percent, the highest of any manufacturing industry in the United States," Finley and Sheinkman observed.

An estimated 30,000 workers in the industry have been laid off, they noted. Under the union's contract with the industry, these workers and their dependents are receiving extended health and welfare benefits.

Even before the recession, however, two other factors threatened the stability of the union's social insurance fund.

"The rise in imports from low-wage foreign nations . . . had forced many American manufacturers to close their doors and made thousands of Clothing Workers jobless," the union said in a statement.

In addition, the fund's plight had been worsened by the steady rise in hospital costs—more than 50 percent higher than was anticipated when ACWA negotiated its contract with the industry in June 1974, Finley and Sheinkman observed.

The union's leadership denounced the economic policies of the Nixon and Ford Administrations "which have led the nation into this sorry plight." They added:

"The health, hospital, surgical and allied benefits which will continue for employed and laid-off ACWA members in the men's and boys' clothing industry . . . will enable our members to cope with a disastrous situation which they had no hand in fashioning."

Plate Printers Set Up Craft, Industry Unit

New York—Delegates to the 76th convention of the Plate Printers, Die Stampers & Engravers approved the formation of a membership committee to help develop programs to keep the union abreast of changes in the craft and the industry.

President Constantine Trochanis noted that prospects for the membership appear bright as the demand for their skills is on the upswing. He stressed the need for the union to maintain an effective apprenticeship program to fill job opportunities in the craft.

Of the union's 400 members, 90 are apprentices. The membership is engaged in the printing of U.S., Canadian and foreign currencies, stock certificates, bonds and other documents.

The 15 delegates representing U.S. and Canadian locals at the week-long convention re-elected Trochanis to his seventh two-year term. Other officers re-elected are Sec.-Treas. James Donegan, Jr., Vice Presidents Harold Ryan and John M. Kuiack, and Legislative Rep. Edward Snipes.

Delegates selected Ottawa as the site for the union's 1977 convention.

Two Anniversaries

A COINCIDENCE OF ANNIVERSARIES provides the proper time for examining parallels in the histories of our nation and our union. Even as we prepare to celebrate the bicentennial of one and the 75th year of the other, both are being challenged by tests of purpose and achievement.

Two centuries ago, brave warriors and wise statesmen created the first nation rid of kings and emperors. They assigned freedom to all the inhabitants thereof and in ancient words proclaimed liberty throughout the land.

But despite lives sacrificed, blood spilled in battle, hardships endured by colonial families in the bitter winters of the revolutionary era, freedom turned out to be a restricted blessing. Chattel slaves, before the Civil War, and wage slaves afterward were denied the full promise of the Declaration of Independence.

Within half a century of the American Revolution, party politics became the great game of consolidating and wielding power. Commerce, and later big business, developed corporate structures for whom the production of goods and services was secondary to the maximizing of profits.

Bursting with energy—its population expanding, its natural resources as gigantic as a continent—our nation became the envy and hope of the world. But even at the time of its peak power and soaring wealth, men and women labored endless hours, drew death in with every dust-laden breath in mine and sweatshop and allowed its children to be stunted by locking them into clattering mills.

Early in the 19th Century, workers seeking to improve the lives of their families through organized action were denied the right of combination enjoyed by their employers, and instead were brought to trial on charges of conspiracy. Captains of industry hobnobbed with legislators on all levels of government, with the result that law and public policy remained hostile to labor unions. Industrial servitude mocked the political freedom announced by the Founding Fathers.

OUR UNION, born in the brutal environment of slum and sweatshop, also had its founders, its times of bitter trial and battle and its triumphs in the cause of democracy. Our founders, like those of two centuries ago, had come to a new land in pursuit of freedom. We called our battle strikes, and our battle fields were picket lines. We stated our vision of human dignity in terms of wages, work hours, collective bargaining and industrial responsibility.

Today we confront doubts about national purposes and morale. Power and wealth have beclouded the vision. Everywhere—except in the ranks of the trade union movement—the controlling principle is for the self-aggrandizement of power and wealth.

Our union—and the great labor movement of which we are a part—marches to a different call. Our faith is that all Americans are inevitably involved with each other and with the rest of the world; that we rise together or not at all.

The good works and inspiring history of our union which we now celebrate testify to the power of that faith; the doubts that now bedevil our country make a return to that faith by all Americans a national urgency.

A Word Edgewise:

Bicentennial Faces Puzzle Of Benedict Arnold's Career

By John P. Roche

A FRIEND OF MINE learned in such matters tells of successive editions of the official Soviet history of the Bolshevik Revolution. The first had as its centerpiece a photograph of Lenin, Trotsky, Bukharin, Zinoviev, Kamenev and — standing modestly in the background — Josef Stalin. As the years and the purges accumulated, the characters in the photograph decreased rapidly until in 1936 only Lenin and Stalin (now in the foreground) remained. The text, of course, reflected this transformation. After all, Trotsky, Bukharin, Zinoviev, and Kamenev had been uncovered (and the last three confessed) as counter-revolutionary agents of imperialism. Similarly in 1954, after secret police chief Beria had been exposed as a CIA agent, libraries were sent a page on the Bering Sea to replace the item on Beria in the "Great Soviet Encyclopedia."

What brought this to mind is the terrible problem that faces the bicentennial celebrants in coping with Benedict Arnold. For example, the re-enactment of the capture of Fort Ticonderoga was done with Arnold in low silhouette, although he was as responsible for that superb coup de main as Ethan Allen. (Ironically, later as a prisoner Allen offered to join the British in return for a secure grant of what is now Vermont but was then claimed by both New Hampshire and New York. However, this information did not come to light for almost a century, when the papers of Sir Guy Carleton, the Governor-General of Canada, were published.)

But how can Arnold be omitted from the march to Quebec? Perhaps it could be called Burr's March—Aaron Burr was an officer in the expedition—but then Burr too does not emerge from American history exactly smelling of roses. The attempt to seize Quebec was a brilliant strategic maneuver; it failed by a whisker. Arnold was wounded in the assault: he did not watch battles through a telescope.

Probably Arnold's greatest contribution was a defeat. As Carleton's army began to invade New York, planning to move down Lake Champlain to meet a British force coming up the Hudson and thus divide the New England states from the others, Arnold—who among other things was a seaman—built a mini-navy on Lake Champlain. Carleton in turn had to stop his advance and bring down ships. In the resulting battle of Valcour Bay, the Americans were defeated, but the British timetable was thrown off a year and they abandoned the pincers movement.

Then, when in 1777 the British under "Gentleman Johnnie" Burgoyne again invaded New York, Arnold was everywhere. Deprived of any active command because of the jealousy of his totally incompetent superior, Gen. Horatio Gates, he was simply wandering around the Saratoga battlefield, and ran into some American troops literally looking for a leader. Never a man to miss a good fight, Arnold led the successful storming of the crucial British position on Bemis Heights—and, as at Quebec, was out front and collected another bullet.

IN SHORT, BEFORE HIS TREASON Benedict Arnold was one of the key figures in the American military command. Recall that it was the defeat of Burgoyne at Saratoga that tipped the balance at Versailles and brought the French into the war as full allies (unlike the Spanish who, while declaring war on Britain in hopes of recovering Gibraltar, refused to recognize the independence of the United States). And the role of these French "mercenaries" (as they would doubtless have been called in the Vietnam era) was decisive in the final defeat of Cornwallis at Yorktown.

Although there is some dispute among military historians of the War of Independence over the relative capabilities of Arnold, Nathanael Greene and "Mad" Anthony Wayne, there is no argument about Arnold's standing as one of Washington's three most talented subordinates. Thus, unless we are going to adopt Soviet-style historiography, Arnold's accomplishments deserve to be celebrated as much as his subsequent treason should be lamented and condemned. Those who find this proposition unpalatable might meditate on the fact that the Byzantine Church honored Judas Iscariot.

Kirkland to Insurance Workers:

President's Battle of the Deficit 'Wrong War at Wrong Time'

The following is excerpted from a speech by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland to the Insurance Workers convention at Miami Beach, Fla.

IN A MODERN, COMPLEX, industrial society, the budget is the most accurate measure that we have of the responsiveness of the President of the United States and of the Congress to the needs of the people they were elected to serve. It is the most effective balance wheel that we have to sustain a stable and expanding economy.

The deficit is a measure, not of the largess, the generosity or the wastefulness of our government. It is a reflection of heavy unemployment and a declining gross national product which will be overcome only when unemployment is reduced and when the product rises. There really is no other way.

Today more than 9 million Americans are unemployed and a million of them have become so discouraged by the prospects that they have stopped even looking for work. Nearly four million are forced to work part-time because there just aren't enough full-time jobs, although they would certainly like to have them.

Twenty-five million Americans will be unemployed during some period this year. The rate of bankruptcies, both personal and corporate, is at a record high, the highest level since the keeping of these statistics was initiated. In the most human terms, all of these figures are just a form of shorthand for something that is much harder to describe — extreme hardship, crippled family life and case after case after case of personal ruin and personal tragedy.

There have been drastic changes in this country since the last Great Depression in the '30s and I believe that most of the consequences of those changes have resulted in the perception of economic pain or the threshold of pain being considerably lower than it was in those days.

It seems so long ago and the rate and pace of change has been so great that we sometimes don't realize the disparity of conditions. I want to mention just a couple. And they effect adversely today, with any decline in the economy, first those who are most vulnerable and least able to cope with any episode of unemployment or hardship.

In the 1930s, better than 50 percent of the black population of this country was engaged in agriculture and lived in rural communities. Today that figure is down at the level of 5 or 6 percent. There has been a massive influx, as people where driven off the farms of the South and other parts of the country, into the urban areas.

It is an urban society and it makes a difference. It makes a 10 percent level of unemployment just about as bad and just about as painful as perhaps 15 or 20 percent was back in these days of a more rural life. A fall is a little bit harder to take when you fall on the pavement, when you fall on the concrete, then when you fall into a bed of collard greens or cabbage.

And that difference is only partly overcome by unemployment compensation and by welfare. Certainly it is not overcome at all in terms of human aspirations.

Today when we need a sustained growth rate of 6 percent or better to reduce unemployment and to provide jobs for new workers coming into the labor market in droves every year, the gross national product—which is the measure of everything, all the goods and services that are produced in this country—is falling at an annual rate of 11.3 percent.

What has been the response of President Ford to this real and imminent crisis? He has officially projected a budget and a program which solidly contemplates a continuing level of heavy unemployment, leaving us with at least 7 million people jobless well into the year 1978.

The President has chosen to wage a battle of the budget and to stonewall the deficit. Most of you, I'm sure, saw him on television some time back where he had a chart and he drew that line for the American public to see, the point beyond which we shall not go in terms of the deficit.

Unfortunately all of those members of Congress that we helped to elect are in the process of delivering themselves into his hands.

THIS IS THE WRONG WAR, in the wrong place, at the wrong time. A war should be declared on unemployment, not on the deficit. For the deficit is a product of unemployment. For every percentage point that the unemployment rate is brought down, some $16 billion of additional revenues flow into the Treasury of the United States.

If unemployment were to be reduced, as it should be, by 6 points—to the same level as when Richard Nixon took office—there would be $96 billion of additional federal revenue and the problem today would be that of a substantial budget surplus instead of a $60 billion deficit.

Can the country stand a much larger level of federal expenditures and programs and a substantial increase in the national debt? The answer is, "Yes, we can. We have in the past and we must."

The business community, industrialists say that the problem will be solved by more profits, more incentives, more tax loopholes and less regulation. Our liberal friends, the academics and intellectuals, are completely cowed by the argument of the deficit and the budget.

The Administration says, "hold the budget line. We'll wield the veto." And somehow, sometime, some mysterious, unseen hand will, as a reward for their stern moralism at the expense of working people, descend from heaven and put everything to right in God's own good time, of course.

We say produce the jobs, put America back to work and higher profits, lower deficits will follow as they should. We propose to fight it out on this line if it takes all summer.

'Shortsighted, Callous':

Ford's Hold-the-Line Approach Ignores Critical Human Needs

PRESIDENT FORD'S hold-the-line approach to efforts to put jobless Americans back to work and ease the impact of the deep recession is shortsighted in both human and economic terms, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman charged.

Citing the President's proposal to reduce the 8 percent cost of living rise due social security beneficiaries under the law, Seidman described the move as "cruel and heartless." He said if the President thought Congress would go along with the idea, "he was being extremely callous to the needs of the elderly, and the disabled, and the orphans, and the widows who depend on social security."

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Seidman said that while social security benefits have "gone up appreciably" over the last few years, those improvements were made on payments that were at "atrociously low levels" in terms of the needs of those Americans who depend on them.

He said that even with those improvements and even if the cost of living escalator "is kept up to where it should be," social security benefits still lag behind needs, "because the adjustments take place at drawn-out intervals." Reports of elderly citizens buying pet food for their own meals and others "scrounging in garbage cans" for food show how inadequate those benefits often are, he said.

Seidman said many members of Congress "have been fooled by the Ford Administration into, in effect, accepting the line that the budget deficit has to be held at . . . some artificial figure," despite the highest unemployment rate since the great depression. He cited the failure of both Congress and the President to include health insurance for the unemployed in their budget estimates and said the congressional committees are "afraid to even raise" the issue now.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

WHEN THE 94th CONGRESS convened on Jan. 14, Speaker of the House Carl Albert declared: "I have assured the chairmen of the appropriate committees that national health insurance will be one of the first bills."

As of June this seems to have been the high point of national health insurance. The "appropriate committees" that Albert assured have succeeded only in getting snarled in a jurisdictional mesh that would even defy a Rube Goldberg. And two Senate committees are battling for jurisdiction, too.

Hanging in the balance is not just health insurance but health coverage for the unemployed. Both are desperately needed.

The Ford Administration has made its questionable contribution in two ways: a threat to veto a meaningful health security bill and completely abdicating responsibility in declining to sponsor any health insurance measure in the 94th Congress.

There is solid support behind National Health Security. It has been sponsored by 95 members of the House and 17 members of the Senate and the number is growing. But if its supporters and other Democratic and Republican liberals can't resolve differences, health security will be little more than a 1976 campaign issue.

The Senate Labor & Public Welfare Committee has approved a measure, sponsored by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), to pay for health care for the jobless through general revenues. However, this is being held captive by the Finance Committee headed by Sen. Russell Long (D-La.) Senate Finance Committee.

The critical issue is private health insurance carriers. Kennedy, chief sponsor of National Health Security, wants to bypass the private carriers in health security.

He contends, as does organized labor, that private carriers take a sizable share of the health insurance dollar and provide no incentive for cost control. Long is committed to catastrophic insurance which, at this stage, can just muddy the waters.

Kennedy is urging that emergency legislation for the jobless, financed through federal revenues be passed now and be separated from national health insurance.

ON THE HOUSE SIDE is an even more complex jurisdictional tangle. The Ways & Means Health subcommittee, chaired by Rep. Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.), has approved health insurance for the jobless. However, this bill goes far beyond the emergency measure and calls for a permanent plan covering ex-employes. The program would be financed through private carriers.

Battling the Rostenkowski subcommittee for health legislation jurisdiction is the Interstate & Foreign Commerce Subcommittee on Health & Environment chaired by Rep. Paul G. Rogers (D-Fla.). To fortify its jurisdiction, the Commerce Committee disapproved the Ways & Means bill and then approved its own substitute dropping the permanent part of the Ways & Means bill.

The conflicting moves and the host of parliamentary questions they raise have brought action on the proposal to a halt. Hoping to avert a bitter floor fight, key members of the two committees have been meeting to try to work out the jurisdictional problems.

Some observers believe that Rostenkowski would be willing to drop the permanent section of the jobless health insurance which would remove private carriers. However, the real issue is jurisdiction and which committee will handle national health insurance.

There's an additional roadblock, too. Neither the Ford budget nor the congressional budget provide any funds for health insurance for the unemployed.

If there is going to be any congressional action in this critical field, it will be initially up to the House leadership—Albert, Majority Leader Thomas O'Neill (D-Mass.) and Philip Burton (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Democratic Caucus.

If they cannot unsnarl the jurisdictional and fiscal tangle there won't be any health insurance protection for jobless workers and prospects for national health insurance, even in 1976, are dim.

PRESIDENT FORD's hold-the-line approach to job-creation and other steps to turn the tide of recession is "shortsighted" in both human and economic terms, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, center, charged on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Harry Conn, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Peter Milius of the Washington Post. The AFL-CIO produced public service program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

ILO Condemns Slaying Of Chile Union Leaders

Geneva—A fact-finding commission appointed by the International Labor Organization to investigate charges of reprisals against trade union leaders following the 1973 overthrow of Chile's Marxist President Salvador Allende reported that "many" labor officials were summarily executed or tortured to death because of their labor activities.

The commission noted that Chile's present military government "has failed to prove that these deaths took place for reasons other than that these persons were trade unionists or that they exercised trade union activities."

In a 122-page report, the commission said it had submitted to the Chilean government a "non-exhaustive" list of 110 labor leaders alleged to have been killed or executed up to the end of 1973. The report, just released after a four-week on-the-spot investigation in Chile at the end of 1974, said the government confirmed the death of 33.

The three-member panel said evidence made it clear that one of the government's aims was to "eliminate or prevent any large-scale opposition to its policy" by trade unions or their leaders.

The commission was headed by Jose Luis Bustamente y Rivero of Peru, a former president of the International Court of Justice. The panel heard witnesses here before going to Chile last November where its members conferred with Chilean authorities and visited detention camps.

The ILO's Governing Body, a tripartite organization representing labor, management and government, appointed the commission a year ago to conduct the investigation with the agreement of the Chilean government. It acted following strong protests from trade union groups throughout the world. The AFL-CIO at its 1973 convention adopted a resolution condemning the Chilean junta for its "sweeping suppression of political and trade union rights" and summary executions of political foes.

The Chilean government, meanwhile, has requested help from the ILO in reshaping its labor laws to insure a better future for Chilean workers. The request came from Chile's under secretary of labor, Luiz Ribalta Puig, in the wake of the factfinding commission's report.

A nation that "recognizes it has made mistakes," and has been passing through a difficult transition period "deserves the help that the ILO can give it," he said.

Expressing dissatisfaction with provisions in the projected revision of the Chilean labor code, the ILO commission made a series of proposals to "guarantee to the workers unhindered enjoyment of their trade union rights."

The Governing Body expressed "grave concern" over the commission's findings and called on the Chilean government to make a progress report by Oct. 1 on the action taken to carry out the commission's recommendations.

At a brief meeting prior to the ILO's annual June conference, the Governing Body made initial plans for a special session next year of all its member states to grapple with employment problems on a global scale.

U.S. Worker Delegate Irving Brown of the AFL-CIO observed that the ILO has a unique contribution to make on all economic and related issues because of its tripartite structure.

"Without the support of labor, proposals and resolutions of any international agency remain nothing but bits of paper," Brown declared.

CWA Strikers Score Gains At Rochester

Rochester, N.Y.—The 1,500 members of Communications Workers Local 1170 have approved a new contract with the Rochester Telephone Corp., ending a strike that began more than six months ago.

The agreement will provide CWA members wage increases and cost-of-living adjustments amounting to an estimated 34.1 percent over the next three years, plus fringe-benefit improvements.

Local 1170 negotiators hailed as a breakthrough the company's agreement to a completely union-administered health and welfare fund with improved company contributions.

The contract was approved by a margin of 3 to 1. Rochester Telephone Corp. is an independent telephone company outside the Bell System network.

The agreement was reached with assistance from the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. CWA President Glenn Watts participated in the bargaining sessions.

Convention Action:

Insurance Workers Approve Dues Hike, Expand Services

Miami Beach—Delegates to the Insurance Workers biennial convention here approved a dues and per capita increase to finance expanded services and compensate for the inflation of the past two years.

Overwhelming approval of a $2-a-month dues hike—to a total of $7.50 a month—came on the recommendation of a broad-based committee that President William A. Gillen said represented "all political views in the union."

Fifty cents of the increase will be earmarked to provide increased services to locals and members under a structure that divides the nation into 10 service areas.

Local unions within each service area will be encouraged to use the earmarked 50 cents to set up an area servicing staff. If this proves impractical, the international union will furnish the services and use the earmarked funds to provide help in such areas as grievance handling.

Gillen said the $1.50 addition to the union's per capita will avoid a cutback in legislative and educational programs—both of which have been expanded since the last convention—and will permit continued organizing progress.

He told the delegates that union education programs are "a necessity, not a frill."

At the state level, the union is pressing for laws that would protect against lapse of insurance during a strike by insurance agents and require adequate training before an agent can receive a state license.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland spoke to the delegates about labor's program for economic recovery and contrasted it with a Ford Administration budget keyed to continued high unemployment "well into the year 1978."

The jobless statistics, Kirkland said, are actually "a form of shorthand for something that is much harder to describe—extreme hardship, crippled family life and case after case of personal ruin and personal tragedy."

He noted that the nation and especially its black population is much more urban than at the time of the Great Depression of the 1930s and that a 10 percent unemployment rate can be as painful as a higher rate in a more rural setting.

"A fall is a little bit harder to take when you fall on the pavement," Kirkland suggested, "then when you fall into a bed of collard greens or cabbage."

As for President Ford's policies, "a war should be declared on unemployment, not on the deficit."

The convention's other major speaker, Director W. J. Usery, Jr., of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Services, foresaw continued union growth in the white-collar sector and noted that in Europe "white-collar workers are creating and joining unions at a mind-boggling pace."

Gillen reported to the convention continued organizing successes and a long string of victories in representation elections, mostly in small units expanding the union's bargaining base with the major insurance companies.

He said the union plans to step up efforts to organize clerks in district offices where the agents are organized and urged a broadening of the union's base because the era of debit agents calling at homes weekly to collect premiums is becoming "a thing of the past."

Delegates approved a $3,000 annual raise for Gillen, raising his salary to $20,000 a year, and increases for other officers.

Dock Workers Settle Container Rule Dispute

New York—The Longshoremen and waterfront employers in six North Atlantic seaports have resolved a two-month dispute with a new agreement on rules for handling ocean cargoes moving in containers.

Announced jointly by ILA President Thomas W. Gleason and President James J. Dickman of the Council of North Atlantic Shipping Associations, the agreement affects some 35,000 union members in ports from Boston to Hampton Roads, Va.

In addition, the settlement is also expected to set a pattern for settlement of a similar dispute involving ILA locals and a separate group of employers in South Atlantic ports ranging from Florida to North Carolina, the ILA and CONASA officials said.

CONASA is bargaining representative of port management groups in Boston, Providence, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Hampton Roads.

Basically, the new rules require that "steamship hauled" containers loaded or unloaded within 50 miles of one of the six ports must involve the work of ILA members.

The dispute arose when the union charged its members were being denied container loading and discharging work on piers that they were entitled to under rules agreed to in June 1974. Under a clause in the 1974 agreement, the union suspended the rules on Apr. 28, alleging that some shippers were violating them.

The new terms, contained in a supplemental agreement, restore the 1974 container rules and set up a new Council of Container Carriers to police the rules.

ILA's overall contract with port employers expires on Sept. 30, 1977.

Congress Urged to Reject Moves To Grant New Tariff Concessions

AFL-CIO stressed. It pointed out that even the Ford Administration's relatively optimistic projections are that 6 to 8 million workers will be unemployed during the next five years while underemployment will remain at record levels.

It also pointed that declines in U.S. output are not considered temporary. The nation's industrial production dropped 11.3 percent in the first quarter of 1975 even after more than a year of recession, and manufacturing plants are currently operating at 68.3 percent of capacity.

"No one knows when, if or how this production loss will be reversed. Production cutbacks have been occurring in virtually every type of manufacturing—particularly in those industries where imports from low-wage countries have already been rising in recent years."

Noting that the Administration's proposals to cut tariffs are aimed at the so-called developing countries, the statement cited rapid increases of imports from those nations in recent years. It pointed out that between 1967 and 1973, imports of manufactured goods from developing nations rose to more than $8 billion—a larger amount than total imports of all products from those countries in 1967.

"Furthermore," the statement stressed, "the imports from these countries were often produced by multinational firms which were encouraged to locate and expand in these countries by the combination of U.S. and foreign laws that served to their advantage in taxes, labor costs and other benefits."

The people of the developing countries where multinational firms have relocated are being exploited for their low wages, rather than being benefited, the federation said. As examples it cited wage rates in Haiti of $1.60 a day, Colombia's 25 cents an hour and Brazil's basic wage of $60 a month.

The real beneficiaries of the generalized preference scheme are often the well-know multinational companies, including some which recently were accused of paying bribes to foreign government officials, the statement charged.

"The end result is that the companies prosper, the worker is exploited and the U.S. consumer pays virtually the same price as on a U.S.-made item. For the millions of Americans at home, the loss is even greater than the price alone. Americans must absorb losses in their jobs, losses in the tax base and their living standard."

Because of provisions in the Trade Act and the way it is being interpreted, the federation said the burden of proof falls on American producers and workers to show due cause why "thousands of products from scores of countries should not get special entry into the U.S. market to destroy many thousands more jobs."

"We do not believe that Congress intended that such a blanket challenge to our endangered economy could result from their acquiescence to the Administration's request for authority to negotiate to 'improve America's standing' by granting preferences," the federation said.

AFL-CIO Appeal Backed:

Labor Moves to Aid Indochina Refugees

Endorsement by the Arkansas State AFL-CIO of the national federation's appeal typified expanding efforts of labor groups to help Vietnam and Cambodian refugees and their families deal with problems of relocation, housing and employment.

The Arkansas federation urged local unions and central bodies in the state to consider sponsoring refugees. It backed the statement adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its recent spring meeting as being "in the best tradition of the labor movement and the long established principles that we are our brother's keepers and that an injury to one is the concern of all."

The Executive Council called upon all members of AFL-CIO affiliated organizations to make the refugees welcome in their communities. Since then, organized labor has moved swiftly to cooperate with government efforts to ease the problems facing the 130,000 Indochinese refugees being resettled in the United States.

Executive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning of the California State AFL-CIO will lead a delegation of central body leaders and community service representatives in his state to Camp Pendleton, Calif., on June 13, for a firsthand look at the refugee center there.

The California labor leaders will meet with camp officials, representatives of some 10 national voluntary agencies that are working toward resettling the refugees, and the refugees themselves. Pendleton is one of four military installations where the refugees are being processed and temporarily housed.

Other installations are at Fort Indiantown Gap, Pa.; Fort Chaffee, Ark., and Eglin Air Force Base, Fla.

The first labor organization offering to sponsor a refugee family was the United Labor Agency, Inc., of Cleveland. Its executive director, Mel J. Witt, wired AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis:

"In the interest of promoting Americanism and sharing the wealth of our country in the time of need of others, we wish to be the sponsors of two Vietnamese families." Witt noted his agency's request was a follow-through on the commitment made by President Ford and AFL-CIO President George Meany to provide all possible help for the refugees.

Meany is a member of a presidentially-appointed advisory panel on the resettlement of the Indochinese refugees.

Much of the AFL-CIO's effort to assist the refugees is being channeled through the Dept. of Community Services, with the cooperation of the Departments of International Affairs and Organization & Field Services, and the Human Resources Development Institute.

Perlis, as Meany's representative, recently toured the refugee center at Fort Chaffee, along with members of the White House advisory committee. He said the government "is running a good operation there," but added "the big problem is going to be resettlement and, finally, integration" into the American way of life.

Two major problems make resettlement of the Indochinese refugees more difficult than that of the Cubans and Hungarians who fled from Communist repression in the '50s, Perlis observed.

"First, there's a higher rate of unemployment," he said, "and there is no solid Vietnamese community in the U.S. So there's going to be some culture shock for them."

At Fort Chaffee, incidentally, are most of the Vietnamese union leaders and their families who made their way out of South Vietnam in the days just before the Communist takeover. Among them is President Tran Quoc Buu of the Vietnamese Federation of Labor.

In its statement, the Arkansas AFL-CIO noted the presence of the Vietnamese union members at Fort Chaffee, and declared "they will always be welcome in the Arkansas house of labor."

RESCUE OF VIETNAMESE union officials with the fall of South Vietnam is discussed at the annual meeting of the Asian American Free Labor Institute's board of trustees at the AFL-CIO headquarters. AAFLI Executive Director Morris Paladino, top center, also presented his annual report and discussed the outlook for Asian trade unions in the coming year.

Controllers Press to Strengthen Airline Traffic Safety Standards

Minneapolis — A determined drive to improve safety standards on the airline traffic routes of the nation and to push for eventual creation of an independent air traffic control system featured the 7th annual convention of the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization.

Several hundred delegates and members heard President John Leyden predict achievement of these two goals as well as success in joint efforts with other public employe unions to gain adequate comparability pay increases from the federal government this year.

Shortly before the convention, PATCO concluded months of negotiations with the Federal Aviation Agency for a nationwide contract for the controllers. FAA runs the nation's civilian and military air traffic set-up, and PATCO represents an estimated 90 percent of the 15,000 air traffic controllers. They are employed both in airport traffic towers and in regional air traffic control centers.

PATCO is an affiliate of the Marine Engineers Beneficial Association.

The delegates gave strong endorsement to a study brought to the convention by PATCO's safety committee, headed by Vice President David Siegel of Atlanta. The committee, working with a leading safety consultant, C. O. Miller, proposed a four-point program for better air safety.

It charged that the application of "separation standards" for planes in flight, as set by FAA, are far "too loose." The report said the agency is insisting "that controllers do more and more work without proper preparation or safeguards."

The committee also urged a basic reporting system and central data collection facility to provide the controller with "a means to report, with immunity, all those frustrating safety discrepancies which have not been corrected because of an unresponsive FAA."

The PATCO delegates also endorsed the views of Glen A. Gilbert, an air traffic expert. In a study prepared for PATCO, he proposed that the air traffic control functions be removed from FAA and lodged in a proposed U.S. Air Traffic Services Corp. This independant corporation, whose board would be appointed by the President, would represent various groups concerned with air traffic, including the unions.

Gilbert said that such a system, removed from the political influences involved in a government agency, would be able to offer better technical and operational performance in handling air traffic.

The convention heard from a number of technical experts on government personnel policies, as well as from Acting FAA Administrator James Dow and from Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.).

Humphrey won a standing ovation from the delegates—the big majority of them under 40 years of age—when he attacked government policies that have made good housing difficult to find and expensive to rent or buy.

"Muriel and I rattle around in two nice houses now," Humphrey said. "But the time when people need good housing is when kids are growing up, and today it's scarce. It's just not there for the people who need it."

He proposed a home-building program, low-interest mortgages and a grace period of five years before payments have to be made.

In the union's elections, Executive Vice President Robert Poli was re-elected without opposition. Leyden's term as president has two more years to run. Six of the seven regional vice presidents were re-elected, three without opposition. In the southwest district, David Trick was elected on a second ballot in a three-way race to fill the seat of Robert Conditt, who did not seek re-election.

Rep. John J. McFall (D-Calif.), head of the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Transportation, received the PATCO Presidential Citation for service to air transportation.

Strike in Second Month At Sporting Goods Firm

Boulder, Colo.—The Clothing Workers moved into the second month of a strike against the Head division of the AMF conglomerate which manufactures Head skis and tennis rackets and Arthur Ashe tennis rackets here.

The ACWA's Midwest Regional Joint Board recently was certified bargaining agent for Head's 170 production and maintenance workers, and had been attempting to work out a first contract. But the talks were broken off when company negotiators refused even to submit counter proposals.

The strike got under way May 9 after union members earlier had voted by a 98 percent margin to authorize a walkout.

The ACWA said it had learned that Head-AMF management advised the Boulder County sheriff to prepare for a strike before contract negotiations had even begun.

The strike issues are wages, safety and health, and "arbitrary and capricious" personnel policies by Head-AMF, the union said. It reported that management had rejected union wage proposals as "ridiculous."

The union noted that even if the workers were to win their full wage demands, wages at Head-AMF still would be more than $1 an hour less than what AMF pays unionized workers making comparable products such as Harley-Davidson snowmobiles or VOIT basketballs.

"And wages at Head would even then still be over $1 an hour less than unionized Head competitors, such as Wilson tennis rackets, pay their workers," the ACWA stressed.

It charged that company bargaining tactics have made AMF, Inc., one of the most strike-prone firms in the country. Other unions that have been forced to strike the conglomerate in the past year to obtain acceptable contracts at various AMF plant locations include the Rubber Workers, the Auto Workers, the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, the Allied Industrial Workers and the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

UAW Seeks Import Aid For 39,000 at Chrysler

The Auto Workers have petitioned the Labor Dept. for adjustment assistance under the 1974 Trade Act for 39,000 workers laid off by Chrysler Corp. since last October. The UAW cited increased foreign imports from Canada.

The union said that in recent months, Chrysler has transferred substantial production from U.S. plants to the firm's Canadian operations while stepping up its imports of cars to the American market from Canada.

The petition further noted that auto imports have gained a larger share of the U.S. market to cause further unemployment among UAW members in the United States. The union also represents auto workers in Canada.

While 34 other unions have already filed for trade adjustment assistance under the trade act, the UAW's claim for 39,000 workers is by far the largest number affected in one union. It poses a major test of the effectiveness of worker protection clauses in the 1974 Trade Act.

If the Labor Dept. fully honors the union's petition, the claims could provide more than $100 million a year in benefits.

Benefits under the act, when coupled with regular state unemployment compensation, amount to 70 percent of a worker's weekly wage, up to the maximum of the national average wage in manufacturing.

Most workers can collect benefits for up to 52 weeks, in addition to counseling, training, job placement and other services that are available for those declared eligible.

The 39,000 affected UAW members had been employed at 10 Chrysler facilities in the United States—six assembly plants, two trim plants and two engine plants. They include hourly workers, office employes, engineers and nurses.

The UAW noted that in 1973 the union was successful in petitioning the government for nearly $2 million in adjustment assistance for 2,000 Chrysler workers after a Los Angeles assembly plant was shut down because of import competition. The petition was approved under earlier foreign trade legislation.

Under the old Trade Expansion Act of 1962 nearly 48,000 workers were certified eligible for adjustment assistance between 1969 and 1974. But a far larger number of claims were denied. During the first five years that the old act was in effect, all petitions for assistance were rejected by the former U.S. Tariff Commission.

Small groups of workers generally were involved in past petitions for assistance, primarily in such import-affected industries as textiles, footwear, electronics, apparel, glass and other manufactured products.

White House Reassessment:

Economic Prospects Grim for Workers

Real GNP is now expected to dip 3.6 percent instead of 3.3 percent as forecast in February.

At the same time, the Administration stuck to its February forecast of a 1976 jobless rate of 7.9 percent, or about 7.5 million unemployed. Real GNP, however, was projected to rise 6.3 percent from 1975 rather than the initial estimate of 4.8 percent.

For the years 1977 through 1980 inclusive, the revised forecast calls for increases in real GNP of 6.5 percent annually.

"But they don't explain how that will be achieved," AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger commented. "It looks like a simple mathematical exercise in official Administration optimism.

"Even under these optimistic assumptions, they project unemployment rates of 7.2 percent in 1977, 6.5 percent in 1978, 5.8 percent in 1979 and down to 5.1 percent by 1980," Goldfinger pointed out.

"That would mean the number of jobless would be close to 6 million as late as 1979."

Goldfinger noted that even if the Administration's forecasts proved correct, it would mean three successive years—1975, 1976 and 1977—of the highest jobless rates since 1941 when the United States was emerging from the Great Depression.

"It wouldn't be until 1980, under these optimistic assumptions, that the number of unemployed would come down to the neighborhood of 5 million, or 5.1 percent," he pointed out. "There is nothing that approaches full employment in these predictions."

In its revised budget outlook, the White House said this year's deficit is now expected to be $42.6 billion—$7.9 billion above the February estimate — while the estimated deficit for 1976 has increased by $8 billion since February to $59.9 billion, just under the $60 billion deficit limit set by President Ford.

However, these Administration forecasts assume that Congress will go along with Ford's requests for more than $8.5 billion in spending hold-downs for many programs, including a proposal for a 5 percent cap on forthcoming wage comparability increases for federal employes.

The Administration was more optimistic in its projections on changes in the consumer price index, predicting retail prices this year would rise 9.1 percent rather than at the 11.3 percent rate estimated in February. By 1979, the CPI increase is expected to slow down to 4 percent a year.

The White House also noted that federal programs providing unemployment compensation to jobless workers have been costing less than earlier budget estimates, despite the high level of joblessness throughout the nation.

It said total costs in this area were expected to be $4.5 billion below earlier budget estimates during the two fiscal years 1975 and 1976.

The extension of unemployment insurance benefits, together with federal outlays to workers under the Tax Reduction Act of 1975, have helped to slow down the recessionary decline, Goldfinger noted.

But this does not mean the recession is at an end, he declared. Looking ahead, he drew the following scenario:

"At some time in the next few months industrial production and real GNP will stop falling, and the Administration will say the recession is over, that it has bottomed out. But that will be a technical, statistical description.

"In human terms," Goldfinger said, "the Administration expects the effects of recession to remain for at least another four years."

Severe Joblessness Hits Record 127 Key Areas

the rise in joblessness was largely attributable to significant reductions in the metals and machinery industries.

Most of the 16 areas that reported higher unemployment in metals and machinery also reported employment declines in other industries, the Labor Dept. noted.

Many metropolitan areas have unemployment rates far in excess of 6 percent, and well above the national jobless rate which is expected to go over 9 percent when the Labor Dept. issues its May report on jobs.

Areas with the highest jobless rates were Ponce, Puerto Rico, 20.1 percent; Flint, Mich., 18.7 percent; Detroit, 16.1 percent; Providence-Warwick-Pawtucket, R.I., 16 percent; New Bedford, Mass., 15.8 percent, and Mayaguez, P.R., 15.5 percent.

The 22 areas added to the Labor Dept.'s substantial unemployment list in April and the 31 added in March were the largest number of additions to the list since 25 areas were added in March 1961, when the classifications were made on a bimonthly basis.

A labor area consists of a central city or cities and the surrounding territory within commuting distance. Major labor areas usually have at least one central city with a population of 50,000 or more.

Besides the 150 major job centers, the department also lists other smaller areas that meet the substantial unemployment criteria.

In April, the list of smaller labor areas with substantial unemployment swelled to 381, compared to 310 in March. A year earlier, the total was 263.

Ford Makes Veto Hold Up On Job Funds

presidential veto, 49 Republicans had joined in the 293-109 vote which was well over the two-thirds mark.

The vetoed bill had been initiated by the House Democratic leadership in cooperation with the Appropriations Committee, whose members combed programs under their jurisdiction for those where additional funding could have the quickest job-creating impact.

Ford has vetoed 30 bills during his 10 months in office. Only four vetoes have been overridden.

In other congressional developments:

- The House prepared for another veto test—an attempt to override the President's veto of the strip mining bill, a compromise conservation measure that has broad support but is opposed by strip-mining operators, who would be required to restore the land they tear up to original contours before abandoning it.

Ford claimed in his veto message that federal strip mining regulations would result in fewer jobs—a contention sharply challenged at joint hearings by the House and Senate Interior Committees on the reasons for the veto.

Rep. Morris K. Udall (D-Ariz.), who presided at the hearings, accused Administration officials of having concocted "phony" estimates of the economic impact of the legislation to kill the bill.

- The House Rules Committee cleared for floor action the energy conservation bill drawn up by the Ways & Means Committee. The bill includes a number of controversial proposals, including a gasoline tax with provisions for rebates, but the AFL-CIO has termed it "far superior" to President Ford's energy program. The legislation is subject to floor amendments, and changes are considered likely in view of the slim 19-16 margin by which the Ways & Means Committee approved the bill.

- Both the House and Senate are expected to approve a conference report combining middle-income interest subsidies for persons purchasing homes and apartments with a program of government loans to protect persons who lose their jobs from losing their homes through mortgage foreclosures. But a presidential veto appears likely on this measure, too.

House Clears Extension Of Voting Rights Law

groups had urged approval of the bill drawn up by the House Judiciary Committee "without weakening amendments" and the major attempts to change the bill were decisively beaten—most by margins close to 3-1. The House then passed the legislation, 341-70.

The controversy over amendments was essentially between those who contended that the law had served its purpose in ending racial discrimination at the polls and now should be phased out, and those who saw the need to maintain a federal presence so that the overt discrimination of the past is not replaced by subtler means of discouraging voting or racially-motivated changes in election districts and laws.

Also at issue was whether the protections that proved so effective for blacks in the South could be used to remove less-overt handicaps to Latino citizens.

Fittingly, the debate was opened by a black congressman from Georgia, Andrew Young, who 10 years ago was an aide to the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., in the civil rights struggles that led to passage of the law.

"Many Americans lost their lives in an attempt to gain the right to vote," Young reminded his colleagues. He spoke of the gains since the law was passed and the election to state legislatures and Congress of candidates in the South who have been able "to forge a coalition of good will rather than a coalition of bigotry and prejudice."

But he also spoke of the slow pace in some sections of the South, of hundreds of towns with black majorities that still do not have even one elected black official, of attempts to evade the provision requiring advance federal approval of changes in voting laws, and of testimony at House hearings of intimidation of Latin-Americans trying to register and vote in communities where public office had been considered an Anglo prerogative.

A white Republican from Virginia spoke of local resentment of having to clear election law changes with the federal government and said, "You have to be from a state that is covered to understand the feeling."

Young promptly retorted: "I come from a covered state and I approve of it."

The House voted 279-133 against the amendment by Rep. M. Caldwell Butler (R-Va.) to make it easier for a state to be freed of coverage and rejected by a similar margin a substitute bill by Rep. Charles E. Wiggins (R-Calif.) in which both new coverage and exemption from coverage would be determined each two years on the basis of minority participation in the congressional elections.

A proposal by Rep. Robert McClory (R-Ill.) to kill the section of the bill extending coverage to Latinos and other language minorities was beaten, 305-104.

The Ford Administration has opposed any expansion of coverage and has supported only a five-year extension of the law.

Steps to End Food Stamp Delays Asked

The AFL-CIO strongly urged the Senate to streamline administrative machinery that is needlessly delaying for weeks and even months, the certification of unemployed workers to buy food stamps.

In a letter to all senators, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller urged support of a bipartisan amendment to a pending bill that would extend the food stamp program to the aged, blind and disabled.

The amendment, to be offered by Senators Robert Dole (R-Kan.), Hugh Scott (R-Pa.), Dick Clark (D-Iowa), George McGovern (D-S.D.), and Philip Hart (D-Mich.), would provide 30 days of food stamp benefits for families that appear eligible. Checks into the family's finances and resources would take place during the 30-day period.

Under the present system, Biemiller said, unemployed workers must sometimes wait weeks for even an appointment to apply for food stamps while their families go hungry. The new system, he said, would not only prevent needless suffering, but relieve pressure on food stamp aides and reduce clerical errors. Wrong payments would be retrieved and fraud strictly punished.

"We strongly urge your support for the amendment," Biemiller concluded. "Its enactment is absolutely essential to prevent hunger among the unemployed and their families."

American Labor Pulls Out After ILO Seats Terrorists

White House Callousness Assailed:

9.2% Jobless Rate Highest in 34 Years

The number of jobless persons in the United States increased by 362,000 in May, pushing the nation's unemployment rate to 9.2 percent of the workforce—the highest level in 34 years, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

"It all adds up to a callous, almost inhuman, disregard on the part of the national Administration for the misery and the suffering that go with unemployment," AFL-CIO President George Meany declared.

"I don't think these people in the White House running this show realize what it means to be unemployed."

The rise of three-tenths of 1 percent in the jobless rate meant there were a total of 8,538,000 workers classified as unemployed in May, the most since July 1940. The 9.2 percent rate was the highest since 1941 when joblessness averaged 9.9 percent for the whole year.

Almost all of the May jobless rise occurred among men 25 years and over and teenage girls, BLS noted. The rate for household heads—a key figure since these are workers with others dependent upon them—rose from 6 to 6.3 percent over the month. The rate for married men moved to 5.8 from 5.6 percent in April.

Meany noted that the unemployment rate for household heads has risen from 1.9 percent in February 1969 and was 3 percent only a year ago. The May figure, he declared, amounts to a "disaster."

Meany also observed that the Ford Administration "has managed to up the unemployment figure 3,600,000 people in a period of just nine months," and noted the 8.5 million officially unem-

President's Strip Mine Veto Stands

For the second week in a row, the House was unable to muster the two-thirds majority needed to overcome a presidential veto.

The latest test was on the strip mining bill that would have required surface mining companies to meet federal standards for restoration of the land they have torn up.

It had originally passed the House by a supposedly veto-proof 293-115 margin last month. Congressional hearings after the veto demonstrated that the Administration couldn't back up its charges that the bill would curtail employment and lead to higher coal prices.

But as had happened a week earlier with the emergency job funding bill, the White House was able to switch enough votes to sustain the veto.

The tally was 278-143 for overriding the veto—three less than the needed two-thirds.

In comparison with the earlier vote, there were six additional

Site Picketing Right Pressed for Crafts

By David L. Perlman

Building trades unions were joined by the AFL-CIO and the Industrial Union Dept. in a call for legislation allowing picketing at a construction site by a union that has a dispute with one of the subcontractors working on the job.

Congressional action is "long past due," AFL-CIO President George Meany contended at House hearings. He said "every segment of the labor movement" supports the bill to remove picketing restrictions imposed by a 1951 Supreme Court decision.

Meany's testimony was presented by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller, and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman of the Industrial Union Dept. testified for IUD President I. W. Abel in support of the bill.

"Industrial workers possess the right to strike and picket the work site," the IUD said. "Building and construction tradesmen need and are entitled to this same . . . basic freedom."

Earlier, President Robert A. Georgine of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. told the panel that the jobsite picketing restrictions had left building crafts and their members "legally powerless to protect themselves" while giving construction employers "a virtual license to destroy unions."

The thrust of the legislation was endorsed also by Secretary of Labor John T. Dunlop, who noted that similar bills have been backed

PLO Given Status As Observers

Geneva — The U.S. worker delegation withdrew from the annual conference of the International Labor Organization to protest a vote to grant official "observer" status at the conference to the Palestine Liberation Organization, an Arab terrorist group.

Irving Brown, the official U.S. worker delegate and a member of the ILO governing body, said the withdrawal was the unanimous decision of the trade union representatives from the United States. The delegation included AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and officials of a number of unions.

Seating of the Palestinian terrorists was also sharply protested by the U.S. government delegation to the tripartite organization — whose delegates come in equal numbers from governments, trade unions and management.

Edward P. Persons, the chief U.S. representative, told the conference that the ILO had made an "ill-considered and tragic decision" that "betrayed" the organization's goals.

He protested the "selfish subversion" of the ILO on behalf of "an entity which is neither a government, nor an employer, nor a union."

A similar point was made by Secretary of Labor John T. Dunlop, who had planned to attend and address the conference before its acceptance of the PLO.

Elderly Hit White House Indifference

By John R. Oravec

The immediate needs of the nation's elderly for adequate income, housing, health care and social services were spelled out to Congress by 3,700 delegates attending the National Council of Senior Citizens legislative conference in Washington.

They told senators and representatives on Capitol Hill that their hopes of relieving the plight of older people rest with Congress, charging that the Ford Administration's policies toward the elderly are marked by indifference and even hostility.

Meany Makes Strong Bid for Ford To Sign Job-Creating Housing Bill

Congress gave final approval to an emergency housing bill and the AFL-CIO strongly urged President Ford to sign it into law.

America needs both the 400,000 new housing units the legislation would support and the 900,000 jobs it would generate, AFL-CIO President George Meany said.

Meany said in a letter to Ford that the legislation is vitally needed and represents "an investment in America and her families who need both jobs and homes."

Foes of the bill have said confidently that it faces a presidential veto and Meany called on the AFL-CIO's state and local central bodies to help ensure that the measure becomes law.

He asked them to wire Ford urging that he sign the housing bill. And Meany alerted the labor councils to a campaign to get Congress to override a veto if the President rejects the legislation.

The veto-threatened bill would provide a variety of mortgage-interest subsidies intended to make it possible for middle-income families to afford to buy homes and apartments, and to influence a downward trend in mortgage costs.

One of the options would be a 7 percent mortgage interest rate for those who qualify—families with incomes not more than 120 percent of the median for their area and housing priced under $38,000 in most sections, but with higher limits in high-cost parts of

ILO Seats Terrorists, U.S. Workers Pull Out

Dunlop said he had intended to urge the ILO "to return to its fundamental work" of "promoting the well-being and social justice of working people."

But the granting of status to the Palestinian group "has further politicized the ILO," Dunlop said, and "under the circumstances" he will not attend the conference.

Earlier, the AFL-CIO Executive Council had warned that the ILO's usefulness would be seriously impaired if it bowed to the Arab and Soviet-bloc demands and gave official recognition to the terrorist group.

Brown's statement to the ILO conference expressed regret that "good faith efforts" to avoid the split were spurned. He noted the American labor movement's long support of legitimate national movements seeking independence and liberty. But the PLO, he emphasized, cannot be considered in that category and is clearly on record for destruction of Israel, one of the ILO's member states.

Some of the nation's that voted to seat the terrorist group, he suggested, are inviting similar treatment for self-proclaimed "liberation" movements that seek to destroy their governments.

Earlier, at the ILO committee meeting where the recognition issue was first debated, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman had sought to dissuade the ILO from its path.

Seidman, a former U.S. worker delegate and governing body member, cited the PLO's vow to "obliterate" Israel and its terrorist tactics. Only after it has shown "by deeds, not merely by words" that it has shed its past could the PLO be accorded international recognition, Seidman asserted.

The U.S. worker delegation, in addition to Brown, Kirkland and Seidman, included President Edward J. Carlough of the Sheet Metal Workers, President Joseph P. Tonelli of the Paperworkers, President Martin J. Ward of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, President James T. Housewright of the Retail Clerks, Vice President Velma Hill of the Teachers, Vice President Pat Greathouse of the Auto Workers, and Michael Boggs, AFL-CIO assistant director of international affairs.

WHO Warned On Anti-Israel Political Moves

A bipartisan group of six senators and 43 House members has put the World Health Organization on notice that any attempt to suspend Israel's membership rights will forfeit congressional support for the United Nations agency.

In an obvious political move, WHO last year adopted a resolution condemning Israel for alleged lack of cooperation with an investigation into health conditions in occupied territories by a committee drawn from nations hostile to Israel. Further anti-Israel moves may be considered this year.

The letter to the director general of WHO stressed that the signers have been strong supporters of both the World Health Organization and the parent United Nations.

They warned that allowing WHO to become a vehicle for political attacks on Israel "would be a grievous error" that "would inevitably lead to a diminution of U.S. support for your organization in Congress."

TWU Reaches New Contract With American

New York—New contracts covering 17,000 members of the Transport Workers Union employed by American Airlines have been agreed to, pending membership ratification.

The agreements would provide wage and fringe benefit increases for 11,500 maintenance employes, 4,500 flight attendants, and stores and communications employes, meteorologists and dispatchers.

Details of the pacts were withheld pending completion of the ratification vote. Deadline for returning ballots is set for June 23.

The contracts bear a Sept. 1, 1977, expiration date.

Record Crowds:

Union-Industries Show Gets Warm Milwaukee Welcome

By James M. Shevis

Milwaukee—This most heavily unionized city in the United States outdid itself to insure the success of the 30th edition of the AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show, a gigantic public exposition relating the story of labor-management-government teamwork.

As a result, the six-day exhibition at Mecca, the new convention center and arena in downtown Milwaukee, drew one of the largest crowds in the show's history. Nearly a quarter-million people from throughout the Midwest attended the exposition, show officials estimated.

Probably the largest free show of its kind in the nation, the exhibition was a blend of labor's skills and management enterprise. More than $100,000 worth of prizes, gifts and souvenirs were given away, and numerous live demonstrations of craftsmanship were put on, including glass blowing, bricklaying, carpentry, cake decorating, printing, welding and sewing.

AFL-CIO President George Meany, who was on hand to open the show, observed that the exposition "symbolizes the deep faith we all have in the American free-enterprise system . . . the best system ever yet devised by the mind of man."

Scores of trade-union members participated in the show, manning close to 400 exhibit booths. The exhibits were designed to promote among the general public the craftsmanship and value of products and services made or offered by firms with union collective bargaining agreements.

In addition to the union-manned industry exhibits, government displays were set up in the cavernous, year-old convention hall, explaining the role of such agencies as the U.S. Civil Service Commission and the Labor Dept.

Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop, who along with Meany officially opened the show, noted the importance of craftsmanship in American life and the Labor Dept.'s long-time interest in the quality of work—that is, jobs that pay well and provide fair and adequate fringe benefits. The union-industries show, he said, was a perfect example of labor and management working together to solve mutual problems.

The city of Milwaukee, which has the highest number of union members per capita in the country, draped its main thoroughfare, Wisconsin Avenue, with banners welcoming the exposition. City hall announced the show dates, June 6-11, in huge letters. And the Milwaukee Common Council adopted a resolution of welcome stating that its members were "delighted to have such a distinguished display of union-industry cooperation in our city."

One of the largest exhibits was that of the Allied Industrial Workers, the only AFL-CIO union headquartered in Milwaukee and Wisconsin. The union, which represents workers in many classifications of manufacturing, put up 34 booths to display products of firms employing AIW members.

As visitors entered the exhibit area, they were handed shopping bags provided by the Retail Clerks to hold the many souvenirs—and a raffle prize or two if they were lucky—passed out at nearly every booth.

RCIA's main exhibit was an old-fashioned store of the early 1900s which it compared with present-day stores. The general store displayed barrels and crates of fresh vegetables whose prices were a far cry from today's. Potatoes, for instance, were 12 cents a peck then; coffee beans were 12 cents a pound; green beans, three pounds for a quarter, and onions, 2 cents a pound.

The AFL-CIO's exhibit, different from that of previous years, was a prototype of one that will be extended for the nation's bicentennial celebration next year.

The final exhibit, which will be produced in cooperation with the Labor Dept. and the Smithsonian Institution, will afford a glimpse of the daily lives of workers in various occupations at different periods of American history.

One of the most striking displays was a piece of sculpture illustrating equipment used in the construction industry by the Operating Engineers. The 14-foot-high, chromeplated steel sculpture took two years to complete. The model equipment included a fork lift, pile driver, an auger and a trenching machine.

The Graphic Arts union distributed 50,000 scratch pads printed, cut and padded on the premises by GAIU members operating an offset press and a cutter.

The Communications Workers displayed an actual switchboard, operated by a CWA member to show the public how a telephone call is put through. The Bakery & Confectionery Workers drew large crowds at the cake-decorating booth and the cotton candy counter.

The Plumbers & Pipe Fitters gave plastic pipe welding demonstrations. The Dental Technicians & Specialists, a Service Employees' local, displayed dentures and other prosthetics produced by their members in commercial laboratories.

The Letter Carriers and the Postal Workers showed how mail is processed, sorted and delivered at an actual operating post office set up in the convention hall.

A glass bottle-blowing demonstration was performed by members of the Glass Bottle Blowers' Association, who also showed curious show-goers how plastics and fiber glass products are made. A 14-foot, union-made Chrysler fiber glass motor boat was given away on the final day of the exhibition.

When they got foot-weary, visitors could stop for refreshments at—where else?—a beer garden erected by the Milwaukee Brewers, AFL-CIO. Milwaukee produces more beer than any other place in the country.

Statement of U.S. Worker Delegate On Withdrawal from ILO Session

Following is the statement by U.S. Worker Delegate Irving Brown to the International Labor Organization conference in Geneva following the conference's vote to seat observers representing the Palestine Liberation Organization.

I wish to explain to this conference the unanimous decision of my delegation concerning the vote which has just been adopted.

Our position is clear: We have never opposed legitimate movements fighting for their freedom and independence, and our history and record have demonstrated that in our support for such movements in North Africa and Black Africa. But these movements never demanded or sought the destruction of another people or their state sovereignty.

But we oppose the admission of liberation movements to the ILO which do not represent an oppressed state and we oppose the admission of liberation movements which seek the destruction of another state as a prerequisite to achieving their goals, particularly when that threatened state is a member of the very organization that has voted in favor of admission of that group into its ranks.

We oppose the admission of any group or organization to the ILO that is not legitimately tripartite.

Mr. President, practically every nation here represented has at least one or more liberation, or terrorist, organizations operative within and outside its national boundaries. I suggest that the action of this plenary just completed opens the door for other non-tripartite organizations to be admitted to this heretofore essentially technical organization, further removing the ILO from its once-vaunted role as the world's only tripartite organization designed to better conditions of work and life of workers and their dependents the world over.

Efforts were made, Mr. President, to amend the actions which ultimately have brought us to this juncture in the appropriate committee. But these good faith efforts were spurned, making the action which has taken place offensive to my delegation.

On that regrettable note, Mr. President, it is the intention of our delegation at the proper and appropriate moment to withdraw from any further participation in this 60th conference of the ILO. We shall withdraw our credentials through appropriate channels, as well.

Gains Endangered:

Job Crisis Threatens Outreach Programs

Progress made through outreach efforts to bring minority group workers into higher-paying union jobs is threatened by soaring unemployment and the Ford Administration's policies, the Recruitment & Training Program's national conference was told.

President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. warned that unless a solution is found for the deepening economic crisis and if the rise in unemployment is not reversed, "all workers—but especially minority workers—will face the loss of gains that took decades to achieve."

Georgine said the deteriorating situation could cause a real division among workers who would battle each other for jobs.

Ernest G. Green, executive director of RTP, pointed out that "along with the mainstream civil rights organizations, the labor movement is the only organized force which has kept the economic issue at the top of the national agenda.

"The program of the AFL-CIO and the program developed by the Black Economic Summit Conference are essentially the same. The similarities are basically due to a sense of mutual interest and political coalition."

Of equal importance, Green noted, is that organized labor has been behind every important civil rights bill.

RTP outreach efforts—with the aid of the Workers Defense League and the A. Philip Randolph Institute—have grown from a modest storefront operation in New York City 12 years ago to 35 major cities across the country. Outreach programs working with unions have been credited with increasing the portion of minority apprentices from 2 percent in 1960 to about 18 percent today.

Donald Slaiman, deputy director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, said that RTP is possibly the best conceived and best functioning outreach operation in existence.

Speaking for AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland at the conference's awards banquet, Slaiman noted that RTP has been highly effective in bringing minorities into craft apprenticeships while keeping government costs of the program low.

The value of outreach was also stressed by Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop, who suggested expansion of the programs to women and rural areas.

"This instrument," he said, "should be extended if only because it is one of the most reasonable ways to get training and job placement to the disadvantaged who would not receive it otherwise. Naturally, its only virtue is not from a cost-benefit point of view, but that is an added reason for the continued expansion of outreach."

Georgine cited the May unemployment statistics showing black unemployment at 14.7 percent and unemployment in the construction industry at 21.8 percent.

He called for full support of the AFL-CIO action program for full employment to head off the danger of polarization.

EXPANSION OF JOBS is essential to all workers during the current high-unemployment crisis, President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. stresses at the national conference of the Recruitment & Training Program, Inc. He said the years of progress for minorities made through outreach efforts is threatened by joblessness and Administration policies.

House Fails to Reverse Veto of Strip Mine Bill

Democrats who voted for the strip mining curbs. But 28 Republicans who had voted for the bill even in the face of a veto threat switched to support the veto on the override attempt.

Republican leaders have sought to shift the blame for the veto stalemates to the Democrats, contending in effect that Congress should accommodate itself to the President's wishes.

House Republican Leader John J. Rhodes called on the Democrats to "cooperate," and Senate GOP Leader Hugh Scott said a consensus is needed "to break the deadlock caused by an overwhelming Democratic Congress and a courageous and effective Republican president."

House Speaker Carl Albert cited Democratic efforts to meet the President part way, including trimming back the strip mining bill in an attempt to appease the White House. But he said the GOP strategy was "to make it impossible to pass anything but the President's plan."

In other congressional developments:

- The House was struggling with an amendment-riddled energy bill as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

The AFL-CIO had termed the bill brought to the House floor by the Ways & Means Committee "far superior" to the Ford Administration program. A series of amendments, however, weakened or deleted much of the original bill.

- The House passed a bill that would make it easier for Congress to block the President from lifting all price controls on oil. The bill was passed 230-151 and is similar to a Senate-passed measure. It may face a veto when sent to the White House.

- A deadlock over Senate efforts to add funds for rail roadbed repairs had blocked a supplemental appropriations bill. But the Senate finally agreed to the House version in order to clear the $15 billion funding bill before key programs ran out of money. The bill includes funds to carry out a provision of the tax reduction bill and send $50 checks to everyone on the social security benefit rolls. The money was supposed to have been in the mails before now, but the appropriations deadlock held up the payments.

- The Senate began debating the disputed New Hampshire election, in which both Democrat John A. Durkin and Republican Louis Wyman were at various times announced as the winners of last November's contest for the Senate.

Republicans want to hold a new election, which they think Wyman can win. Most Democrats have argued that the Senate should make the decision on the basis of the ballots cast in November.

- The House sent to the Senate a $473 million appropriation to fund summer job programs that were among the casualties of President Ford's veto of the emergency jobs bill.

Ford Urged To Sign New Housing Bill

the nation. Also in the bill are provisions for increased funds for conventional public housing for low-income families.

A key section of the bill is a labor-urged program of federal loans to protect people who lose their jobs from also losing their homes because they can't keep up mortgage payments.

The final version of the bill passed the House by 253-155, less than the two-thirds margin that would be needed to override a veto. It cleared the Senate by a bigger 72-24 vote and was sent to the President.

Meany wrote Ford that the lag in housing will continue if the legislation is killed, leading to "additional housing shortages and inflationary increases in home prices and rents."

The nation needs 2 million new housing units a year, but Meany noted that the current annual rate of housing starts is under 1 million and is unlikely to rise above 1.1 million anytime soon.

He cited the current unemployment rate in construction of 21.8 percent—more than double the nation's overall jobless rate. That amounts to 961,000 unemployed construction workers, Meany told Ford, with an equal number jobless in occupations that are affected by housing.

As for the budget deficit argument the Administration has used to attack job-creating bills passed by Congress, Meany said the housing bill would bring about a "net reduction" in the deficit.

"It would increase employment, reduce unemployment relief expenditures and increase tax revenues," Meany told the President.

Airline Union Okays North Central Pact

Chicago—The Air Line Employees ratified a new 30-month contract with North Central Airlines providing for a 41.3 percent increase in wages and benefits.

The agreement, retroactive to Mar. 1, will boost monthly wages as of Jan. 1, 1977, to $1,460 for computer operators and crew schedulers, $1,400 for station agents and $1,150 for secretaries.

ALEA President Victor J. Herbert said the contract also includes improvements in company-paid insurance, the pension plan and in vacation and holidays.

North Central's ground employes approved the ALEA contract in a mail referendum by a vote of 1,175 to 372.

Maritime Union Ratifies New Three-Year Pact

New York—The National Maritime Union has ratified a new contract with major U.S.-flag ship operators that provides substantial wage and fringe-benefit improvements over the next three years.

Meanwhile, the Marine Engineers were in the process of completing ratification of a new agreement covering members employed by many of the same firms.

The Seafarers, the Masters, Mates & Pilots and the American Radio Association were separately engaged in various stages of negotiating new agreements. All have contracts expiring at midnight June 15, as do NMU and MEBA.

NMU's pact covers some 20,000 unlicensed seamen, and provides a three-step pay increase beginning with a 12.5 percent increase effective June 16. Additional 5 percent increases will take effect in the second and third years, plus cost-of-living adjustments.

The monthly base wage for an able seaman on conventional freighters will rise to $759 by the third year of the agreement, compared to the present $612. The present $673 for ABs on automated vessels will rise to $835 over the same time span.

Pension benefits, now at a $300 maximum, will rise to a range of $300 to $400 a month, depending on the retiree's rating. Present pensioners now receiving $250 a month in benefits, who have the age and service requirements, will receive a 10 percent increase.

The contract also establishes a dental benefit plan for members and their dependents, a better hospitilization plan, an improved upgrading and retraining plan, higher vacation payments and other benefits.

NMU President Shannon J. Wall said approval of the new pact at ratification meetings at ports and aboard ships was "overwhelming."

MEBA's new agreement, which is also for a three-year term, will provide stability and protection for MEBA members, Jesse M. Calhoon, the union's president, observed.

Cement Industry Accord Yields Gains for 17,850

Chicago—The Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers have reached agreements with more than a dozen major cement manufacturers on new three-year contracts providing key improvements in wages, cost-of-living increases and fringe benefits.

The basic wage package, retroactive to May 1, would raise hourly pay for 17,850 union members by $1.80 in four steps over the three years.

The agreements call for increases of 60 cents effective May 1, 50 cents next Nov. 1, 50 cents plus a cost-of-living provision with an 8-cent limit on May 1, 1976, and 45 cents with an uncapped cost-of-living provision May 1, 1977.

Union President Thomas F. Miechur said the settlement follows an industry pattern established in negotiations last month with three of the major cement firms.

Miechur noted that of the 173 cement industry locals involved in the negotiations, only three went on strike over local issues. One dispute was quickly settled, while two other strikes continued.

Pension benefits were increased to $11 a month for each year of service beginning May 1 and will go up to $12.50 on May 1, 1976, and to $14.50 on May 1, 1977. Total and permanent disability pension benefits also are increased in three similar annual steps to $12, $13.50 and to $15.50, with a minimum benefit of $350 on May 1, 1977.

Other improvements are in medical coverage, accident benefits, dental care and vacations.

Among the major cement manufacturers involved in the agreements are Alpha Portland Cement Co., General Portland, Inc., Ideal Cement Co., Lehigh Portland Cement Co., Lone Star Industries, Inc., Martin Marietta Cement, Marquette Cement Manufacturing Co., Medusa Cement Co., Penn-Dixie Cement, Universal Atlas Cement, and the Southern California-Arizona Cement employers.

Louis Silverberg Dies, Retired Labor Attache

Louis Silverberg, a former U.S. labor attache with the American embassy in Tokyo who retired a year ago as executive secretary of two employe-management relations boards at the State Dept., died in a Washington hospital following a heart attack.

Silverberg, 59, served as director of information for the National Labor Relations Board from 1941 until 1959 before joining the Foreign Service.

Victory for Whom?

UNEMPLOYMENT IS GOING in the direction that we have been saying for some time. It is up three-tenths of a percent in one month, which means that 360,000 more people were unemployed in May than April.

It is significant that the figures come out a few days after a presidential veto on an emergency employment bill was sustained by a margin of five votes in the House of Representatives.

These figures represent 8.5 million people officially unemployed. This as against the figure of 4.9 million people officially unemployed in August when Mr. Ford took office. So his Administration has managed to up the unemployment figure 3,600,000 people in a period of just nine months.

To me, it adds up to a callous, almost inhuman disregard on the part of the national Administration for the misery and the suffering that goes with unemployment.

I don't think these people in the White House running this show realize what it means to be unemployed.

I don't think they realize what it means to a head of a family trying to send kids to school, trying to pay off interest on a mortgage, trying to pay taxes and trying to keep a roof over the head of his family, clothe and feed them.

I don't think they realize what it means for that fellow to be completely out of work, without a job, and actually as time goes on without any hope for the future.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S own projection is that we are going to have 7.5 percent unemployed four years from now. I happen to think that this country can't stand that sort of unemployment. I don't think the social fabric of this country could stand it. I don't think the cities could stand it.

The unemployment rate for black teenagers now is 39.9 percent —practically 40 percent. Now what does this mean to the cities? What does this mean to life in the cities? What does this mean for jobs? What does this mean for additional welfare families?

We have a very simple theory that the government should stimulate the economy—that the government should add to the national debt temporarily in order to get people back to work. Because, in the final analysis, they are not going to lick this problem unless people get back to work. When you get a fellow back to work he starts paying taxes, he ceases to be a burden insofar as welfare and assistance from federal, state and local agencies is concerned. As long as he is unemployed he is not on the tax rolls, he is not bringing any revenue to the federal government, and he actually is a burden.

There has to be a change in national policy, I think the very weight of events is going to compel a change. This idea that there is some kind of political victory every time the President vetoes a bill that would alleviate this misery, and it's sustained on political grounds over in the House or the Senate, that this adds up to a victory. It may be a victory for the President. It may be a victory for Arthur Burns. It may be a victory for the economists who are running this show.

But it certainly is not a victory for the American people. It is not a victory for the economy, and it is certainly not a victory for the victims of this whole economic mess that we are in with the people who are without jobs.

Switch-Hitting Morality Marks Views on Communist Terror

By John P. Roche

IF IN 1938 an American columnist shrugged off Nazi brutality to Jews as merely an old German custom going back to the First Crusade, decent people of all denominations would have been appalled and enraged. However, if he took the same stance toward Stalinist atrocities ("Russians have always been brutal to each other") or to white-black relationships in the American South ("the blacks have always been treated as inferiors"), the writer could hardly be accused of lack of principle. True, a number of us would have considered the principle despicable, but it was there in all its stark consistency.

However, what we find today is the commentator with a selective sense of principle; one who, so to speak, bats from both sides of the plate. Rarely do you find one as honest as Joseph Kraft who, in discussing Vietnam and the Middle East could flatly observe that "this country will also get along nicely no matter what happens in the Middle East or Southeast Asia." On the contrary, the same columnists who work themselves into moral spasms about racial discrimination in the United States or the evils of our prison system somehow shift gears when the issue is Communist barbarism.

In connection with the horrendous forced evacuation from Phnom Penh of some two-and-a-half-million people by the Red Khmers, we are suddenly told by one high moralist that we should not impose our value system on Cambodians, that, indeed, to do so is to engage in the sin of cultural chauvinism. In fact, to make the statement that this is barbarous is a characteristic symptom of American moral arrogance, the same failing that got us into the business of world policeman and led to dumping a million tons of ordnance in Vietnam and Cambodia.

Or take another case. No one in his senses is prepared to defend the American prison system. The big problem is not that our prisons are run by the operating procedure of the Gulag Archipelago, but—as James Q. Wilson pointed out in his recent book "Thinking About Crime"—that they are run on no conceptual foundation at all. But in comparative terms, whether prisons deter, rehabilitate, or simply keep hard characters off the streets, the fact is that here criminals live to reach prison. And most inmates are eventually released.

Let us take a hypothetical case and consider the reaction it would receive. Overwhelmed by the crime statistics in New York, Gov. Hugh Carey issues instructions that all criminals apprehended are to be killed on the spot and their bodies left "pour encourager les autres" ("to encourage the others," as Napoleon said sardonically when he had a general shot.) Moreover, to help the police in this sanguinary display of law and order, the governor mobilizes the National Guard to provide thorough coverage. In such an event, I could write Tom Wicker's column drunk with a Chinese typewriter.

YET THIS IS PRECISELY what is now happening in Saigon: Evidence? Item 1: A story by Richard Halloran, New York Times, included in passing the news that, "The Japanese (in Saigon) reported that robbery and thievery were widespread in Saigon and that the new government was severe with punishments. Saigon newspapers carry pictures of thieves executed on the spot, and their corpses are sometimes allowed to lie in the streets as warnings." Item 2: George Esper, Associated Press, provided a new and perhaps Aesopian twist (he has just been expelled from Saigon) by noting, "The provisional government is dealing more harshly with crime than the previous regime and publicizing it."

Now when you recall that the previous regime was the "brutal Thieu dictatorship," what Esper is saying comes through clearly. If one of the "white mice," as Thieu's police were called (they wore white uniforms), caught someone robbing a jewelry store, he arrested him and took him to court. If he spotted a kid stealing a Honda, he did not whip out his pistol and shoot —or if he did, he shot at the tires. Larceny, in short, was not a capital offense under the ancien regime. However, Saigon today has a genuine "law and order" regime; it's the kind of place American yahoos would consider ideal.

Generally I don't like to provide topics for other columnists, but this is a special case. When he finishes his Attica tapes, I wish Tom Wicker would turn his moral telescope on Saigon and tell us how he feels about this new progressive order.

Manpower Policy Task Force:

Direct Job Creation Pressed As Key to Recession Battle

The following is excerpted from a policy statement by the National Manpower Policy Task Force on direct job creation. The task force is a private non-profit organization of 16 academic manpower experts devoted to the promotion of research in manpower policy. It is chaired by Sar A. Levitan of the George Washington University Center for Manpower Studies.

THE NATION IS ENGULFED by grave economic difficulties. Even rapid recovery may leave a high rate of joblessness for several years, and a timid application of macroeconomic tools due to fear of future inflation will insure this eventuality. Policymakers seem hypnotized with fear lest we be overtaken by an inflationary resurgence, ignoring the fact that the percentage of the recession is not to be found in the labor market. Its cures should, therefore, not be sought in labor market restraints.

Direct job creation is one tool which can and should be used to a greater extent than in the past. Analysis of recent experience suggests that public service employment, employment projects, and public works can provide vitally needed goods and service. They can be implemented rapidly and effectively. They can be cut back, if appropriate, when conditions improve. They provide useful output and sustain and develop skills. And they are a less costly way to fight unemployment than many other approaches.

The scale of job creation and the mix of strategies depends on economic developments in the future. The most likely scenario, in the absence of appropriate policies, is a very slowly declining unemployment rate, stagnating at a level of 6 percent or higher for the remainder of the 1970s. However, further deterioration or a more rapid than expected turnaround are also possibilities that should not be ignored. Based on the assumption of stagnation, but recognizing the need for flexibility in the case of a quick rebound or a reversal, the National Manpower Policy Task Force makes the following recommendations:

1. Public service employment should be expanded. The task force suggested in December 1972 a triggering formula which would have provided funds to hire one-fourth of the unemployed above a high unemployment level. Assuming a tolerable level of 4.5 percent unemployment, the present 8.9 percent rate means 3.6 million "excess" unemployed and calls for 900,000 public service jobs. Since some 300,000 service jobs are currently available, an expansion of 600,000 jobs is needed, carrying a price tag of about $5 billion. Such an expansion would have been feasible if the recommended trigger mechanism had already been in place. Having lost time, it may be difficult to achieve this goal all at once. Nevertheless, a doubling of present efforts should be feasible.

2. If public service employment is expanded rapidly, states and localities will need more resources for supplies and equipment. Some are already claiming difficulties in putting all their public employment funds to good use because needed materials and equipment were not available. The limitation on non-wage expenses should be liberalized, yet some strict precautions should be taken to assure that money is not siphoned off for other purposes. Public service employment should shift in the direction of employment projects as its scale is increased.

3. It is regrettable that the training provisions of the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act are being deemphasized. A recession may be the most propitious time to upgrade the skills of many to better enable them to take advantage of the eventual recovery. Additional funding for CETA would add to total demand while enabling state and local elected officials and manpower planners to take approaches which meet the specific needs of their communities.

4. The pending emergency public works legislation should be strengthened. Greater specificity of project selection criteria, including public service needs, local unemployment rates, and occupational skills required by the proposed projects, are essential, and preference in allocation of funds should be given to early applicants promising speedy completion. Mechanisms should also be established for linking job creation projects with the CETA system, so that the created jobs are an outlet for its clients.

5. The longer-run implications must also be considered. A trigger formula under both public service employment and public works would reduce as well as expand funds automatically. These trigger mechanisms should be coordinated with similar provisions made under the unemployment compensation system. Countercyclical public works and employment projects should be short-term in nature, so that they can be cut off upon completion if this is desired.

These recommendations carry a multibillion dollar price tag. Yet, so does a tax cut, expansion of unemployment compensation, and other "emergency" measures which have been taken with no more guarantee of their potential impact. Despite a fair degree of experience to date with direct job creation which suggests that it can be usefully undertaken in the present conditions, a bias persists against an active employment policy.

Shedding the misconceptions on which this bias is founded is long overdue. Properly designed and triggered job creation programs can play an important role in augmenting macroeconomic measures and preventing repetition of the current deep recession.

Condoning mass unemployment is no way to begin the third century of our nation's history.

40,000 in Decade:

Labor's Outreach Efforts Swell Apprenticeships for Minorities

BUILDING TRADES apprenticeships have been swelled by more than 40,000 young minority group workers, largely because of efforts of unions and other concerned groups to find and prepare youngsters for the training programs.

That progress report was made by Ernest Green, executive director of the Recruitment & Training Program, Inc., which was founded in 1963 as the Joint Apprenticeship Program of the Workers Defense League and the A. Philip Randolph Educational Fund.

Green said that from a modest beginning in the Bedford-Stuyvesant neighborhood of New York City, the outreach effort has expanded to RTP projects in 35 cities, while the federal government has adopted the model built in New York and expanded it to 105 cities across the country.

Green said the apprenticeship idea should be adopted as "a training model in this country, expanded to other occupations . . . it's viable; it demonstrated its transferability." And, he added, apprenticeship has proved itself an effective route for young minority workers into the mainstream of the workforce.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Green said the rate of progress in placing minority youngsters in apprenticeship programs leading to skilled jobs in the construction industry "is fairly definable." He pointed out that "in 1960, fewer than 2 percent of the youngsters in apprenticeship programs were from minority groups; today, the figure is around 18 percent."

But, he stressed, "none of this can operate fully in an economy that is not running at full steam." Noting that "the construction industry has been one of the hardest hit by this present depression," he said that stepped-up programs of public construction—schools, hospitals, housing—would not only meet the mounting need for such facilities, but would also expand the chances for minority construction workers to find decent jobs with solid futures.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

FOR THE GREATER PART of this century, labor leaders, businessmen and politicians have been debating over how to bring stability to the nation's economy—to sustain steady growth and eliminate the periods of peaks and valleys, the boom and bust.

For almost as long as the debate has been going on, there have been those who have been saying economic stability cannot be achieved without the benefit of long-range economic planning. Others have contended such planning would lead to government domination.

Throughout the years, economic planning has remained an idea not well understood in the United States. As Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop has observed, "It's hard to discuss because almost nobody knows what it means."

Now Senators Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) and Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) have introduced a bill to establish a national economic planning process under a federal agency, an Economic Planning Board.

The legislation would create a system that combines policy decisions by government agencies with voluntary cooperation by unions, businesses, state and local interests. Economic planning would be developed by three new government bodies, then scrutinized by Congress. The three would be:

- A three-member Economic Planning Board, appointed by the President and set up in his office. It would have a division of economic information to develop and distribute material on the economy from both public and private sources.
- A Council on Economic Planning, composed of some Cabinet members and other top echelon federal officials.
- An advisory Committee on Economic Planning, with four members appointed by the President, four by the Speaker of the House and four by the President of the Senate.

The planning board, after extensive hearings, would submit a "balanced-economic-growth" plan to the council for its approval. The council would review the plan, possibly revise it, and send it to the President. The advisory committee would help provide the board and council with views of groups and organizations, including labor.

The Joint Economic Committee of Congress would hold hearings on the plan as finally approved by the President. The committee would report to the House and Senate a concurrent resolution approving, disapproving, or amending the plan. Congress in turn would be required to act on the plan. Presumably, a plan might run for four years or longer.

HUMPHREY, AS CHAIRMAN of the Joint Economic Committee, and Javits, as its ranking GOP member, note that Congress last year passed the Budget Act to provide a means of making short-term, economic policy by requiring the Executive to report to Congress.

Humphrey and Javits know that their balanced Growth & Economic Planning Act will not become instant reality. They expect it to spark vigorous debate. But they believe an economic planning law has become a must if the country is to be put "on the road to consistent economic prosperity."

AFL-CIO President George Meany has called long-range economic planning essential to reducing "the degree to which American society has stumbled and fumbled along in the past few years." Planning in the 1950s could have averted the urban crisis of the 1960s, he points out.

President Leonard Woodcock of the Auto Workers has appealed to Congress to focus immediately on the Humphrey-Javits measure. "Rampant inflation, serious recession, massive unemployment and national misery have been the result of our failure to plan the economy in a rational way," he concludes.

APPRENTICESHIPS have put more than 40,000 young minority group workers into building trades jobs during the last decade, but the rate has slowed as the industry sunk into depression, Executive Director Ernest Green of the Recruitment & Training Program, Inc., center, reported. He was questioned on Labor News Conference by Duane Emme, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Charles Flinner of United Press International. The AFL-CIO produced program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual Radio.

Key Vote on President's Job Fund Veto

The key House vote on the emergency $5.3 billion appropriations bill to fund 900,000 jobs is shown in Column II. That's the attempt on June 4 to override President Ford's veto. The 277-145 vote was five short of the two-thirds majority needed.

On labor's scorecard, right votes (R) were cast by the 258 Democrats and 19 Republicans who voted to override the veto. Voting wrong (W) were 123 Republicans and 22 Democrats.

The Column I vote is used here only for purposes of comparison. It shows which House members cast "right" votes for the bill when it was passed in final form on May 14, and then backed away and voted against overriding the veto. In a few cases, switches went the other way. The AFL-CIO considers the Column II vote on overriding the important test.

Numerals show districts; AL—at large; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not paired.

Delegates Draft Alternatives:

CWA Assails Ford On Economic Mess

San Diego—The destruction of the nation's economy and the development of programs to revive it were the overriding concerns of the more than 2,500 delegates to the Communications Workers' annual convention here.

CWA President Glenn E. Watts sounded a call for new national leadership in his opening address, declaring that "the economic mess in this country today is the direct result of 6½ years of systematic deliberate and shameful mismanagement of the economy by the current and former big business administrations."

Watts roundly denounced President Ford's veto of the emergency jobs bill, declaring: "It's absolutely ridiculous for our leaders to speak to us of the federal deficit in terms of household budgetry."

If it takes a budget deficit of 75 to 100 billion dollars to pull the country out of the recession, "that shouldn't frighten anyone," Watts said. He pointed out that total public debt in 1974 was only 27 percent of the gross national product as compared with more than 50 percent during the Eisenhower Administration.

The delegates later adopted a lengthy economic policy statement calling among other things for creation of a major public service jobs program, liberalization of mortgage credit to stimulate housing construction, government regulatory efforts to stop "monopoly price gouging," and a "complete revision of the tax system" to more fairly redistribute income.

The convention paid tribute to CWA's late founder and president for three decades, Joseph A. Beirne, with a special program which included a film highlighting his career and a eulogy delivered by Msgr. George G. Higgins. Beirne died last Labor Day.

The delegates also acted to raise $1 million over 10 years to fund a memorial foundation in Beirne's name, dedicated primarily to promoting educational opportunity for working class and disadvantaged young people—one of Beirne's lifelong interests.

In an address to the convention, former Georgia Gov. Jimmy Carter, an announced candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination next year, stressed the need to concentrate on exporting American goods to help improve the U.S. balance of trade. He suggested that companies choosing to manufacture their products abroad at the expense of American jobs should be heavily taxed.

Leadership in solving economic and social problems, Carter said must come from the White House because "Congress has demonstrated that it is inherently incapable of leadership." He cited recent failures of Congress in dealing with energy policy and attempting to override vetoes of public service jobs and strip mining legislation.

Bess Meyerson, former consumer protection commissioner of New York City, discussed the need for a federal consumer protection agency and for more vigorous enforcement of laws against fraudulent business practices and unsafe products.

HRDI Names Bradford To Director Post

Charles E. Bradford has been named executive director of the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute, HRDI President Alan Kistler announced.

Bradford had been serving as acting executive director of the institute for the past seven months. HRDI has the responsibility of advising unions and management in the development of job and training opportunities for the unemployed, the poor and minority groups.

Kistler said Bradford will continue to direct the day-to-day operations of the HRDI program which is carried out in more than 50 major cities.

Bradford has been active in the labor movement since 1950. He held a number of offices, including the presidency of Machinists Local 41 in St. Louis, before joining the HRDI field staff.

He was appointed St. Louis area manpower representative of HRDI in 1968 and became regional director for the Midwest in 1972. Bradford became assistant director of HRDI for program development, evaluation and training at the institute's Washington headquarters in 1972.

Postal Union Delegates Retain Old Constitution

Kansas City—The Postal Workers will continue to operate under the union's present constitution, at least until the APWU's regular convention in mid-1976.

Delegates to a special convention here debated a proposed overhaul of the constitution that has been in effect since a multi-union merger four years ago, and ended up rejecting all proposed changes.

A draft document drawn up by a select committee was amended during the floor debate so that it ended up greatly expanding the officer structure and adding a new department.

The new posts and salary increases provided in another amendment would have added an estimated $400,000 a year to the union's costs. But delegates decisively defeated a proposed rise in per capita payments to cover the added expenses.

An attempt to reconsider and delete the section creating the new positions mustered a 6,282 to 3,918 majority at a night session on the eve of the final day. But that was short of the needed two-thirds, and the effort failed.

The next day, with President Francis S. Filbey and most other national officers voting against it, the amended constitution failed of adoption. The vote of 5,662 to 4,465 was 1,089 short of the two-thirds needed. The convention then adjourned after voting down a motion to submit the issue to a referendum.

PROBLEMS OF THE ELDERLY are spelled out for the House Select Committee on Aging at the opening session of National Council of Senior Citizens legislative conference. The three-day meeting in Washington drew 3,700 delegates, representing the more than 3 million NCSC members.

Senior Citizens Outline Program For Congress on Needs of Elderly

In testimony before the House Select Committee on Aging, NCSC officials and representatives from around the country detailed the steps Congress must take to resolve the problems of millions of older Americans struggling against high living costs and illness.

The occasion was the first field hearing conducted by the new 28-member committee, held at the hotel ballroom where the NCSC was meeting.

Among the key legislative objectives outlined by the NCSC are:

- General revenue contributions to the social security fund.
- Automatic cost-of-living increases in social security benefits at least twice a year.
- Enactment of the National Health Security bill to overcome the shortcomings of Medicare with its deductibles, fees and exclusions.
- An independent Social Security Administration outside the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.
- Reform of nursing home regulations to eliminate inhumane conditions and abuse of patients.
- Reduced fares for the elderly during non-rush periods on national and local transportation systems.
- Property tax relief and development of adequate low-income housing programs for senior citizens.

The delegates took time during their three-day conference to demonstrate at the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development in protest against proposed HUD regulations that have created a crisis in housing construction for low-income retired persons.

HUD rules would require housing sponsors to repay all government loans within 12 months after completion of construction, which would require refinancing through commercial loans at higher interest loans.

As the lead-off witness before the committee, NCSC President Nelson H. Cruikshank noted that retirement for most Americans means that they must live on fixed incomes during a time of high inflation. He pointed out that about 5 million persons over age 65 live in poverty.

Cruikshank said the elderly must pay a disproportionate amount of their incomes for the basic necessities of food, shelter, transportation and medical care.

He also stressed that economic problems are mounting for persons aged 55 to 64, among whom the unemployment rate has increased nearly 75 percent in the past nine months and long-term unemployment has doubled.

"Once out of work, these persons remain unemployed more than twice as long as those under 25," Cruikshank observed.

He said that enactment of Health Security legislation is vital to close gaps in coverage under Medicare, citing in particular the problems of 8 million persons over 74.

Other NCSC witnesses, representing all major sections of the country, described for the committee the wide-spread poverty conditions that exist among the elderly, many of whom after paying their housing expenses don't have enough income to cover the costs of adequate food or medical care.

They cited the shortcomings in the Supplementary Security Income program which was intended to provide the aged, blind and disabled enough benefits to stay above the poverty level.

They pointed out that the SSI federal income floor is so substandard that recipients cannot live decently at that level. And only about one-third of the persons qualified for SSI are actually receiving the benefits, the committee was told.

NCSC witnesses also urged Congress to continue resisting Ford Administration attempts to reduce cost-of-living increases in social security benefits. They cited efforts of President Ford to limit this year's adjustment to 5 percent, instead of the legally mandated 8 percent, in addition to seeking cuts in Medicare to hold down the federal deficit.

Kenneth Young, AFL-CIO assistant legislative director, told the delegates they must make their needs clearly known to a Congress that claims "it only hears from those who want to reduce federal spending and cut the deficit. Remind these members that you can't balance the budget in a vacuum."

Young pointed out that the coalition of senior citizens, labor and civil rights continues to have the support of numerous members of Congress who favor social progress. He noted that of the almost 100 sponsors of the Health Security bill in the House, not one voted to sustain President Ford's veto of the emergency employment legislation to create 900,000 jobs.

President Leonard Woodcock of the Auto Workers called on the NCSC to step up its pressure on Congress for the adoption of Health Security.

Woodcock, chairman of the Committee for National Health Insurance, stressed that Health Security would provide the universal coverage that is needed and halt the waste in the health delivery system.

Other major speakers at the three-day conference included Robert M. Ball, former Commissioner of Social Security; Senators Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) and Charles McC. Mathias (R-Md.) and Rep. Yvonne B. Burke (D-Calif.).

USWA Members Get 9-Cent COL Boost

Pittsburgh—A 9 cent cost-of-living increase went into effect June 1 for 30,000 members of the Steelworkers employed by three major aluminum companies.

The wage adjustments are part of the USWA 1974 agreements with Aluminum Co. of America, Reynolds Metals Co. and Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp. Earlier adjustments, based on a 1-cent an hour increase for every three-tenths of 1 percent jump in the government's Consumer Price Index, amounted to 53 cents an hour, the USWA reported.

Solid Union Support:

by the secretaries of labor of the past five administrations, Democrats and Republicans alike.

Dunlop suggested some changes in the bill but he stressed his belief that "a construction site should have a common labor relations policy, regardless of how many separate contracts or contractors, prime or subcontractors, are involved."

Georgine strongly backed the bill as introduced by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), chairman of the subcommittee. A companion bill in the Senate is sponsored by Labor Committee Chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.).

Because of the picketing restrictions, Georgine said, non-union firms are performing "a much higher percentage of construction work." And national contractor associations have been helping union contractors convert to non-union operations, he charged.

Meany's testimony charged that the 1951 Supreme Court decision on construction site picketing distorted the intent of Congress and "was wrongly decided."

It expanded a protection against secondary picketing that Congress had intended to apply only in the case of truly neutral employers to the "highly interdependent" relationships of a multiemployer construction site.

Further, Meany noted, the present Supreme Court has used the "wrong" decision of the 1951 court as the basis for subsequent decisions that also weaken unions and distort the intent of Congress—as in its recent antitrust ruling.

Meany said denial of traditional picketing rights means that "building tradesmen have, in practical terms, been required to disregard their common interests and break each other's strikes."

The union witnesses all supported a provision of the picketing bill that would make it clear that the legislation does not sanction picketing to bring about or preserve racial discrimination.

Meany noted that this proviso eliminates one of the arguments falsely used by employers opposed to the bill.

His statement noted pointedly that the employers "who show such concern about minorities" when legislation to restore picketing rights is being considered were not allies of the AFL-CIO and the civil rights movement in passing and strengthening the ban on job discrimination in the Civil Rights Act.

Also in the bill is a requirement for a 10-day notice to the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service before picketing in disputes on federal defense or space agency work.

Dunlop suggested a general 10-day notice requirement to enable national unions and contractor associations to seek a settlement during a "cooling off period," but committee members seemed cool to the concept. Dunlop also suggested a 30-day limit on picketing.

Georgine said at the hearing that the building trades supported the bill as Thompson had introduced it.

Clayman told the panel that the IUD considers the ban on construction site picketing a "grievous injury to our democratic system as well as to those workers directly affected."

ECONOMIC RECOVERY and action programs to put unemployed Americans back to work are more responsive to the nation's immediate needs than the Ford Administration's war on the deficit, AFL-CIO Sec.-Teas. Lane Kirkland declared at the Insurance Workers convention in Miami Beach.

White House Callousness Scored As Joblessness Climbs to 9.2%

ployed persons do not reflect the true story.

"Add to that the 1.1 million people who are discouraged and no longer look for jobs, and you have 9.6 million people unemployed," he said. "Add in another 1.8 million more people who usually work fulltime but who are partially unemployed, and you get a figure well over 11 million people who are unemployed or underemployed."

While employment increased in May for the second month in a row, the rise was far outstripped by a jump in the civilian labor force. Total employment rose 316,000 to a seasonally adjusted 84,402,000 but the labor force increased 678,000 to 92,940,000 with the resulting increase in the jobless rate.

Meany said it was significant that the new unemployment figures came out only a few days after President Ford's veto of an emergency employment bill was sustained by a slim margin in the House of Representatives. The measure would have provided 900,000 jobs.

"But the President said he vetoed the bill because he felt that it would over-stimulate the economy to put 900,000 people back to work," Meany said. "In other words, the 900,000 jobs were not needed. And now we have 360,000 more jobs that are needed in one month."

The May increases in unemployment were concentrated in construction, finance and service, and government. The rise in joblessness was particularly sharp in the construction industry which has probably been hit hardest of all U.S. industries in the current recession.

At an all-time high of 21.8 percent, the unemployment rate among construction workers was more than double that of a year earlier.

President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., citing the 2.5 percent increase over the month, declared that workers in the industry "are being buried alive in the tunnel at the end of which the Ford Administration professes to see a light.

"With more than one out of every five building and construction workers now jobless, we can't see any light, nor can we see President Ford's logic," Georgine declared.

The overall jobless rate has climbed steadily since last August. The May rate was double the October 1973 pre-recession low. Since last August, the number of job losers—that is, workers laid off—has risen by 2.9 million, or about 80 percent of the total 3.6 million who have become jobless over the past nine months.

Among the statistical highlights of the monthly BLS report, one that measures "hardship" in a telling way is the number of long-term unemployed—those who have been out of work for 15 weeks or longer.

In May, this number rose by 240,000 to more than 2.6 million. A year earlier the total was less than a million. Those who had been seeking work for six months or more exceeded the 1 million mark for the first time since 1958.

Also, the average duration of joblessness continued to move upward, reaching 13.4 weeks in May, the highest level in more than 10 years, BLS noted.

Since last November, the average duration of unemployment has increased by 3.6 weeks, and the number jobless for 15 weeks or more has risen by 1.5 million.

The average workweek in May dropped by one-tenth of an hour to 36 hours, seasonally adjusted. Average hourly earnings rose two cents over the month to $4.47.

Limit on Aid Extension Opposed as Premature

Unemployed workers should be entitled to 65 weeks of unemployment insurance benefits "until the nation is no longer plagued by large-scale unemployment," the AFL-CIO told the Senate Finance Committee.

The committee is considering a House-passed bill extending the maximum 65-week entitlement for regularly-covered workers under state unemployment insurance laws until June 30, 1976.

"Frankly, we see no reason to limit this extension to mid-1976," the AFL-CIO said in a statement filed with the committee by Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller. The federation noted that most observers believe unemployment will continue to increase in the next few months and remain at high levels for the next few years.

"Temporary stop-gap, 13-week extensions of unemployment compensation benefits triggered 'on' and 'off' by statistical formulas totally unrelated to actual unemployment levels will not solve the problems the nation faces today," the AFL-CIO said.

Noting that 127 of 150 major labor market areas are classified as having substantial unemployment, Biemiller's statement added:

"Attempts to develop local unemployment compensation triggers, as the Administration has recommended, will certainly fail just as the national and state triggers, which have required congressional revision ten times in the past five years, have been a dismal failure."

While urging Congress to act on permanent unemployment insurance reform this year, the AFL-CIO asked the committee to report a bill providing every jobless worker with 26 weeks of regular benefits and at least 39 weeks of extended benefits. Benefits after 39 weeks should be federally financed, it said.

The federation pointed out that workers who exhausted their benefit entitlements in December 1974 and whose benefit year expired on January 15, 1975, are ineligible for emergency benefits. The AFL-CIO suggested making workers who exhausted all benefit entitlement after June 30, 1974, eligible for emergency extended benefits.

Job Losses Bear Heavily On Heads of Households

The sharp increase in the jobless rate for household heads during the current economic recession "has contributed to a growing public concern over the unemployment problem," the Bureau of Labor Statistics notes in a detailed study on the employment status of household heads and members.

At 6.3 percent in May, the rate for household heads is more than double the average rate of 2.8 percent over the 1963-74 period.

Household heads now account for 39.2 percent, or 3,346,000, of the unemployed, up from 34 percent, or 1.4 million, in October 1973, when the overall unemployment rate dropped to a post-1970 low of 4.6 percent, BLS noted.

In most households, the head is the sole or primary earner. Thus, the unemployment of the family breadwinner usually has a serious effect on the economic well-being of the entire household.

"Unless the spell of unemployment is brief, or the household unit has considerable savings, the head's loss of a job almost inevitably lowers the household's standard of living," BLS said.

Railway Clerks Set New Talks With Carriers

The Railway & Airline Clerks will enter marathon mediation talks June 16 in an attempt to resolve the longstanding contract dispute with the nation's major railroads.

BRAC President C. L. Dennis said daily meetings would be held with carrier representatives and National Mediation Board officials. He expressed hope the two sides will find a basis for agreement before a government-imposed, 30-day cooling-off period ends on June 23.

The union has been studying the findings of a special presidentially-appointed panel which recommended last month that BRAC accept the general pattern of settlement approved earlier in the year by seven other rail unions.

The panel was established by President Ford on Apr. 16 under provisions of the Railway Labor Act, blocking a nationwide strike by BRAC that had been set for Apr. 18. The disputants by law must observe the cooling-off period before they are free to take any "self-interest" action such as a strike.

Ford to Continue Vetoes, Claims Recovery on Way

Financing Shift Urged On Security

The AFL-CIO proposed to Congress changes in the financing of social security benefits designed to meet both short-term and long-range funding problems.

While there is proper cause for "concern" when the social security trust funds pay out more than they take in, the federation's statement to a House Ways & Means subcommittee emphasized that there is no cause for alarm.

To overcome the deficit problem, the AFL-CIO suggested:

- Raising the amount of wages subject to the social security tax and used for computation of benefits, and requiring employers to pay the tax on their total payroll.
- Shifting a scheduled four-tenths of 1 percent increase in the Medicare payroll tax, due to take effect in 1978, to the basic social security program since the rise in the taxable wage base would automatically bring more money into the Medicare fund.
- Initiating a federal contribution to the social security program from general treasury revenues to amount eventually to at least one-third of the income.
- Remedying a technical flaw in a 1972 amendment which added automatic cost-of-living increases to retirement benefits and to the benefit schedule. The AFL-CIO proposed to retain the present living cost formula for retired workers but to "decouple" this from the basic benefit table to correct an "unanticipated technical flaw" that distorts the link between wages and pensions.

The statement, submitted by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller, said a temporary deficit is not a problem and currently has been helpful in providing purchasing power that the economy needs. But "this deficit cannot continue indefinitely and some action must be taken to insure future financial stability" of the program.

It noted also that the original social security legislation that President Roosevelt submitted to Congress in 1935 contemplated a government contribution to finance past service credits.

Unless the government joins workers and employers in financing the program, the AFL-CIO warned, a significant rise in the payroll tax rate will eventually be needed as a declining birthrate reduces the active work force in proportion to retirees.

U.S. LABOR DELEGATION leaves International Labor Organization conference in Geneva after the ILO voted to give official observer status to the terrorist Palestine Liberation Organization. U.S. government and employer delegates joined labor in denouncing the vote. (Story, Page 3.)

President Set to Bar Housing Bill

President Ford served notice that he will continue to veto legislation that he considers too costly, too "radical" or too stimulating to an economy whose recovery from deep recession is now "in sight."

The President told an audience of cheering small businessmen that he shares their distaste for "escalation" of government. And he indicated at a White House meeting with Republican congressional leaders that his next veto target will be a labor-backed housing bill.

In every test this year, congressional majorities in favor of overriding Ford's vetoes have been short of the two-thirds vote required.

The housing bill passed by Congress would make it possible for an estimated 400,000 middle-income families to purchase homes and apartments through a system of mortgage interest subsidies. The extra housing construction that would be generated would provide about 900,000 jobs.

An important part of the veto-threatened bill is a federal loan program that would protect persons who lose their jobs from the risk of also losing their homes because they can't keep up mortgage payments.

House Republican Leader John J. Rhodes said Ford indicated that a recent rise in housing starts meant that the legislation would have little impact.

Unfair, Unworkable:

Labor Assails Bids To Revive Controls

The AFL-CIO came down hard on congressional proposals to strengthen the powers of the Council on Wage & Price Stability, and let it be known it is opposed to any wage-price legislation which goes beyond a simple extension of the life of the agency.

"All these proposals for strengthening the powers of the Council on Wage & Price Stability would expand the council's activities in the direction of more indirect controls," the AFL-CIO told a House Banking subcommittee considering various bills dealing with wage and price controls. Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller's testimony was presented by Ray Denison.

"Our experience with indirect controls convinces us that such controls cannot be administered in a fair and equitable manner," the AFL-CIO said.

"This belief is strengthened by the pro-business orientation of President Ford's Administration."

Biemiller noted the federation has no objection to the continued existence of the council and to its continued monitoring activities, "but we are opposed to the council having any powers beyond what it now has."

Expressing skepticism over the council's value, Biemiller said its very existence reflects a wrong sense of economic priorities.

While not ignoring the problem of inflation which has seriously eroded workers' purchasing power, the AFL-CIO believes that Congress and the Administration should be giving top priority to job-creating, economy-stimulating measures, Biemiller said.

"The key economic problem today is jobs and the need for jobs," Biemiller said. "We need consumer purchasing power and fundamental to that purchasing power is getting America back to work."

The Senate has already passed a bill to extend the council's authority to June 30, 1976. In addition, the Senate measure would give the council a new power of subpoena. Other bills would authorize the setting of wage and price guidelines, require pre-notification of proposed wage and price increases, and grant

Panel Seeks Growth Aid For Utilities

A labor-management panel created last year to advise President Ford on economic matters has proposed a package of tax credits and deferrals to stimulate bogged-down electric utility construction.

The panel's unanimous recommendations, strongly endorsed by Ford, include an increase from 10 to 12 percent in the investment tax credit for construction work already in progress. The credit would remain in effect indefinitely.

The Labor-Management Committee termed it "imperative that there be substantial restoration of construction of electric utilities at once."

Federation Banquet Set To Honor Solzhenitsyn

Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn, Nobel Prize winning author and Soviet dissident, will be the guest of honor at an AFL-CIO banquet during his visit to Washington on the weekend of June 27.

AFL-CIO President George Meany announced that Solzhenitsyn had accepted a long-standing federation invitation to visit Washington. He wrote presidents of AFL-CIO affiliates that the banquet on June 30 at the Washington Hilton "is a testament to the solidarity of the American trade union movement with the cause of intellectual freedom everywhere."

"We are honored," he wrote, that the author of works that "have laid bare the tragedy of human life under Soviet totalitarianism has accepted our invitation."

Meany had written Solzhenitsyn in February 1974 inviting him to the United States as a guest of the trade union movement to "communicate freely with the American people." The Russian author expressed his great pleasure at receiving the invitation in a letter to Meany in March 1974 and his great respect for the AFL-CIO and its policies, but said he of necessity had to decline at that time, shortly after he was exiled by the Soviet Union.

Coors Rejection Urged For Broadcasting Post

The AFL-CIO has asked the Senate to reject President Ford's nomination of Joseph Coors to the board of directors of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting because of his "narrow, extremist political views."

Coors, head of the Colorado beer company that bears his name, was originally nominated to the CPB board by President Nixon—on the day before Nixon's resignation. The 93rd Congress didn't act on the nomination, but Ford recently resubmitted it.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said the integrity of public affairs programming would be seriously impaired if Coors brought his views to bear in a policy-making role.

Biemiller wrote Sen. John O. Pastore (D-R.I.), chairman of the subcommittee holding hearings on the nomination, that a diversity of views on the board of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting should be achieved without bringing in either the far right or the far left.

Confirmation of Coors, he said, "would add division, not diversity," to the board and "would portend ideological mischief with this nation's public broadcasting system, which operates on the public air waves with the public's money."

The Colorado-based Coors family has bankrolled such right-wing enterprises as the Committee for the Survival of a Free Congress,

FAULTY ECONOMIC POLICIES of the Nixon and Ford administrations that triggered the current recession are assailed by Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts at the CWA convention in San Diego.

New Study Refutes Industry Claim Of High Cost of Reducing Job Noise

Companies that refuse to install noise controls may be practicing false economy, a new study suggests. The "savings" may be wiped out by the rising volume of compensation claims and increasing awards to workers who have suffered hearing loss.

That point, recently explored in a scientific paper before the Acoustical Society of America, is likely to have a significant impact at Occupational Safety & Health Administration hearings on a proposed noise standard which open June 23.

Industry and employer groups are opposing a reduction in on-the-job noise levels, claiming that costs for the controls would be excessive.

But the study submitted to the acoustical society pointed out that "the costs of applying noise control or not applying noise control may be approximately equal." And it said new developments have lowered the cost of reducing noise levels.

The study was conducted by acoustical engineers Glenn Warnaka, Gerald Johnson and Hans Sass of the Allforce Acoustics division of Lord Corp., who stressed the economic impact on industry stemming from damage claims for hearing loss.

Although workers in certain specialized industries are faced with severe occupational diseases such as black lung, asbestosis, arsenic poisoning and liver cancer, the authors noted that the noise hazard affects workers in virtually every industry.

"Noise may result in a loss of more money to industry than any other portion of OSHA standards simply because noise seems to affect more workers," the paper observed.

The cost factor affecting industry is illustrated by the spectacular rise in compensation claims for hearing damage in Oregon over a four-year period.

In 1971, state statistics showed two claims on hearing damage. The number increased to 25 in 1972, to 700 in 1973 and to 1,500 in 1974.

The authors also noted that one large company in New Jersey paid $3,250,000 in hearing damage claims last year. This year, the firm expects the amount to increase to $8 million, the paper said.

Occupational safety and health experts in organized labor are pressing for a reduction in noise levels on the job to 85 decibels for an eight-hour period.

But OSHA has proposed in its standard to hold the line at 90 decibels, contending that the lower decibel level would be too costly to industry and unfeasible with present technology.

Both of OSHA's arguments have been refuted in congressional testimony by the Environmental Protection Agency, which is siding with organized labor for an immediate reduction to 85 decibels.

OSHA has estimated that cost of a 10-year program to reduce noise levels in industry to 85 decibels would be $31.6 billion. But the EPA, citing data in the paper presented to the acoustical society, said the levels could be reduced to 85 decibels for $11.7 billion.

The Warnaka-Johnson-Sass paper stressed that innovations in noise control technology would greatly reduce the costs of industry meeting the lower decibel standard.

Noting the economic impact of compensation claims, the paper said that "unless the cost of not applying engineering noise control is carefully defined, the costs of applying engineering noise control have little significance."

Flint Glass Union Hails End of Area Differential

Hollywood, Fla.—Delegates to the 90th biennial convention of the Flint Glass Workers hailed the ending of geographic wage differentials as the achievement of one of the union's longest standing goals.

In negotiations with Corning Glass Co., the union won a five-year program for the removal of all differentials at the company's plants across the nation. About 40 percent of the union's 34,000 members are employed by Corning.

The convention also heard details of a new three-year Corning contract which calls for a 40-cent increase in the first year and 25-cent raises in each of the second two years, plus breakthroughs in pension, life insurance and dental programs. In all, the convention was told, the fringe package now totals $1.08 an hour.

The convention also re-elected President George M. Parker to an eighth two-year term and Ivan T. Uncapher to his second term as secretary-treasurer. Others re-elected were Vice Presidents Robert W. Newell, Harold Gibbons and Eugene Howling. Lawrence Bankowski was elected as the new assistant secretary. Officers' salaries are tied to the negotiations just completed.

Delegates to the 12-day convention narrowed the choices for the 1977 convention to Toronto, Louisville and Las Vegas. That will be just short of the centennial of the union, which was established in 1878.

The union's remaining 1975 bargaining calendar was described as "light," but negotiations will be conducted in 1976 for the entire hand-made industry.

That industry has been severely hit by imports, the convention was told. Imports were a major reason for a slight dip in the union's membership from its 1973 record of 36,000.

R-T-W Bills Beaten Down In Louisiana

Baton Rouge, La.—The Louisiana legislature made it perfectly clear in its current session that it wants no part of a revival of a "right-to-work" law the state repealed back in 1956.

Anti-union forces, tried in both the House and Senate, and struck out.

First, the House Labor & Industrial Relations Committee voted 8-2 against a proposal to ban the union shop.

The sponsor of the anti-union bill then tried to get the House to override the committee and pass the bill. His attempt was rebuffed, 63-15.

Meanwhile, the Senate Labor Committee voted 4-1 to kill another "right-to-work" bill. As in the House, anti-union groups tried to revive the bill on the Senate floor. But the Senate voted 28-7 to postpone "indefinitely" any consideration of the "right-to-work" bill.

Convention Action:

CWA Sets Policies On Major Issues

San Diego—The more than 2,500 delegates to the Communications Workers convention here adopted policy statements and resolutions on a broad range of social and international issues and provided an early forum for prospective presidential candidates.

The resolutions called for adoption of a public employe bargaining law, establishment of a national child care program, comprehensive tax reform and a major national commitment to provide housing for poor and working class families.

In the international area, the convention condemned the new Communist-military dictatorship in Portugal, called for assistance to refugees from Southeast Asia and reaffirmed CWA's support for efforts to promote free trade unionism in all nations.

It called also on the Ford Administration to reassert, rather than reassess, America's commitment to Israel. The union blasted the "oil energy blackmail" by the Arab nations and noted that the "enemies of Israel show no real desire to have peace return to the Middle East."

The delegates listened to four Democrats who have declared their candidacy or are considering a run for the party's nomination in 1976. The speakers included Rep. Morris Udall of Arizona—who delivered a tough condemnation of Alabama Gov. George Wallace and his tactics— along with former Georgia Gov. Jimmie Carter and Senators Birch Bayh of Indiana and Lloyd Bentsen of Texas. Nearly a dozen of the growing roster of presidential contenders had been invited to address the gathering.

CWA President Glenn Watts set the convention's major theme in his keynote speech by urging an all-out union effort to help defeat the "big business Ford administration" next year.

Rep. Udall became the first candidate to publicly declare, "I will not serve on any ticket that includes George Wallace." He went on to say he would "make no deals" with Wallace nor support any candidate who does.

Udall characterized Wallace's campaign strategy as "the politics of negativism," and pronounced it "hollow" and "divisive."

Each of the speakers had strong criticism for President Ford's general economic policies and for his veto of emergency jobs legislation as unemployment climbed to 9.2 percent by the Labor Dept.'s calculations.

The delegates authorized establishment of a union savings and retirement trust fund to give CWA members an opportunity to invest personal savings for "maximum possible returns consistent with maximum safety."

In conjunction with the convention some 1,000 delegates attended a special women's conference featuring an address by California Secretary of State March Fong Eu. Conferees discussed issues of special interest to female members and union officials—who comprise more than half of CWA's membership—and resolved to intensify efforts to win ratification of the proposed Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution. Final ratification of ERA requires approval by four more state legislatures.

Utility Workers Expand Minority Participation

New York—Delegates to the Utility Workers convention voted to provide a stronger voice for minority group members by creating a new position on the union's executive board.

The constitutional amendment calls for the automatic seating of the head of the union's Human Relations Committee on the expanded board of 15 members and four executive officers.

In effect, the action taken makes Elizabeth Daniels of New York the first woman and first black to serve on the board. More than 10 percent of the union's members are from minority groups.

The 422 delegates to the 19th biennial UWUA convention also elected James J. Joy, Jr., an executive board member, as executive vice president. He succeeds William R. Munger, who retired.

Other top officers were re-elected to new four-year terms. They are President Harold T. Rigley, Sec.-Treas. Marshall M. Hicks and Vice President C. Joseph Luciano.

Among the major resolutions adopted at the four-day convention, delegates called for a strong equal opportunity program in employment, passage of the labor-backed National Health Security bill, full enforcement of federal job safety and health standards, and the extension of jobless benefits to all workers.

Turning to problems that directly affect UWUA members, the convention urged the development of a balanced government program to meet the nation's energy needs.

It called for efforts to reduce American reliance on foreign oil, stressing improved policies on the use of coal and nuclear energy for the production of electricity.

Establishment of direct credit allocations and low-cost loans to private utility companies was also cited as vital to ease their financial problems with the increased costs of operations. Delegates reaffirmed the union's opposition to government takeover of private utilities.

Expressing concern over the loss of jobs by workers in heavy manufacturing, the convention called on utility firms to halt the purchase of equipment and components produced overseas by foreign companies or overseas plants of U.S. multinational corporations.

In an address to the convention, Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) assailed President Ford's economic policies and questioned the close ties of the Administration with major oil producers.

Jackson said both consumers and utility companies must bear the brunt of Ford's energy program through increased prices.

Other convention speakers included New York Mayor Abraham D. Beame, New York City AFL-CIO President Harry Van Arsdale, State Industrial Commissioner Louis Levine and AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard.

After Seating of Terrorists:

U.S. Labor Left ILO Session With 'Sorrow but Conviction'

Geneva—It was with solemn dignity and regret that the U.S. labor delegation walked out of the International Labor Organization conference when the ILO's fight for social justice for the world's workers was subverted to the political ends of the self-styled Palestine Liberation Organization.

The decision on the PLO "further removes the ILO from its once-vaunted role as the world's only tripartite organization designed to bring about better conditions of work and life for workers and their dependents the world over," U.S. worker delegate Irving Brown told the conference.

It was with "deep sorrow but yet with conviction" that Brown announced to the some 1,500 trade union, government and employer representatives that jammed the three-tiered hall that his delegation was withdrawing from "any further participation" in the session.

With AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and the other advisers on his 14-member team, Brown marched up the aisle leading from the U.S. delegation benches to the outside lobby.

As the American worker group filed up the aisle they were joined by the U.S. government and employer delegates and by the entire Israeli delegation. However, only the Israeli workers, led by Gidon Ben-Israel of the Histadrut's executive bureau, joined the AFL-CIO in quitting the conference.

"We are deeply moved by the AFL-CIO act of solidarity," Ben-Israel told the conference when announcing that his delegation was also leaving.

Joining the U.S. and Israel delegations in the walkout were worker delegates from Finland, The Netherlands, West Germany, Norway and Australia, accompanied in some cases by employer delegates from these countries. A number of delegates from other countries said later that they absented themselves from the conference procedings as a form of protest.

The granting of observer status to the PLO came in a series of confusing and sometimes incoherent votes amending the conference rules to permit the sitting of its delegation with the right to speak but not to vote.

However, the key decision came when the conference rejected a demand by Brown, Joseph Morris, president of the Canadian Labor Congress, and the worker delegates of Sweden, Colombia, West Germany, Britain and Australia, that before any group calling itself a liberation movement could be accepted by the ILO it would have to assure that it "fully recognizes the principles of the ILO and its constitution and the right of all member states to continue in existence and participate in the working of the organization."

In an eloquent appeal to the conference Bert Seidman, AFL-CIO social security director, urged the adoption of the proposal as being "absolutely necessary." It offered the ILO a "last chance of being true to its traditional and fundamental principles of freedom and social justice."

R. J. Hawke, president of the Australian council of trade unions, warned the delegates that by giving the PLO observer status the ILO could be signing its own death warrant. "A tripartite organization which is committed to protecting and advancing the interest of workers all around the world cannot continue if it is to have its noble purposes emasculated by becoming a political forum which is used to advance the destruction of a member state," he said.

But the Communist-backed Arab states, by the simple expedient of abstaining in the vote to prevent the quorum being reached, killed the worker proposal. It received only 74 votes, with 305 abstentions and no one actually voting against it.

The AFL-CIO position was strongly supported at all times by the U.S. government and employer delegations. "This forum and this organization," U.S. government delegate Edward B. Persons said of the PLO admission, "so carefully designed to prevent interference by political dispute, has none the less been diverted from its true and important concerns by a political act."

Vigorously denouncing the PLO terrorist record, Charles H. Smith, U.S. Chamber of Commerce official who speaks for American employers, warned that the admission of the PLO could be the "first link in a chain of events that will result in destroying the usefulness of this organization."

A few scattered cat calls, quickly silenced, accompanied the American and Israeli delegations as they left the hall. They were followed a few minutes later by cheers and loud applause as the PLO delegation marched in waving their arms above their heads with fingers flashing the V for victory sign. Immediately invited to speak by conference president Blas F. Ople, Philippine labor minister, Abdel Aziz al-Wajeh, a high-ranking PLO official, said the Palestinians had proved their desire for peace not only through their "perseverance in the pursuit of armed struggle, but also through the numerous peace overtures they made."

But Gerd Muhr of the West German trade union confederation dismissed the "peace" argument in reply to Arab claims that PLO leader Yaser Arafat had held out an olive branch when he spoke before the United Nations General Assembly.

"He raised the olive branch so high that you could see the pistol in his pocket," Muhr said in recalling the revealing news photo of Arafat at the assembly.

The Palestine issue did not prevent the election of Brown by his fellow worker delegates at the conference to a three-year term on the ILO's Governing Body.

CLOSELY FOLLOWING the final debate at the ILO prior to the vote on the Palestine Liberation Organization are AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and Irving Brown, U.S. worker delegate. The vote to admit PLO led to the U.S. labor walkout.

Montana Labor Posts Major Legislative Gains

Helena, Mont.—The Montana legislature enacted a package of labor-backed bills to improve jobless benefits, workers' compensation, the state minimum wage, protection for construction workers and public employes, along with banning the importation of strikebreakers.

James W. Murry, executive secretary of the Montana AFL-CIO, said the legislative gains were a direct result of getting labor-endorsed candidates elected last fall. State voters elected a majority of COPE-backed candidates in both houses of the legislature—27 in the Senate and 63 in the House.

One of the key measures to clear the legislature was an increase in the maximum unemployment compensation rate from 50 percent of the average state weekly wage to 55 percent in July and to 60 percent next year.

The benefits increase was coupled with a change in compensation fund taxes paid by employers. In effect, this requires companies with a heavy turnover rate to pay a higher share of the taxes.

A major overhaul of the workers' compensation system is designed to eliminate bureaucratic abuses. The law provides for the establishment of a workers' compensation judge to handle appeals for claims. The judge would have the authority to award attorney fees in addition to the claimant's award for injury. Previously, lawyers deducted fees from any award or settlement.

For workers employed by businesses too small to be covered by the federal minimum wage law, the state's wage floor will be raised from the current $1.60 an hour to $1.80 on July 1 and to $2 on July 1, 1976.

A new classification and wage plan instituted by the legislature will provide higher salaries for public employes in Montana. Workers' compensation is also being extended for the first time to public employes, including teachers.

The legislature strengthened enforcement powers of the state's "Little Davis-Bacon Act" to insure prevailing wages to construction workers on public projects and adopted regulations for contractors to post performance bonds to cover wages and benefits.

To halt the abuse of fly-by-night operators, general contractors are required to withhold final payments to subcontractors until unemployment taxes are paid. This would prevent a contractor from running off with the unpaid taxes, leaving construction workers ineligible for unemployment benefits.

In other key bills, the legislature made Montana the 17th state to prohibit the importation of professional strikebreakers, guaranteed 180 days leave of absence with rehiring rights for all public employes on temporary service, established a procedure for assured maternity benefits and continuation of benefits for public and private employment, and set the regulation of private employment agency fees.

The legislature also enacted postcard registration of voters with the cut-off date set 10 days before an election.

Margaret Goetzinger Dies, AFL-CIO Retiree

Margaret F. Goetzinger, who worked in the accounting department of the AFL and the AFL-CIO for 42 years from 1919 to 1961, died June 16 at the age of 83 at a Hyattsville, Md., nursing home.

Miss Goetzinger served as administrator of the federation's health program from 1953 until her retirement in 1961.

Tax Credits Proposed To Aid Utility Growth

schedules of coal and nuclear power plants that are needed to meet the nation's energy demands for 1980 and 1985 "seriously jeopardizes" the country's goal of reduced dependence on imported oil, the committee declared.

"It also threatens continued economic growth, promises to restrain essential job creation and inhibits measures to reduce unemployment," the 15-member panel added.

The committee noted that, as of the end of 1974, electric utilities had deferred or cancelled construction of 106 nuclear power plants and 129 coal-fired plants.

Besides the higher investment-tax credit, the panel proposed:

- An increase in equity capital by deferral of taxes on utility dividends which are reinvested in new common stock of electric utilities.
- An extension of the fast write-off of pollution control facilities beyond Dec. 31, 1975, when the tax provision is set to expire. The fast write-off of pollution control facilities reduces the financing costs of the construction of electric utility units. The panel also would extend the write-off to fuel-conversion costs.
- In view of the length of time required to complete the construction of electric-utility installations, the federal government should permit depreciation for tax purposes on construction expenditures as made, provided such costs are included in the rate base.
- Extension of the nuclear-indemnity coverage law.
- Establishment of a small labor-management federal task force to study the problem of delays in the completion of utility plants.

The task force could study such matters as unreasonable environmental restrictions, financing, collective bargaining disputes, and regulatory delays.

The committee also recommended consideration of a timetable for the conversion of oil- and gas-fueled power plants to coal. It also urged the nation to make every effort to increase the percentage of electric power derived from nuclear sources by 1980 and 1985.

The committee estimated that 10-15 million construction labor hours are required for each nuclear unit installed.

At a White House news conference in which the committee recommendations were announced, Federal Energy Administrator Frank Zarb estimated that generating capacity from nuclear facilities could rise from 2 to 20 percent of the nation's total energy needs by the late 1980s if the panel's proposals were adopted.

Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop estimated the proposed tax reductions would save electric utilities more than half a billion dollars in the new fiscal year.

Labor members of the committee are AFL-CIO President George Meany, Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, President I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers, President Murray H. Finley of the Clothing Workers, President Paul Hall of the Seafarers, President Leonard Woodcock of the Auto Workers, and President Frank E. Fitzsimmons of the Teamsters. Dunlop is chairman of the panel.

Senate Urged To Bar Coors As Extremist

which raised funds last year for 71 conservative candidates for Congress and now is trying to raise $2 million to defeat "radicals" elected to Congress last fall.

A profile of Coors by Washington Post reporter Stephen Isaacs noted that he quit the National Association of Manufacturers in 1971 because he considered it too "liberal" but later rejoined and became a member of its board of directors.

He also has financed a money-losing television news service because he considers the network news coverage slanted to the liberal side.

Biemiller suggested that the continuing role of Coors in the operations of the news service would constitute "a real conflict of interest" in the public broadcasting post.

Labor has strongly advocated public affairs programming by public radio and television, Biemiller noted, adding:

"We firmly believe that such programming can only be successful if its integrity is above reproach and it is absolutely insulated against any ideological whim."

Sherburne Chairman Of Minnesota Regents

Minneapolis—Sec.-Treas. Neil C. Sherburne of the Minnesota AFL-CIO was elected chairman of the University of Minnesota Board of Regents for a two-year term.

A resident of Lakeland, Minn., Sherburne has been a member of the board since 1969. He was elected vice chairman two years ago, and has been acting chairman since early this year.

Inflation and Jobs

THE MOST PRESSING issue on the national economic agenda is to achieve as quickly as possible a full-employment, prosperous economy. The way to restore health to the economy is to put America back to work. The AFL-CIO has spelled out a program—including accelerated public works, public service employment, aid to the cities, housing and railbed repair—which would put America back to work.

We do not ignore the problem of inflation. Workers and their families have suffered grievously as inflation has eroded the buying power of paychecks. Real net spendable earnings for private, nonfarm workers with three dependents in April 1975 were down 4.1 percent from April the year before, down 10.1 percent from the 1972 average, and down 2.4 percent below the 1964 average.

We are concerned about the buying power of the paychecks of those workers lucky enough to have a job. We are also concerned about the effects of inflation on elderly and retired people and on low- and middle-income people generally. We want the American consumer to have enough buying power to give the necessary lift to sales, production, and employment. This means that we will not accept an unfair, one-sided, and regressive program to control the wages and incomes of working people under the guise of an "anti-inflation" program.

We oppose any legislation which would sanction direct or indirect controls or would open the door to the same kind of unfair restrictions and limitations on the wages and salaries of working people that we have seen before under different labels—guidelines, guideposts, jawboning, and the direct controls of the late, unlamented Nixon game plan with its freezes and phases. All of these so-called anti-inflation programs, no matter how much they were gilded with the rhetoric of equity, ended up as government campaigns to hold down the wages and salaries of working people—period.

INFLATION CONTINUES at a rapid rate, but fortunately, in recent months, the rate of inflation has somewhat diminished. In 1974 the Consumer Price Index went up 12.2 percent, and for the 12 months ending in April of this year the CPI increase was 10.2 percent. But the increase in consumer prices for the most recent three months has dropped significantly to an annual rate of 5.8 percent. So there is some encouragement to be found in the 1975 consumer price changes.

Likewise there is some encouragement to be found in the behavior of wholesale prices in 1975 when compared to last year. The Wholesale Price Index went up 20.9 percent, almost 21 percent in 1974. In 1975 the wholesale price picture has changed quite a bit and in the three months ending in May the annual rate of increase in wholesale prices was 5.5 percent

However, past increases in wholesale prices will show up later in 1975 in continued high prices paid by consumers. The buying power and living standards of workers and their families will continue to be undermined and eroded by inflation, even if the rate of inflation is diminishing. In April 1975, the buying power of the average weekly after-tax earnings for a worker with three dependents was down 11 percent from the peak in October 1972.

So we have no fear that anybody can say the wage increases we seek in collective bargaining are unreasonable. Workers and their unions are trying to catch up with increases in the cost of living, trying to make up for lost buying power and reduced living standards.

Effective External Control Key To Intelligence Operations

By John P. Roche

MAYBE YOU WANT President Ford to declare a week of national humiliation, fasting and prayer as collective penance for the misdeeds of the Central Intelligence Agency, but frankly I think we have a better intelligence agency than we deserve.

When you realize that since 1947 the CIA has operated without any effective legislative or executive regulation, has been provided with almost unlimited funds and done its work virtually hidden from public or press scrutiny, the miracle is that we don't have a monster, that 15 foreign heads of state were not disposed of, and that all mail entering the United States was not read.

What has been uncovered demonstrates beyond a shadow of a doubt that the CIA went well beyond its mandate in a number of areas, but there is no evidence of a malignant conspiracy to turn the United States into a police state.

On the contrary, there is no pattern: as problems arose, solutions were improvised—some illegal. And, of course, once a "solution" gets established in the bureaucracy, particularly one protected from observation, it remains like a fly in amber. If someone asks, "Is it legal?" the answer is, "Sure, we've been doing it since 1952." In short, a body of common law grows up around the original charter.

In retrospect, for example, I am convinced that unknowingly I was a witness to the beginnings of the CIA "Operation Chaos," which involved infiltrating anti-war and other militant groups and domestic surveillance. In 1967, as the anti-war movement became noisier and noisier, President Johnson became madder and madder. His fury was fed by the late FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover, who could find a conspiracy in a nursery school. In the White House, Special Counsel Harry McPherson and I became the backboards. We were both profoundly skeptical of the conspiracy theory, and LBJ set out to convince us we were a couple of barefoot innocents.

His technique was to call either of us in and triumphantly hand over some documents that, he felt, were proof positive of his pet thesis—that the militants were led and financed by the Communists abroad, and that they were tightly coordinated. One that I recall vividly was a memo from J. Edgar carefully documenting how anti-war militants in 15 cities across the United States had employed the same protest techniques within the space of three or four days.

Following my addiction to the simplest possible answer, I suggested that in each of these cities there were television sets, which could explain the chain reaction. A group in New York would see a new wrinkle playing in San Francisco and employ it the next day. The President was unimpressed and called on the government for a full-court press.

NOW WHEN A PRESIDENT, particularly a volcano like LBJ, calls for a full-court press, the troops really hop. In fact, they are very likely to become more Catholic than the Pope—that is, engage in marginal and illegal acts to impress the Man. When Army counterintelligence got the word, for instance, it launched an absolutely outrageous campaign of surveillance, bugging trees at anti-war meetings and setting up dossiers on roughly a quarter of the population of the United States. The President knew nothing of this, nor did the Secretary of Defense; down in the depths of the Pentagon, however, some colonel was bucking for a star.

Let us shift to CIA Director Richard Helms and his possible reaction to President Johnson's booming orders. Like other human beings, he did not want to disappoint his boss.

I hypothesize the following scenario: Helms held a council of war and somebody suggested infiltrating radical groups, someone else perhaps asked, "Can we do it legally?" and the common law was invoked, "We did it for Kennedy (or Eisenhower)." That settled, "Operation Chaos" went into business. And when Director Helms proudly handed the President a letter from one militant in Havana to one in Detroit, one doubts if the President's first question was, "Did you obtain it legally?"

In any case, our reaction to the exposures should skip flagellation in favor of effective external control. No agency, particularly a secret one, can be trusted to police itself.

Rebuff to Tyranny:

Labor Movement Steadfast In Opposing Totalitarianism

By Msgr. George G. Higgins

THE LEADERSHIP of the British Trades Union Congress (the English equivalent of the AFL-CIO) recently entertained Comrade Alexander Shelepin, then chairman of the Congress of Trade Unions in the Soviet Union—a man who, earlier in his career, had been chief of the KGB, the Soviet secret police apparatus.

It is impossible for me to understand how the TUC could justify showing official hospitality to the leader of a totalitarian workers' movement which is a trade union federation only in name and stands in complete opposition to everything the British labor movement claims to represent in terms of freedom and democracy.

In any event, you can be absolutely certain that if Shelepin ever comes to the United States, he will not even be received, much less welcomed or entertained, by the AFL-CIO.

Organized labor in the United States, as labor economist and labor historian Philip Taft points out in a recent study, "Defending Freedom: American Labor and Foreign Affairs," has always taken the position that "the unions of the free world had to oppose Communist totalitarianism because it denied men the right to choose their governors, their organizations of labor, and took away the rights of freedom of association, speech, and press. . . . Its adamant opposition to exchanges with the 'unions' of the eastern bloc has always been based upon the view that these organizations are neither autonomous nor independent and that nothing can be gained by meeting with what are in fact government-controlled organizations."

Prof. Taft, a close student of labor affairs in this country and abroad for more than half a century, takes note of the fact that many members of the liberal community in the United States look with intense disfavor on labor's rigidly anti-Communist stance. Taft himself has no sympathy with the views of his liberal colleagues on this matter. He says it would be futile to review the misinformation and the half truths they have circulated about labor's foreign policy. One of their favorite ploys, he points out, has been to attribute labor's policy to some sinister influence "without noting that the opposition to all forms of totalitarianism has been a consistent position."

It should also be noted that labor's liberal critics frequently contradict one another. Some of them allege, for example, that labor, having become part of the establishment, slavishly echoes the foreign policy of the United States when that policy is anti-Communist. Others have criticized the AFL-CIO for not falling in line behind the U.S. government when the government happens to be on friendly terms with a particular Communist regime.

In response to the latter type of criticism, Taft points out that "the labor movement is not sponsoring or promoting what might be described as realpolitik, which is the task of governments, but democracy and social and economic justice. It is not obliged to shake the bloody hand of the tyrant even when the American government finds it necessary to do so."

Taft also reminds labor's critics that the AFL-CIO refusal to deal with government controlled unions is not confined to the Communist bloc. The same criterion, he says, has been applied to the so-called "unions" in Spain and in Argentina during the Peronist period. "There are those," he says, "who, because of their socialist sympathies or other reasons, seek to distinguish between totalitarianism in socialist clothing and the fascists. American labor has, on the whole, not been receptive to these distinctions, and it finds both types of dictatorship evil and repulsive.

LABOR'S STAND-OFF POLICY with regard to the so-called "unions" in Franco Spain has been criticized at times in certain Catholic circles, but unjustifiably so, in my opinion.

The fact is that the AFL-CIO's policy on this matter was clearly echoed by the Spanish bishops in their recent pastoral, "Reconciliation in the Church and in Society." With specific reference to the trade union situation in their own country, the Spanish bishops said that "If our society is to reach true reconciliation, workers must be able to exercise their rights and defend their interests and aspirations without fear of reprisals. This means legal recognition of labor unions which are truly representative." The bishops also supported efforts within the cabinet of Premier Carlos Arias Navarro to legalize labor strikes.

The Franco government recently approved a law granting Spanish industrial workers the right to strike, but only under strictly controlled conditions. This represents a very tiny measure of progress, but it really doesn't begin to meet the requirements of justice as outlined in the recent pastoral of the Spanish bishops. Nor does it meet the traditional standards of the AFL-CIO with respect to trade union freedom.

Until these standards are legally acknowledged by the Spanish government, the AFL-CIO will refuse, as it has in the past, to recognize or to deal with the so-called Spanish unions. I agree with the federation's position on this matter. Whether or not its anti-Communist and anti-fascist policy has always been implemented wisely and prudently is an arguable point. The policy itself, however, is basically sound.

In Wake of Veto:

Public Works Measure Sought To Curb Rising Joblessness

THE FAILURE of Congress to overturn President Ford's veto of the job-creating Emergency Employment Act makes passage of the pending public works measure more urgent than ever, Legislative Director Jack Curran of the Laborers declared.

Curran pointed out that national unemployment figures released after the veto was sustained show that joblessness has jumped again, and the rate now stands at the highest level since 1941. Worse yet, he stressed, unemployment among construction workers is more than double the rate for all industries, and in some areas has soared as high as 60 percent.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Curran scored President Ford's claim that he vetoed the jobs bill because it was inflationary.

"Indeed, it is inflationary to do nothing to stimulate the economy," he asserted, noting that a rise of 1 percent in unemployment is an increase of $16 billion, in terms of costs to the federal government, through loss of revenue and greater expenditures of public assistance programs.

Turning to the issue of some $30 billion appropriated by Congress, but impounded by the White House, Curran said that even though the courts have ruled that certain of those appropriations must be released, bureaucratic indifference in the federal agencies keeps the badly needed monies bottled up. "The agencies are twiddling and diddling, making it almost impossible for the money to filter out into contracts," he charged.

In effect, Curran said, "the Administration has another weapon in its hands," and funds Congress intended be used for water and sewage treatment plants and other waste facilities aren't getting out into the communities where they are needed to help cut the jobless rolls.

Curran was questioned by Jerome Cahill of the New York Daily News and Dale McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THERE ARE 2.8 MILLION WORKERS in the United States who are being denied the right to engage in any meaningful political activity. And there are several million other workers who cannot hold on to their jobs and run for public office.

All of these workers are "hatched." The 2.8 million federal employes who come under the provisions of the Hatch Act are barred from soliciting campaign funds from fellow workers, from using their offices for political purposes and from taking an active part in a partisan political campaign.

Until last year several million state and local government employes were covered by the Hatch Act but Congress modified their coverage, generally, restricting them from running for public office.

The Hatch Act was enacted in 1939 to correct what Congress felt, at that time, were growing abuses of the merit system. In 1940 the act was expanded to include state and local employes whose principal employment was related to federally financed activities.

While there was general recognition that public employes need some protection against coercion, there has been a growing opposition to the broad area of restrictions imposed by the law.

Congress recognized this in 1966 when it passed a law establishing a bipartisan Commission on Political Activity of Government Personnel to review the Hatch Act and other laws that limit participation of federal employes in political affairs.

After a year's study, the 12-member commission recommended a general easing of restrictions on most federal workers but the writing of strong protections of civil servants against coercion by their superiors.

These recommendations were never adopted but they are now largely incorporated in a bill introduced in the House by Rep. William Clay (D-Mo.). And there is a serious effort being made in Congress to secure passage of the legislation.

Among the political activities which are prohibited under existing Civil Service Commission regulations, and which the Clay bill would loosen, are: being a delegate to a political convention; participating in political meetings, caucuses and primaries; preparing for, organizing, or conducting political clubs; distributing campaign literature or buttons; circulating nominating petitions and running for public office.

SOME PROGRESS was made against the coverage of the Hatch Act last year when Congress passed the Federal Election Campaign Act amendments. Most of the restrictions were lifted on campaign activities of state and local government employes. However, they are still prohibited from running for major office.

For a time it appeared that the battleground for the opposition to the Hatch Act would be the courts. The lower courts frequently upheld challenges to the constitutionality of the act. One district court decision involving the Letter Carriers in 1972 said, "No one can read the act and ascertain what it prohibits."

The decision was reversed in 1973, however, by the U.S. Supreme Court which by a 6-3 vote affirmed the constitutionality of the act. The high court did leave the door open, though, for Congress "to strike a different balance if it chooses."

Congressional Quarterly, which keeps close tab on the legislative picture, says the chances for changes in the Hatch Act are improved, adding:

"A significant precedent was established in 1974 when the new election law removed restrictions on state and local government employes. . . . Perhaps the strongest factor in favor of House action is the aggressive push of the Clay subcommittee."

The Senate is awaiting action on a similar measure introduced by Chairman Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.) of the Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee.

NEW URGENCY was put on passage of the public works measure now before Congress when the House failed to overturn President Ford's veto of the jobs bill, Laborers Legislative Director Jack Curran, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Dale McFeatters, left, of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Jerome Cahill of the New York Daily News. The program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

House Vote on Strip Mining Bill Veto

The House failed to muster the two-thirds majority needed to override President Ford's veto of the bill that would require strip mining operators to restore the land they have torn up in surface mining operations. The vote, on June 10, was 278-143.

The AFL-CIO supported the position of the 222 Democrats and 56 Republicans who cast right votes (R) to override the veto. Voting wrong (W) were 86 Republicans and 57 Democrats.

Labor Assails Bids To Revive Controls

authority to the council to delay wage or price increases.

Biemiller declared these proposals would be unworkable, and emphasized the federation's strong opposition to them.

"With the new powers proposed in various bills before this subcommittee, the council would be moving toward indirect controls," Biemiller noted.

"We oppose any legislation which would sanction direct or indirect controls or would open the door to the same kind of unfair restrictions and limitations on the wages and salaries of working people that we have seen before under different labels—guidelines, guideposts, jawboning, and the direct controls of the late, unlamented Nixon game plan with its freezes and phases," Biemiller declared.

The Council on Wage & Price Stability was established last August. Its authority terminates on Aug. 15, 1975.

Need Stressed to Widen Education in Economics

New York—Expanded economic education at the grass-roots level is essential in an economy as complex as America's, representatives of labor and business agreed at a seminar sponsored by the Joint Council on Economic Education here.

"The need for economic education at all levels was never greater," Sec.-Treas. J. C. Turner of the Operating Engineers declared in remarks to the 200 delegates from leading U.S. corporations and trade unions.

"The world economic problems touch every American and our level of understanding is woefully inadequate," Turner observed.

The joint council, a non-profit organization, held the meeting to explore ways in which labor and business mutually could expand current programs on economic education.

Participants were urged to stimulate economic education programs for school systems in plant communities by working with local and state affiliates of the joint council.

"One clear lesson from the economic history of the years since World War II is the necessity of a balanced, full-employment, prosperous national economy," Turner observed. "So, we indeed must expand our economic education programs, and widen the level of understanding on economic problems as soon as possible.

"In the next decade, this nation will be called upon to make hard choices between undesirable alternatives," Turner said. "Our young people, 18 years old and above, are now part of the electoral process.

"They will be called upon to select candidates for public office who, in turn, will be setting new legislative goals on economic questions. The future of America might very well depend upon the quality of that selection."

Turner said he would like to see well-balanced programs in economic education provided all citizens, and suggested that labor should be playing a greater role in this educational process at the state council level.

He noted that the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education is organizing education committees within the federation's local central body structure and that these committees will study ways to link their efforts with the Joint Council on Economic Education. The committees also will attempt to evaluate current economic education programs in their communities.

E. T. Kehrer, southern representative of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, discussed the program of the Georgia Council on Economic Education.

The council has established six centers at colleges and universities across the state whose chief priority thus far has been to conduct summer seminars for social studies and economics teachers.

Far too little is being done to convey labor's role in the nation's economy in Georgia's textbooks and supplementary classroom and library materials, Kehrer noted.

Boyle Retires, Martino Voted Chemical Head

Akron, O.—The Chemical Workers' executive board has elected Frank D. Martino to succeed Thomas E. Boyle as president of the union. Boyle, who retired for health reasons, had served in the post since 1968.

Martino, the union's secretary-treasurer since 1972, was elected unanimously by the board which then approved the nomination of Vice President J. A. Thomas to fill the post of secretary-treasurer.

In approving Boyle's retirement, the board named him president-emeritus in recognition of his more than 30 years of service to the ICWU.

Boyle, 59, had requested the board's approval of his retirement because of a serious heart ailment that recently required surgery for repair of an artery.

Martino, who becomes the union's fifth president, is 56 and a native of Albany, N.Y. He has held a number of posts with the ICWU since joining Local 61 in Rensselaer, N.Y., after military service in World War II. In 1970 he became a vice president and director of the union's Region 6 in St. Louis.

Thomas was a former special assistant to the late ICWU President Walter Mitchell and was director of research and education under Boyle.

The Chemical Workers board also approved the appointment of Angelo A. Russo, a union representative, to the post of vice president and regional director formerly held by Thomas.

Terms of the officers run until the union's next convention, in September 1976. The union has 85,000 U.S. and Canadian members.

Max Steinbock Dies, Editor, ILPA President

Max Steinbock, a veteran labor editor and trade union leader, died in Washington, D.C., on June 17 of a heart attack. He was 58.

Editor of the RWDSU Record since 1954 and administrative assistant to Max Greenberg, president of the Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Union, Steinbock was serving as president of the International Labor Press Association.

AFL-CIO President George Meany wired his wife, Mildred Steinbock, that as president of ILPA "he was a strong and consistent force behind improving and strengthening the labor press which is so vital to this movement." He served his union and the labor movement "with talent and devotion," Meany said.

Born in New York City, Steinbock attended Cooper Union Art School and worked as an organizer for the union. After wartime service in the Air Force he became executive director of the New York County Liberal Party before joining RWDSU Local 388 as editor of its paper.

In 1954 he became editor of the RWDSU Record and made it into one of the outstanding labor papers in the country, winning numerous ILPA and other awards. He was elected a vice president of ILPA in 1965 and served six years in the post before being elected the organization's president in 1973.

John M. Barry, ILPA secretary-treasurer, writing on behalf of the organization, called Steinbock's "loyalty to the labor movement an inspiration to all of us." As an "outstanding labor editor" he had time for encouragement and help to all editors, Barry said. The ILPA, he added, deeply feels "this tragic loss."

Steinbock, who lived in Valley Stream, N.Y., served at the time of his death on the executive committee of the American Trade Union Council for Histadrut and on the board of directors of the Workers Defense League. In addition to his wife he is survived by his mother, Bertha Steinbock, two children, Daniel J. and Jean M. Steinbock. The family has asked that any contributions be made to the Histadrut Scholarship Fund in his name. They can be sent to the RWDSU.

In Salvage Operation:

Job Program Funds Voted by Congress

Congress acted to salvage at least a part of the $5.3 billion emergency job funds that President Ford vetoed last month, giving priority to appropriations bills that will translate quickly into paychecks.

The House voted 400-16 approval of a funding bill that includes $2 billion for job-creating programs and the Senate approved an even bigger funding bill, 90-0.

Both bills include an Administration-supported $1.6 billion to continue federal funding of 310,000 public service jobs through the new fiscal year. But most of the other items go beyond the President's original budget requests.

The House bill includes $120 million for college work-study grants for part-time student jobs, $150 million for rural water and sewer construction grants, $70 million in work incentive job training funds, $19 million for the Youth Conservation Corps and $12 million which, when added to existing funds for the Older Americans Act, will provide part-time community service jobs for about 12,700 persons 55 or older.

Quick House-Senate conference agreement is anticipated.

Meanwhile, President Ford signed into law the $473 million appropriation Congress rushed through to fund an estimated 840,000 summer jobs for needy youth this year and other special programs. The amount is more than $60 million above the President's budget request.

The House ended an intermittent two-week debate and passed a much-amended energy conservation bill intended as an alternative to Ford's proposed high tariff on imported oil.

In other Capitol Hill developments:

- The Senate approved a "sense of Congress" resolution that asked the Federal Home Loan Bank Board not to approve mortgages that carry variable interest rates pending further congressional consideration of the issue. The House earlier passed a labor-supported bill directing the agency not to allow federally-chartered savings and loan associations from issuing mortgages whose rates would fluctuate with the market price of money. The AFL-CIO said it would be inflationary and hurt homeowners hardest when other costs were also going up.

- The AFL-CIO called on the House to override President Ford's veto of a bill authorizing funds for promotion of tourist travel to the United States. Four million Americans work in jobs affected by travel and tourism.

- A bill to raise the government payment on life insurance for federal employes from one-third to one-half the premium cost won a 245-145 endorsement in the House, but this was short of the two-thirds needed to pass it under a time-saving "suspension of the rules" procedure. It is expected to be brought to the floor again under the normal legislative procedure requiring only a majority vote.

Senate Rejects New Election For N.H. Seat

The Senate refused to give up its effort to determine the winner in New Hampshire's contested senatorial election and voted 55-43 against a Republican motion to declare the seat vacant and direct that a new vote be held.

Its task now will be to reach a decision on a number of contested ballots—some of which can be displayed without revealing whether their acceptance would benefit Democrat John A. Durkin or Republican Louis C. Wyman. Both candidates at various times had been declared and certified the election winner by New Hampshire authorities.

Republicans recruited only four southern Democrats to vote with them to void the election—Harry F. Byrd, Jr. (Va.), James O. Eastland (Miss.), John L. McClellan (Ark.) and John C. Stennis (Miss.).

Later, Sen. James B. Allen (D-Ala.) proposed to declare the seat vacant if the Senate reached no conclusion by Aug. 1. But that motion was beaten after Republicans refused to agree to a timetable on voting on the election contest. Democratic leaders pointed out that absence of a timetable would clearly invite a filibuster that would ensure no action before the proposed deadline.

Safety Financing Shift Proposed by AFL-CIO

More effective enforcement of job safety standards can be achieved by shifting $30 million from deteriorating state plans to federal safety and health programs, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

The $30 million is part of the $48.5 million in President Ford's budget for fiscal year 1976 to finance the operations of 25 state safety programs. But in recent months, five states have withdrawn their programs, reverting the enforcement authority to the federal Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

In testimony before a Senate Appropriations subcommittee, Legislative Rep. Howard McGuigan pointed out that the 20 remaining states represent less than 25 percent of all covered workers. He also said other states might also pull out of the program.

McGuigan, who was accompanied by AFL-CIO job safety specialist George H. R. Taylor, said that the funds budgeted by the Administration could be better used for increasing OSHA's staff and improving federal programs.

Of the $30 million the AFL-CIO wants shifted, $25 million should go for the hiring of 1,040 additional safety inspectors, industrial hygienists and back-up personnel; $3 million for contracts with preempted states for on-site consultive services; $1.5 million to improve OSHA's standards development, and $500,000 to expand needed statistical programs.

McGuigan and Taylor also urged Congress to appropriate an additional $19.1 million for the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health. They said the added funds are needed by NIOSH to reactivate manpower training grants, laboratory facilities, research grants and an industrial carcinogens program.

Turning to other programs under the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, the AFL-CIO said that additional new funds would also be needed in the coming fiscal year to keep the Health Maintenance Organization movement growing.

Joined by Lawrence Smedley, associate director of the federation's Dept. of Social Security, McGuigan said an additional $15 million should be appropriated to initiate a moderate number of HMOs. The minimum budget, including staffing, would require an appropriation of $51.5 million.

Citing the nation's rising unemployment rate, the federation urged the subcommittee to add $68.5 million to the President's budget to carry out the activities of state employment service agencies. It called for a total appropriation for the coming year of $562.1 million to provide 31,035 positions to handle the increased caseload of jobless claims because of the expected continued high unemployment rate.

Supreme Court Rebuffs 'Right to Work' Group

The Supreme Court has refused to interfere with a federal judge's order requiring the National Right to Work Committee and its legal foundation to furnish a list of major business contributors.

Ten unions that are suing the "work" committee have sought a list of employer contributors to document their charge that harassment suits against unions have been illegally financed by employers with an interest in the outcome. The Landrum-Griffin Act bars an "interested employer or employer association" from financing litigation by a union member against his union.

The open shop group last June refused to comply with an order by U.S. District Judge Charles Richey for a partial list of contributors. A unanimous Court of Appeals panel and now the Supreme Court refused to overturn the order, leaving the "work" foundation subject to contempt of court penalties if it defies the ruling.

Unions that have brought the suit are the Machinists; State, County & Municipal Employees; Teachers; Farm Workers; Television & Radio Artists; Sheet Metal Workers; Laborers; Communications Workers; Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and Auto Workers.

In another area, the Supreme Court indicated that it was not likely to back away from its position that at least some state and local employes can be covered by the federal wage-hour law.

The court refused to review and thus let stand lower court decisions affirming enforcement through court suits of the federal minimum wage guarantees for workers at state hospitals and other institutions brought under the Fair Labor Standards Act in 1966.

Still pending, awaiting new oral arguments in the fall, is the attempt by the National League of Cities to curtail additional wage-hour coverage enacted last year, and particularly overtime pay standards set for police and fire fighters.

The Supreme Court also cleared the way for payment of retroactive salary increases for 180,000 state employes in California, whose pay had been limited by the now-defunct Cost of Living Council. The state had put the rejected funds in escrow, the state Supreme Court ordered the money paid, the federal government sought to block the payment but the Temporary Emergency Court of Appeals ruled that the money could be paid. The Supreme Court refused to overturn that decision.

Credit Unions Post 7% Membership Rise

Madison, Wis.—Membership in the nation's credit unions increased by almost 7 percent in 1974, the Credit Union National Association reported. CUNA said membership increased nationwide from 27.5 million in 1973 to 29.4 million last year.

The number of credit unions last year remained about the same as in the previous year, a national total of nearly 23,000. Assets in 1974 rose to a total of $32 billion, a growth of 12 percent.

Shanker Raps Profiteering On Child Care

Profit-making organizations should be excluded from carrying out federally funded early-childhood and day-care programs, and the operations of any such system of programs should be primarily sponsored by the nation's public schools, Teachers President Albert Shanker told a joint congressional hearing.

Shanker said profit-making agencies would "guarantee a fragmentation of effort and duplication of services."

He cited an AFL-CIO Executive Council statement attacking "the sorry record of profit-making organizations in the provision of human services, especially in the nursing home, health care and education fields."

Shanker testified at a joint hearing of a Senate subcommittee on children and youth, chaired by Sen. Walter Mondale (D-Minn.), and a House subcommittee on special education, chaired by Rep. John Brademas (D-Ind.).

Shanker told the joint committee hearing public schools have the facilities, administrative capabilities, personnel and public support necessary to provide a nationwide system of early childhood education and day care "that will meet the common needs of all."

"The whole trend of declining enrollments in education has produced a situation where the school system can now begin to provide and coordinate needed services for children in the pre-school age group," Shanker said.

He urged that public schools be the presumed prime sponsor of programs provided in legislation being considered by the panels, except where a school system is unwilling or unable to assume responsibility.

Ford Serves Notice Of More Vetoes

May housing starts were at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1,126,000 units, up from 986,000 units in April.

The rise in homebuilding in May turned out to be less than anticipated and left the industry at its lowest level for the month in 28 years.

There were other figures, too, to cast doubt on the Administration's determined optimism, including another downturn in industrial output and a new rise in initial unemployment insurance claims.

Industrial output last month fell three-tenths of 1 percent from the previous month, the eighth consecutive monthly decline.

Meanwhile, the Labor Dept. reported a huge increase in new claims for jobless insurance benefits. Initial claims during the week ended June 7, the latest reporting period for which figures are available, totaled 549,000, up 135,000 from the week before.

Nevertheless, the President assured the National Federation of Independent Business that "we are at the bottom of the economic slide, and we will soon be on our way up."

He suggested that the real problem is to suppress "the tendency of our government to do all things for all humanity."

Ford promised his business audience to do his part "to help each and every one of you make it big by getting government off your back."

Ford's Housing Veto Called Senseless

Alternative Won't Help, Says Labor

By David L. Perlman

President Ford's alternative to the labor-supported housing bill that he vetoed "won't do the job," the AFL-CIO charged.

AFL-CIO President George Meany said the vetoed bill would have meant more homes built and sold to middle-income families, and more jobs for American workers. But under the Administration plan, interest rates would stay high, "houses won't be built, rents and prices will rise and no new jobs will be created."

The vetoed bill would have provided a federal interest-rate subsidy that would have brought monthly payments on new housing within the reach of average-income families. It also would have established a federal loan program so that persons who lose their jobs won't lose their homes through foreclosure.

After the House failed to override the veto, the Senate voted quick 94-0 approval of a substitute bill that was largely tailored to the Administration's specifications. It did, however, include the protection against foreclosure that was part of the vetoed bill.

Ford said the bill he vetoed would be too costly and wasteful, especially since "there are clear signs of recovery" in the severely depressed housing industry.

He proposed to expand a little-used government program of purchasing home mortgages from banks at slightly below market rates and said he would go along with some sort of mortgage foreclosure protection, but not one dependent exclusively on the federal government.

As for the President's reliance on government purchases of mortgages to stimulate new housing—a key feature of the Senate-passed substitute bill—Meany commented at the time of the veto:

"Additional billions in mortgage-purchasing authority are meaningless. For 18 months the government has followed such a policy and only $3 billion out of the $13 billion committed have been used."

The interest rates under the program are still so high, he said, that "most families can't afford the monthly payments."

"The President's veto of the housing bill makes no sense from

Jobs Funding Bill Cleared By Congress

Congress sent to President Ford a job-creating $2.4 billion appropriations bill that includes important elements of the legislation he vetoed last month.

Added to the package in a last-minute Senate amendment that was accepted by the House was $375 million to complete financing of a $500 million public works construction program the 93rd Congress voted last December.

The full funding is designed to create 50,000 direct construction jobs, with many thousands more finding employment through the ripple effect.

Also in the bill is an Admin-

Meany Blasts President's Do-Nothingism on Jobless

Scores Callous Views On 'Human Recession'

By James M. Shevis

AFL-CIO President George Meany, charging the Ford Administration is running a "government by veto," accused the President and his economic counselors of deliberate "do-nothingism" in the face of the nation's worst unemployment crisis since the 1930s, and called for immediate, massive, job-creating programs to put the country back to work.

He said the attitude of the Ford Administration "adds up to a callous disregard for the misery and suffering experienced by our nation's unemployed."

Meany assailed Alan Greenspan, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, for remarks in a national television interview urging a go-slow policy in reducing joblessness and claiming that the recession "for all practical purposes" has ended.

"Just think of that," Meany declared. "He wants them to go back to work but not too soon. . . . He said, in effect, that this is the price we must pay in order to avoid more inflation."

Addressing some 300 delegates to a national conference in Washington sponsored by the Full Employment Action Council, Meany noted the Administration predicts high unemployment for the remainder of the decade. If the forecast is true, he declared, it could "tear this country apart."

Later, at a White House press conference, President Ford indicated the Administration's willingness to accept spreading joblessness —perhaps as high as 8 million unemployed workers in 1976, according to his own economic advisers.

"As you bring down the inflation, we may have to suffer for a short period of time higher unemployment than we like," he said.

The goal of the action council

Prices Still Rising But Pace Slows

Retail prices, while rising at a rate considerably below their year-ago pace, continued to climb in May, lifting the consumer price index 9.5 percent above May 1974, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The May CPI rise of four-tenths of 1 percent was an improvement over the six-tenths of 1 percent increase in April but still high by historical standards.

Real spendable earnings in May —take-home pay expressed in 1967 dollars to remove the effects of inflation — rose 4.4 percent from April. The increase, however, was due entirely to the tax cut and lower withholding rates enacted into law earlier this year. The real gross pay—before taxes—was down two-tenths of 1 percent from the previous month.

For a married worker with three dependents, real spendable average weekly earnings in May were $91.54, still less than they were a year earlier and only slightly higher than the 1965 average. Real spendable average weekly earnings a year earlier

Experts Tell Hearing:

Industry Can Afford Lower Noise Costs

By John R. Oravec

Workers can be protected from job-caused loss of hearing at a cost that industry can afford, expert witnesses testified during the first week of Labor Dept. hearings on a federal noise standard.

The hearings will run for several weeks to air all viewpoints on the industrial noise problem which affects workers in virtually every industry.

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration has proposed continuing the present industrial noise limit of 90 decibels over an eight-hour period. Organized labor and the Environmental Protection Agency contend that 85 decibels is the maximum than can be allowed to better protect the hearing of workers.

A 5-decibel difference at that sound range is far greater than the numbers indicate. Noise recorded at 85 decibels is actually less than half as loud as at 90 decibels.

Some experts compare 90 decibels to the roar of a 20-ton truck or a subway train and 85 decibels to the noise of a busy street corner.

A scientific study under OSHA contract warned that if present noise levels in 19 major industries are permitted to continue, 1.7 million workers will suffer handicapping hearing impairment.

The OSHA study disclosed that 36 percent of the nation's production workers are likely by age 59 to have suffered hearing losses of

House Rejects Move to Weaken Safety Protection in Small Plants

The House refused by a 231-186 vote to weaken job safety protections for workers in establishments with 25 or fewer employes.

As in past years, the proposal to curb enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act was made by Rep. Paul Findley (R-Ill.) through an emendment to an appropriations bill carrying funds for the Labor Dept.

In each of the past two Congresses, Findley's amendment carried and only the Senate's refusal to bow to the small business employer lobby salvaged the job safety enforcement program.

Ninety percent of all workplaces and 30 percent of the nation's workers, including many in hazardous occupations, would be excluded under a 25-worker cutoff.

In a letter to House members before the vote, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller expressed strong opposition to any "numerical exemption" to job safety enforcement. By making some workers "less than equal," Biemiller said, Congress would be "plainly subverting" the intent of the federal safety law.

Findley's amendment this year was somewhat less severe than his 1974 amendment that had passed the House, 201-194. This year's proposal would have allowed an inspector to enter a small establishment. But he could only warn an employer on a first inspection, and could not cite him for a violation.

Idaho Unions Press Goals In Legislature

Twin Falls, Ida. — The Idaho State AFL-CIO re-elected its present slate of officers, approved a 5-cent monthly increase in per capita dues, and adopted more than a score of resolutions at its 17th annual convention here.

The 150 delegates returned to office President Robert W. Macfarlane, Sec.-Treas. Jim Kerns, Vice President Ed Johnson and six executive board members.

Higher operating expenses were cited to justify the dues increase. Approved unanimously, the increase will raise monthly dues to 35 cents effective July 1.

Among the resolutions approved at the three-day convention were measures to provide unemployment benefits to striking workers and to fight any legislative proposals dictating compulsory arbitration.

The convention also adopted a resolution to set the normal retirement age for workers in hazardous industries at 60 and for those choosing early retirement at 55. This would cover workers in Idaho's zinc, lead and silver underground mines.

One of the convention speakers, Assistant Labor Sec. John H. Stender, lauded the support of organized labor in passing the national job safety and health law, and noted that without the help of the AFL-CIO and its state affiliates such as the Idaho AFL-CIO there would be no Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

Also addressing the convention were Idaho Lt. Gov. John Evans, AFL-CIO Region VI Director William L. Gilbert, and Assistant Director Frank Emig of the Dept. of Organization & Field Services.

Counties Study Ways to Deal With Unions

Milwaukee—Some 100 officials from county governments throughout the United States met here to determine how best to deal with public employe unions.

Sponsored by the National Association of Counties, the seminars and speeches ran a wide gamut of views and ranged in topics from general comments on legislation to the nuts and bolts of collective bargaining and unit determinations in elections.

Sam Zagoria, former member of the National Labor Relations Board and currently director of Labor Management Relations Service, a consulting agency for municipalities, told the group in a general session that because of the "money pinch" facing local governments, they are seeking to get more work out of fewer workers. He said the financial crisis facing government may require numerous changes in labor-management relations.

Unions came in for some criticism by several of the management spokesmen, with comments that many unions and their leaders seek a "confrontation," and often look for "a martyr" to dramatize their cause.

Bernard F. Hillenbrand, executive director of the National Association of Counties, stressed in an interview that his association supports the principle of collective bargaining for public employes, and the conference was called because of the concern over the implications of the bargaining.

The association has already gone on record as opposing any federal legislation covering public employes and suggests such collective bargaining laws be passed by states.

EXPANDED JOB OPPORTUNITIES for minority workers through labor's outreach efforts are cited by AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard at a Human Resources Development Institute conference in Washington. The three-day session drew 90 staff representatives from AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Councils that operate apprenticeship and journeyman outreach programs under HRDI contracts.

Job Loss Stress Urged In New Trade Talks

The government's foreign trade negotiators are still not facing up to the problems of job losses by American workers caused by expanding imports, labor representatives warned.

The Labor Policy Advisory Committee for Multilateral Trade Negotiations—composed of representatives from 48 AFL-CIO affiliates and other unions — said that the basic interests of workers are not being adequately reflected in trade discussions.

The committee advised that the immediate and future impact of reduced tariffs on low-wage imports from so-called developing countries must be thoroughly explored by the negotiators.

Labor's concerns were expressed in a follow-up meeting with Labor Secretary John T. Dunlop and Special Trade Representative Frederick Dent.

At an earlier meeting, the committee told the government's trade negotiators that a new round of giveaways by further lowering tariffs would worsen the jobs loss of American workers.

The Labor Policy Advisory Committee was established under provisions of the 1974 Trade Act, along with committees representing business, agriculture and the public.

In an organizational session, the committee elected president I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers as chairman and President Harry A. Tulley of the Glass Bottle Blowers as vice chairman.

Also formed were six Labor Sector Advisory Committees, representing workers in various industries, trade groups and services.

Meanwhile, the Labor Dept. has certified 650 workers at two electronics plants and 84 shoe workers eligible for trade adjustment assistance because they lost their jobs due to increased foreign imports. But at the same time, another 225 shoe workers were denied adjustment assistance.

Petitions for assistance were filed by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers for 500 employes who were laid off at an RCA plant at Mountaintop, Pa., and another 150 employes of a Magnavox plant in Jefferson City, Pa.

The United Shoe Workers filed the petition on behalf of the 84 employees who either lost their jobs or became underemployed at Algy Shoes, Inc., of Everett, Mass.

However, the Labor Dept. failed to honor another USW petition for 225 employes of the Brown Shoe Co. plant in Newport, Ark., contending that increased imports of women's fashion boots did not contribute importantly to the closing of the plant last fall.

Recent Labor Dept. figures show that adjustment assistance under the Trade Act was approved on 14 petitions covering 5,000 workers, while three covering 1,800 were rejected.

There are currently 63 petitions on file with the Labor Dept. for adjustment assistance covering more than 50,000 jobless or underemployed workers affected by imports.

Workers certified eligible for assistance qualify for cash allowances, training, testing, counseling, job placement and other assistance.

The cash allowance amounts to 70 percent of the worker's average wage, but not exceeding the national average wage in manufacturing. Benefits are paid for 52 weeks. However, workers age 60 or older may receive an additional 26 weeks in benefits.

Rail Clerks Defer Strike

The Railway & Airline Clerks agreed to a 30-day postponement of a strike date it had set on the nation's major railroads to permit more time for bargaining.

The agreement with the National Railway Labor Conference, the carriers' negotiating arm, came on the heels of an all-night bargaining session attended by federal mediators.

The union had been legally free to strike the carriers June 23, the end of a government-imposed, 30-day cooling-off period required under provisions of the Railway Labor Act.

A month earlier, a special presidentially-appointed fact-finding panel recommended that BRAC's negotiators accept a pattern agreement signed by seven other rail unions calling for a 41 percent wage-and-benefit increase over three years.

Convention Theme:

Musicians Cite Need For New Approach

Shreveport, La.—An organizing campaign geared to the "problems and realities of today," rather than the concepts of the 1930s and '40s was called for by Musicians President Hal C. Davis at the union's annual convention here.

In his keynote address to the 1,200 delegates Davis said that while the AFM has made its share of mistakes, "it has negotiated benefits that are the envy of performers throughout the world. Every serious young musician joining the federation has a right to expect to share in those benefits."

Davis and the union's secretary-treasurer, J. Martin Emerson, were elected to new terms by acclamation along with Vice Presidents Victor W. Fuentealba and J. Alan Wood. Nine candidates were nominated for five other seats on the international executive board and an election held before the convention's end will determine the outcome.

Nancy Hanks, chairman of the National Endowment of the Arts, in the first appearance by the head of the endowment before a union convention, told the delegates that President Ford was supporting the concept of performance-royalty legislation long sought by the arts and entertainment unions.

She announced also that the endowment was establishing "residencies in music" under which musicians and composers will perform and teach in various communities. She called for a joint effort to help solve the economic problems of diverse musical groups and the creation of "innovative musical programs and events."

Davis, in his opening address, also called for passage of the performance-royalty legislation which would provide for the payment of a small royalty for musicians and other artists when their recorded work is used by others for a profit. He said that Congress has succumbed in the past to the phony argument that poorer radio stations would be subsidizing wealthy stars.

The fact is, he stressed, that the proposed royalties are minimal, less than those paid to composers, and small stations would pay nothing. "We don't scratch social security or Medicare because a minority of the people receiving benefits do not need them to survive," he pointed out.

Davis also called for legislation to give taxpayers the opportunity to specify on their tax forms that a portion of the tax payments go directly to support the arts.

A highlight of the opening session of the 332,000-member union's convention was the presentation of the federation's honorary life membership gold card to country music star Roy Acuff for his "unique and continued contribution to country-western music."

Kansas Limits R-T-W Penalty

Topeka, Kan.—Violations of the Kansas "right-to-work" law will be a civil but not a criminal offense under a bill passed at the recent session of the state legislature.

Kansas banned union shop agreements through an amendment to the state constitution adopted in a 1958 referendum. Since then, the "right-to-work" sponsors have been pressing for "enabling legislation" that they claimed was needed to put teeth into the prohibition.

As originally proposed, a union shop could have resulted in penalties as high as a year in jail and a $2,500 fine. In its final form, the law merely empowers a person claiming to have been harmed by an illegal union shop to sue for actual damages and reasonable attorney fees. Further, if the "right-to-work" provision should ever be removed from the state constitution, the enabling law would be nullified.

Ford's Housing Proposal Termed Short of Need

an economic or a humanitarian point of view," Meany said. "Once again, the President has put the deficit ahead of the people's need for homes and jobs."

Robert A. Georgine, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., termed the veto "difficult to understand" in view of the need for new housing and the state of the economy.

One million unemployed construction workers and hundreds of thousands of others only partially employed are "totally unable to perceive the light at the end of the tunnel which the Administration's economic experts profess to see," Georgine said.

As with all of the President's other vetoes this year, the Democratic majority in the House was unable to muster the two-thirds majority needed to override a veto.

The actual vote was 268-157 for repassing the bill over the veto—16 short of two-thirds. Voting to override were 249 Democrats and 19 Republicans; supporting the veto were 122 Republicans and 35 Democrats.

The Administration went all-out to hold Republicans in line and sustain the veto, including an unusual personal appeal by the Secretary of Housing & Urban Development, Carla Hills, at a Republican caucus held on the floor of the House before the showdown session began.

She told the House Republicans that the Democratic-sponsored housing bill came too late because a "remarkable housing recovery" is under way.

House Speaker Carl Albert told the House before the showdown that Ford "is building the most monumental record of anti-job vetoes in the history of Congress."

Democrats gave Albert a standing ovation after he took the floor to attack the veto of a bill designed to provide 800,000 jobs. More Democrats but fewer Republicans voted to override the veto than had voted for the bill initially.

Before the Senate pushed through its version of the Administration bill, House Banking Committee Chairman Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.) and Rep. William A. Barrett (D-Pa.), chairman of the housing subcommittee, said they would propose a "compromise" between Ford's plan and the vetoed plan.

AFL-CIO Files Objections:

'Clean Slate' Urged On Service Pacts

The AFL-CIO asked the Labor Dept. to scrap its proposed changes in rules covering government service contracts and "begin again on a clean slate."

A federation statement charged that the new regulations were drawn up in "a highly irregular procedure" by government agencies seeking to keep costs down by giving service contracts to firms that pay substandard wages to their workers.

That's what the original 1965 Service Contracts Act and strengthening amendments adopted in 1972 were intended to prevent, the AFL-CIO stressed.

Union objections to the proposed regulations were aired recently at congressional hearings, where both Democratic and Republican members of a House Labor subcommittee ripped into the Labor Dept. for distorting the law and the intent of Congress. The Service Contracts Act was meant as an equivalent of the Davis-Bacon Act which applies to government-financed construction.

It was brought out during the congressional hearings that senior Labor Dept. officials, including the department's solicitor, had written memos declaring that portions of the proposed regulations are contrary to the law and its legislative history.

The changes the Labor Dept. has proposed would:

- Relieve the employer of obligations under a "successor contract" by saying those obligations would apply "only where substantially the same service will be performed at the same place as the previous contract."

The AFL-CIO statement said this would mean that the lowest possible wage scale would unavoidably surface as "prevailing."

- Provide a cutoff date for newly bargained contracts with service employe unions, requiring that terms be filed with the Labor Dept. 10 days before bids are opened.

The AFL-CIO pointed out that the time taken for reaching agreement, obtaining ratification and notification could result in a wage determination based on an old contract, and workers would have to fulfill the government job without benefits from scheduled wage increases.

- Allow the wage and fringe determination to "reflect rates applicable to the ultimate place of contract performance" in cases where the bidder doesn't know where the work will take place.

Labor objected that this would automatically mean the lowest wages paid anywhere. If contractors have no single prevailing wage determination on which to base their bids, it is inevitable that the wage rate will sink to the lowest level," the AFL-CIO said.

- Permit a prospective bidder who has a collective bargaining agreement "to be allowed to bid solely on the basis of that agreement."

This could make a substandard contract the standard. The AFL-CIO said the proposal reads "as if the Dept. of Labor had sat down with one special interest group and allowed that group simply to dictate the language and content of the proposed regulations."

Abel Ties Gain In Productivity To U.S. Role

Progress in labor-management cooperation has increased steadily, Steelworkers President I. W. Abel told a conference on productivity improvement in Washington, but a "new posture" from government could mean even greater strides.

"We here all seem to understand what needs to be done, and we've a willingness to get it done, but we stand in need of a lot of encouragement from the top," Abel observed at the conference, sponsored by the National Commission on Productivity and Work Quality and the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

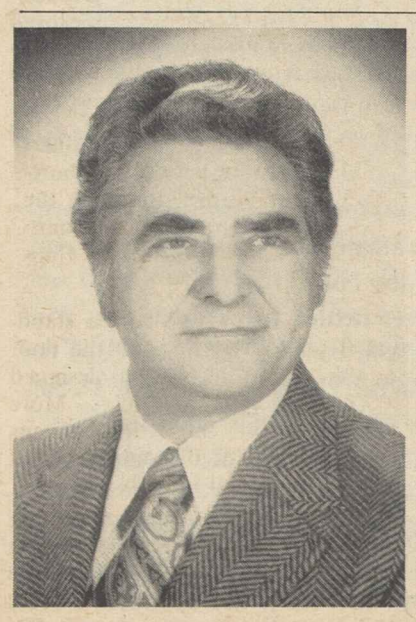
A vice chairman of the commission, Abel called on government leaders to get on with the job of restoring the health of the nation's railroads, developing mass transit systems, and providing low-cost housing.

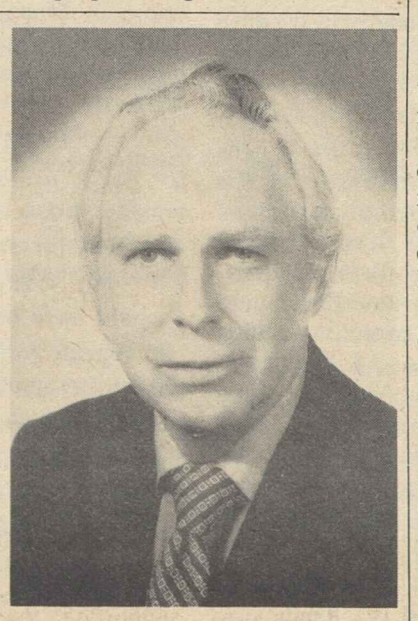
"We've lived to see a tremendous change," Abel said. "Today the leaders of industry are willing to agree that the men on the production floor can help increase production," and contribute to the success of the business that keeps them employed.

Labor representatives at the one-day conference came from the Machinists, the Paperworkers, Steelworkers, Mine Workers and Auto Workers.

AIW Convention Date

The Allied Industrial Workers convention will open September 15 in Kansas City. The convention date in last week's issue of the AFL-CIO News was incorrect.





NEW OFFICERS of the Chemical Workers are Frank D. Martino, left, who became president on the retirement of Thomas E. Boyle, and his successor as secretary-treasurer, J. A. Thomas.

JOBS FOR ALL was the goal of a national conference called by the Full Employment Action Council. Keynote speakers were Rep. Augustus Hawkins (D-Calif.), right, and AFL-CIO President George Meany. The council is headed by Murray Finley, left, president of the Clothing Workers, and Mrs. Coretta Scott King. Meany assailed the Administration's callous job policies.

is to get the nation to carry out the Employment Act of 1946, a statute committing the government to creating and maintaining conditions promoting maximum employment.

"No matter when the Administration economists pronounce the official end of the business recession," Meany warned, "the human recession of unemployment will continue for the rest of this decade unless strong actions are taken now."

Greenspan and the Ford Administration have not made a "single suggestion to alleviate the condition of America's millions of jobless workers," Meany said.

He called for a change in government policies and the people who make those policies.

"Maybe if Arthur Burns, William Simon and Alan Greenspan had a personal taste of unemployment, they might be more sympathetic to the problems of the unemployed," Meany said.

Meany singled out Burns, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, as the chief architect of the current economic disaster, brought on in large part by the Fed's tight-money, high-interest rate policies of 1973-74.

Calling on both Congress and the Ford Administration to live up to the terms of the Employment Act of 1946, Meany proposed a large-scale housing program, an accelerated public works program, increased federal aid to the cities, an expanded public-service jobs program and other efforts to put the nation's jobless millions back to work. All are opposed by the Administration.

"No single program can now do the job," Meany added. "America needs an arsenal of economic weapons . . . to end this crisis. He urged the closing of tax loopholes, restoration of railroad trackbeds, a greater concern for social priorities and long-range planning, and a program that would make the government the "employer of last resort," among other measures.

Meany scoffed at the "obsession" with budget dificits by both the Administration and Congress.

"The only sound way to quickly cut the budget deficit is to put the people back to work, so that American workers and businessmen can increase their earnings and pay their taxes," he said.

The idea that the federal government should impose a tight budget straitjacket on itself at a time of the most severe unemployment since the Great Depression is "completely ridiculous," Meany declared.

"Job opportunities at decent wages for all persons able and seeking work—the only definition of full employment we'll accept—is a goal as old as the labor movement," Meany told the delegates who represented trade unions, church and civic organizations, business and minority groups.

The Full Employment Action Council is headed jointly by Clothing Workers President Murray H. Finley and Mrs. Coretta Scott King, widow of the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr.

Following a plenary session which heard Rep. Augustus Hawkins (D-Calif.) outline his bill aimed at reducing joblessness to 3 percent, a series of panel sessions took up various aspects of employment in a full employment economy. The AFL-CIO has not taken a position on the Hawkins bill.

Panelists included Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland; AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger; Auto Workers President Leonard Woodcock; Executive Director Jack Conway of the State, County & Municipal Employees; Teachers President Albert Shanker; AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew Biemiller; Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; President Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; President Robert Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., and Vice President Dolores Huerta of the Farm Workers.

NLRB Issues Health Care Election Rule

Petitions for employe representation elections in the health-care field now must be filed 90 to 120 days before the expiration of collective bargaining agreements, rather than during the 60- to 90-day period that applies to other employer categories, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

The special action was taken to comply with the 1974 health-care amendments to the National Labor Relations Act, and "to promote the stability of labor-management relations in the health-care field," the five-member board said in a unanimous ruling.

Under the amendments, Congress intended that in labor agreements involving health-care institutions any party which wanted to open such agreement must give at least 90 days' notice to the other party, the NLRB noted.

UNESCO's Ouster Of Israel Protested

New York—Musicians President Hal C. Davis, in his capacity as head of the Inter-American Federation of Entertainment Workers (FITE), has protested action by the United Nations Educational, Scientific & Cultural Organization in excluding Israel from its councils and elevating the Palestine Liberation Organization to observer status.

In a recent letter to UNESCO Gen. Sec. Amadou-Mathar M'Bow, Davis urged the agency to "reconsider these unprecedented actions and thus undo the damage to itself which they have caused."

Use Grain of Quirk On July Job Figures

The unemployment rate for June, scheduled to be released by the Labor Dept. on July 3, will not reflect the full extent of the nation's joblessness, Bureau of Labor Statistics Commissioner Julius Shiskin warned.

Shiskin, whose agency compiles the monthly report on employment, said the next report will reflect a statistical quirk based on a seasonal adjustment rate announced earlier this year. It will be distorted because "the proportion of students entering the labor market in June will not be proportionate with unemployment."

When the June unemployment rate is announced, he told reporters, "if you see a sharp drop, defer your celebration until you see the July figures." While he wouldn't predict how far the June rate would drop below May's 9.2 percent, Shiskin said the difference "won't be trivial."

More Than a Slogan

FULL EMPLOYMENT is more than a slogan to the American labor movement. Job opportunities at decent wages for all persons able and seeking work—the only definition of full employment we'll accept—is a goal as old as the labor movement.

We don't look at full employment as one of those philosophically correct things that social workers talk about. Full employment, to us, is an economic necessity. Jobs are the lifeblood of this economy.

From jobs come the wages that generate mass purchasing power. A job is the key measure of a person's place in society—whether that person is a full-fledged participant in society or on the outside looking in. Work is the source of individual fulfillment. It is positive, constructive activity.

And since we in organized labor have been intensely involved in this issue of full employment for years and years, we have some advice to pass along: Full employment is not going to be achieved by wishful thinking, rousing speeches or one-shot gimmicks.

A bipartisan majority adopted the Employment Act of 1946 and on Feb. 20, 1946, President Truman signed that historic statute.

It committed the U.S. government to creating and maintaining "conditions under which there will be afforded useful employment opportunities, including self-employment, for those able, willing and seeking work, and to promote maximum employment, production and purchasing power."

It would be most difficult to improve on those words as a commitment of the U.S. government enacted into law. But it would be easy to improve on the performance.

During much of the past 30 years, the government has walked away from its commitment. In fact, that commitment has been perverted.

Government officials and their academic supporters have been busier in the past few years redefining the goal than trying to meet it. It went from 3 percent to percent, then to 4½ percent. Now it's 5 or 5½ percent. And some so-called economists even talk of 6 percent as "full employment."

It's an old game, if you can get away with it—if you don't make the grade, change the rules. To me, that's fakery, regardless of whether the trickster is a college professor or a government official.

WE ARE CONVINCED that no single piece of legislation will restore the economy to health or achieve full employment. The recession is too deep; the problems too complex for any one magic cure.

We in the AFL-CIO have not taken a position on the Hawkins bill, although we share the commitment of its author—for whom we have deep respect—for his goal of full employment. But we firmly believe other steps must be taken immediately.

The beginning must be a change in government policies and the people who make those policies. It is time the Congress remembered its responsibility to the people who elected them—one in seven of whom are unemployed or underemployed. It is time the President remembered that government by veto means the minority forcing its will on the majority. It is time that this government of, by and for the people kept its commitment to the American people contained in the Employment Act of 1946.

A Word Edgewise:

House Democrats' Problems Stem from Stuctural Flaws

By John P. Roche

BACK IN JANUARY when the new Congress burst into Washington full of new, young liberal enthusiasts, I had one of my unhappy premonitions. As I noted here, it reminded me too much of the huge majority that was swept into Congress with Franklin D. Roosevelt's 1936 landslide. A majority which promptly fell apart at the seams because, given its size, nobody felt any need for discipline.

The Republicans, as now, deliberately laid low and chortled as "Old Whiskers" (as FDR called Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes) gave the President the worst licking of his political career over the so-called "court packing" proposal. Before it was over, there was blood on the floors of Congress—all of it Democratic.

Now Speaker of the House Carl Albert has publicly thrown in the sponge. The allegedly "veto-proof" House has made Gerald Ford look like a strong President, and everywhere you look Democrats are carving up their fellows.

The freshman representatives have allegedly called on Albert to resign—I say allegedly because nobody knows how many of the 75 new faces actually joined in the appeal. The Democratic Caucus, which leaped into life back in January, is in total disarray because it tried to assume policy-making functions and the House committees, once settled into their feudal demesnes, told the caucus to keep off their turf.

In a curious way, the very success of the caucus in deposing some committee chairmen at the beginning of the session contributed to its decline. Flushed with visions of grandeur, it then moved on to try to establish a disguised form of parliamentary government by arguing that the caucus could tell Democrats on various committees what legislation to support or oppose. At this point, those Democrats who had joyfully joined in bouncing some seniors from their chairmanships were already locked into the traditional system: "Nobody can tell the Ways & Means, or Appropriations, or . . . committee what to do!"

It's easy to blame Speaker Albert, who is one of the nicest men in town and incapable of a vengeful act. (If a representative got mean with Sam Rayburn, he would suddenly find his office had been shifted—to a broomcloset.) Albert just doesn't play rough and in my judgment should not be considered the scapegoat—as the old saying goes, "Don't shoot the piano player, boys, he's doing his best." What has to be kept in mind is that the Democrats in the House are suffering from a self-inflicted wound: in their effort to end arbitrary procedures, they virtually destroyed the sense of discipline.

The other day, for example, I got a letter from Congressman Paul Simon, a most talented freshman representative from Illinois, which in part bemoaned the fact that most congressmen don't have enough facts to vote intelligently on issues. They are just supposed to go in and find out from the Whip how to vote. With all respect to Simon, this is the very basis of party discipline. Obviously it is impossible for every member to know everything about every issue. Hence the division of labor among functional committees whose recommendations have in the past been almost routinely accepted by the House as a whole.

THE PROBLEM IN THIS CONGRESS has been exaggerated by the number of new faces. Power in Congress is a function of knowledge and a willingness to work. Sen. Henry M. Jackson, for example, is a dominating figure on the Appropriations Committee because he knows how to read a budget, even a Pentagon budget, and take it apart inch by inch. Wilbur Mills dominated the House Ways & Means Committee for years before his illness, not because he carried a pistol in his pocket, but because he knew more about taxation than any other 15 representatives put together. And was prepared to work twice as hard as most of his peers.

If Lyndon Johnson were now Senate Majority Leader, for example, the Wyman-Durkin controversy over the New Hampshire Senate seat would have been settled two months ago. And to repeat, Johnson couldn't have exercised the power he did in the 1950s unless Senate Democrats accepted discipline; his authority was a function of his brains and his willingness to work a 28-hour day.

Right now there are simply too many unseasoned newcomers who have yet to work out a pecking order. In short, if every man is a leader, there can by definition be no leadership.

So don't shoot the piano player: the problem is structural, not personal.

CWA Cites the Record:

Reader's Digest Attack Designed To Raise 'Right-to-Work' Funds

Reader's Digest magazine is notorious for its unceasing attacks on the trade unions movement. An article in its May 1975 issue involving a CWA local brought the following from Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts in the June 1975 CWA News. Watts' article was entitled "The Strange Case of 'The Lonely Ordeal of Dale Richardson.'"

I'M SURE BY NOW many of our members have seen a piece of blatant anti-union propaganda in the May issue of Reader's Digest entitled "The Lonely Ordeal of Dale Richardson," which describes—or, more accurately, distorts—a legal case involving CWA.

The Digest has a massive circulation, exceeding that of all other American publications, and I therefore think it is important to CWA and the labor movement for me to attempt to set the record straight in this matter.

The case in point stems from an incident nine years ago at the Western Electric Service Center in Omaha, Neb., where Richardson resigned from the union after a dispute with local officials and then was chided and harassed by his fellow workers until—like any red-blooded American would do (the Digest presumes)—he picked a fight with a union member and found himself fired, along with the member.

The contention of the Digest (and Richardson's lawyers over the years) is that the union failed to represent Richardson fairly as a nonmember, and the article goes even further and insinuates that the union encouraged the harassment—a charge which is untrue and which has never been substantiated in court.

Richardson took both CWA and the company to court claiming his firing was unjustified, seeking a backpay award and also an award for "mental anguish." Many years later a jury awarded Richardson $92,000 in back pay and lost benefits, which the court said should be divided 70-30 by CWA and the company; however an award for "mental anguish" was thrown out by the judge, who cited "passion and prejudice" on the part of the jury. In a subsequent trial the new jury also rejected Richardson's claim for "mental anguish" against CWA.

Now, there has never been any question of the basic facts in this case, that Richardson resigned from the union (the unit had been 100 percent union) and then suffered verbal abuse and various forms of harassment, including mischievous telephone calls at his home, and that he started the fight that resulted in his dismissal. And I want to state clearly that some of Richardson's fellow workers behaved in a way which has brought shame and embarrassment to CWA.

However, many facts which were omitted or twisted by the Reader's Digest must be stated. First of all, Richardson himself behaved in a manner calculated to anger and antagonize his coworkers, and which would have caused their resentment under any circumstances. Richardson slandered the local union's officers and on at least two occasions leafleted the plant with anti-union extremist literature published by the John Birch Society.

After his firing, the NLRB declined to process his unfair labor practice charge, and in a letter denying an appeal the NLRB General Council makes reference to Richardson's "repeated recourse to physical violence against other employes."

Harassment of Richardson was undertaken by individuals who resented his bullying and his belligerence, and was not encouraged by the union. At no time did Richardson ever file a grievance, although he was told that the union would represent him even though he was no longer a member. After he was fired, the local did take up his case in grievance procedure along with that of the other employe who was fired. The union sought to protect Richardson even without his asking.

You will find none of these facts in the Digest article. You will however find much malicious innuendo. The article dwells on Richardson's wholly false and irresponsible charges of mishandling of local union funds by its officers. Richardson had been shown the local's financial statement and told that he could contact the Federal Bureau of Labor-Management Reports in Kansas City if he had questions about the local's treasury. This subject has never become an issue in any of the court proceedings over the years, and the reference to it by the Digest without clarification amounts to yellow journalism.

WHY HAS THIS VERY REGRETTABLE yet not-so-remarkable case been blown out of all proportion by the Reader's Digest? The answer lies in the fact that the anti-union National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation has been bankrolling and masterminding Richardson's legal attack for years, and is spotlighting this case along with a few others in its solicitations for funds from right-wing millionaires.

The Reader's Digest is notorious for its support of conservative causes and for consistently flailing organized labor in its pages. Here the Digest clearly has rehashed an old story (there was no current "news peg" to justify it) in order to help out the right-to-workers in their fund-raising efforts, as the "foundation" attempts to battle a costly suit before the courts, brought by CWA and nine other unions, which may put them out of business for violating federal labor law.

As Layoffs Mount:

Seniority System Termed Vital To Basic Rights of All Workers

WEAKENING the long-established seniority system would do nothing to cut the high jobless rate and could backfire later against minority workers entering the workforce under a diluted system, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard warned.

Unearned or "phantom seniority" based on "discrimination at the hiring gate" in which the union had no part, if used to displace older workers, is unfair, Pollard declared. "The determinant in layoffs ought to be the longevity of an employe on the job," he said.

Pollard stressed that discriminatory hiring practices were the rule with many employers, but that society which was silent and permitted this to happen must bear the responsibility to somehow compensate those who suffered from such employer practices. "The innocent worker," he said, "was not responsible for the managerial prerogative in hiring," and should not now be penalized for what his employer did.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Pollard said that the seniority system is now under attack by some because the progress minorities and women made during the decade since passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 has been seriously slowed by the mountain of layoffs and high joblessness of the recession. The only solid remedy, he said, is jobs for all those who want and need them and a national commitment to full employment.

"We cannot accept the 6 percent to 8 percent unemployment that is now proposed by certain government economists," he declared. "If we do," he said, that would be "giving status to unemployment," a concept the labor movement rejects.

Pollard pointed out that the problems of the recession-tightened job market have been multiplied by the continuing export of U.S. jobs to low-wage nations. He said the labor movement will continue the fight to slow or end that practice through reform of the nation's trade and tax laws and policies.

Reporters questioning Pollard were Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine and Duane Emme of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

By Press Associates, Inc.

ASKED AT A RECENT press conference about the 32-year high in the country's unemployment rate in May, President Ford quickly turned the emphasis to an increase in employment "for the second month in a row."

More recently, the Wall Street Journal criticized Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.), chairman of the Joint House-Senate Economic Committee, for deploring increasing unemployment and asserting—based upon the May report—"there is no employment recovery in sight."

Humphrey, the newspaper charged, "made no mention of the rise in employment, which . . . tells more about general economic prospects than any change in the jobless rate."

Ford and the WSJ either did not read the Labor Dept.'s report or misinterpreted it. The Bureau of Labor Statistics did announce a rise in total employment in May of some 320,000 jobs but the agency carefully noted that "nearly all of the increase was in the agricultural sector." Analysis shows, in fact, that more than 90 percent of the job pickup was in farm labor.

As BLS clearly explained, total non-farm payroll employment (which accounts for more than nine of every ten jobs in urbanized America) "has risen very slightly in the last two months." Analysis here indicates virtually no change in non-farm employment since March.

Assertions that the recession is "bottoming out" and the unemployment crisis is easing were brought into further question by the BLS report that unemployment compensation claims are moving up again. They increased by 363,100 the week of May 31 over the previous week. And 549,000 initial claims were filed the week ending June 7, an increase of 135,200 over the previous week.

As Humphrey and other members of the Joint Economic Committee contend, "There may be a dollar recovery and a profits recovery, but there is no people recovery, no employment recovery in sight."

Twenty-nine years ago, Congress legislatively declared that this country's goal should be "full employment." However, the nation has emerged from each recession with acceptance of a higher-than-ever rate of unemployment.

THE GOAL OF FULL EMPLOYMENT has been pushed further and further aside. Over the years we have witnessed a changing of the goal instead of efforts to meet it. In 1946, consensus was that full employment meant a jobless rate no higher than 3 percent. The goal was changed to 4 percent, then 4½ percent and now 5 or 5½ percent.

Today an Administration confronted with a 9.2 percent jobless rate speaks in terms of a great achievement if it can be reduced below 8 percent by 1977. And that reference is within the framework of the official government figures which do not account for an additional 1 to 2 percent jobless rate among those who have given up the search for jobs and hence are not included in the labor force. It also does not account for underemployment.

As Humphrey has pointed out, "When discouraged workers and the part-time workers seeking full-time jobs are included, the unemployment rate actually is a socially devastating 12 percent."

Most independent economists appearing before the Joint Economic Committee over the past several months believe that the "official" unemployment rate by 1977 will be even higher than the Administration projects—above 8 percent and possibly higher if Federal Reserve Board Chairman Arthur Burns continues to dominate the economy with his tight-money policies.

These economists stress that the tragedy of unemployment for more than 10 million Americans who want and need full-time jobs is at least in part the result of the Administration's "obsession" with the fear of inflation at a time when economic stimulus has become the nation's overwhelming need. The nation's biggest single crisis is an economy that cannot produce jobs and the refusal by government to do anything about it.

UNDERMINING the long-established seniority system wouldn't create a single job to roll back unemployment, but it could backfire against minority workers entering jobs with weakened protections, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William Pollard, center, warned on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Duane Emme, left, of Press Associates, Inc. and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Milwaukee Gets a Union Label

Bigger than ever, this year's AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show drew nearly a quarter-million visitors during its six-day stand at Milwaukee's Mecca convention center.

Highlighting the exposition was a wide variety of colorful exhibits and demonstrations—some of them shown here — telling the story of labor's teamwork with industry and government.

"It highlights the skills of the American worker, as well as the resourcefulness and ingenuity of American management," AFL-CIO President George Meany said.

Close to 400 exhibits were put up and staffed by members of AFL-CIO affiliated unions. Their aim was to promote goods and services produced or offered by firms with which they have labor contracts.

Free prizes, gifts and souvenirs valued at over $100,000 were given out at the show. Sponsor and producer is the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

Department Sec.-Treas. Edward P. Murphy praised the Milwaukee area labor movement for its cooperation and assistance in making the 30th annual Union-Industries Show a huge success.

Private Efforts Inadequate:

Federal Commitment Sought For Child Care Programs

Private efforts in child care, no matter how praiseworthy, can't meet needs that are of a scale only a federal commitment can handle, a union authority writes in the Federationist, the AFL-CIO magazine.

Joyce D. Miller, social service director of the Clothing Workers, notes that a federal program was approved by Congress in 1971—and killed by former President Nixon's veto.

The coalition of labor, church and women's groups that helped bring about passage of the vetoed bill is still pressing for federal child care legislation.

Mrs. Miller says the need for child care is now even more urgent because of the presence in the workforce of 45 percent of the nation's mothers — a tremendous increase from the 18 percent of 20 years ago.

In March 1974, about 26.6 million women with children under 18 were in the workforce, she points out, while there are facilities for only about one million children. And while the birth rate is declining, that drop is more than overcome by the additional number of women working or seeking work. By 1985, it is projected, just the mothers with children under six will total 6.6 million.

In addition to meeting the daily needs of families with working parents, a comprehensive federal child care program could help meet the health, nutritional and other developmental needs of small children, the article points out.

Consequently, organized labor has taken the position that "the only real answer is a massive federal commitment to the provision of early childhood development and day care."

Since it would take time to provide comprehensive services to all who need them, the AFL-CIO has proposed a system of gradually increasing federal funds, with the nation's public school system as the prime sponsors. Profit-making operators should be denied eligibility for such funds, labor contends. "There is no legitimate role for profit-making entrepreneurs in child care programs," is the way the AFL-CIO has expressed it.

On the other hand, existing public and private non-profit programs that meet federal requirements should be eligible for federal funds. Mrs. Miller cited promising programs operated by union, church and neighborhood groups that could be built on.

Her own union, the Clothing Workers, has found its child care facilities in Chicago and Baltimore developing into trade union centers of a wider scope, with libraries, programs for older children and a center where union members can learn more about other union programs.

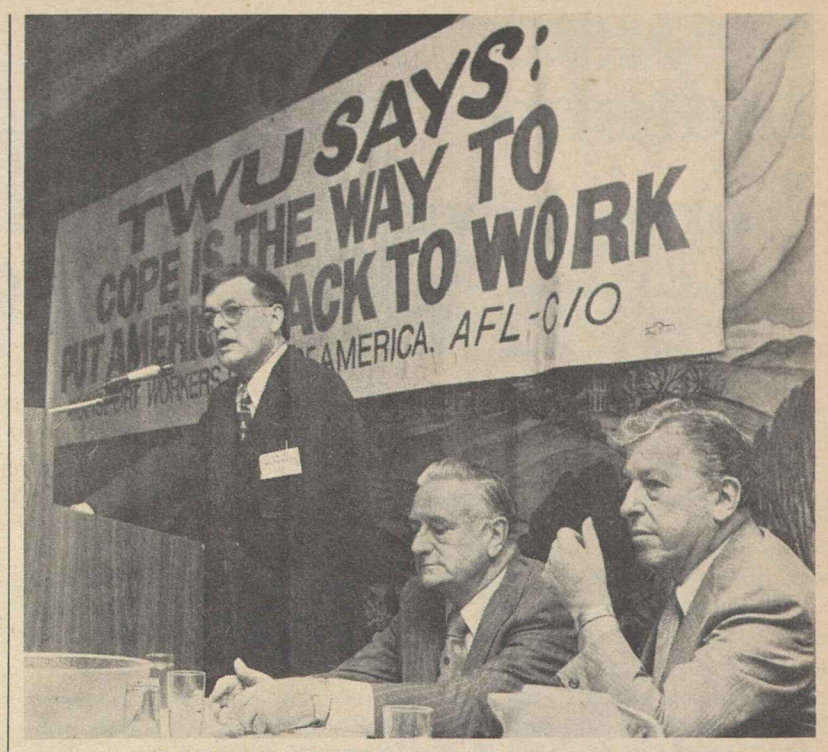
Similar projects from Puerto Rico to Canada are sponsored by a wide variety of unions, she says. And she points out that the United States has had experience with government-sponsored child care.

"When some people question the feasibility of establishing public child care centers on a large-scale basis in the United States, they are usually unaware that this country has earlier experienced one of the most massive, innovative and far-reaching child care programs ever attempted," Mrs. Miller says.

As part of the recovery program during the depression, "the federal government spent $3.1 million on child care and provided services to 300,000 children from 1933 to 1944," she notes. "The second spurt of public child care began with U.S. entry into World War II," when the number of employed women increased by 4 million in three years.

At its height, 39 states were cooperating extensively in the World War II program, which enrolled approximately 1.6 million children and included a federal commitment of $150 million, the article notes.

But that effort was dismantled abruptly after the war — and the constantly increasing percentage of women in the workforce has made the need more urgent ever since then.



FULL EMPLOYMENT PROGRAMS to pull the nation out of recession were stressed at the Transport Workers legislative conference in Washington. Addressing the 300 delegates at the two-day conference is TWU Vice President and COPE Director Ernest Mitchell. TWU President Matthew Guinan and AFL-CIO COPE Director Al Barkan are seated.

Labor Calls for Action On No-Fault Insurance

The AFL-CIO urged the Senate Commerce Committee to approve a no-fault auto insurance bill that would combine prompt and fair compensation for accident victims with cost savings on auto insurance premiums.

In the last Congress, a Senate-passed no-fault bill died when the House failed to act before adjournment. The same bill is now being considered again by the Senate committee.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller asked committee members to make three changes in the bill so as to achieve greater savings on insurance costs.

He asked that lawsuits for non-economic claims — so-called "pain and suffering" reimbursement — be allowed only when an auto accident has resulted in at least 180 days of total disability.

A Senate floor amendment last year dropped the requirement to 90 days disability.

Biemiller also asked rejection of another amendment dealing with accident cases involving trucks and private cars. As adopted by the Senate last year, he said, it would have lessened costs for commercial vehicle operators and increased costs for consumers.

The most important change needed to hold down costs, Biemiller said in his letter to committee members, is a requirement for "coordination of overlapping insurance coverages, principally in the health and disability income areas so as to eliminate costly duplication of benefits."

With the changes labor has recommended, he said, the legislation would effectively deal with an area of consumer need where the states have "abdicated responsibility."

Biemiller said, "American consumers, particularly the victims of auto accidents, have waited long enough."

Labor Studies Center Sets Schedule for July

AFL-CIO President George Meany will open a five-day institute on International Affairs July 20-24 at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, Silver Spring, Md. Seven other programs are scheduled at the 47-acre campus during the month.

The International Affairs Institute will deal with the AFL-CIO in world affairs, the structure of the international labor movement, the trade secretariates and the International Labor Organization, the world economy and the energy crisis, and a two-day discussion of economic and political trade union concerns.

Discussion leaders will include Irving Brown, U.S. Worker Delegate to the ILO and AFL-CIO European representative; Ernest Lee, AFL-CIO International Affairs director; Elizabeth Jager of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research; and Leo Suslow of the Organization of American States.

Participants will get detailed reports on Latin America, Africa, Asia and Europe.

Registration for the International Affairs Institute will begin on the Campus at 4 p.m. Sunday, July 20. The institute will end on Thursday, July 24.

Other programs at the Labor Studies Center during July are:

Organizing—The AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services will bring in 40 representatives from four East Coast regions for a conference. From Sunday, July 6, through Tuesday, July 8.

Political Education—The AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education will sponsor three programs for state federation representatives concerned with data processing, reporting and controls, budgeting, bookkeeping and reporting, election laws and COPE structure. The dates: July 10-12, July 13-15, July 16-18.

Flight Attendants—An institute for local officers of the Association of Flight Attendants, affiliated with the Air Line Pilots, to review the union's policies and procedures and the duties of local officers with special emphasis on grievance processing. From 9 a.m. Wednesday, July 9, through Friday, July 11.

AFSCME—The State, County & Municipal Employees will sponsor a special educational conference at the center on July 28 and 29.

Black Trade Unionists—The A. Philip Randolph Educational Fund will present a three-day leadership training program for black trade unionists from international and local unions. From Thursday, July 31, through Saturday, Aug. 2.

Further information about these and other Labor Studies programs can be obtained from Executive Director Fred Hoehler, AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Phone 301/431-6400.

New Jersey Convention Pushes Jobs Expansion

Atlantic City, N.J.—More than 1,100 delegates to the New Jersey State AFL-CIO convention here charted an action program to combat severe recession through jobs creation, housing contruction and improved social programs.

President Charles H. Marciante focused on the problems of New Jersey's workers, the elderly and the poor in his keynote address to the four-day convention.

With the official unemployment rate of 11.5 percent in New Jersey, "we have the highest and most persistent joblessness of any state," Marciante said.

Sec.-Treas. John J. Brown and Executive Vice President Richard A. Lynch also focused on the unemployment crisis that has pushed the state's jobless total in one year from 250,000 to 400,000.

In a two-phase effort to help spur employment and meet the demand for housing, the state federation approved the creation of a non-profit corporation committed to construction of housing facilities for senior citizens and low- and middle-income families.

Marciante said that with construction expected to begin soon in a number of communities "our state AFL-CIO housing program will provide thousands of jobs."

Delegates also called for legislation to reduce home mortgage interest rates, urged Congress to enact a new Emergency Employment Act in answer to President Ford's veto, asked improvements in workers' compensation and unemployment benefits, and a halt to job losses caused by "favored nation" imports.

Other resolutions urged:

- Full union rights for public employes, including the right to strike.
- State rent controls on multiple dwellings and the right for tenants to withhold payments to assure proper repairs and services.
- A no-fault auto insurance law.
- Improvements in the prevailing wage law.
- Passage of the labor-backed jobsite picketing bill.

Major convention speakers included Senators Lloyd Bentsen (D-Tex.), Clifford P. Case (R-N.J.) and Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.), and Executive Director Norman Hill of the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

Public Radio to Air Solzhenitsyn Speech

The address by Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn at the banquet June 30 in his honor sponsored by the AFL-CIO will be broadcast nationally by National Public Radio.

The broadcast will be available to local stations on a delayed basis and will be heard in Washington, D.C. at 11 p.m. Check local program listings for the time and station.

Rail Carmen Name 2 Vice Presidents

Kansas City, Mo.—Two new vice presidents and a new executive board member have been announced by the Railway Carmen.

W. D. Crawford and C. C. Bevins were appointed vice presidents by President A. K. Krause with the unanimous consent of the executive board. Bevins succeeds J. J. Noonan who retired Apr. 30, while Crawford will succeed Irwin L. Barney who retires on June 30. Until his appointment as vice president, Crawford had served as grand lodge deputy, and Bevins is former general chairman on the Norfolk & Western.

James A. Klimtzak, general chairman of the N&W Nickel Plate Division, is the new executive board member, succeeding Bevins.

Experts Tell Hearing:

Industry Can Afford Lower Noise Costs

greater than 25 decibels, which is a handicap by present standards.

Industry and business organizations, including the Chamber of Commerce, are challenging any tightening of noise controls largely on the ground that noise reduction would be too costly. One government study set $31 billion price tag on a 10-year program to reduce industrial noise to 85 decibels and $13 billion for the 90-decibel limit.

But other acoustical experts have estimated that effective engineering controls could be installed by industry at about one-third of the earlier estimates.

Lyle F. Yerges, a noise and acoustics consulting engineer testifying on the OSHA panel of experts, said that most engineering controls for noise are feasible in both terms of reasonable costs and technical practicality.

Yerges said that industry's resistance to engineering controls of noise can be traced to ignorance on costs and fear that innovations may interfere with production.

He submitted data showing that acoustical controls could be installed at relatively low costs.

In some cases, Yerges said, industry was actually able to reduce operating costs and to save energy by installing smaller capacity motors and pumps, which run quieter but are still capable of meeting production needs.

Dr. John F. Finklea, director of the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health, expressed concern whether a 90-decibel limit provides sufficient protection.

NIOSH's compromise position is that existing industrial operations should be permitted to operate at the 90-decibel level but new workplaces would be held to an 85-decibel standard. Ultimately all establishments would have to meet the lower noise limit.

Finklea cited the NIOSH criteria document issued three years ago which supported the 90-decibel level for older establishments on the ground of inadequate technological feasibility.

However, in responding to questions by AFL-CIO and EPA representatives, Finklea admitted that NIOSH's capabilities for engineering research were limited.

The NIOSH director also agreed that his agency's capacity for biological research is extensive and that hearing impairment would be significantly less at 85 decibels than at 90.

Hearing loss from excessive noise levels on the job is only a part of the problems workers must face, Finklea said in his testimony. He noted excessive noise exposure can also lead to increased incidence of medical problems, job accidents and worker absence.

He said that personal protective equipment, such as ear plugs, or muffs, should be only temporary measures and that noise should be abated through the application of engineering technology.

Some key areas in the proposed OSHA standard call for:

- Engineering and administrative controls to hold worker exposure to 90 decibels for an eight-hour period "to the extent feasible," although permitting the use of ear protectors to supplement engineering changes.
- Allowing a "doubling rate" of 5 decibels — 85 decibels for 16 hours or 95 decibels for four hours.
- Limits on noise exposure to peak impulse noise to 140 decibels 100 times a day, permitting a tenfold increase in the number of impulses for each 10-decibel decrease in the peak pressure of the impulse.
- Employers to maintain worker audiograms for their duration on the job, plus five years.
- Worker observation of monitoring programs and access to monitoring records.

Based on the current pace of the hearings, union representatives are not likely to testify before July 7.

Congress Sends Ford Cutback Job Fund Bill

istration-supported provision for $1.6 billion to continue financing 310,000 public service jobs, plus money for an assortment of other job-related programs, mostly in amounts greater than the President had budgeted. These include college work-study grants, a rural water and sewer grant, the Older Americans program, the Youth Conservation Corps and the Work Incentive program.

Adding in the earlier-approved $473 million appropriation for summer jobs for youths, this totals $2.85 billion of the $5.3 billion that was in the vetoed bill and runs more than $850 million above the total the President had indicated would be acceptable.

The money was added to a continuing appropriations bill which authorizes government agencies to spend at specified levels for the fiscal year that starts July 1 until Congress completes action on their appropriations. Administration supporters in Congress did not actively fight the new funding bill—an indication that the President is expected to sign it. He has until July 4 to act.

In other developments:

- The Senate continued to be stalemated on the controversy over the disputed New Hampshire senatorial election.

Democrats want the issue settled on the basis of the disputed ballots that are before the Senate for a ruling. Republicans want the seat declared vacant and a rerun election held between Democrat John A. Durkin and Republican Louis C. Wyman.

To compel a decision on the merits, Democrats sought to limit debate through a cloture petition. Under the Senate's new rules, this requires 60 votes—three-fifths of the total membership. On two tries, the closest was 57 votes for cloture.

- A House-Senate conference commtitee sought to reach agreement on legislation continuing the present 65-week maximum duration of unemployment benefits and raising the current 26 weeks of federally-funded payments to persons not covered by state law to 39 weeks. The Senate, however, added several labor-opposed amendments, including a triggering system linked to the state's insured unemployed rate and a requirement that jobless persons must take any job, whether suitable or not, after 39 weeks of benefits.
- A scheduled attempt in the House to override the President's veto of a bill authorizing funds for promotion of tourist travel to the United States was cancelled after bipartisan agreement was reached on terms of a substitute bill.
- The House Ways & Means Committee opened hearings in the broad and controversial area of tax policy — with conflicting advice from experts on what "incentives" are needed to stimulate the economy and what "reforms" are needed to achieve fairness. Committee Chairman Al Ullman (D-Ore.) said he hopes to bring a bill to the House floor by October.

Living Costs Increase At Slower Pace

were $91.62. In 1965 they averaged $91.32.

Real spendable earnings — the measure of a worker's purchasing power—now have fallen below their year-earlier levels 27 months in a row, BLS said.

If calculated on an annual basis, the four-tenths of 1 percent rise in May would work out to an annual compound rate of 5.3 percent, less than half of last year's 12.2 percent rise in the CPI.

The May increase lifted the index to 159.3 percent of its 1967 base. That means the assortment of goods and services that cost urban workers $100 eight years ago cost $159.30 in May.

Much of the recent slowdown in inflation is due to smaller rises in prices of nonfood commodities. Still, items in this category in May were 10.1 percent higher than a year earlier.

Beef prices rose 7.6 percent over the month — 91.2 percent on an annual basis — while pork prices went up 3.3 percent and poultry, six-tenths of 1 percent. All were contraseasonal increases, and the rise in poultry prices was the first this year.

The overall rise in the food index was five-tenths of 1 percent. Price rises in the nonfood goods category averaged two-tenths of 1 percent over the month, the same as for service charges.

About a fourth of the increase in nonfood commodity prices was due to higher prices for gasoline, motor oil, fuel oil and coals, BLS said. Used car prices rose sharply, and there were also price increases for apparel, houses, furniture, appliances and an assortment of housekeeping supplies.

Prices for gasoline and motor oil and fuel oil and coal also rose steeply in May, following large increases in April.

Among services, May brought higher charges for auto repairs, taxicab fares, physicians' fees and hospital service fees, shoe repairs, movie admissions, dry cleaning and bank service charges.

Supermarket Chain Ordered to Pay $1 Million in Wage-Hour Violations

Jacksonville, Fla.—Winn-Dixie Stores, a southern-based supermarket chain with a longstanding anti-union policy, has been ordered by a federal court here to pay $1 million in back wages and overtime to current and former employes.

The judgment, for violation of minimum wage and overtime payments, is the largest in the 37-year history of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

U.S. District Court Judge Gerald Bard Tjoflat, Jacksonville, ordered that $500,000 be paid to 466 employes named in the action. An additional $500,000 will be paid to more Winn-Dixie workers to be listed with the Labor Dept. The workers to be named are, or were, employed in the Raleigh, N.C., division and Savannah and Statesboro, Ga., area stores. This latter group could number several thousand.

The court order further decrees that any employe whose name is not included in the two lists, and who, within the next two years, makes a demand for back wages will be satisfied in addition to the $1 million. The period covered is Feb. 1, 1967, to Mar. 30, 1974.

The order also holds Winn-Dixie in civil contempt of judgments of the court entered on Sept. 12, 1962, and Feb. 1, 1967, enjoining it from violating the minimum wage, overtime and record-keeping provisions of the FLSA, and states that the latter two orders shall remain in effect.

Winn-Dixie is ordered to purge itself of contempt by reimbursing the $1 million in back wages and by compensating the Labor Dept. $48,761 for expenses.

The 466 employes to be paid $500,000 gave depositions, responded to mailed questionnaires, or were personally interviewed by Labor Dept. officials. The individual back-wage amounts range from a high of $9,330 to a low of $6.47.

By stipulation of all parties concerned, the remaining $500,000 will go to employes and former employes the department has been unable to contact. These employes will be paid on a pro-rata formula basis since, according to the stipulation, substantially all of the violations involved "off-the-clock" work, making impossible an exact determination of work performed.

Earlier the Labor Dept. announced that A&P stores in eight southern states have agreed to pay $200,000 in overtime compensation due to 112 employes and have been permanently enjoined from further violations of the wage-hour law. The company agreed to the court order.

AFL-CIO Convention Slated to Open Oct. 2

The meetings of the convention will be in the Civic Auditorium.

Clothing Firm Brings Back 400 U.S. Jobs

New York—The Clothing Workers are hailing the return of more than 400 jobs in the men's apparel industry which had been lost earlier when a suit manufacturer shifted production operations to Colombia.

Intercontinental Apparel, Inc., the American licensee for Pierre Cardin clothing, has now returned production to the United States through the efforts of the ACWA and Mayor Abraham D. Beame.

The action came after the company signed an agreement with the ACWA New York Joint Board. The union said that many ACWA members formerly employed at the Rosenmond-Shiers plant here are being called back to work.

ACWA President Murray H. Finley and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman said the union is hopeful that the action by Intercontinental "will encourage other manufacturers of men's and boys' clothing —who have moved their production facilities to foreign shores—to come home and reverse the export of American jobs."

Mayor Beame said the firm returned because "American workers are still the most efficient and most productive."

Solzhenitsyn Warns West Detente Imperils Freedom

Meany Sees Job Picture As Bleak

Unemployment officially declined last month, dropping to a seasonally adjusted rate of 8.6 percent from 9.2 percent in May, but because of a quirk resulting from Labor Dept. statistical methods the decrease does not tell the real story, AFL-CIO President George Meany cautioned.

"This is phony good news," Meany declared. "It would be the height of folly for anyone to take satisfaction from these figures for statistically they show that the unemployment crisis has not eased at all."

The decline in joblessness from May to June was not unexpected. The Bureau of Labor Statistics warned in mid-June that a sharp decline was likely due to "a deficiency in the seasonal-adjustment procedures," and noted "the 'true' June rate may be higher than that published."

BLS Commissioner Julius Shiskin said the nation won't know whether there was a real improvement in the jobs picture "until we see the July figures" that come out next month.

Meanwhile, Meany ticked off "the cold facts" of the nation's most serious unemployment crisis since the 1930s:

- The number of long-term unemployed workers — those who have been jobless 15 weeks or longer — rose 250,000 over the month to a total of 2.9 million.
- The number of persons too discouraged to seek work jumped

After the Veto:

Weaker Housing Bill Voted by Congress

Congress approved a half-loaf housing bill acceptable to President Ford after failing to override his veto of a job-creating measure that would have enabled more middle-income families to buy new homes and apartments.

It completed action on the substitute bill in just two days, before closing down for a holiday week recess.

The new law expands a program under which the Government National Mortgage Association agrees to buy home mortgages from lenders that issue them at interest rates below market levels—but not as low as in the vetoed bill. The government would eventually resell the mortgages so there would be little net cost to the Treasury.

Earlier, the AFL-CIO had charged that the Administration program on which the new legislation was based would have only a slight impact on interest rates, new housing or jobs.

The new law does, however, include a popular section of the vetoed bill that the President termed acceptable after having earlier opposed it.

It authorizes federal payments of up to $250 a month for a maximum of two years so that jobless homeowners could avoid losing their homes through foreclosure. Homeowners would later have to repay the loans to the government with interest. The legislation also provides an alternative of avoiding foreclosure through a government guarantee of payment of an overdue mortgage.

Protection against foreclosure had been strongly urged by the AFL-CIO to avert "social and economic disaster."

Interest rates in mortgages purchased by "Ginnie Mae"—the housing industry's term for the

Jobless Aid Extension Averts Benefit Cutoff

Jobless workers will continue to qualify for up to 65 weeks of unemployment compensation under a bill rushed through Congress and signed by President Ford in time to avoid a cutoff of benefits to 250,000 persons.

Two groups of unemployed workers are directly affected by the legislation:

- Persons who have used all the benefits available under their state unemployment compensation laws —normally 26 weeks—and have also exhausted the additional 26 weeks provided through two continuing programs of extended federal-state payments.

Last March, as an amendment to the tax cut bill, Congress passed a stop-gap measure to prevent the Soviet Exile Hails U.S. Labor's Stand

By James M. Shevis

America and other Western democracies, apparently blinded to the true goals of worldwide communism, will pay a heavy price if they do not soon abandon their present policy of detente with the USSR, Soviet dissident Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn warned at an AFL-CIO banquet honoring the exiled Russian novelist.

Speaking bluntly to his audience of 2,500 labor leaders and government officials including two Cabinet members of the Ford Administration, the Nobel laureate declared that "the Soviet Union has used detente in its own interests, is using it now and will continue to use it in its own interests."

Nothing has changed in Communist ideology, Solzhenitsyn said. The goals are the same as they have been since the Bolsheviks rose to power in the Revolution of 1917-20, he charged—the subjugation of peoples everywhere.

Speaking in Russian, his words translated and simultaneously delivered in English, Solzhenitsyn praised the American labor movement for its continuing anti-Communist position.

"The AFL-CIO has never given in to . . . illusions," he said. "The American workers' movement has never allowed itself to be blinded and mistake slavery for freedom. And I today, in behalf of all of our oppressed people, thank you for this."

He noted that the AFL, in

Slump Mars Progress In Civil Rights

Recent economic events prove "we will not fully realize our civil rights goals unless we realize other goals as well," AFL-CIO President George Meany told the national convention of the NAACP.

Meany said the civil rights group's 60th annual convention came at a time when "the forces of decency in American life are being seriously challenged once again—this time not so much by the old familiar faces of racism but by far more subtle and complex economic forces."

The net result, Meany said, is that the civil rights battles in which the NAACP and AFL-CIO have joined in the past "can be virtually neutralized by the disastrous economic policies of this Administra-

Labor Law at Age 40 Still Short of Objectives

The National Labor Relations Act, 40 years old July 5, has become "the keystone of industrial democracy" and has enabled the country to achieve greater progress toward the common welfare of all Americans in the past four decades than in any other period, AFL-CIO President George Meany declared.

But the statute — signed into law by President Franklin D. Roosevelt on July 5, 1935—has not fully lived up to expectations, Meany noted.

"All too often the justice this law is supposed to bring to the workplace is delayed and delayed," he said, "until it is in reality denied."

Meany noted also that the law has not yet been extended to cover all who work for a living—particularly farm workers and many others who urgently need protection under its provisions.

But even if the law's coverage were broadened and its administrative pace quickened, Meany said, "for the millions who have no jobs, the legal rights to organize and bargain collectively are shallow indeed."

He called for a new commitment on the part of the federal government to assure the millions of currently unemployed workers their

DELEGATES REPRESENTING unions in the performing arts meet for the biennial convention of the 4As, the shorthand for the AFL-CIO's Associated Actors & Artistes of America. President Frederick O'Neal, president-emeritus of Actors' Equity and an AFL-CIO vice president, presides.

Performing Arts Warn Of Non-Union Inroads

New York—Concern over non-union inroads in motion picture production was expressed at the biennial convention of the 4As—more formally, the Associated Actors & Artistes of America.

Delegates to the biennial convention, representing the performing arts unions that make up its branches, backed the campaign by the Screen Extras Guild to end the use of non-union extras in films.

The organization also voiced concern at reports of persecution of Argentine actors, writers and intellectuals by right-wing vigilante groups.

Frederick O'Neal, the 4As president, expressed the group's feelings in a letter to Argentina's head of state, President Isabel de Martinez de Peron.

"If the lives and the professions of performing artists are endangered in any part of the world, we too are affected," he wrote. "We, too, are concerned."

O'Neal, who is president-emeritus of Actor's Equity and an AFL-CIO vice president, was re-elected, along with all other 4A officers.

The officers include: Chester Migden of the Screen Actors Guild as first vice president; DeLloyd Tibbs of the American Guild of Musical Artists as second vice president; H. O'Neill Shanks of the Screen Extras Guild as third vice president; Penny Singleton of the American Guild of Variety Artists as fourth vice president; Donald Grody, executive secretary of Actors' Equity as fifth vice president; Harold M. Hoffman of the Screen Actors Guild as treasurer, and Sanford I. Wolff of the American Federation of Television & Radio Artists as executive secretary.

The convention voted to take out advertisements in trade publications making clear that the Guild of Variety Artists (AGVA) is the only recognized union in its jurisdiction.

O'Neal has sent a letter to Eddie Rio, who has challenged the election of Penny Singleton as president of AGVA and is now reportedly seeking to set up a rival union, that the 4As cannot recognize a breakaway group and will abide by court decisions in any dispute over union elections.

Hospital Clerks Expand SEIU Unit

Some 300 clerical workers at the Washington Hospital Center in Washington, D.C., voted by a ratio of nearly 2 to 1 to have the Service Employees as their bargaining agent.

In an earlier election this year, 1,400 other workers at the hospital chose the union as their collective bargaining representative.

Grain Millers Approve Increased Per Capita

Minneapolis—Delegates to the Grain Millers convention approved a $2 increase in the union's monthly per capita tax to help finance expanded operations of a new organizational department and the staffing of full-time organizers.

The additional payments will become effective Aug. 1, with local unions retaining 50 cents of the increase. Part of the revenue increase will cover higher operating expenses of the international, President Roy O. Wellborn said.

Wellborn said the union is encountering "a very determined resistance" to organizing efforts from anti-union management, not only at the plant level, but also through extensive legal maneuvers. He cited additional employer resistance to the union's efforts to improve benefits for members.

In addition to re-electing the union's top officers to new two-year terms, delegates elected Joe Rajcevich as director of organization and to a new executive vice presidency.

The other executive officers of the union are Sec.-Treas. Harold P. Tevis and Executive Vice President Frank House.

Elected to the union's executive board were Vice Presidents Ralph Masters, Donald Watts, Lloyd Freilinger, Peter Rybka, Fred Kunz, Joseph Smisek, Robert Willis, Larry Jackson, Lloyd Ott and Gary Haston.

Plasterers Receive Training Grant

The Plasterers & Cement Masons received a $938,837 Labor Dept. contract to prepare 735 disadvantaged persons for apprenticeships and to upgrade the skills of 200 journeymen.

The union will conduct the training programs in 28 states with the assistance of the Portland Cement Association. Under six previous contracts, 5,084 disadvantaged workers have completed the union's training programs.

IAM Urges Safety Probe Of Railroads

The Machinists have called for an immediate investigation of safety and health conditions affecting the union's members in the entire U.S. railroad industry.

In the first industry-wide complaint filed with the Labor Dept., the IAM accused the railroads of wholesale violations of the federal safety law.

The IAM charged that its 26,000 railroad machinists are being exposed to unnecessary health hazards at 385 locations across the country, including roundhouses, service facilities, repair shops and related work areas.

The complaint, signed by IAM Vice President William W. Winpisinger, stems from the unanimous recommendation of 100 delegates who attended the union's railroad conference last spring.

Workers employed by the railroads, the complaint states, are being exposed to "excessive dusts, fumes, vapors, gases, soot and noise that constitute continuous and cumulative health hazards."

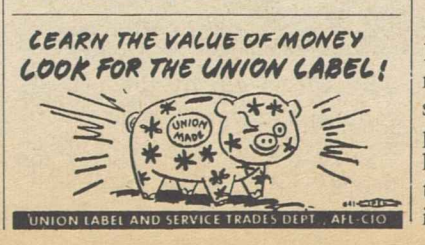
These hazards are affecting the workers' respiratory system, along with bringing potential harm to other parts of their bodies, skin diseases and hearing impairment or loss, the complaint charges.

The seriousness of the health hazards demands an immediate environmental and medical investigation of the entire industry, the complaint states in calling on the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to designate railroads as a top priority target for enforcement.

The IAM said that the railroads have failed to provide their employes in each of the 385 locations "a place of employment free from recognized hazards that are causing or are likely to cause death or serious physical harm."

Enforcement authority over railroads was shifted to OSHA last January by the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission in a decision resulting from a complaint filed by the IAM on behalf of workers employed by Southern Pacific's diesel shops in Houston.

Prior to that ruling, the Federal Railroad Administration had claimed exclusive jurisdiction over railroad safety enforcement. But the FRA had been a frequent target of union charges of failure to enforce the Railway Safety Act since it was enacted in 1969.



U.S. Appellate Decision:

Disability Benefits Cover Pregnancy

Richmond, Va.—A federal appellate court here has upheld a union's contention that women unable to work because of pregnancy or childbirth are entitled to the same benefits provided workers with other disabilities.

The 2-1 decision by the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals came in a class-action suit brought by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers (IUE) on behalf of all women employes of the General Electric Co.

The final word will almost certainly come from the Supreme Court, which has before it a similar verdict in a different case that had been decided by the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Both the IUE and General Electric had earlier asked the Supreme Court to consider the two cases at the same time.

In both appellate courts, denial of disability benefits for a condition that affects only women was deemed a violation of the ban on sex discrimination in "compensation, terms, conditions and privileges of employment" contained in the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

The GE case was initiated by IUE Local 161 of Salem, Va., and a group of women employes of the company.

The union position was initially upheld in an April 1964 federal district court decision, which has now been affirmed by the appellate court.

As to the company's contention that pregnancy was a "voluntary" disability, the appellate court majority questioned the assumption that pregnancy in all cases was voluntary. But in any event, it noted, disability benefits were paid for absences from work resulting from such "voluntary" disabilities as cosmetic surgery and attempted suicide.

IUE President Paul Jennings termed the decision "an important victory over second-class treatment of women workers" and expressed hope that it will be "finally and favorably resolved by the Supreme Court."

In another case, involving enforcement of an arbitration award, the Ohio Supreme Court ruled in favor of Rubber Workers Local 200 in its suit against the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co.

The decision affirmed a 1972 arbitration award granting the union's claim that the company's policy of paying benefits for a shorter time for pregnancy-related disabilities than for other disabilities violated EEOC guidelines.

Rubber Workers President Peter Bommarito termed the verdict a big step toward "equality regardless of sex."

Court Widens Discrimination Back Pay Rule

The Supreme Court ruled that trial judges may award back pay to workers who have been victims of discrimination in hiring or promotion, even if there is no evidence that the employer acted in bad faith.

A lower court had found that racial job patterns at a North Carolina paper company which had their origins before passage of the Civil Rights Act hadn't fully been overcome. It ordered changes made, but declined to order back pay because the employes filing the complaint hadn't initially sought it and the employer was not found to have acted in bad faith.

Also in dispute was the firm's use of a promotion test which a federal district judge had accepted as showing a valid relationship to the ability of a worker to do a higher-level job. An appellate court and the Supreme Court disagreed and said the test had not been properly validated.

The Supreme Court did not get into the details of back pay claims. It sent the case back to the trial judge with instructions to consider the issue of back pay in view of the Supreme Court ruling.

Housing Rules Attacked As 'Disaster' to Elderly

Nonprofit sponsors of housing for the elderly will not be able to get construction loans because of proposed "disastrous" regulations of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development, the National Council of Senior Citizens has charged.

NCSC President Nelson H. Cruikshank accused HUD Sec. Carla Hills of "thumbing her nose at Congress and the American people" by refusing to modify the proposed regulations.

Hills had been asked to explain to the Senate why HUD's regulations allowed only short-term construction loans for senior citizen housing when Congress intended that the loans be used for long-term financing. She claimed that major nonprofit sponsors could use endowment or pension funds to finance long-term loans.

Sen. Harrison Williams (D-N.J.), chairman of the subcommittee on housing for the elderly, reminded her that such use of pension funds would be a violation of federal law.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) was unable to get Hills to name even one potential nonprofit sponsor who had agreed that the proposed regulations would create low-income rental units. Kennedy told Hills that it was the clear legislative intent of Congress to provide a means whereby nonprofit sponsors could get long-term loans to operate new rental units for the low-income earners and the elderly.

Cruikshank said it is "clear that the Secretary intends to ignore the wishes of Congress and the wishes of senior citizens." He said unless Congress can rectify the dispute, the senior citizens' group will take the matter to court. He said HUD is already in violation of law for impounding senior citizens' housing funds for eight months.

Hails American Labor's Stand:

1947, while liberals of the West were swearing there was none in the USSR, published and distributed a map of the Soviet chain of slave labor camps. The map matched the author's account of the camp system in The Gulag Archipelago, his own account of Soviet internal oppression.

"On our crowded planet there are no longer any internal affairs," Solzhenitsyn said, paraphrasing a passage from his 1972 Nobel Prize lecture.

"Interfere more and more" in Soviet affairs, he urged. "Interfere as much as you can. We beg you to come and interfere.

"Whenever you help the persons persecuted in the Soviet Union," he reminded his audience, "you not only display magnanimity and nobility, you're defending not only them but yourselves as well. You're defending your own future."

"I'm not going to tell you sweet words," the author of The Gulag Archipelago—a detailed account of the inhumane treatment of Soviet prison camp inmates during the Stalin era—told his listeners at the start of his 90-minute address.

"The situation in the world is not just dangerous," he said.

"It isn't just threatening—it is catastrophic. Something that is incomprehensible to the ordinary human mind has taken place," he continued.

"Your statesmen of the West, for some inexplicable reason, have signed one capitulation after another." Starting with United States recognition of the Soviet Communist government in 1933, American leaders have joined European governments in dignifying communism as being "worthy of diplomatic recognition, of friendship and of assistance," Solzhenitsyn said.

He criticized the 1941 military alliance of the United States, Britain, France, Australia and other countries with the Stalin regime, which he said served to strengthen Soviet totalitarianism and helped bring into existence another oppressive government, Red China. And he cited other diplomatic sell-outs by the West in the post-World War II period.

"All this finally precipitated the present world situation," the 56-year-old novelist observed. "How could the Western democracies have done this?"

The result of these capitulations and compromises — "the constant retreat, the surrender of one country after another, to such a point that there are Soviet satellites even in Africa and almost all of Asia is taken over by them" — has been terrible, unspoken human tragedy, Solzhenitsyn declared.

SOLZHENITSYN

"One cannot think only in the low level of political calculations. It's necessary to think also of what is noble, and what is honorable—not only what is profitable."

"We already hear voices in your country and in the West—'give up Korea and we will live quietly; give up Portugal, of course; give up Japan; give up Israel; give up Taiwan, the Philippines, Malaysia, Thailand; give up 10 more African countries; just let us live in peace and quiet.'

" 'Just let us drive our big cars on our splendid highways; just let us play tennis and golf in peace and quiet; just let us mix our cocktails in peace and quiet.' "

But these are voices of people who do not understand the true nature of communism, Solzhenitsyn declared.

"The Communist leaders respect only firmness and have contempt and laugh at persons who continually give in to them," he added. "I can tell you that only firmness will make it possible to withstand the assaults of Communist totalitarianism."

The noted Russian author, an outspoken defender of basic human rights, appealed to American leaders to take a tough stand toward the Communists. First, though, it is necessary for them to admit their nation's mistakes over the past 40 years, he said.

Recalling the political philosophy of Aristotle, Solzhenitsyn observed: "One cannot think only in the low level of political calculations. It's necessary to think also of what is noble, and what is honorable—not only what is profitable."

In 1933 and again in 1941 during World War II, he charged, "your leaders and the whole Western world, in an unprincipled way, made a deal with totalitarianism" by aligning themselves with Communist Russia against Hitler's Germany.

"For 30 years we have been paying for it, and we're still paying for it," Solzhenitsyn said.

He cited a Russian proverb, "Do not call a wolf to help you against dogs," explaining:

"If dogs are attacking and tearing at you, beat the dogs. Fight against the dogs, but do not call a wolf for help."

Because, Solzhenitsyn said, when the wolves come, "they will destroy the dogs, but they will tear you apart as well."

Solzhenitsyn's address was his first major speech in the West since he was deported and deprived of his Russian citizenship by Soviet leaders in February 1974. His exile followed publication of The Gulag Archipelago.

AFL-CIO President George Meany, who had invited the noted author to make a federation-sponsored lecture tour of the U.S. shortly after his deportation, introduced Solzhenitsyn as "the single figure who has raised highest the flame of liberty."

"The American trade union movement," Meany noted, "from its beginnings to the present, has been dedicated to the firm unyielding belief in freedom—freedom for all mankind, as well as for ourselves.

"God knows, the world needs to think more about human freedom. The world needs to think more about those who are losing their freedom every day," Meany said.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland introduced the head-table guests. They included members and former members of the federation's Executive Council; Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop; Defense Sec. James R. Schlesinger; Director W. J. Usery, Jr. of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service; Chairman Betty Southard Murphy of the National Labor Relations Board; Daniel P. Moynihan, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations; former Sec. of State William P. Rogers; former Under Sec. of State Robert Murphy, and former Defense Sec. Melvin Laird.

DETENTE WITH THE SOVIET UNION as currently conceived and carried out by the United States, is a fraud, exiled Russian novelist Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn told a gathering of some 2,500 labor and government officials at an AFL-CIO banquet in his honor. Praising the American labor movement for opposing U.S. policy toward the USSR, he called upon the trade union movement and its members to maintain their strong anti-Communist position.

Dutch Workers Assail ILO Role for Terrorists

Geneva—Dutch trade union leaders have expressed the indignation of non-Communist European labor movements over the recognition by the International Labor Organization of the Palestine Liberation Organization, the Arab terrorist group.

Cees N. Commandeur, the Dutch worker representative, wrote the president of the ILO's annual conference, Blas F. Ople, Labor minister of the Philippines, to put on record the "grave concern" of his delegation at the granting of observer status to the PLO.

"In addition," Commandeur continued, the delegation "wishes to state that it strongly disapproves of the procedure followed prior to the invitation to the PLO to attend and address the conference, the admission ceremony itself and the statement of the PLO representative."

The Dutch trade union leader denounced the flouting of the ILO rules by Abdel Aziz al-Wajeh, the PLO representative, who strutted to the rostrum to deliver a propaganda spiel when he was supposed to be speaking on the report of ILO Director Gen. Francis Blanchard.

Ople had no other recourse but to inform the 126-nation ILO session of trade union, government and employer delegates of the Dutch protest from his chair at a plenary meeting.

The American worker delegation's walkout from the conference was followed by a second boycott staged by the U.S. government and employer delegations. These had left the hall with the labor representatives led by U.S. Worker Delegate Irving Brown and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland when the PLO admission was voted, but they did not quit the conference.

However, the government group, headed by Edward B. Persons of the Labor Dept., and Employer Delegate Charles H. Smith and his advisers boycotted a conference sitting to protest procedural decisions by Ople that they saw as further violations of ILO rules of the same order that opened the doors to the PLO.

Because of the boycott, Persons was not present to hear Ople apologize for having adjourned the previous sitting without, as he explained it, having noticed that the American official was calling for recognition to raise a point of order.

In the course of its hectic three-week session the conference approved a budget of $143,982,000 for the next two years, an increase of $33 million over the 1974-75 budget that was attributed to inflation and related factors.

The conference also elected for a three-year term a new Governing Body, or executive council, that was expanded to give 28 seats in all to governments, 14 to workers and 14 to employers.

Having been elected to this Governing Body by the conference's worker delegates, Brown attended the one-day session it held immediately after the conference's close. Philip H. Cook, Australian government delegate, was elected chairman for a one-year term, while Joseph Morris, president of the Canadian Labor Congress and leader of the worker group, was re-elected as the council's worker vice chairman.

House Votes To Hold Back ILO Funding

The House voted to hold up future U.S. payments to the International Labor Organization as a protest against admission of the terriorist Palestine Liberation Organization to official observer status at the recent Geneva conference.

The money was cut from an appropriations bill on the motion of Rep. John M. Slack (D-W.Va.), chairman of the subcommittee that drew up the funding bill before the Geneva conference.

Despite perfunctory Administration opposition, the House deleted $22.3 million from funds for dues and assessments to international organizations. That left in the bill only the $5.6 million needed to pay up the U.S. obligation through June of this year, representing past participation in the ILO. The deleted money was for the balance of 1975 and the 1976 calendar year.

During the brief debate, Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) termed the cutoff of funds a means of showing support for the delegations that walked out after seating of the PLO and a condemnation of the welcome given to the terrorist band.

Rep. Elford A. Cederberg (R-Mich.) spoke with "reluctance," he told the House, in opposition to the cutoff as the senior Republican on the committee.

Cederberg said Sec. of State Henry Kissinger is "very concerned that this kind of an action, taken now, would certainly not make it any easier for him when he is trying to do the best he can."

The funding bill now goes to the Senate.

The Invisible Movement

WHEN WE THINK of the historic srtuggles and conflicts of this century, we naturally think of famous leaders: Men who governed nations, commanded armies and inspired movements in the defense of liberty, or in the service of ideologies which have obliterated liberty.

Yet, today, in this grave hour in human history, when the forces arrayed against the free spirit of man are more powerful, more brutal and more lethal than ever before, the single figure who has raised highest the flame of liberty heads no state, commands no army, and leads no movement that our eyes can see.

But there is a movement—a hidden movement of human beings who have no offices and have no headquarters, who are not represented in the great halls where nations meet, who every day risk or suffer more for the right to speak, to think and to be themselves than any of us here are likely to risk in our entire lifetime.

Where are the members of this invisible movement? As we prepare tonight to honor the presence of one of them among us, let us give some thought to the rest: To the millions who are trapped in Soviet slave labor camps. To the countless thousands drugged and straitjacketed in so-called "insane asylums." To the multitudes of voiceless workers who slave in the factories of the commissars.

To all those who strain for bits and pieces of truth through the jammed frequencies of forbidden broadcasts, and who record and pass outlawed thoughts from hand-to-hand in the shadows of tyranny.

But if they remain invisible to us, we can hear them now, for there has come forth from under the rubble of oppression a voice that demands to be heard; a voice that will not be denied.

We heed this voice not because it speaks for the left or the right or for any faction, but because it hurls truth and courage into the teeth of total power when it would be so much easier and more comfortable to submit and to embrace the lies by which that power lives. What is the strength of this voice? How has it broken through to us when others have been stilled? Its strength is art.

Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn is not a crusader. He is not a politician. He is not a general. He is an artist. Solzhenitsyn's art illuminates the truth. It is, in a sense, subversive: subversive of hypocrisy, subversive of delusion, subversive of the Big Lie.

No man in modern times and very few in all of history have demonstrated as dramatically as Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn the power of the pen coupled with courage to free men's minds.

We need that power today desperately. We need it to teach the new and the forgetful generations in our midst what it means not to be free. Freedom is not an abstraction; neither is the absence of freedom. Solzhenitsyn has helped us to see that, thanks to his art and his courage.

His art is a unique gift. It cannot be transmitted to another. But let us pray that his courage is contagious. We need echoes of his voice. We need to hear the echoes in the White House. We need to hear the echoes in the Congress and in the State Department and in the universities and in the media, and if you please, Mr. (UN Ambassador Daniel P.) Moynihan, in the United Nations.

The American trade union movement, from its beginnings to the present, has been dedicated to the firm unyielding belief in freedom. Freedom for all mankind, as well as for ourselves. It is in that spirit that we are honored to present our speaker of this evening.

A Word Edgewise:

Police State Actions in India Cover Up Failure, Corruption

By John P. Roche

ALMOST EXACTLY two months ago I ruminated here on the extent to which the Soviet Union was providing Indian Prime Minister Indira Gandhi with technical assistance on how to run a police state. Now we know the answer. Accused of corruption and found guilty by a lower court, Mrs. Gandhi has forestalled a Watergate by locking up every honest politician in India, by censoring the press, and for a time cutting off all communication with the outside world.

It had all the earmarks of a KGB-chaperoned operation. For example, the arrest in the middle of the night—actually before the internal emergency was declared by the figurehead President—of the truly saintly Jaya Prakash (J.P., as he is known) Narayan, of my old social democratic friend Asoka Mehta, of the 79-year-old conservative ascetic Morarji Desai, and others. These former comrades of Mahatma Gandhi and Nehru were summarily packed into taxis and taken to unknown destinations.

Then there was the "accidental" break in the cable from Bombay which links India with the world and a similar cutting of the Associated Press's land line to London. And the "power failure" that stopped the presses. This was not planned in half an hour—it was carefully orchestrated. At the risk of sounding unkind, I doubt if the notoriously inefficient Indian government could have handled the mop-up without external guidance. At any rate, Mrs. Gandhi has adopted the slogan of the old Bolshevik Nicolai Bukharin: "I believe in the two-party system: one in office, the other in jail." One can only hope that like Bukharin she will live to regret her sentiments.

Objectively, locking up the opposition and muzzling the press (under that internal emergency powers act inherited from the British) does not accomplish a thing as far as the needs of the Indian people are concerned. India can best be described as the world's largest outdoor slum: roughly two-thirds of the population are on the verge of starvation at any given moment. Yet agronomists have estimated that under proper cultivation the land in two provinces could feed the population.

For years the United States provided aid without strings under Public Law 480 ("Food for Peace") until President Johnson forced a reappraisal. In his view, sending food and collecting rupees (most of which were recently given back to India) could go on indefinitely without stimulating the Indians to pull up their socks and develop an efficient agricultural sector.

The Indians, of course, got annoyed at this intervention in their internal affairs, but Johnson's policy did bring notable improvements. However, it did nothing to cut the birth rate. Thus in the 28 years of Indian independence the gap between rich and poor has increased, per capita consumption of the necessities of life has decreased, and virtually no progress has been made in educating the estimated three-quarters of the population that are illiterate. Throughout this entire period the Congress Party has been in power, but once its original goal—independence—was achieved, it lost its idealism and took up stealing.

Suddenly in the last year it has been terrified: J. P. Narayan at 72 returned to politics and launched a great anti-corruption crusade, preaching to hundreds of thousands. And worse, Desai went on a hunger strike to force elections in his home state of Gujarat; Mrs. Gandhi capitulated, and when the votes were counted the Congress Party had been clobbered.

HERE WE HAVE the tragic irony: Prime Minister Gandhi has declared an emergency to make India safe for corruption. Naturally she is talking darkly about plots, conspiracies, sedition and other activities frowned upon by all right-thinking people. The fact is she can't take the heat so she closed down the kitchen.

What is a state of internal emergency, for example, going to do about illiteracy or grain distribution? Nothing. Except that now, instead of getting savaged by the free press and the opposition for incompetence, corruption and inertia, the Prime Minister can soothe herself by reading government press releases.

This is a bitter column, but it is heartrending to see the world's largest democratic government go into the abyss of authoritarianism. Particularly if, like me, you marched around the British Consulate in New York in 1940-41, picketing for Indian freedom. You know that your Indian friends are on ice indefinitely—and nothing can be done.

As Critics Fade Away:

NAACP Builds on Past Gains By Upholding Its Basic Ideals

By Bayard Rustin

IT IS IRONIC that, just as America's bicentennial celebration draws near, this nation finds itself engulfed by a sea of indecision and self-doubt. Never before have Americans been less sure of their goals. Confronted with a rapidly escalating economic crisis—with over 9 million unemployed—our political and intellectual leadership appears immobilized by a lack of purpose and loss of will.

The stagnation of leadership has not, fortunately, infected all of society. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is currently holding its 65th national convention in Washington. For most of this century the NAACP has been a leading force for moral, social and political change. Other organizations, of course, have contributed to social and racial progress. But far too many are notable today more for their mistakes and weaknesses than for the very real results they achieved.

Indeed, with the single exception of the labor movement, no other organization can be said to have achieved the level of enduring and far-reaching change as has the NAACP.

I point this out because I believe there is something in the traditions and philosophy of the NAACP from which all society can learn, particularly when that society suffers from a thoroughgoing crisis of purpose.

The most fundamental point is that the NAACP was founded by individuals who had a particular vision of the kind of society they wanted to create. They were inspired by the conviction that a racially equal society could be forged through the use of every available democratic process: the courts, the political system, and the constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech and assembly.

These principles, moreover, were the benchmark for NAACP activism over successive generations. The militancy of its leadership did not diminish when they were denounced as anti-American by racists and damagogues. Nor was the courage of its local activists affected by threats and murders.

By the same token, the NAACP's commitment to integration and non-violence enabled it to survive what was perhaps its most difficult period—the turbulent sixties. This was a time when Roy Wilkins was dubbed "Uncle Tom Number One" by archmilitants and separatists and when the NAACP, because of its refusal to abandon its integrationist ideals, was dismissed as irrelevant to the changing tide of black struggle.

Today, one seldom hears of the advocates of what was erroneously characterized as a movement for "black power." Few are actively engaged in the serious business of working for racial change; most dropped out of the civil rights movement altogether or drifted into any number of marginal causes, ranging from Republican business conservatism to forms of nationalism entirely inappropriate to the American situation.

Roy Wilkins has remained as probably the most important black leader because, unlike his critics, he believed that prejudice was not an inevitable part of American life and that American society could indeed be transformed. The causes that he and the NAACP refused to embrace—separatism, black studies programs that exclude whites, violent action—are today no longer seriously debated.

What we have experienced, in fact, is a return to the ideals on which the NAACP was founded. And that is that basic institutions must be reformed so as to serve human needs, and not profits, and that black people must be full participants in all aspects of society if they are to achieve the benefits of and exert maximum influence on that society.

ITS ADHERENCE to these principles has given the NAACP a renewed significance, while their abandonment led to the demise of others. The NAACP can count over 440,000 members in 1,700 active chapters, a substantial increase over even a decade ago. The NAACP has also adjusted its strategy: where once it sought change primarily through the courts, today it is increasing its legislative activities in recognition of the fact that economic change must be achieved politically.

There is an important lesson to be learned from the history of the NAACP, and it is our political leadership which would profit most from the experience. Social change is advanced by those who have a personal stake and philosophical commitment to its achievement. Those who in frustration would as soon bring society down, and those who resist the democratization of society are doomed to failure.

The NAACP's accomplishments are an enduring part of our history: its critics and those who ignored its call for a more decent human order will soon be forgotten.

Gradual Import Quota Needed:

Self-Sufficient Energy Policy Essential to Nation's Economy

FAILURE TO DEVELOP self-sufficiency in energy could lead to ransom-like oil prices and all that portends for the nation's economy, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Ray Denison warned.

Noting that the OPEC nations plan to boost oil prices in September, Denison called for a price rollback on U.S.-produced oil to offset the impact of the OPEC action and maintain, approximately, current import quotas, he said, but not a sudden ban on oil imports.

That would be "disastrous to our economy," he declared. He said it would force a 37 percent reduction of U.S. energy consumption, whereas the 1973 embargo that hit the U.S. economy so hard forced only only a 5 to 7 percent consumption reduction.

Denison said on Labor News Conference the energy crisis is real, even though the long lines at the gasoline stations have ended and some economists contend there is a glut of oil in the world market. He said that Congress is aware of the crisis, and that recent House rejection of a limited energy measure reflected a political situation, not rejection of the fact that there is an energy crisis. He said the vote on that bill might well have been different if certain provisions had been structured differently.

Denison said the AFL-CIO is encouraged that the House Commerce Committee has now reported out an energy bill that goes to many of the same areas, including creation of a federal purchasing agency that would handle all purchases of imported oil and re-sell it to U.S. distributors.

"We feel that such action is absolutely necessary, if we are going to come to grips with the oil cartel," he asserted.

Denison also noted that the AFL-CIO would be prepared to support an equitable rationing system to develop a comprehensive energy program. Unfortunately, he said, rationing is no more popular than increased gasoline taxes and "it is a hard concept for the people to accept."

Reporters questioning Denison on the AFL-CIO produced public service program were Roberta Hornig of the Washington Star and Michael Posner of Reuters News Agency. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

If the 1974 campaign spending law was designed to do anything it was to take control of American elections away from these fat cats and give it back to the people.

The law, itself, is complex as it spells out the limits on contributions, the limits on spending, the limits on party spending, public financing and disclosure of contributions and spending.

An eight-member, bipartisan, full-time Federal Elections Board, controlled by six voting public members, is charged with enforcement of the law. The board only recently set up shop, and none to soon since spending for 1976 campaigns is already under way.

On the presidential level, the law sets a $10 million spending limit, with an additional $2 million set aside for fund-raising costs. And it provides for partial public financing of presidential primary spending up to $5 million.

To qualify for that money, a candidate has to raise $5,000 in each of 20 states in contributions of no more than $250, for a total of $100,000. Once he has raised that amount, contributions he receives will be matched dollar-for-dollar up to $250 per contribution.

More than 30 states, including the 10 largest, will have presidential primaries in 1976. Estimates of the costs of such campaigns for individual candidates range all the way up to the $12 million overall prenomination campaign spending limit set by the law.

All federal money for public funding of campaigns will come from the Presidential Election Campaign Fund. The fund is being built from check-offs of $1 or $2 on federal income tax forms.

To date, it seems that the new kingpins of campaign financing are not the fat cats of 1972 but, rather, professional fund raisers. Along with them, the accountants and managers are important since they must plan their actions to stay within the new law.

THE DAY AFTER the law took effect it was challenged in the courts by Sen. James L. Buckley (R-N.Y.), former Sen. Eugene A. McCarthy (D-Minn.), Rep. William A. Steiger (R-Wis.) and the New York Civil Liberties Union. Their 34-count complaint alleges the law violates the freedom of speech, equal protection and separation of powers clauses in the Constitution. The Supreme Court is not expected to act on the case until December.

Although there is no public financing on the congressional level, the new law is expected to have a direct impact on campaigns for the Senate and the House.

Overall contribution limits include both congressional and presidential candidates. This limits contributions per individual for each primary, runoff and general election and to an aggregate contribution of $25,000 for all federal candidates annually, $5,000 per organization, political committee and state party organization.

A candidate and his family can contribute a maximum of $50,000 if he is running for President, $35,000 for the Senate and $25,000 for the House.

Candidates for the Senate can spend no more than $100,000 in the primary, or 8 cents per eligible voter, whichever is greater. The Senate limit goes up to $150,000, or 12 cents per voter, in the general election. The limit in House primaries is $70,000 and the general election is also $70,000.

A number of questions have been raised about the law. Does it give the incumbent unfair advantage? Does it undermine third parties? Are the disclosure requirements too severe? The answers will begin coming early next year.

Rollcalls on Housing Veto, Job Safety

Both of these June 25 rollcalls were on key labor issues—housing and job safety.

Column I shows the 268-157 vote in favor of overriding President Ford's veto of the housing bill. It fell short of the needed two-thirds majority. Right votes (R) for overriding the veto were cast by 249 Democrats and 19 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 122 Republicans and 35 Democrats.*

Column II is the 231-186 vote rejecting an attempt to bar the Occupational Safety & Health Administration from penalizing any establishment with fewer than 26 workers for first violations of job safety regulations. Right votes against this exemption from enforcement were cast by 194 Democrats and 37 Republicans. Voting wrong were 104 Republicans and 82 Democrats.*

Numerals show districts; AL—at large; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not paired.

Kelley New President:

Aluminum Workers Elect New Officers

Las Vegas, Nev.—The Aluminum Workers elected new top officers as President Henry S. Olsen and Sec.-Treas. Patrick J. Reilly announced their retirements at the AWIU's 21st convention.

The more than 400 delegates elected Vernon E. Kelley by acclamation to succeed Olsen and H. Max Webster was elected secretary-treasurer.

Kelley, who has served as the executive assistant to the union president since 1967, will complete the remaining two years of Olsen's four-year term. Olsen held office as acting secretary-treasurer and assistant to the president before being elected president of the union in 1967.

Webster, a vice president and regional director, was elected to a full four-year term as secretary-treasurer. Reilly held the post since 1961.

Among the 19 resolutions adopted at the four-day convention, delegates called for congressional action on legislation for tax reform to close loopholes for the wealthy, postcard registration of voters and national minimum standards for workers' compensation.

The convention also reaffirmed the AWIU's opposition to "ban-the can" laws sponsored by "some well-meaning, but ill-advised groups," and called for the total rejection of any efforts to impose compulsory arbitration in labor-management disputes.

LaMar Gulbransen, area COPE director, stressed in an address to the convention the importance of labor political action programs on local, state and national levels. He also explored the economic problems of workers, noting that the Ford Administration has failed to come up with any effective answers to bring economic recovery or reverse the climb in unemployment.

Howard Chester, executive director of the AFL-CIO Stone, Glass & Clay Coordinating Committee, detailed the efforts of organized labor to halt the "dumping" of products from low-wage countries on American markets to erode U.S. jobs.

Delegates also approved an increase in salaries of the union's top officers, raising the president's annual salary from $28,500 to $31,880 and the secretary-treasurer's from $24,000 to $27,380.

Other major speakers at the four-day convention included President John McNamara of the Firemen & Oilers and Elmer Chatak, organizing director of the Steelworkers.

The convention approved the selection of New Orleans as the site of the union's 1977 convention.

Rubber Union, OCAW Recess Merger Talks

The Rubber Workers and the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers have recessed merger discussions after committees from both unions were unable to reach agreement on certain points.

The unions had been conducting serious discussions since February, when the officers of the URW and the OCAW agreed in principle to merge. The cessation of talks was announced separately by URW President Peter Bommarito and OCAW President A. F. Grospiron.

Grospiron and Bommarito said the areas of disagreement include the per capita tax arrangement, the manner in which vacancies in elective offices would be filled, appointment of convention committees, establishment of districts in terms of numbers and geographic lines, duties of the secretary-treasurer, staff salaries of the merged union, the manner for the selection of the Canadian district director, and uniformity of local union bylaws.

Both unions are scheduled to hold conventions beginning Oct. 3 within a few miles of each other in Florida.

Basic Seniority System Seen Withstanding Test

New York—Solicitor of Labor William J. Kilberg doesn't think that the basic "last hired, first fired" concept of seniority is going to be thrown out by the courts every time it results in reducing the percentage of blacks or women at an establishment.

Despite one lower court decision that Kilberg thinks will be reversed at the appellate level, most court rulings have required modification of seniority systems only when necessary to remedy discriminatory practices.

He told the New York City Bar Association that the concept of superseniority to compensate for a past generation's prejudices is "alien" to American legal concepts. And to attempt to install such a concept, Kilberg suggested, is to invite violation of other anti-discrimination policies such as the ban on discrimination because of age.

Citing a number of court cases, Kilberg said the key decisions have held that persons who have been discriminated against in the past—such as being denied opportunities to transfer to a better-paying department because of race or sex—should be entitled to claim their "rightful place" in terms of job rights and pay that they would have enjoyed if they hadn't met with discrimination.

But he stressed that this is quite different from the argument that seniority should be disregarded so that younger workers in effect would be compensated for past discrimination against "their parents or grandparents."

That, he said, would require replacement of long-service workers by members of "protected classes in order to achieve an allocation of persons of various racial, sexual, age, ethnic, physical and other backgrounds throughout the workforce to achieve some mythical notion of where persons with these backgrounds would have been but for some prior discrimination."

Meany Elected Trustee of Eisenhower College

Seneca Falls, N.Y.—AFL-CIO President George Meany has been elected to the board of trustees of Eisenhower College.

Meany is one of nine new trustees who took office July 1. His term runs through June 30, 1979.

Labor Spurs Passage Of Texas Voter Law

Austin, Tex. — A bill providing for permanent registration of voters—instead of the present three-year period—passed the Texas legislature with strong backing from organized labor to highlight the 1975 session.

Regarded as "an excellent piece of legislation" by the Texas AFL-CIO, the measure provides that once a voter registers he is registered permanently unless he moves. Then he would be notified of the need to re-register.

The bill also provides that the Texas secretary of state will maintain a computerized central file of regisered voters in Austin, and retains the provision under the old law that permits voters to mail in post card registration applications.

Under the old system, voters were automatically re-registered when they voted in a general or primary election. If they did not vote at least once every three years, however, their names were dropped from the rolls of registered voters.

The State AFL-CIO, which is planning a massive voter registration campaign beginning in November, expects registration to increase by 20 percent as a result of the bill. Plans for the voter registration drive will be outlined this month at the State AFL-CIO's annual convention in Dallas.

Other significant bills to clear the 1975 legislature with strong labor backing included one establishing a three-member public utilities commission, something which already exists in most states.

First proposed by the State AFL-CIO in 1951 and supported by it each year since, the commission will have jurisdiction over electric, telephone and water-sewer utilities. It will have a planning component, and an independent legal counsel.

As part of its efforts to secure passage of the bill, the state federation sponsored a 30-minute, statewide television program featuring Texas Attorney General John Hill. Viewers were urged to contact their representatives in the legislature and request them to support the measure. The bill cleared the legislature by a more than 2 to 1 margin.

A proposed new state constitution will go before the voters Nov. 4 without a "right to work" provision. The Texas Senate rejected an amendment that would have upgraded the state's ban on union shops from a law to part of the constitution.

Another bill adopted by the legislature sets campaign spending limits for statewide candidates, including those seeking the office of governor and lieutenant governor.

Longshore Act Benefits Go to Boat Builders

Employes of recreational boat builders and marinas now are covered by workers' compensation under the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers Compensation Act, the Labor Dept. announced.

Herbert A. Doyle, Jr., director of the department's Office of Workers' Compensation Programs (OWCP), said his agency has concluded on the basis of recent interpretations of 1972 amendments to the law that its coverage extends to such workers.

As amended in 1972, the Longshoremen's Act substantially expanded coverage beyond the navigable waters of the United States to include maritime employment performed in shoreside areas adjoining the navigable waters. There had been some question whether the expanded coverage applied to recreational boat builders and marinas.

OWCP now has concluded that workers employed by such operations come under the statute's jurisdiction if they are injured in a shoreside area that meets the "adjoining area" criterion established by the broadened definition of "navigable waters" in the 1972 amendments.

The expanded area of navigable waters of the United States includes any adjoining pier, wharf, dry dock, terminal, building way, marine railway or other adjoining area customarily used by an employer in loading, unloading, building or repairing a vessel.

Civil Rights Gains Keyed To Economy

tion." He said Martin Luther King's message of "give us the ballot" of a dozen years ago could now be paraphrased "give us jobs — jobs for all — and we shall overcome."

He noted the recent success of a black-labor coalition in winning a 10-year extension in the 1965 Voting Rights Act, but said it was the kind of victory which can be "neutralized" by a declining economy, rising unemployment and an Administration that is willing to accept 7 percent unemployment for years to come.

"The American labor movement cannot and will not accept this cruel and fraudulent definition of 'recovery,'" Meany said, accusing the Ford Administration of "an economic philosophy that would sacrifice on the altar of unemployment so much of what so many have struggled so hard and so long to achieve."

Similarly, Meany recited the improving figures of Negro apprentices in the construction trades, but noted:

"As proud as we are of these efforts, we cannot pretend they are the answer to the economic plight of millions of black families. In the final analysis, the only answer to their plight is a full-employment, full-production economy combined with diligent application of our civil rights laws."

More than 37,000 minority group youngsters are now enrolled in outreach apprenticeship programs, he said, and AFL-CIO unions have issued journeymen cards to more than 11,000 minority youngsters, an increase of several thousand over last year, when 29,000 were enrolled in the programs.

Still, Meany noted that the construction unemployment figure, 21.9 percent, is one of the few that is higher than the figure for all black Americans, which is 14.7 percent while black teenagers are 40 percent unemployed.

Meany's message to the Washington, D.C. convention included high praise for the legislative work of Clarence Mitchell, the NAACP legislative representative, and an expression of condolence on the deaths of Dr. John Morsell and Bishop Stephen Gill Spottswood, NAACP officials who died in the last year.

Roy Wilkins, the NAACP executive director who has been with the group for 40 years, told reporters on the eve of the convention that the civil rights movement has suffered from recent Supreme Court decisions, including the refusal to strike down zoning laws that are used for racial discrimination.

William E. Pollard, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, is a member of the board of directors of the NAACP and a delegate to the convention.

IUE Gets Grant For Job Training

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers were awarded a $470,694 contract by the Labor Dept. to provide on-the-job training for 600 workers.

Under the 15-month contract, IUE will train 300 persons in entry level jobs and the remainder will be either employed or laid-off workers moving to higher level jobs and new product lines.

The IUE has trained more than 5,500 workers through its OJT programs under five previous Labor Dept. contracts.

Congress Expands Duration of Benefits

cutoff of payments to large numbers of workers who had used up a year of benefits and were still jobless. It voted them 13 additional weeks of federally-funded eligibility, for a total of 65 weeks in all. But this emergency legislation ran only until June 30.

The new legislation continues the program at least through this year, and through March 1977 if unemployment stays near present levels.

- Those whose jobs had not been covered by state unemployment compensation—a group that includes many public employes and farm workers.

Under a law passed last December, they were entitled to up to 26 weeks of federally-funded benefits in the same amount that would have been paid if they had been covered by state programs.

The new law increases that entitlement to 39 weeks through 1976, with payments not phased out until Mar. 31, 1977.

The legislation sent to the President was a compromise between House and Senate versions. It emerged somewhat closer to the Administration plan, with its complex system of unemployment rate "triggers," than to the AFL-CIO proposal.

Starting next January and until the legislation expires on Mar. 31, 1977, the maximum number of weeks of unemployment compensation available would depend on the rate of insured unemployment in each state.

This refers to the percentage of unemployment among persons whose job or last job is covered by the state program. Since it excludes persons entering the workforce or those who hadn't recently been employed in covered jobs, the insured unemployment rate runs about one-third below the more widely used Bureau of Labor Statistics compilation of unemployment as a portion of the total labor force. A 4 percent insured rate is close to a 6 percent overall jobless rate.

Under the new law, the 65-week maximum duration of benefits would drop to 39 weeks in any state with an insured unemployment rate of less than 5 percent, and to 52 weeks in any state with an insured rate of between 5 and 6 percent.

The AFL-CIO had urged Congress to provide 65 weeks of eligibility for all workers "until the nation is no longer plagued by large-scale unemployment" and termed the system of off-and-on "triggers" that have marked extended unemployment compensation programs "a dismal failure."

The final version of the bill did drop a labor-opposed Senate amendment that would have denied more than 39 weeks of benefits to anyone who refused an "unsuitable" job that was too far below his past level of pay and skill. However, it provides that a person claiming more than 39 weeks of benefits can be required to take any available free training that the state may determine is necessary to upgrade or broaden his skills.

For the 39 weeks of federal benefits for persons not covered by state programs, the trigger is the same as in the present program—a national unemployment rate (not an insured rate) of 6 percent or higher, or local area unemployment of at least 6.5 percent.

The legislation directs the Secretary of Labor to study the two temporary programs of extended benefits and report recommendations to Congress by Jan. 1, 1977.

The AFL-CIO has urged Congress to follow up the emergency temporary legislation with a permanent overhaul of the nation's "outmoded and fragmented" unemployment compensation system.

Weaker Housing Bill Enacted After Veto

Government National Mortgage Association—will come down slightly under the new law.

Currently, mortgages issued with a promise that Ginnie Mae will purchase them from the lending institution carry an interest rate of 7.75 percent. The new law sets a maximum of 7.5 percent interest on a Ginine Mae mortgage.

The vetoed bill would have given middle-income home purchasers an option of a flat 7 percent interest rate for the life of the mortgage or a temporary 6 percent rate that would gradually rise to the market level.

Also in the vetoed bill were provisions expanding contract authority for public housing construction and extending a home ownership subsidy for lower-income families that the Administration had sought to end.

Congress did write into the new legislation one item of the vetoed bill the Administration opposed—an extension of the direct, low-interest government loans for rehabilitation of housing owned by persons with limited incomes.

In another area, Congress acted to expand the number of new homes that will be eligible for the 5 percent tax credit—up to a $2,000 ceiling—that was provided in the tax cut bill enacted earlier this year.

To avoid profiteering by builders, the law required that a house couldn't be priced above the lowest level at which it had previously been offered for sale.

A compromise attempt to deal with legitimate cost increases, such as those incurred in constructing a new section of homes in a development where earlier models had been built and sold at lower prices, was made through an amendment to an unrelated unemployment compensation bill the President signed into law. It modifies the earlier legislation to require only that the new homes may not have been offered at a lower cost since last Feb. 28.

President Ford's ability to make his vetoes stick despite attempts to override them may be tested again.

The Senate passed a $7.6 billion aid-to-education appropriation bill despite an Administration warning that it faces a veto. The measure, which now goes to a House-Senate conference, is $1.5 billion over the Administration's budget request and $340 million more than the House had voted.

The Administration's biggest objection is the continuation of federal "impact" aid to schools in communities with large numbers of federal military and civil service families.

In another possible funding clash with the Administration, the House boosted the President's budget request by $862 million in passing an appropriations bill for the Labor Dept., the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and some other agencies. It included additional health funds and a substantial increase in poverty program funds through the Community Services Administration.

Federal Labor Law Still Shy Of Objectives

"human rights of opportunity to match their legal rights."

Meany said the success of the institution of collective bargaining in establishing equity and peacefully resolving disagreements between employers and workers has made it "the keystone of industrial democracy."

Chairman Betty Southard Murphy of the National Labor Relations Board noted that the NLRA has been "a key factor in our country's immense economic growth" over the past 40 years.

"It is difficult to imagine what this country would be like had there been no National Labor Relations Act and no NLRB," she said, pointing out that the statute was born in a time of extreme economic disruption.

"The discord and discontent that swirled up into the storm of labor-management conflict in the mid-1930s required a reasoned, systematic method framed by law to produce economic progress through a just balancing of economic power," she said.

The NLRB chairman noted that since 1935 union membership has grown sixfold and there are now more than 160,000 collective bargaining relationships, covering some 23 million workers.

She said the agency's goal for the current 1976 fiscal year is to trim one month from the time it takes to process those unfair labor practice cases which move all the way from the filing of a charge to the issuance of a board decision.

The median length of time is currently 327 days, or about 11 months, for the 1,000 or so cases that fall into this category. In addition to these, many thousands of others are settled, dismissed or otherwise closed in earlier stages.

AFL-CIO Hits Bid to Nullify Appeals Rule

The AFL-CIO is "adamantly opposed" to weakening federal standards that require states to act promptly on appeals filed by jobless workers who have been denied unemployment compensation.

Federation President George Meany termed it "shocking" that the Labor Dept. has proposed to nullify a federal standard that just recently has gone into effect requiring states to decide at least 75 percent of appeals within 30 days and at least 85 percent within 45 days.

In a letter to Assistant Sec. of Labor William H. Kolberg, Meany pointed out that the time-limit standard resulted from "continued and repeated criticisms of the appeals system and appeal delays found to be unacceptable to the courts."

Since the time limit was announced in 1972 and did not take effect until this year, "the states have had three years to prepare for the implementation . . . and they should be required to meet it fully."

Meany noted that the proposal to weaken the appeals procedure stemmed from the recommendation of the Interstate Conference of Employment Security Agencies. This "employer-dominated" body has consistently opposed improvements in the unemployment compensation system, Meany charged, and its members were responsible for the unreasonable delays in processing appeals that led to establishment of the standard.

Seasonal Quirk Clouds Job Figures, Meany Warns of Continuing Crisis

to a record high of 1.2 million during the April-June period.

- The average duration of unemployment in June reached its highest level in 13 years, climbing from 13.4 to 15.4 weeks.
- Construction unemployment still stands at 21 percent; factory joblessness is 12 percent; unemployment among heads of households is 6.1 percent, and black male adults have a rate of 11.9 percent.
- In the 12-month period from June 1974 to last month, the number of unemployed rose 3.1 million, a jump of 65 percent.

What's more, Meany noted, the unemployment outlook for the '70s is bleak. The failure of the Ford Administration and Congress to do enough to meet the unemployment crisis is "deplorable," Meany declared.

In an explanatory note, BLS pointed out that changes in unemployment in June are strongly affected by large numbers of students and graduates entering the labor market.

"The seasonal adjustment method currently used assumes that the number of young jobseekers who enter the labor market between May and June is proportional to the level of unemployment," BLS noted.

"However, when the unemployment level becomes exceptionally high, as in 1975, the proportional relationship does not hold," BLS added.

As a result, the seasonal adjustment factors overcorrected in June and brought about a seasonally adjusted decline of 640,000 in the overall level of unemployment.

"The rate was probably overstated in May and understated in June," BLS observed, "so that an average of the two months provides a better estimate."

AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger noted that in 1971, a recession year, the jobless rate in May was reported by the government as 6.2 percent. The next month, due to the same statistical quirk in adjusting the jobless figures for seasonal fluctuations, the rate dropped to 5.6 percent. In August, the rate was back up to 6.1 percent.

Because of the problems of seasonal adjustment, BLS said it was difficult to interpret changes in joblessness among those worker groups that typically experience sizable labor force inflows in June.

Total employment in June was unchanged at 84.4 million. However, the figure represents a fall-off of nearly 2 million since last September.

The jobless rates for adult men and women were 7 and 8.1 percent, respectively, BLS reported. The rate for white workers was 7.9 percent and for blacks, 13.7 percent. The jobless rates for household heads, 6.1 percent, and married men, 5.7 percent, were about the same as in May.

The total of "discouraged" workers was about 100,000 more than the first-quarter level of 1.1 million, seasonally adjusted. The greatest incidence of discouragement continued to be among those hardest hit by rising joblessness — younger and older workers, women and blacks.

Unions Call for Stiff Curb On Harmful Noise Levels

House Unit Backs Site Picketing

A drive by the AFL-CIO and its building trades unions to legalize picketing at multi-employer construction sites advanced on two fronts in Congress.

The House Labor Committee approved the job-site picketing bill introduced by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), 31-7. The bill is expected to reach the House floor later this month.

Meanwhile, a Senate Labor subcommittee opened hearings on a companion bill carrying the bipartisan sponsorship of Senators Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) and Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.). Williams is chairman of the full Senate Labor Committee and Javits is its ranking minority member.

The legislation is aimed at overcoming a 1951 Supreme Court decision which held that a union having a dispute with a subcontractor can't picket the job site if employes of the prime contractor or other subcontractors are working there. The court reasoning was that this created an illegal secondary boycott against supposedly "neutral" employers.

At the Senate hearings, President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. stressed that contractors working together on the same construction job are not arms-length "neutrals" in terms of labor relations.

There would be no bar to picketing if all the workers at the site were employed by the prime contractor, he noted, or in a factory situation where members of one bargaining unit struck a common employer.

But because of the unique nature of the subcontracting system common to construction jobs, union construction workers have been denied basic rights, Georgine said.

The House Labor Committee wrote into the Thompson bill one change that had been proposed by Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop—a requirement for a 10-day notice of intent to picket to be given to the unions and general contractor at the construction site and to the international union of the local planning to picket. The parent union would have to approve the picketing, but could not be held liable in any lawsuit arising out of the picketing.

Acceptance of the amendment was seen as broadening bipartisan support for the measure. But it still faces opposition on the House floor.

Abel Cites Obligation Of OSHA

America's unions demanded that the Labor Dept. and its Occupational Safety & Health Administration (OSHA) protect workers from on-the-job noise levels that can damage their hearing.

AFL-CIO Vice President I. W. Abel, the leadoff union witness at Labor Dept. proceedings, termed OSHA's proposed noise standard a "direct violation" of the agency's legal obligation to protect workers against job hazards.

Medical experts have warned that twice as many workers will suffer hearing impairment at the 90-decibel continuous noise level OSHA wants to allow than at an 85-decibel level.

Industry contends it would be too costly to reduce the noise volume below the 90-decibel level—the equivalent of listening to roaring subway trains for eight hours a day.

Speaking for America's workers, Abel said it would be "irresponsible and immoral" not to do so.

Abel, who is president of the Steelworkers and the Industrial Union Dept., presented the opening argument for labor's case as the designated spokesman for the AFL-CIO and three big unaffiliated unions—the Auto Workers, Teamsters and Mine Workers.

"The unions of this nation speak with one voice," Abel said, in rejecting the concept that workers must pay with their hearing for the jobs they hold.

He cited the language of the Occupational Safety & Health Act directing the Secretary of Labor to "set the standard which most adequately assures to the extent feasible, on the basis of the best avail-

Fiscal Woes Mount:

City, State Workers Battle Cuts, Layoffs

By David L. Perlman

The bargaining table faceoffs between mayors and governors on the one side and unions of public workers on the other are in grim earnest, sometimes erupting into picket line confrontations.

Witness the strike by virtually all of Pennsylvania's state employes to break an impasse over wages. And that same week, mass firings of city workers in New York set up a counterwave of job action protests.

The settlements were at best an uneasy truce.

In Pennsylvania, where 76,000 members of the State, County & Municipal Employees work for state agencies, it took a three-day strike to obtain what AFSCME Vice President Gerald McEntee termed "the best contract that could be negotiated under difficult circumstances." A union proposal to submit the dispute to arbitration had been rejected by Gov. Milton Shapp.

After an all-night bargaining session, the state's pre-strike offer of a 3.5 percent raise was upped to 12 percent over a two-year period. This was endorsed by the union's 600-member policy committee and ratified by the membership.

An additional 10,000 state workers, members of the Service Employees, remained on strike and continued to negotiate with state officials.

In New York City, some but not all of the 18,000 furloughed workers—including fire fighters, police and sanitation workers—got their jobs back after the state legislature agreed to allow the city to levy new taxes. But the emergency was far from over.

Labor Asks Hazard Test Of Chemicals

The AFL-CIO gave a strong endorsement to legislation empowering the Environmental Protection Agency to require testing of both new and existing chemicals for their effects on human health and the environment.

"There is still too little known about occupational disease," Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said in testimony at House hearings. "But we can already see the grim outlines of a national health disaster among working people and their families."

Labor had sought a study of hazardous chemicals as part of the Occupational Safety & Health Act, Biemiller noted. It is unfortunate

Lumber Industry Pact Sets Gains for 75,000

Portland, Ore.—Members of two unions have overwhelmingly ratified a two-year contract that includes $1.33 an hour in wage increases for 75,000 lumber industry workers in the Pacific Northwest.

The agreements with all of the major logging, sawmill and lumber products firms in the region were negotiated in coordinated bargaining of the two unions—the Western States Regional Council of the Woodworkers and the Western Council of Lumber, Production & Industrial Workers, an affiliate of the Carpenters.

The settlement provides a 68-cent increase retroactive to June 1, with an additional 65 cents one year later; an additional paid holiday, and higher employer contributions to health and welfare plans.

Among the companies that have signed the agreement are Crown Zellerbach, Weyerhaeuser, ITT-Rayonier, St. Regis Paper, Publishers Paper, U.S. Plywood-Champion, International Paper, Potlatch Forests, Boise Cascade, Georgia Pacific and Louisiana Pacific.

Some smaller firms have still not settled. Members of both unions have voted strike authority in establishments that do not meet the pattern of the major contracts.

About 42,000 members of the Carpenters and 33,000 Woodworkers members are covered by the agreements. They work as loggers, in sawmills, plywood, box plants and other forest products operations.

Elderly Called Victims Of Ford Budget Slash

The Ford Administration "is attempting to balance the budget on the backs of the elderly," a Senate Special Committee on Aging charged.

In a 394-page report on developments over the past 18 months, the committee accused the Administration of mounting a "determined and persistent" effort to cut back on essential programs for the elderly to make up for so-called "uncontrollable" expenditures in other areas.

The Senate panel documented several key areas to bear out "what must be regarded as a hardening of Administration attitudes on matters of vital importance to older Americans."

As an example of the Administration's strategy, the report cited attempts to impose a ceiling on social security cost-of-living increases.

The committee's chairman, Sen. Frank Church (D-Ida.), noted that Sec. Caspar Weinberger of the Dept. of Health, Education and

Elderly Seen Penalized By Budget Slash

Welfare vehemently opposed the 8 percent COL increase that went out to social security recipients earlier this month. Weinberger insisted it should be held to the 5 percent ceiling urged by the White House.

"The social security position is just one of the many disturbing Administration actions," Church declared.

The report cites a list of "proposed assaults on Medicare, of efforts to cut funds already appropriated for the Older Americans Act, of continuing Administration resistance to genuine nursing home reform, and reluctance to implement a desperately needed program to provide housing for the elderly."

The Administration's game plan is clear, Church said: It is asking Congress to take unacceptable actions on bills related to the elderly, "and then blaming the Congress when Congress will not accept them."

The report paid special attention to the impact of inflation upon today's elderly. It reported that living costs went up by 23 percent between October 1972 and December 1974, but even with the 8 percent increase sent out with this month's checks, social security payments have increased by only about 20 percent over the same period.

"In the four areas where the elderly have their greatest expenditures—housing, food, medical care and transportation—the rate of increases exceeded the rise in prices for all other items in the consumer price index," the committee noted.

Other highlights:

- The report criticized the Housing & Urban Development Dept. for its apparent reluctance to implement the Section 202 direct-loan housing program for the elderly program.
- The committee called for increased funding of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, declaring "new employment legislation to help older workers should be effectively administered and adequately funded."
- Describing a "broadened public concern for problems of the one million frail elderly who inhabit the nation's 23,000 nursing homes," the committee pointed to a gross failure in public policy in nursing home care.

In its summary of findings and recommendations, the committee noted that recent attacks on the social security system have been based upon "misleading or inaccurate information."

"These accounts have only created needless apprehension and concern for social security beneficiaries and workers who are now contributing to this system, instead of making any meaningful contribution to the national dialogue concerning the future direction of social security."

Public Bargaining Law Highlight in Connecticut

Hartford, Conn.—One of the clear victories for labor to emerge from the recently concluded 1975 session of the Connecticut General Assembly was a new state law spelling out collective bargaining rights for state employes.

The bill, which contains "generally good provisions" according to the Connecticut State AFL-CIO, had strong backing from a coalition of the State, County & Municipal Employees, the Fire Fighters, Teachers and two unaffiliated unions, with support from the State AFL-CIO and the Auto Workers.

The legislature also passed a bill providing binding arbitration for municipal employes in contract disputes. While city workers have had collective bargaining rights since 1965, lack of provision for binding arbitration caused many municipal contract disputes to drag on without settlement for up to three years.

Other gains for labor in this year's legislature included:

- An agreement with Gov. Ella Grasso to divert $5.3 million from the state's pension fund to pay some 75 percent of scheduled pay increments for more than 30,000 state workers. The pension fund agreement was necessary because a state budget had already been signed into law without providing for the pay increases.
- An election reform law restoring the right of nonprofit organizations, including unions, to pool the resources of their members to support candidates of their choice and to communicate these political decisions to the public as well as to their own members.
- A measure substantially easing voter registration. The new law permits voter registration at the work site of all employes even if they do not live in the town where they work.

In addition, labor succeeded in preventing a legislative ban on unemployment benefits for workers who quit or are discharged for cause from their jobs. However, a key bill that would have permitted locked-out workers to collect unemployment compensation benefits died in the House.

White Collar Pay Trails Living Costs

White-collar salaries rose at a record pace during the 12 months ending last March, but the rise in the cost of living during the same period was even greater.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported an average increase of 9 percent in clerical jobs and 8.3 percent in professional, administrative and technical occupations over the period—compared with a 10.3 percent jump in the consumer price index.

The BLS survey is used as the basis for adjustments in the salaries of government employes the following October.

Woodworkers Approve Rise In Per Capita

Portland, Ore.—Recognizing the serious financial problems of their international union, members of the Woodworkers across the United States and Canada have approved a two-stage increase in per capita payments.

The IWA per capita tax, which has been $1 since 1970, will be increased 25 cents a month effective on membership dues paid for September 1975.

A formula designed to provide automatic annual raises in per capita payment will take effect Jan. 1, 1976, based on wage increases received by the membership.

Under this formula, the union will receive 12.5 percent of the weighted average of one hour's common labor wage increase that the membership receives in the future.

The per capita issue was referred to the membership in May by the IWA executive board on the recommendation of a committee established in 1973 to study the union's financial needs.

TNG Convention Opens:

News Guild, ITU Cite Steps Toward Unity

Denver—Ringing calls for acceleration of the last eight months' moves toward greater unity between the Newspaper Guild and the Typographical Union were made by the presidents of the two unions at the opening session of the Guild's 42nd annual convention here.

Pointing to a series of steps by the two international unions aimed at producing "unity on the local level," TNG President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., told the convention's 230-plus delegates that once local unity is achieved "unity at the top will take care of itself."

Noting those same efforts to encourage cooperation in bargaining by locals of the two unions, ITU President A. Sandy Bevis, told delegates that if there is to be "any lasting meaning" to the new cooperation "it must lead us inevitably to one goal: to merger."

Perlik, who will speak to the ITU's convention Aug. 30-Sept. 5 made his remarks as part of his opening address to the TNG convention. Bevis, the first ITU president to speak to a Guild convention since 1960, spoke at the convention's second session.

Perlik said both he and Bevis, ITU President for the past year, were convinced when they first met last November that "in the past, leaders of our two unions had approached the problem from the wrong end, attempting to cement unity at the top rather than the bottom."

Pointing to a no-raiding agreement earlier this year and to a series of regional meetings by a Guild-ITU task force with local leaders and staffs, Perlik said the search for unity through "the grass roots" is "bearing abundant fruit."

"The grass roots want unified action," Perlik said, "and they are, if anything, impatient that they're not getting it any faster."

Bevis said the ITU task force members report they "could actually see the apprehension and misgivings, so much a part of any new undertaking, melt away during these grass-roots meetings to be replaced with enthusiasm as the enormous potentials of the programs under discussion were made clear."

Perlik said he is making one international representative's "prime assignment in the months ahead the coordination of joint bargaining with printers' and mailers' ITU locals" in order to "make certain" that "now that the seed of unity has begun to sprout . . . it doesn't wither."

Bevis expressed the hope that the two unions soon can launch a "realistic, intelligent" joint organizing program as well.

Stating that "the first steps toward binding our unions closely together have been taken" and "we are comfortable with them, we like them, and clearly our members like them," Perlik cautioned that while he thinks a merger "is down the road . . . that road is not likely to be a short one.

"Merger," he said, "will come when, and only when, the grass roots of our two unions want it, and want it badly."

Delegates also heard pleas for greater political action by Guild locals and members from both Perlik and TNG Chairperson Barney Peterson.

Peterson called for enactment of the Kennedy-Corman National Health Security bill, extension and expansion of the Voting Rights Act and rejection of those portions of a bill to revise the federal criminal code that would pose severe dangers to freedom of the press "and other facets of the bill of rights."

The proposed revisions, he said, contain "insidious and dangerous" provisions that would make it impossible for the press to uncover a Watergate and others that "might do no less than protect public officials and their private agents from being convicted of a Watergate-like crime."

Peterson said he detects a "growing awareness" in the Guild that its members "must extend our voices and our power further into the political arena—because nobody else is going to do it for us."

Pointing to President Ford's veto of housing and public-service jobs bills, Perlik said that "only a President sadly lacking in social conscience could be capable of such a performance in the face of the human suffering this recession has inflicted on so many of our people."

"These and other developments on the economic and political scene have demonstrated that we can close our eyes to the importance of political involvement only at imminent peril to our economic well-being, if not our economic survival," he said.

Union Praises Decision on Mentally Ill

The Supreme Court's unanimous decision proclaiming a "right to liberty" for the mentally ill who are no threat to themselves or others and are not receiving adequate treatment was hailed by the State, County & Municipal Employees, which had filed a friend-of-the-court brief in support of a former mental patient who had been involuntarily confined in an institution for 15 years.

President Jerry Wurf of AFSCME, which represents 160,000 workers in hospitals for the mentally ill and retarded, said, "Our union has always viewed mental hospitals as facilities for treatment, not confinement."

Wurf called for a "new national commitment to improve the level of care in mental hospitals for those who need constant treatment."

"Decent institutional care will always be part of a balanced mental health care system," the AFSCME leader declared.

Wurf urged that "public accountability" be built into the entire mental health care system to insure that "what has come to be referred to as the right to treatment will be guaranteed to everyone who ever needs any form of mental health care."

Pennsylvania AFL-CIO Votes Revenue Boost

Philadelphia—The 16th convention of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO approved a 3-cent increase in the per capita tax, raising monthly payments of affiliates to 13 cents per member.

The action by the 2,000 delegates, effective July 1, is expected to bring in an additional $200,000 a year in revenue from the state federation's 630,000 members.

A major topic of concern to the delegates was the failure of Congress to override President Ford's veto of the emergency employment legislation designed to create 900,000 jobs.

The convention called for more vigorous and effective Democratic leadership in confrontations with the White House over vital social legislation.

Among the 147 resolutions acted on by delegates, the convention assailed the eight Republican congressmen from Pennsylvania who voted to sustain Ford's veto of the jobs bill.

The resolution also noted that of 289 Democrats in the House, 22 defected to support the veto and nine others were absent.

Major convention speakers included Sen. Richard S. Schweiker (R-Pa.), Gov. Milton J. Shapp (D) and President-elect Sol. C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Schweiker, declaring the nation "cannot afford a 9 or 10 percent unemployment rate," told the delegates the government "has got to start dealing with our economics on a national basis to insure that every American has a job."

Chaikin noted that the labor movement learned long ago that victories on the negotiating table and on the picket line can be quickly eroded by unfriendly administrations at the state and national levels. The economic well-being of society in general has a direct effect on the ILGWU and the garment industry, he said.

"You can't have unemployed construction workers, auto workers and steelworkers and have a prosperous garment industry," he observed.

State Sec. of Labor & Industry Paul Smith told the convention that at the present rate of weekly benefit claims by Pennsylvania's jobless — now about a half-million — the state's unemployment compensation fund could be depleted by December.

Others addressing the three-day convention were Ben Stahl, regional director of the Human Resources Development Institute; Alan Kistler, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, and Ruth Shy, regional coordinator of the Farm Workers.

Many of the resolutions adopted by the delegates dealt with problems of the state's unemployed, the elderly and the poor.

The convention called upon the Pennsylvania General Assembly to enact appropriate legislation to achieve tax justice both at the state level and in local communities.

Delegates also urged the General Assembly and Congress to liberalize voter registration laws by permitting registration by mail. And they urged improvements in unemployment and workers' compensation programs.

Peter M. McGavin Dies, Maritime Dept. Leader

Peter M. McGavin, executive secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., died at his home in Bethesda, Md., July 6 of cancer. He was 66 years old.

McGavin, who joined the labor movement 35 years ago, held his post with the MTD for nearly 15 years. Before assuming the position, he served as assistant to AFL-CIO President George Meany. He was a member of the Machinists.

Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, in a letter to McGavin's wife, Dorothy, said "there is no way to express what his gifts and dedication have meant to the labor movement. His loss is irreparable."

MTD President Paul Hall said that McGavin's accomplishments in behalf of the department's affiliated unions "will long endure and be remembered.

"All of us who knew Pete will remember him for his loyalty and dedication to the labor movement he served so long and so well," Hall said. "More than that, we will also remember him as a warm human being and a valued friend."

Born in Grand Rapids, Mich., McGavin joined the AFL organizing staff in 1940. He returned to his position with the AFL in 1946 following four years of Army service in World War II.

In 1949, AFL President William Green named him regional director for Pennsylvania and West Virginia. Four years later, he was appointed assistant national organization director.

Named an assistant to Meany in 1955, McGavin handled hundreds of jurisdictional disputes and worked with state and local central bodies and federal labor unions and assisted national and international unions.

He was unanimously elected executive secretary-treasurer of the MTD in November 1960, and assumed the duties of the position on Jan. 1, 1961.

McGavin is survived by his wife and a son, Stephen.

Services were held at Our Lady of Lourdes Catholic Church in Bethesda. Interment was in Silver Spring, Md.

State-County Union Wins N.M. Election

Sante Fe, N.M.—The more than 1,500 employes of the New Mexico Health and Social Services Dept. have chosen the State, County & Municipal Employees as their bargaining representative.

AFSCME received more than two-thirds of the votes cast in the statewide election. The tally was 778 for AFSCME to 338 no-union votes.

The new AFSCME unit includes social workers, maintenance, clerical and custodial workers.

Metropolitan Pact Covers Clerical Staff

Chicago—The Insurance Workers reached tentative agreement here with the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. on a first-time contract covering the company's district office clerical employes in Inglewood, Calif., Youngstown, Ohio, and Joliet, Belleville, Alton and the Normal Park section of Chicago, all in Illinois.

IWIU President William A. Gillen, chairman of the union's negotiation committee, called the agreement "an historic breakthrough."

"Our union has had the district agents of the major life insurance companies organized for 30 years," he said, "but this is the first contract secured for clerical personnel in the same district offices of those companies."

The three-year agreement, which is subject to ratification by the clerical workers, establishes grievance and arbitration procedures, provides among other benefits for 12 paid holidays and company assumption of the full cost of all fringe benefits.

It also contains a provision permitting reopening of the agreement for wage negotiations at the end of two years.

Slowing the Recession

THE PACE OF the economic decline which reached crisis proportions last winter has slowed down in the past three months. The major reasons have been the regular operation of the unemployment insurance system, the adoption of some parts of the AFL-CIO Action Program and the slower rate of inflation that resulted from the economic slack and large business inventories.

The sharp drop in wage and salary income, as a result of rising unemployment and cuts in working hours, has been partly offset by the automatic operation of the unemployment insurance system and by extended unemployment benefits, enacted by Congress.

The average unemployment benefit payment has been under $70 per week in the early months of this year. But total benefits have been running at a yearly rate of about $14.5 billion—about $600 million per month more than in the same period of 1974. The operation of SUB plans, under several major collective bargaining agreements, also helped to prevent the collapse of incomes.

The emergency tax cut, which the AFL-CIO supported, began to put a large amount of money into the economy. Tax rebates of $8.1 billion have been distributed—mostly in May. Payments of $50 each to social security and railroad retirement recipients have been distributed, most of them in June—the total amount is $1.7 billion. Reduced withholding from paychecks, effective on May 1, and some additional reductions of personal taxes are adding further to consumer incomes.

Between May 1 and Dec. 31, 1975, the estimated total boost to consumer incomes from the tax measure comes to $18.6 billion. More than half of this amount went out in May and June.

However, the drop in consumer purchasing power has been so great in the past two years that the effects of the tax cut offset only part of it. The measure's boost to consumer incomes is scheduled to decline in the second-half of 1975 and to fade away during 1976, unless the reduced withholding (amounting to $7.8 billion between May 1 and Dec. 31, 1975) is extended for 1976.

A small federally-funded public service employment program for the unemployed has provided about 300,000 jobs in the first-half of 1975 and the release of some impounded funds cushioned the sharp decline in construction and related industries, despite the slow pace of implementation by the government agencies.

THESE DEVELOPMENTS seem to indicate that the tax cut and other government actions have slowed the pace of the recessionary decline. But these government measures—plus the slower rate of inflation—have not been enough to generate a rapid enough pick-up to bring down unemployment quickly.

The major areas of the economy that are still particularly weak —like steel, machinery, building materials, autos, industrial construction and housing—indicate the special need for measures such as large-scale public works types of programs (accelerated public works and railroad track beds) and housing; the extension of reduced withholding through 1976; much lower interest rates on mortgages and long-term loans.

A rise in the OPEC price of crude oil in the coming months, on top of the $2 per barrel import duty already imposed by the President—and the Administration's threat to deregulate the prices of "old" domestic oil and natural gas and to impose another $1 per barrel tariff on imported crude oil—the combination of most of such events in the next few months can extend the recession and worsen the already bleak employment-unemployment outlook.

A Word Edgewise:

Foreign Policy Unit Comes Up With $2 Million Marshmallow

By John P. Roche

TWO YEARS AGO Congress and President Nixon cooperated to establish the Commission on the Organization of the Government for the Conduct of Foreign Policy, known as the Murphy Commission after its chairman, former Under Sec. of State Robert D. Murphy. The 12-member body, composed of eminent citizens drawn from Congress and the private sector, was notable from the outset for the absence of "boat-rockers."

Its chairman, who spent most of his life in the Foreign Service, was famous for never ending up on the high end of a see-saw. "Bob," as one of his former colleagues put it, "always kept his shoes shined." Indeed, the "Murphy cable" was considered something of an art form. In the words of the same critic, "You would finish three pages of 'Top Secret,' 'Nodis' (the highest general classification, not for distribution) prose without ever finding a hard recommendation."

Well, there have been two years of hearings and discussions costing $2 million, and the commission has produced a marshmallow. The closest it comes to a hard recommendation is to suggest that the President's national security adviser should not also be Secretary of State. I have been making this pitch in season and out ever since Henry Kissinger grabbed both jobs. But the commission knows that Kissinger is sensitive and goes out of its way to indicate that he is great and the proposed separation should await his departure from government.

In addition, there is a lot of playing with the erector set, upgrading liaison officers with the Pentagon, improving the status of the Arms Control & Disarmament Agency, taking the Voice of America out of the United States Information Agency, renaming the Central Intelligence Agency the Foreign Intelligence Agency, and the like. For this we spent $2 million? (A much better job was done at trivial expense several years ago by a dissident group of Foreign Service officers.) Indeed, the report got so bland that Mike Mansfield, the mild Montana monk, dissented with uncharacteristic virulence, stating flatly that the whole exercise was a waste of the taxpayers' money.

There is an optimistic side, however. The $2 million was injected into the gross national product and a number of staffers were kept off welfare —or perhaps on what might be called super-welfare. But in balance it's a shame because the conduct of foreign relations desperately needs sharp analysis. You can't reform the immensely clumsy aparatus we now have by playing games with tables of organization.

Take the eternal problem of coordination. Since every agency in Washington—with the possible exception of the Advisory Council on Historic Preservation—is in the foreign policy business, any State Dept. recommendation has to be "cleared" with other interested parties (Treasury, Defense, perhaps even the Fish & Wildlife Service). The result is that the department's advice is invariably watered down by the paralysis of prudence. (In my files I have a memo with 28 clearances!) Defense has its private state department: International Security Affairs. How do you cut through this labyrinth?

WHEN WALTER BEDELL SMITH was under secretary, it was easy: One of his former aides tells of Gen. Smith picking up the White House phone and bellowing, "God damn it, Ike, I don't care what Defense says—you know as well as I do they can't add." Gen. George Marshall and Dean Acheson had a similar personal relationship with President Truman, and it is generally agreed that during the Marshall-Acheson years the State Dept. achieved preeminence in the conduct of foreign relations.

During the Kennedy-Johnson years, Defense, dominated by the zeal of Sec. Robert McNamara, moved to center stage. If Sec. of State Dean Rusk had been a tiger, perhaps he could have held the line. But Rusk had a constitutional aversion to internal brawling and wound up essentially as personal adviser to President Johnson, who found his incisive intelligence invaluable. State, as a functioning coordinator of policy, languished in the shadows, which grew even darker with the ascension of Henry Kissinger and personalized diplomacy.

What this adds up to is that the role of State depends almost entirely on the character of the secretary and his top subordinates. If powerful, intelligent persons hold the top jobs, have the President's trust, and spend their time running the store rather than wandering around the world, the department will thrive. Where do I send my bill for $2 million?

Dollars vs. Values:

Costs of Reducing Job Noise Counterbalanced by Benefits

The following is excerpted from testimony by AFL-CIO Vice President I. W. Abel on noise standards on behalf of the AFL-CIO, the Steelworkers and a number of other unions.

OSCAR WILDE ONCE DEFINED a cynic as one who understands the cost of everything and the value of nothing.

This statement can be applied to the position of business management, the Office of Management & Budget, the Council on Wage and Price Stability, and President Ford himself, in a recent speech before the United States Chamber of Commerce.

It seems that their sole consideration in setting a noise standard is its dollar cost, and its value in preventing occupational injuries or illnesses among working people is of secondary concern.

The debate should be over what exposure levels must be set to control workplace noise hazards, not over the cost.

This argument is not a new one. It has been a characteristic reaction by the business community to every attempt since the 1880s to regulate and make it socially accountable. Now it is dressed up in a 1970s costume with more sophistication and deceptive economics, but with the same message.

On the issue of occupational noise, the old song has had new verses added to it to reflect present inflation and mass unemployment and how compliance even with a minimum noise standard would open the inflation throttle several notches and cause additional unemployment. This is nothing more than environmental blackmail.

At issue here is business management's effort to set a pattern in OSHA standard-making that will continue mainly to require workers and society in general to pay for the occupational hazards despite the contrary and clear intent of Congress in passing the Occupational Safety & Health Act. And that clear intent was that OSHA set standards to protect workers fully from work hazards; not partially or depending on the cost.

The approach of the economic impact studies and the testimony of the spokesmen for the Council on Wage and Price Stability, is one-sided and open to challenge. They ignore the other side of the ledger, that is other costs to industry and costs to the worker and society from failure to prevent the hazards of occupational noise.

What are these other costs to industry? An important one is, for instance, workers' compensation claims for hearing loss. Even with the inadequate workers' compensation laws operating in many states, the average claim appears to be in the neighborhood of $2,000. A paper presented before this year's meeting of the American Acoustical Society by Glen Warnaka and two co-authors, cited averages of $2,656 in Oregon and $2,504 in Wisconsin in 1974. With about 10 million production workers exposed to noise levels in excess of 85 decibels, the potential compensation liability could be about $20 billion.

Another cost to management which has not been pinpointed is absenteeism from stress caused by noise. Every day of absenteeism costs management something in lost production. If absenteeism from noise stress would account for just one-half day of total production loss, estimated by an HEW study as six days per year per employe, the elimination of excessive noise could save industry $5 billion annually.

Other indirect costs to industry caused by excessive noise include lower productivity and increased occupational injuries caused by high noise levels or artificial deafness due to hearing protectors. A recent study of causes of 25 fatalities in railroad accidents by the Federal Railroad Administration showed the common factor was the workers' unawareness of the approach of the railroad cars or equipment that struck them. Many of these workers, the study pointed, out, were working under exposure to a high level of noise.

WHAT ARE THE COSTS to workers themselves? One of these is turning a productive worker into a deaf person who must be supported by society. In cases of partial hearing loss from noise exposure, there is the possibility that an employer will either dismiss the employe or summarily transfer him to a job with lower pay, loss of seniority rights, and less responsibility.

How do we put a price tag on hearing loss? Does $2,000 adequately compensate a worker who can no longer communicate with others, listen to music, or enjoy the everyday sounds of life?

As for the costs to society, they are indicated but not known. Products produced in a noise work environment bear a price that does not adequately reflect either direct or indirect costs to industry, the costs to workers and economic inefficiency. It is quite possible that identical products can be produced with less noise, but until there is a firm standard in being and endorsed, this cost is unknown.

While these costs I have described are ignored, underplayed, or rejected, the projected costs of abating excessive noise levels have been grossly overestimated.

The time for decision is now. There is no need for a restudy, simply because all aspects of economic impact have not been examined to the nth degree. There is enough at hand to proceed with a strong standard.

Administration 'Hogwash':

Jobless Figures Refute Claim Recession Has 'Bottomed-Out'

THE AFL-CIO's CHIEF ECONOMIST branded Administration claims that the recession has bottomed out as "hogwash" and warned that the economy will sink even lower before true recovery sets in.

Research Director Nat Goldfinger said that statistics or other signs that the "longest and deepest" recession since the 1930s "has reached the bottom" just don't exist. He said the "bottomed-out" claim won't be valid until the decline of industrial production and real gross national product has been halted for a few months and there is a sharp cutback of unemployment, "the most tragic aspect of this recession." Goldfinger appeared on the AFL-CIO produced network radio interview, Labor News Conference.

"Even optimists like Mr. Greenspan (chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers) admit that unemployment is going to remain high," Goldfinger stressed. He pointed out that the Administration's budget review projected three years of the highest unemployment levels since 1941, running through 1977. And he said there is a strong chance that unemployment in the next few months will soar even higher than the 9.2 percent level reached in May, when 8.5 million people were on the official unemployment rolls.

Goldfinger said the Ford Administration has "an obsession" with the size of the budget deficit and has put a straitjacket on job-creation and other economic stimulators. He said the return of people to work would mean "more business sales and more income . . . more savings and more investments . . . greater tax receipts for the government, reduced unemployment benefits and other social costs of joblessness."

HE REJECTED the contention that the needed stimulation would be inflationary. That "threat . . . simply is not in the picture" now; it is "certainly far away in some long-distant future, if at all," he asserted. He said that with depression-level unemployment and manufacturing operating at only 68 percent of capacity, "we have to move . . . a tremendous distance . . . before we bump up against anything like limits on expansion."

Goldfinger was questioned by Philip Shabecoff of the New York Times and Hobart Rowen of the Washington Post. The program is aired Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting Network.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

WHEN THERE WAS some talk last year about electing a veto-proof Congress many conservatives became quite exercised at the idea that the Congress—two-thirds of the Congress—would be able to override presidential vetoes.

Today there is a Congress that generally is capable of passing needed emergency legislation but is incapable of mustering the two-thirds vote necessary to override presidential vetoes.

In the second session of the 93rd Congress President Ford vetoed 24 bills. In only four cases were the vetoes overridden.

In the first session of the 94th Congress, up to the July 4 recess, the President vetoed six measures. In four instances, an attempt was made to override but all four lost:

- To provide one-year increases in farm price supports and income guarantees.
- To regulate strip-mining of coal.
- To reduce unemployment by stimulating the creation of more than one million jobs.
- To provide emergency assistance to the housing industry by subsidizing mortgage interest rates for middle income families.

These were not just ordinary bills. They were emergency measures drawn up during a period of severe economic crisis. And with unemployment remaining at a very high level and the economy still very much in the depths of recession, moves by the Congress to meet the emergency have been largely nullified.

The Democratic Study Group of the House of Representatives has issued a special report that reviews the history of attempts to override presidential vetoes.

The DSG says there have been 32 veto override votes in the past two decades and 11 have been successful—about one out of three.

These include seven attempts to override Eisenhower's vetoes with two being successful. Congress attempted to override Nixon's vetoes 13 times but in only five instances were they successful. Of 12 attempts to override Ford vetoes, four have been successful.

Kennedy did not make use of the veto and no attempts were made by the Democratic Congresses to override Johnson's vetoes.

THE DSG STUDY of the last 20 years provides an analysis of party voting on the 31 attempts to override. The 32nd, the housing veto, was not included in the report.

It shows that Democrats, as could be expected, voted in favor of overriding all 31 vetoes. On the 11 successful efforts, an average of 86 percent of all Democrats voted to override while 80 percent voted in favor on the 20 unsuccessful efforts.

Override efforts have succeeded only when large numbers of Republicans voted to override. On the 11 successful efforts, an average of 60 percent of all Republicans voted in favor of overriding while on the 20 unsuccessful efforts, 74 percent of all Republicans voted against overriding.

On the first three unsuccessful efforts in 1975, listed above, there were more Democratic than Republican defections.

Prior to 1975, an average of 20 Democrats, or 8 percent, defected on overrides; on the three 1975 vetoes, an average of 50 Democrats, or 18 percent, defected. By comparison, Republican defections dropped from an average of 62, or 32 percent per vote, to 36, or 24 percent per vote.

The Democratic performance on the farm bill, DSG says, was the worst in two decades with 71 Democrats, or 25 percent, voting to sustain the veto. The strip mining vote wasn't much better.

Republicans held their ranks well above average on the farm and jobs bills while party performance on strip mining was average. The jobs and strip mining vetoes could not have been sustained without the no votes of 48 Republicans who had supported one or both of the measures when they passed the House.

However, DSG points out that all three 1975 failures would have succeeded if Democrats who voted no on override had refrained from voting. The jobs bill, which lost by three votes, would have passed by 35.

HOGWASH was the label AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger put on the Administration's claim that the recession has bottomed out. Questioning him on Labor News Conference were Hobart Rowen, left, of the Washington Post and Philip Shabecoff of the New York Times.

Union Skills Keep U.S. Moving

The Festival of American Folklife, now a permanent part of the summer scene in the nation's capital, focused this year on the country's transportation workers—the men and women who keep America moving.

Eight participating unions, five of them affiliated with the AFL-CIO, provided visitors glimpses of the folklore and skills of railroad workers, air traffic controllers, deep sea and inland boatmen, commercial aircraft machinists and maintenance workers, and trucking workers.

An estimated 700,000 visitors from all over the United States turned out for the event, held annually on a 50-acre stretch of the Mall between the Lincoln Memorial and the Washington Monument. This year's was the ninth edition of the festival.

Divided into four main groupings—"Working Americans," "Native Americans," "Regional Americans," and "Old Ways in the New World"—the 1975 festival represented one of the largest living history programs ever presented on one site.

In the Working Americans section, members of the Seafarers demonstrated wire splicing and knot tying skills. Railroad Signalmen showed how an electro-mechanical crossing gate and trackside signal operate.

A four-car train, together with a locomotive mockup, were set on 288 feet of railroad track, enabling Maintenance of Way Employees and members of the United Transportation Union and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers to demonstrate their skills.

At simulated work sites, members of other unions —the Machinists and the unaffiliated Teamsters and Air Traffic Controllers Association—shared their unique occupational lore.

On the Working Americans stage, the Musicians —through the Music Performance Trust Funds— sponsored songs and music growing out of the work experience. The trust funds were set up by the recording industries under agreements with the AFM.

On the Fourth of July, near the end of the festival's two-week stand, the Ladies' Garment Workers exhibited for the first time a mural painted by members of several ILGWU affiliates in New York City.

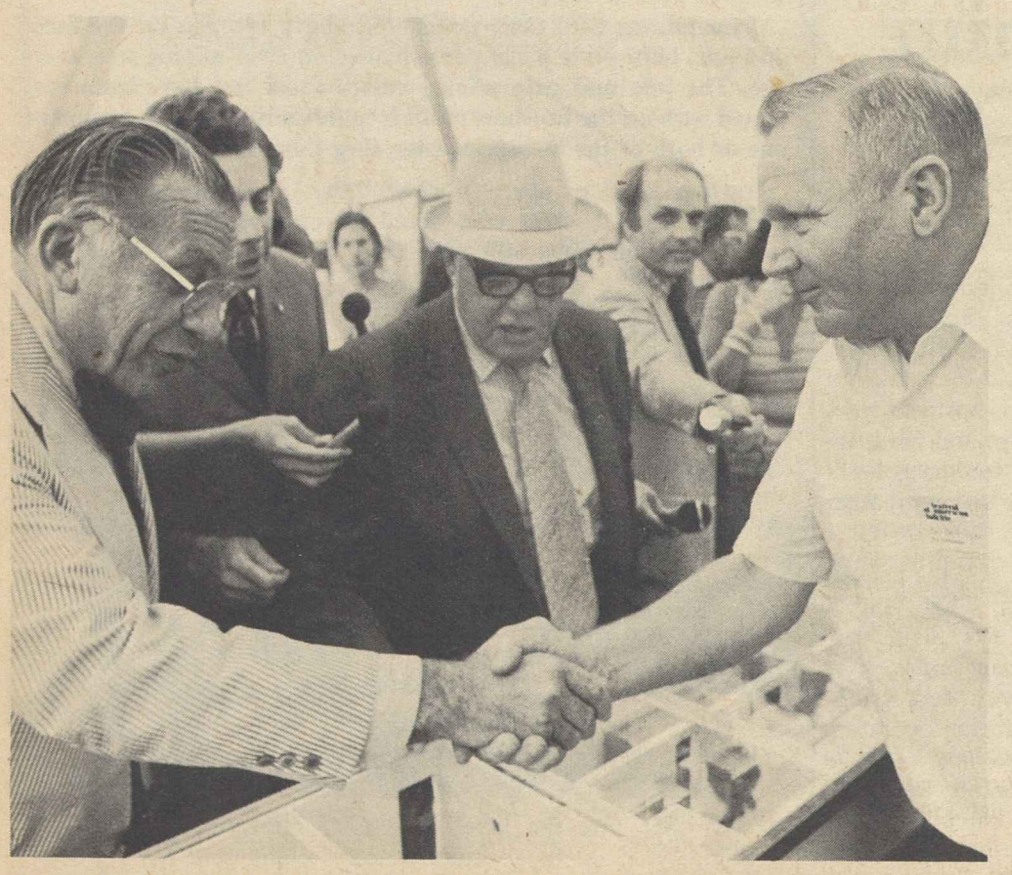
Midway in the festival, AFL-CIO President George Meany and Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop toured the exhibit area. The Working Americans section was the result of cooperative efforts of the federation and the U.S. Departments of Labor and Transportation.

Meany noted that when he was a boy "workers and their work were out in the open, all around you. In every town youngsters could watch blacksmiths or railroad men or telegraphers at work.

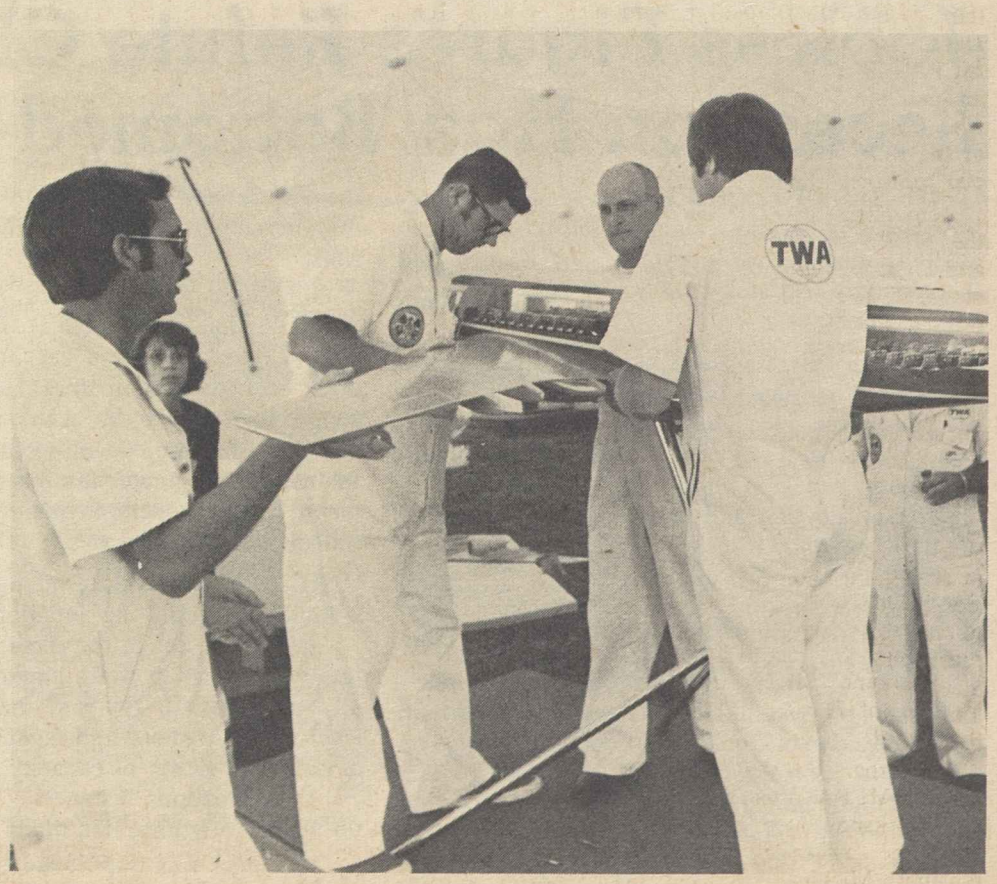
"Now everything is done behind high factory walls or behind office doors," he said. "It's great for youngsters to come here and see how workers go about earning their living and doing the nation's work.

"It lets them see how the work of this world gets done," Meany said.

Overall sponsors of the festival are the Smithsonian Institution and the National Park Service which already are planning the 1976 Bicentennial festival, an event that will run for 12 weeks starting on June 16.



Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop greets Seafarer Bill Bellinger, crew member of the Mayaguez, as President Meany inspects SIU exhibit.



Members of the Machinists assemble a mockup of a 747 jetliner at the Working Americans exhibit area.

'Justice—Not Dollars':

Phony Arguments on Costs Obscure Real Health Issues

The fight for national health insurance is, first of all, a battle for public understanding and so far—at least on issues of cost—the people have been confused, Harvard Medical School Prof. Rashi Fein observes in the June issue of the Federationist.

Spokesmen for the Ford Administration and special interest groups who argue the country cannot afford health insurance for all obscure the real issue, Fein charges in the AFL-CIO magazine.

"The argument that the economy cannot accommodate itself to national health insurance, that it represents an increase in total expenditures and that we have to put national health insurance on the back burner because it is inflationary is false and deceptive," Fein declares. His article is excerpted from a paper he presented to a recent Washington, D.C., conference on Health Security.

"It is an argument without merit, and it does not become any more persuasive when we are told there is no such thing as a free lunch. There isn't and we know it.

"But this is a lunch that is already being paid for," Fein points out, noting that the United States spent $104 billion in 1974 for health care, $63 billion in private expenditures alone.

So the issue is a non-issue, Fein says. The question, can we as a people afford national health insurance, really means, can we afford to spend what we are already spending—"and surely the answer is 'yes.'"

The real issues, he asserts, are "whether we are getting what we should for our money, and whether the present arrangement which makes health expenditures depend on a family's income are fair, just and humane."

Make no mistake about it, Fein urges his readers: the crux of the matter is not about dollars but about justice for all.

"Those who opposed the Social Security Act, disability insurance or Medicare were not really arguing about money but about how the pie is shared," he observes. "And the same is the case with national health insurance."

The real question, he says, "is whether resources shall be allocated so that everyone receives his fair share in a system in which the use of medical care is related to medical need, or whether we shall continue, as in the past, to ration care on the basis of income."

National health insurance is within our means, Fein asserts.

"We can finance Health Security because we are already financing health care," he notes. "We are not so poor that we cannot afford one of the hallmarks of a civilized society—the right to health care regardless of income."

Fein also stresses that national health insurance would be a better way of spending the dollars that are already being spent for medical care.

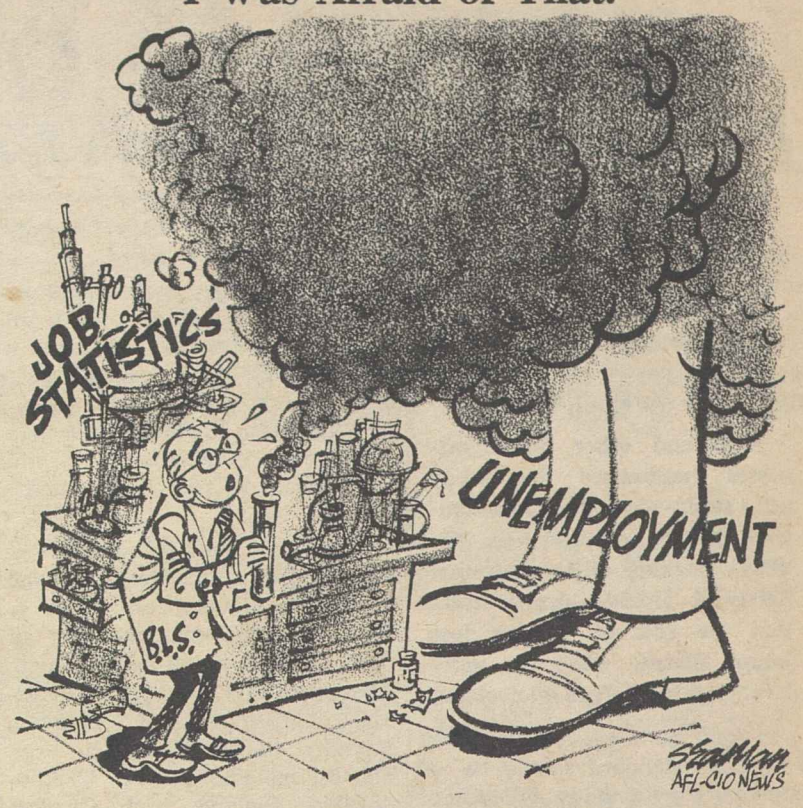
"I am convinced that we can have a well run system of health care that, by eliminating present waste and inefficiency, can provide care for all the people with fewer resources than are now providing care for only some of the people," he observes.

Private financing, operating with private insurance principles, clearly has not met the public's health care problems, Fein says.

"We needed social security. We needed Medicare. We got them because those who fought for those programs understood the basic issues involved. The same issues lie at the heart of the fight for national health insurance."

Once the battle of public understanding is won, Fein declares, justice and decency will favor national health insurance and a bill will be enacted and signed into law.

'I Was Afraid of That!'



Ford's Economic Policy Assailed as Anti-Worker

Marquette, Mich.—The Ford Administration has chosen to put the American worker through an "economic meatgrinder," to make him "expendable," in the hopes of beating inflation, AFL-CIO Vice President I. W. Abel charged in a speech to members of the Midwest Labor Press Association.

"It is crystal-clear by now that the Ford Administration gives lip service to jobs for the jobless but it continues to worship at the altar of Adam Smith," the profit-minded 18th-Century classical economist, Abel noted.

"We say the worst unemployment rate in 34 years is the result of actions by man, and it must be undone by man through legislation to put America back to work," said Abel, president of the Steelworkers.

Calling for enactment of the AFL-CIO's program to restore the nation's economic health, Abel said that "what we need, in effect, is a modern-day duplication of Roosevelt's 100 days of far-reaching social reform" during the 1930s.

Abel, who is also president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., was here to receive the MLPA's Eugene V. Debs plaque, an annual award given to those who best exemplify the principles of the great turn-of-the century social reformer and labor editor.

Reminding the 220 persons at the MLPA banquet that both he and Debs at one time were editors of local union publications, Abel praised the labor press for doing "an outstanding job of keeping members informed." Without union publications, he said, the trade union movement could not have been organized or have survived and grown.

In granting the Debs award to Abel, MLPA cited his leadership in getting the recent landmark pension reform law passed, his support of labor press activities and his presidency of the IUD and the Steelworkers. MLPA Pres. Rose Tadlock of Denver presented him the award.

More than 100 delegates attended the MLPA annual conference and workshop held in connection with the award presentation at Northern Michigan University here. Speakers included Michigan State AFL-CIO Pres. William Marshall; State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Walter Campbell; B. G. Culver, labor liaison with the National Council for Crime & Delinquency, and Dorothy Shields of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

James Ragazino of Steelworkers Local 1010 in Canton, Ohio, was elected MLPA's new president for a two-year term. Allen Williams of Machinists District Lodge 837 in Hazelwood, Mo., was elected executive secretary.

Re-elected were Sec.-Treas. George Thorp of State, County & Municipal Employees Local 1583, Ann Arbor, Mich., and Executive Vice President Richard Holmes of the Lansing, Mich., Labor News.

Labor Calls for Testing Of Hazardous Chemicals

it wasn't adopted then, he said, since in recent years there has been "one health crisis after another."

Biemiller's statement, presented to a House Commerce subcommittee on consumer protection by Legislative Rep. Howard McGuigan, urged that priority in testing be given to substances known to present hazards to workers.

It expressed labor's concern that, with thousands of chemicals and chemical compounds used by industry, the Occupational Safety & Health Administration has to date "promulgated only three health standards dealing with toxic materials—asbestos, 10 carcinogens and vinyl chlorides."

Biemiller suggested that the legislation direct the Environmental Protection Agency to provide OSHA with all relevant data when it determines that a chemical substance poses an "unreasonable risk."

He urged inclusion in the bill of special assistance to any workers whose jobs might be eliminated because of curbs on hazardous substances. But Biemiller scoffed at a claim by Dow Chemical that the legislation would be "inflationary" and "have a negative impact on jobs."

Biemiller noted that last year, when OSHA proposed a standard to protect workers against deadly vinyl chloride, there were forecasts by industry that as many as 2 million jobs would be lost if this were done.

The vinyl chloride standard was sustained in the Supreme Court, Biemiller noted, and "we have not seen any public announcement by the industry of any job losses directly attributable to the standard."

The AFL-CIO statement added that Dow Chemical is hardly in a position to talk about possible loss of jobs since "it has already exported many thousands of them by locating a large part of its capital investment abroad."

Biemiller's testimony stressed that the legislation is concerned with "chemicals that kill or permanently disable scores of thousands of American working men and women every year." He called on Congress to "take swift and positive action to protect the public from these killers."

Five-Union Bargaining Brings Square D Pact

A coordinated bargaining agreement covering some 5,000 workers represented by five unions has been reached with Square D Corp. at 21 of the firm's plants in 14 states.

The settlement, the first coordinated bargaining agreement with the Chicago-based electrical products manufacturer, provides an average annual increase of 12.3 percent in wages and fringe benefits over a three-year period.

Of the 24 separate contracts involved in the complicated bargaining, 21 already have been ratified by locals of the five unions—the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Pattern Makers, Molders and the Auto Workers.

Until this year, the company had negotiated on a plant-by-plant basis. The new settlement was hammered out with the aid of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., which represented all the unions involved.

"One of the most important aspects of the agreement is that it achieves almost total equalization of benefits," IUD's Carlin Allen, the chief negotiator, observed.

Wage increases are the same under each contract—40 cents an hour the first year and 20 cents in each of the other two years. On a percentage basis, total wages will rise an average 16.6 percent in the first year, 10 percent the second and 10.4 percent the third.

In addition, a cost-of-living provision—the first with Square D—will provide up to 15 cents in each year of the pact. The provision calls for a 1-cent hourly increase for every rise of three-tenths of a point in the consumer price index, with the first payout scheduled for December of this year.

The company also agreed to compress the spread of contract termination dates at the various plant locations to three months, from July 1 to Oct. 1, 1978. Expiration dates of the old contracts ranged from June 2 to Dec. 20, 1975.

The new contracts equalize nearly all fringe benefits, including pensions, group insurance, paid holidays and vacation schedules.

The new contracts—retroactive to July 1 — cover production and maintenance workers, tool and die men and warehouse employes at the following locations: Milwaukee; Secaucus, N.J.; Ferro, Helena, Leeds and Clanton, Ala.; Detroit; Oxford, Toledo and Middleton, Ohio; Peru, Ind.; Denver; Lexington and Florence, Ky.; Seattle; Dallas; Cedar Rapids, Iowa; Chicago; Lincoln, Neb., and Atlanta.

Square D produces electrical construction goods, including switch boxes, switch gears, circuit breakers, switchboards and electrical connectors.

New Department Fills Staff Posts

Three new staff appointments to the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. have been announced by President W. Howard McClennan.

John E. Cosgrove, most recently urban affairs director for the U.S. Catholic Conference and a former labor educator, will be the department's director of legislation.

Rick M. Galleher, a member of the AFL-CIO research staff and chairman of the Federal Employees Pay Council, has been named director of research.

Michael Grace, who has been assistant information director for the Laborers, is the department's public relations director. The new staff members will work with the department's executive director, John A. McCart.

Karth Sees 'Neglect' of Age Bias Law

Rep. Joseph E. Karth (D-Minn.) charged that the Age Discrimination Act of 1967 is being neglected and inadequately enforced by the Labor Dept.

While the law applies directly to 36,700,000 American working men and women between the ages of 40 and 65, "it has never been given the opportunity of serving and protecting them," Karth said.

He noted that more than 1 million businesses, industries, federal, state and local governments are now covered by the statute but that "only a tiny fraction have had occasion to be checked by the Labor Dept."

Karth said that in 1974 only 7,535 businesses and industries were investigated for violations. In 277 of these establishments, he said, monetary violations were found affecting 1,648 employes. In 110 of them, income amounting to $2.5 million was restored to 637 employes.

Cost Arguments Rejected:

Labor Demands Protection From Harmful Noise Levels

able evidence, that no employe will suffer material impairment of health or functional capacity even if such employe has regular exposure to the hazard . . . for the period of his working life."

Abel and other union witnesses emphasized that study after study—including data compiled by the government's National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health—demonstrates that the risk of hearing loss jumps sharply when the noise level rises from 85 to 90 decibels.

In fact, he suggested, an initial 85-decibel standard should be accompanied by a thorough study of the technical feasibility of lowering the level to 75 decibels.

As for technical feasibility, Abel noted that significant lowering of noise levels has been achieved by relatively minor changes in machine design, such as substituting one material for another and taking measures to reduce vibration.

"But what incentive is there for a manufacturer to produce equipment meeting a limit of 85 decibels when the standard calls for only 90 decibels?" Abel asked.

Abel and other union witnesses stressed that ear plugs to be worn by workers cannot be considered a substitute for noise control technology. They "cannot and must not be regarded as anything more than a temporary control measure until engineering devices can be used," he said.

As for the industry contention, supported by a statement from the President's Council on Wage & Price Stability, that the cost of noise control would be too high, Abel noted that many major industrial countries presently limit noise exposure to an 85-decibel level. The list includes Austria, Czechoslovakia, Finland, both German republics, South Africa, Sweden and Soviet Russia, with Australia in the process of conversion.

Auto Workers President Leonard Woodcock, Rubber Workers President Peter Bommarito and Machinists Vice President William Winpisinger were among the first group of union witnesses. Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts presented a statement, and union occupational health directors and consultants from a number of unions testified or were scheduled to testify.

Bommarito, appearing for the Industrial Union Dept., sharply criticized OSHA's apparent acceptance of management estimates of the high cost of reducing noise without consideration of the cost to workers of not doing so.

He cited a recent study in Minnesota indicating that more than half of the employers questioned would not normally hire a deaf worker for a production job.

Woodcock termed excess noise the "most pervasive of the many job hazards" that auto workers face.

Audiograms demonstrate, he testified, that UAW members "are being hammered and jolted into the group of Americans who today have measurable loss of hearing due to noise and who will suffer a lifelong impairment to their health."

Winpisinger said the "moans and groans" of industry about the cost of reducing noise levels must be measured against the "permanent damage" already done to workers whose hearing has been destroyed or impaired.

In the CWA statement, Watts compared the industry argument for ear plugs to the issue of aircraft noise levels. If people in the vicinity of airports wore ear plugs 24 hours a day, they might be better protected. But there would then be no incentive to design less noisy aircraft.

The union witnesses sharply criticized the "environmental blackmail" that some companies have indulged in, using threats of closing down to head off compliance with pollution or safety and health standards.

Abel noted that the business community has fought every form of social regulation over the years, and is now using inflation and unemployment as an argument against even a moderate noise standard.

Instead of giving in to this "environmental blackmail," Abel said, the Labor Dept. should implement the Occupational Safety & Health Act "as Congress intended and as the workers demand."

UNION WITNESSES were unanimous in protesting that the on-the-job noise level allowed under the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's proposed standard would damage the hearing of many workers. Auto Workers President Leonard Woodcock, left, consults with Steelworkers President I. W. Abel who opened the union presentation.

City, State Fiscal Woes Squeeze Jobs, Salaries

Massachusetts state employes were demonstrating against the governor's refusal to grant a scheduled wage increase and his plans to lay off 1,000 workers. In California, members of the Service Employees and other unions were engaged in a number of city and county strikes and protests. City bus drivers were on strike in Nebraska and Iowa; unions representing public workers in New Jersey and Rhode Island were battling layoffs and wage freezes; the Georgia legislature was considering whether to cancel or merely postpone cost-of-living increases for teachers and other public employes.

But increasingly, the financial strains that drive a wider wedge between public worker unions and elected officials on their home turf have been bringing the two groups into closer alliance in another set of negotiations.

They are seeking, through common lobbying efforts increased federal financial aid to enable cities to survive the twin blows of heavy unemployment and inflation. And if the actual survival of the states isn't at stake, certainly the ability to provide an adequate level of services has been seriously threatened.

Mayors and unions are on the same side of the table in urging Congress and a veto-prone President to support an emergency package of financial aid.

At the U.S. Conference of Mayors meeting in Boston, big city mayors led the call for two funding programs in addition to the normal level of revenue-sharing appropriations. They urged the emergency $2 billion "counter-cyclical" aid Sen. Edmund Muskie (D-Me.) has proposed for cities and states with high unemployment. And they urged Senate approval and presidential acceptance of a House-passed $2.5 billion public works bill.

Just a few days earlier, the AFL-CIO's new Public Employee Dept. had summed up the need for such aid in a statement to a House committee considering the financial emergencies of the cities.

The labor statement noted that cities and states are being forced to curtail essential services at the same time that the impact of the recession has enlarged the need for public services.

"As a result of inflation and recession," the unions said, "citizens are confronted with undermanned fire and police protection, uncollected garbage, curtailed education activity, reduced health services, diminished consumer protection. . . ."

President Ford invited the mayors to meet with him in Washington. But Administration officials attending the mayors' conference made it clear that the White House isn't prepared to go along with a large-scale anti-recession program of aid to the cities and states.

Before the latest recession, cities and states had appeared to be achieving financial stability. Their aggregate budget had showed a $4 billion surplus in 1972 and was balanced in 1973, according to a congressional Joint Economic Committee study.

But the recession and inflation combination led to a $7.5 billion deficit in 1974 and current estimates point to a combined city-state revenue deficiency of more than $20 billion for this year.

New Hampshire Dispute Still Deadlocks Senate

A Democratic compromise offer has failed to break the Senate's stalemate over procedures for resolving a New Hampshire election dispute.

At issue is whether the Senate will decide the winner of last November's senatorial election or abandon the attempt as Republicans want and direct that a new election be held. Both Democrat John A. Durkin and Republican Louis C. Wyman have at various times been certified winners by state authorities. An official state recount ruled Durkin a 10-vote winner. A Republican-controlled state ballot commission said Wyman won by two votes.

Republicans, outnumbered in the Senate, have resorted to a filibuster to prevent the Senate from deciding the issue. Defections by three southern Democrats have blocked the 60-vote margin required under Senate rules to cut off a filibuster.

Democratic Majority Leader Mike Mansfield proposed a compromise solution for resolving the thorniest issue in the ballot disputes — how to count paper ballots on which a voter has checked a party designation that ordinarily would mean a vote for each of the party's candidates, but also checked the names of every individual candidate except the party's senatorial candidate.

In the group of disputed ballots being considered by the Senate are eight which were initially counted for Wyman even though his was the only name "skipped" by the voter. If they were thrown out, Durkin would almost certainly be the winner.

Wyman has contended that "hundreds" of such ballots in which Durkin's name was skipped by Democratic voters were counted in New Hampshire, and not challenged by Republicans.

The Mansfield compromise proposal was to have the General Accounting Office scan the 185,000 paper ballots that are being stored and remove all in which the senatorial candidate is the only unchecked name. If Wyman's contention were accurate, he would emerge the undisputed winner.

Republicans considered and rejected the offer. Two subsequent attempts to invoke cloture — the fourth and fifth tries to end the filibuster—continued to fall three votes short.

The filibuster hasn't prevented the Senate from acting on other business; it has been on a two-track schedule in which the election dispute is set aside daily for other bills.

Otherwise, the first days of Congress after an eight-day recess were marked largely by committee action.

Apart from the job-site picketing bill approved by the House Labor Committee, a labor-supported consumer bill moved a step forward. A House Government Operations subcommittee approved a bill to create an independent agency to represent consumers. It is similar to a bill that has already passed the Senate.

Worker Skills Theme Of Regional Festivals

The highly successful Working Americans section of the Festival of American Folklife will be expanded for next year's Bicentennial festival.

As a prelude to the 1976 show the Working Americans Bicentennial project will stage exhibits in five selected cities across the nation.

The regional programs, to be held in Los Angeles, Houston, Minneapolis-St. Paul, Hartford, Conn., and Birmingham, Ala., were conceived as a special project funded by the Labor Dept. and the American Revolution Bicentennial Administration through a grant to the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Education and the Smithsonian Institution also will lend their support to the project, which has been recognized by the ARBA as a National Bicentennial Program.

Under the project, Working Americans festivals will be held in each of the five cities from September to December. The festivals will be accompanied by training institutes designed to give local representatives an opportunity to see how they may mount similar exhibits in their own communities as Bicentennial projects for 1976.

The regional festivals, similar to the Working Americans section at the national folklife festival, will feature live worker demonstrations against a backdrop portraying the history of American workers. The experience gained from the regional programs will serve as examples for the 1976 phase of the project.

The AFL-CIO has participated in the Working Americans section at the national festival since 1971.

Chicago Democrat Wins House Seat

Chicago—A labor-endorsed Democrat won an easy victory in a special election to fill a congressional vacancy.

John D. Fary, a state representative, defeated the Rev. Francis X. Lawlor, a Catholic priest who won the Republican nomination with a write-in campaign.

The vacancy resulted from the death last January of Democrat John C. Kluczynski. The election of Fary brings the party division of the House to 290 Democrats and 145 Republicans—exactly two-thirds.

Solzhenitsyn Warns on Complacency

Sees U.S. Security In Danger

By James M. Shevis

New York—The United States cannot go on closing its eyes to the evils of "insatiable totalitarianism" and expect to live long in security, exiled Russian author Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn warned in a speech at an AFL-CIO luncheon in his honor here.

America and a few European democracies constitute a minority in a world already half overridden by communism, the Nobel Prize-winning novelist declared. How therefore can the West consider itself safe, he asked.

The Communists are out to "destroy your society," Solzhenitsyn charged. "This has been their aim for 125 years and has never changed; only the methods have changed a little."

Detente, the current Soviet tactic, is a sham, he told the 1,000 guests at the July 9 event.

"You want to believe, and you cut down on your armies. You cut down on your research," Solzhenitsyn said. Meanwhile, he observed, the Soviet leaders are not cutting down on anything but are studying the West for vulnerabilities to force a wedge and split it asunder.

Imploring the U.S. to abandon this policy of so-called detente, and to stop making economic concessions to the Communists, Solzhenitsyn at one point in his address asked in bounding tones:

"Must you wait until (communism) comes with a crowbar to break through your borders, until the young men of America have to fall defending the borders of their continent?"

AFL-CIO Sec. Treas. Lane Kirkland, who introduced the Soviet dissenter, described him as a man who "seeks to move a world that today seems far gone in madness and cowardice. . . .

"He stands as a living monumental reproach to all those statesmen and leaders who today raise the practice of abstention on basic moral issues to the level of high national policy."

Kirkland noted that Solzhenitsyn has devoted himself to the most elemental values of human dignity, human justice and human freedom, and said "the AFL-CIO is proud and honored to stand with him in that cause."

Invited to the U.S. by Federation President George Meany shortly after his exile from the Soviet Union in February 1974, Solzhe-

Meany Spurs Tax Justice, Hits Trickle-Down Policy

SOVIET DISSIDENT Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn, addressing an AFL-CIO luncheon in his honor in New York, again denounced the U.S. government's policy of detente with the Communists. The Soviet slave labor system depends on economic assistance from the West, the exiled author declared. Solzhenitsyn was introduced to the 1,000 guests by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland.

Loopholes For Rich Denounced

By David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO President George Meany pressed Congress to get on with the "unfinished business" of tax justice and to reject the Administration's "trickle-down" economic doctrine.

Top priority in tax reform should go to closing the capital gains loophole, Meany testified at House Ways & Means Committee hearings. He saw "no reason" why profits from investments should continue to be taxed at a lower rate than income from wages.

"Every dollar in taxes that isn't paid by wealthy individuals and corporations because of special privilege loopholes is one more dollar that must be paid by someone else," Meany said. "It's that simple."

Meany told the committee that tax fairness is also an effective tool for balanced economic growth. And he stressed, in both prepared testimony and in reply to questions, that mass purchasing power is the key to the nation's economic recovery.

The income tax cut enacted this year should be continued through 1976, Meany urged, to avoid the "depressing effect" of higher withholding taxes and reduced spendable earnings.

One of the decisions that must be made by the committee in pre-

HMO Rules Held Affront To Union Role

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to enact a clarifying amendment correcting "a flagrant misinterpretation" of the Health Maintenance Organization Act that would require an employer to bypass a union and offer his workers a health care plan the union may find unacceptable.

Unless the "dual choice" provision of the 1973 law is changed to reflect the intent of Congress, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman said, the law may lose the support of organized labor.

"It is essential that the HMO

Inflation Threat Scored:

Congress Confronts Ford on Oil Prices

Congress sought to block a new inflationary spiral by keeping a lid on the price of oil produced in the United States.

Several overlapping bills were moving through Congress with a common goal of blocking President Ford's attempt to allow the price of domestic oil to rise rapidly to the heights arbitrarily set by Mideast oil producers.

A House-Senate conference agreed on a bill continuing controls and giving Congress a longer span to reject presidential actions to raise prices.

It cleared the Senate, 57-40, and was expected to win House approval. But it faces an almost certain presidential veto.

Meanwhile, the House opened debate on a bill drawn up by the House Commerce Committee which labor considers a superior alternative to Ford's decontrol plan.

It takes what AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller termed "a consumer-oriented approach" to energy shortages, and it would roll back further than the separate conference agreement bill the price of that portion of domestic oil that is not now controlled.

Instead of forcing up prices to lessen the nation's dependence on imported fuel, the House bill would rely on allocation, automobile fuel efficiency standards and other conservation measures.

Biemiller termed the Ford Administration plan "inflationary and recessionary."

It would allow oil that is now being produced at a ceiling price of $5.25 to escalate over a 30-month period to $13.50 a barrel, the going rate for Mideast oil.

A new surge in gasoline prices would be only a small part of the impact of such a price hike. The Unions Near Deadline on Postal Pacts

Three of the four unions jointly negotiating new contracts with the U.S. Postal Service summoned their national policy-making bodies to Washington for strategy sessions as the talks reached a critical stage and current agreements approached expiration.

Presidents James H. Rademacher of the Letter Carriers and Francis S. Filbey of the Postal Workers said there was a possibility the executive boards of their unions would meet in a joint emergency session. The two national committees are empowered to call a strike if such action were deemed necessary by union negotiators.

Right to Picket at Construction Site Pressed to Remedy Long Injustice

Legislation giving construction workers the right to picket a multiemployer job site is "long past due" and has the full support of "every segment of the labor movement," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller testified.

He called on a Senate Labor subcommittee to remedy a distorted interpretation of the secondary boycott ban in the Taft-Hartley Act by giving construction workers the same trade union rights long held by industrial workers.

A companion bill has already been approved by the House Labor Committee and is tentatively scheduled for action by the full House July 23 or 24.

It is the first time the House will have had an opportunity to vote on the "situs picketing" issue, even though the legislation has had strong bipartisan support since President Eisenhower endorsed it in 1954 and its sponsors have included John F. Kennedy, when he served in the Senate.

The current bill is co-sponsored by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Senate Labor Committee, Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) and Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.).

With committee meetings barred while the Senate is considering the New Hampshire election dispute, Williams called the Senate panel into an 8 a.m. session to hear Biemiller and other witnesses.

Despite the strong bipartisan support—including a 31-7 endorsement from the House Labor Committee—the bill faces heavy opposition from an influencial lobby of con-

HMO Rules Assailed As Affront to Unions

Act be amended to make it unmistakably clear that Congress has no intent of undermining collective bargaining," Seidman told a House subcommittee on health chaired by Rep. Paul Rogers (D-Fla.).

Seidman noted that the problem that has arisen is not with the law itself but with its interpretation by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, which issued proposed regulations covering the subject last February.

The regulations would interpret the law to require an employer to offer a qualified HMO to a union as the bargaining representative for the workers. Then, if the union decides the particular HMO option is not in the workers' interests, the employer would be required to go beyond the union representatives and offer the HMO option to its employes as individuals.

"The paradox of such a policy," Seidman observed, "is that all experience with dual choice clearly indicates that the active support of union leadership in promotional and educational activities of an HMO is essential to a successful enrollment campaign.

"Without the active support of the union, the HMO simply will not fly," he warned.

Labor has sponsored and supported "consumer-oriented HMOs," but there are also some bad HMOs run by unscrupulous entrepreneurs out to make a quick profit, Seidman pointed out.

Labor's position is that the regulations should specifically provide that the bargaining agent for employes be able to decline the HMO option on behalf of the entire bargaining unit.

Seidman also noted that the HEW regulations were adopted over the objections of the Labor Dept. and the National Labor Relations Board.

In spite of numerous meetings with HEW officials to try to resolve the problem administratively and in spite of the "unanimous opposition of our affiliated unions," Seidman said, "we understand on good authority that HEW will not change its position with regard to dual choice."

"In short, we have reached an impasse, and respectfully call upon Congress to resolve it," he said.

Seidman also objected to a proposed amendment to the law that would eliminate a requirement in the law that members of an HMO must devote their principal professional activity to the health care of the prepaid enrollees of the health care plan.

Brooklyn Gas Pact Brings Major Gains

New York—Wage increases totaling 21 percent over a 25-month period highlight a new agreement between the Transport Workers and the Brooklyn Gas Co., reached despite a two-week lockout.

The settlement, covering about 3,000 workers, was overwhelmingly approved July 8 by members of the union's Utility Division Local 101 who found themselves barred from work after they rejected the firm's "final" offer in mid-June.

The new agreement, which was reached with aid from a special state mediator, provides a 10 percent wage boost retroactive to June 16, when the old contract expired and the lockout began. Another 11 percent increase is scheduled on the contract's anniversary date in 1976.

Besides wage increases, the pact provides substantial improvements in pensions, health benefits, vacations and in other areas. The pension benefits were broadly improved to give a worker 100 percent vesting after 10 years of service.

In addition, a worker will be able to retire after Jan. 1, 1976, at age 60 with no reduction in benefits. The contract also improves benefits for a surviving spouse, and the union scored a major breakthrough in negotiating a cost-of-living increase for retirees. The COL provision will allow retirees an increase equal to 2.4 percent a year.

Victor Borella Dies, Rockefeller Labor Aide

Hanover, N.H.—Victor Borella, a consultant to Vice President Nelson Rockefeller and a key labor adviser during his tenure as governor of New York, died here at the age of 68.

Borella, a former industrial relations director for Rockefeller Center, had a wide acquaintance in New York trade union circles and AFL-CIO President George Meany described him as "a close friend for many years." Joseph P. Tonelli, president of the Paperworkers and an AFL-CIO vice president, represented the federation at funeral services.

IBEW Strikes Electric Utility In Midwest

St. Louis—About 1,600 members of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers have struck Union Electric Co., a utility that serves 740,000 customers in Missouri, Illinois and Iowa, after a breakdown in negotiations for a new contract.

The strike began July 12 after union members rejected by a 15 to 1 margin a company offer which was described by John Durham, IBEW Local 1439 business agent, as a "take-away" proposal.

The three IBEW units on strike are Local 1439 with about 1,500 members in Missouri and Iowa, Local 309 with about 80 members in East St. Louis, Ill., and Local 649 representing about 80 members in Alton, Ill.

The strikers include linemen, workers on underground lines, substation employes, customer service personnel, meter readers and others.

Durham said the union and company still are far apart.

Other unions affected by the strike are IBEW Local 1455 with 1,100 members and Operating Engineers Local 148 with 1,400 members. Durham said that many of the 2,500 in the two locals are observing the picket lines.

The company also is negotiating with Local 1455 which represents office workers and Local 148 whose members run the power plants.

Graphic Arts Union Subject to Sanctions

AFL-CIO President George Meany has notified all affiliates that the Graphic Arts International Union has been found in non-compliance with the decisions of the impartial umpire under the AFL-CIO's internal disputes procedures and is therefore subject to sanctions under the federation's constitution.

The finding was reached by two subcommittees of the AFL-CIO Executive Council and is based on the failure of the Graphic Arts International Union to comply with decisions involving representation elections at Standard Register Co., Dayton, Ohio, and Western Publishing Co., Racine, Wis., and the Printing & Graphic Communications Union.

In his notification to affiliates Meany said the union, effective July 14, 1975, would be subject to the following provisions of Section 15 of Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution:

"1. The non-complying affiliate shall not be entitled to file any complaint or appear in a complaining capacity in any proceeding under this article until such non-compliance is remedied or excused as provided in Section 16;

"2. The federation shall, upon request, supply every appropriate assistance and aid to any organization resisting the action determined to be in violation of this article;

"3. The federation shall appropriately publicize the fact that the affiliate is not in compliance with the constitution;

"4. No affiliate shall support or render assistance to the action determined to be in violation of this article."

In addition to the Graphic Arts International Union, the following unions are currently in non-compliance with an impartial umpire's decision: the Air Line Pilots Association and the International Typographical Union.

Hits U.S. Complacency:

Solzhenitsyn Warns Of Soviet Expansion

nitsyn spoke 10 days earlier at another AFL-CIO gathering in Washington. That event, attended by 2,500 trade union leaders and other dignitaries, marked the author's first major address in the West since the Communists deprived him of his citizenship and deported him.

Solzhenitsyn's New York speech was just as biting as his June 30 address in the nation's capital. In the harshest of tongues, he assailed the Soviet system with its measures of systematized repression.

"The essence of communism is quite beyond the limits of human understanding," he said. "It's hard to believe that people could actually plan such things and carry them out."

Marxism has always opposed freedom, Solzhenitsyn observed, quoting passages from the writings of Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, the founders of communism, to support his statement.

"In their correspondence, Marx and Engels frequently said that after achieving power terror would be indispensable," Solzhenitsyn said. " 'We'll be considered monsters, but we couldn't care less,' " Marx and Engels wrote.

"Communism has never concealed the fact that it rejects all absolute concepts of morality. It scoffs at any consideration of 'good' and 'evil' as indisputable categories."

Communism has nothing to recommend it to men, the exiled author declared:

"It lacks arguments and hence there is the club, the prison, the concentration camps, and insane asylums with forced confinement.

"I was swallowed myself (by the Soviet system)," Solzhenitsyn said, referring to his eight years of imprisonment in a slave labor camp. "I have been in the dragon's belly, in the red burning belly of the dragon. He wasn't able to digest me. He threw me up."

In both his New York address and a later appearance on the nationally televised Meet the Press program, Solzhenitsyn warned that humanity has reached a watershed in history.

"I compare (this turning point) only with the change from the Middle Ages to the modern age, and it is a major spiritual crisis which is on us now," he said in the TV interview on July 13.

Coincident with this spiritual crisis in the affairs of men is a political crisis of such grave proportions the future is fraught with danger for all mankind, the 56-year-old writer added.

"The leadership of your country, which is entering the third century of your national existence, will perhaps have to bear a burden greater than ever before seen in the whole of American history," he declared in New York.

But, returning to the West's delusion with detente, Solzhenitsyn said that during his month-long, cross-country travels in the U.S. this summer he has gained the impression that "all the dangers which I talked about today indeed seem imaginary" to the American people.

"In your wide open spaces," he said, "even I get a little infected. . . . On this continent it is hard to believe all the things which are happening in the world. But, gentlemen, this carefree life cannot continue in your country or in ours."

In the USSR and in other Communist countries today, Solzhenitsyn said, "a process of spiritual liberation" is under way. But this process is being impeded by the assistance being extended by the West to the Communist rulers—"a process of concessions, of detente, of yielding whole countries."

"Why do you help our slave-owners?" he asked. "In my last address I only requested one thing and I make the same request now: when they bury us in the ground alive . . . please do not send them shovels."

He noted that the very day he gave his Washington address, Mikhail Suslov, a senior member of the Soviet Politburo, was talking with a group of visiting U.S. senators in the Kremlin.

"And he (Suslov) said, 'In fact, the significance of our trade is more political than economic. We can get along without your trade.' That's a lie," Solzhenitsyn charged.

"The whole existence of our slave owners from beginning to end relies on Western economic assistance." AFL-CIO President George Meany understands this thoroughly, he observed.

"Mr. Meany has quite rightly said that it is not loans which the U.S. gives to the Soviet Union; it is economic assistance. It's foreign aid. It's given at a level of interest that is lower than what American working men can get for their home mortgages. That is direct aid."

Solzhenitsyn, in his Meet the Press interview, expressed thanks to Meany for giving him the opportunity to appeal directly to the American people for an end to U.S. trade policies with the Communists.

The greatest danger to the West today, he said, is the growing Soviet nuclear superiority—a superiority that is being enhanced by American economic aid.

"With such a nuclear superiority it will be possible to block the use of your weapons, and on some unlucky morning they will declare: 'We're marching our troops to Europe, and if you make a move, we will annihilate you,' he said.

"And this ratio of 3 to 1, or 5 to 1 will have its effect: you will not make a move. Indeed, theoreticians will be found to say, 'If only we can have that blessed silence. . . .' "

Denounces Loopholes for Rich:

paring its tax proposals for the House is whether the tax laws should be changed to reward business investment, as the Administration has urged, or to enhance consumer buying strength.

Meany took sharp issue with the contention of Treasury Sec. William E. Simon that the chief problem of economic recovery is a shortage of investment capital.

He said Simon's solution is to change drastically the division of "the American economic pie" by giving more to corporations and the rich.

Meany said the Administration program amounts to:

"Give those at the bottom less, squeeze those in the middle even harder. Give those at the top — especially the corporations — more tax shelters, more loopholes, more opportunities for profit."

Unfortunately, Meany testified, there has already been a redivision of the "economic pie." Over the past two years, living standards and consumer purchasing power have fallen. "This redivision has contributed substantially to the current deep and prolonged recession."

Meany, who was joined at the witness table by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller and Research Director Nat Goldfinger, said the path to economic recovery is buying power that translates into sales, jobs, production and investment.

Any forms of investment stimulus for business should be "highly selective," Meany urged, and not across-the-board.

In response to questions, Meany stressed his belief that lowering the interest rates on home mortgages to 6 percent—the same rate the United States charges on loans to Soviet Russia, he noted—would be the biggest step toward prosperity. It would enable a family with a $20,000 income to buy a home, he suggested, and have a ripple effect through the entire economy.

Meany said he has talked to President Ford "again and again" about the need for housing aid, but "it is just no use."

In another tax area, Meany outlined the AFL-CIO's proposals for tightening tax laws dealing with corporate earnings from foreign sources.

On the basis of tax fairness alone, these loopholes should be closed, Meany said. But in addition, they have "encouraged and subsidized the export of American jobs, technology and production facilities . . . helped to undermine America's industrial base while making America increasingly vulnerable to economic blackmail."

He proposed gaining $6 billion in annual tax revenue for the United States by:

- An end to the foreign tax credit provision, under which taxes and royalties paid to foreign governments are subtracted from taxes owed to the United States, instead of merely being treated as a business expense that could be deducted from taxable income.
- An end to the provision that allows multinational corporations to defer U.S. income tax payments on earnings of foreign subsidiaries until such profits are brought home —"which may be never."
- An end to the Domestic International Sales Corporation (DISC), which allows corporations to form special subsidiaries to shield export profits from taxation.

Meany noted that corporations are bearing proportionately less of the nation's tax burden, slipping from about one-third in the 1960s to about 25 percent in recent years.

He urged the Ways & Means Committee to "take a very close and careful look at the entire corporate income tax structure" and the various tax avoidance devices.

As for "simplification" proposals that have been made calling for a standard "miscellaneous deduction allowance" instead of many itemized deductions, Meany cautioned against creating hardship for ordinary taxpayers suddenly faced with big medical expenses of casualty losses.

Particularly in this period of deep recession, Meany said, tax policies should be geared to "bolster consumer purchasing power, help create jobs and bring the economy out of its present mess."

He told the committee members in response to a question that the Administration acceptance of 8.5 million unemployed in order to keep the budget down spells disaster, and particularly for the nation's cities.

Americans "look to the government" in times of crisis, but "up to this time, we've been looking in vain."

He asked the congressmen:

"What is going to happen to America's great cities?

"Have you been in the interior of some of our cities in the last two or three years . . . where we have black teenage unemployment running as high as 35 or 39 percent?"

The Administration seems to be saying, Meany suggested, "This is all right. We're not going to do anything special for these people. We're going to hold that budget down."

By holding the budget down, Meany warned, "we are going to lose our whole social structure in the process."

LABOR'S CASE for tax reform was presented to the House Ways and Means Committee by AFL-CIO President George Meany. With him as he prepared to testify were Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller, left, and Research Director Nat Goldfinger.

Black Family Income Lag Grows Wider

Black families have lost economic ground since 1969, the director of a labor-backed skill training program testified at congressional hearings.

Ernest Green, executive director of the Recruitment & Training Program, translated family income ratios into dollar comparisons when he appeared before a subcommittee of the congressional Joint Economic Committee.

The average black family is trying to live on $58 for every $100 available to the average white family, he said. Green pointed out that this represents a slippage of $3 from 1969, when the ratio was $61 to $100.

Limited access to jobs that pay well and deterioration of inner city schools contribute to the high teenage unemployment rate among blacks, he said.

Green urged labor's program for full employment, including expanded public service jobs, public works projects, federal aid to cities hard hit by unemployment, effective measures to halt the exportation of jobs and lower interest rates for housing.

Army Set to Sponsor Apprentice Programs

Acceptance by the United States Army of national apprenticeship standards for training soldiers as skilled craft workers was announced by the Labor Dept. and the Army.

The action enables a branch of the armed forces for the first time to train uniformed members in a formal apprenticeship program.

The new standards give Army commanders authority to sponsor apprenticeship programs in apprenticeable occupations patterned after those in private industries and approved by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training.

The individual programs will be developed in consultation with labor and management representatives of specific crafts involved, the joint announcement said. Among the first apprenticeship programs the Army is developing are for occupations involving the operation and repair of heavy equipment, such as bulldozers, road graders and mobile cranes.

Soldiers, as registered apprentices, will be able to get the same credit for Army training in civilian skills through these programs as their civilian counterparts. Thus, the soldier-apprentices will be gaining credit toward meeting the requirements for journeyman status in nationally recognized apprenticeable occupations.

Until now, the government noted, it has been difficult for an ex-soldier to show civilian employers or joint apprenticeship committees a record of his or her training and experience while in the service.

The Army is the country's single largest human resources training and development agency, and conducts vocational training in scores of occupations needed in the civilian labor market, the joint announcement pointed out.

AFTRA to Consider Link to Screen Actors

Hollywood, Fla.—The 38th annual convention of the Television & Radio Artists received a report from the union's national board calling for continued study of "the feasibility of merger" with the Screen Actors Guild.

The report, approved by a majority of the plenary session of the board, noted both organizations in the past had achieved benefits through joint negotiations in the TV recorded commercials field and in the area of prime-time TV programming, and added.

"AFTRA . . . concurs with the proposal adopted by the Screen Actors Guild board of directors on June 17, 1975, and hereby adopts a policy of joint negotiations and increased cooperation in areas of common and mutual interest." The board called for a detailed study of possible forms of structure for such a merged organization.

SAG's board of directors last month passed a resolution calling for continued study of merger also. Both unions are affiliates of the Actors & Artistes.

AFTRA President Kenneth Harvey, who was re-elected to his third one-year term, noted that meetings to date between AFTRA and SAG merger committees "have urged strongly that this important work go on. And so it shall, with even greater cooperation."

The 200 delegates to the four-day convention elected other officers, adopted a score of resolutions and awarded the union's highest honor to former NBC announcer Jack Costello. In other actions, the convention:

- Called for renewed negotiations of new rules governing the union's relationship with agents representing AFTRA members.
- Formulated proposals for renewal of contracts covering members' services on radio and TV commercials. These negotiations will be conducted later in the year with advertising agencies and producers.
- Went on record supporting the proposed Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution.

Harvey, a New York actor, was elected to his post by acclamation as were all other officers. The union's executive secretary, Sanford I. Woff, is appointed to his post.

Costello was presented AFTRA's George Heller Memorial Gold Card award for "outstanding service" to the union. For 25 years a prominent NBC announcer, he has served AFTRA as an officer and member of its national board since the union was formed in 1937.

Novik Elected To Free Radio Group Boards

New York—M. S. Novik, broadcasting consultant to the AFL-CIO, is one of eight new board members for the parent corporations of Radio Liberty and Radio Free Europe.

Novik, who has been involved in foreign language broadcasting in the United States since 1933, was elected at board meetings in late June, according to a joint announcement by Ambassador John S. Hayes, board chairman of the Radio Liberty Committee, Inc., and Ambassador Jacob Beame, board chairman of Free Europe, Inc.

Radio Liberty has been broadcasting to the Soviet Union in Russian and 18 other languages since 1953. Radio Free Europe has broadcast in the languages of Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Rumania and Bulgaria in Eastern Europe since 1950.

Recently retired as president of radio station WPUT in Brewster, N.Y., Novik was a member of the U.S. Advisory Commission of Information from 1962-71. He was director of WNYC in New York City under Mayor Fiorello LaGuardia.

Equal Picketing Rights

BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTION tradesmen should have the same rights that are accorded other citizens of the United States —equal treatment under law.

Legislation is needed to assure equal treatment in disputes at construction job sites, the same treatment accorded picketing at manufacturing sites.

Such legislation would protect the economic rights of construction labor without harming the rights of neutral employers.

It would not lessen the current statutory protection of true neutral employers in any way, nor would it spread labor disputes beyond the immediate parties.

It would serve to decrease costs by eliminating the expensive effects of lower productivity, work slowdowns and illegal strikes that stem from the construction workers' lack of legal redress. A legitimate means would be available to the worker to express his grievances.

It would permit picketing only where the methods and objectives are lawful and would not protect unlawful picketing, or permit sudden or "wildcat" strikes in violation of a no-strike clause in an existing collective bargaining agreement.

It would assure equal and non-discriminatory treatment for construction and non-construction unions alike.

It would contain safeguards to prevent the use of strikes for racial discrimination and take cognizance of the requirement for national security.

THERE IS AMPLE precedent for the legislation both in the Taft-Hartley Act itself and in the numerous decisions construing it. Moreover, there is a long history of support for legislation previously introduced for this purpose.

Four Presidents—Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson—spoke in favor of efforts to end the inequitable dual standard for picketing by construction unions and for picketing by unions at a manufacturing or office site.

The Secretaries of Labor of these four Presidents, as well as the Labor Secretaries of the Nixon and Ford Administrations, each testified before the Congress in favor of various proposals to permit construction site picketing.

The Taft-Hartley Act, as interpreted for nearly 30 years, has been applied unfairly to construction workers. It has made the building trades unions and members legally powerless to protect themselves while, at the very same time, it has given a construction employer a virtual license to destroy unions with impunity.

The present statute, as applied, has placed all the legal weapons in the hands of the contractors.

The stability of long-established collective bargaining relationships has been eroded.

It seems reasonable and fair that unions in the building and construction industry should at least have the right to publicize peacefully, by picketing, the fact that an employer subcontracts part of the job to a non-union subcontractor, who very easily might have won the bid for the subcontract because he pays substandard wages.

A Word Edgewise:

'Opinion Trustees' Essential To Art of Getting Things Done

By John P. Roche

SOMETIME IN THE MID-1950s I made my first—and last—address to a large assemblage of the League of Women voters. The general subject as I recall was the interaction between President and Congress, the congressional leadership structure, and the emergence of public policy. The address was well received, but in the question period the balloon went up. A woman rose and asked, "Don't you think it is appalling that, according to a recent poll, 75 percent did not know the name of the Secretary of Defense?"

My reply was that most people were busy trying to raise families and make a living so they relied on the division of labor; that is, they elected Dwight Eisenhower President and assumed he would recall the name of his Secretary of Defense. This seeming display of anti-intellectualism cast a pall over the audience, which became positively overpowering as I proceeded to dig myself deeper into the pit, pointing out that every rational organization had to rely on the division of labor. Nobody could be expected to know everything about every critical decision so they turned to opinion leaders for guidance.

I pointed out that despite my PhD, I didn't know beans about a lot of controversial issues, but I knew whose leadership to accept in support of the liberal position. Politicians like Paul Douglas, Estes Kefauver and Hubert Humphrey were, so to speak, my "opinion trustees."

Nothing said here is designed to impugn the good works of the League of Women Voters. The problem is that the league in its conscientious fashion is in search of conclusions. The politician is in quest of decisions, and the two can rarely be achieved simultaneously. And I only mention the league because it seems to me that the major problem with the present House of Representatives, and the Senate to a lesser degree, is that it is behaving like an educational institution and not a political body.

Take the energy debacle as a case in point. I suppose in an ideal world every representative and senator should take a few months off to school himself in the arcane dimensions of the problem. Once an expert, he could then gather with his fellow experts and evolve a conclusive energy program. The result would be predictable: like a faculty meeting where everybody does think of himself as a universalist, an agreed upon consensus might emerge by the year 2000. However, if (like me) you have no time and less interest in becoming an energy expert, but want to prevent a consumer rip-off, you make an appointment with Sen. Henry M. Jackson and his staff. He is your "opinion trustee."

CONGRESS HAS ALWAYS worked this way —and undoubtedly will again once the hyperthyroid theory of democracy wears out the would-be universalists—but it just happens that the enormous inflow of new blood in the current session has left members without established "opinion trustees." It takes a while to figure out that representative X or senator Y really knows a topic inside out and shares your general philosophy, whether liberal or conservative. When the crunch comes, you will then look to him or her for leadership. If a constituent writes to inquire why you voted to ban the manufacture of widgets, you simply plagiarize the opinions of your "trustee." If you are asked about it at a public meeting, you say, "I'm glad you asked that question . . ." and answer another.

Now I happen to be one of those who believes that, by and large, the American people get a better Congress than they deserve. In the course of my years as spokesman for Americans for Democratic Action and later as an official of the Johnson Administration, I got to know and respect a large number of senators and representatives.

For instance, I had long considered the late Louisiana Sen. Allen Ellender a racist fool. A racist he was, but after watching him at a meeting of the Senate Agriculture Committee literally demolish a number of allegedly expert witnesses on some subsidy measure, I realized that he probably knew more about our agriculture policy than the Secretary of Agriculture.

There is much expertise of this sort in Congress, and more will emerge as the new members season. But the beginning of legislative wisdom is the division of labor: hyperthyroid democracy may lead to conclusions, but not to decisions.

More for the Rich:

Administration Tax Approach Revives 'Trickle-Down' Policy

The following is excerpted from testimony by AFL-CIO President George Meany before the House Ways & Means Committee.

TAX REFORM MEANS many things to many people. To us it means fair play. What we are aiming at is "tax justice."

The 14.3 million union members we represent are, almost without exception, taxpayers. They are loyal Americans who appreciate the value of government and the need for the services government can and must provide. They know such services must be paid for and they seek no special privileges. In short, they are willing to pay their fair share—no more and no less.

But now they are paying far more than their fair share because the tax structure is rigged against them. Every dollar in taxes that isn't paid by wealthy individuals and corporations because of special privilege loopholes is one more dollar that must be paid by someone else. It's that simple.

But there is more at stake. There is an inseparable relationship between justice in taxation and the willingness of citizens to support their government and be confident that their government is acting in their best interests. Events of the past few years have badly undermined this confidence.

The use of tax avoidance provisions in the code has become an industry in itself wherein wealthy Americans pursue tax shelters as avidly as they pursue their basic income. And the rewards are there. According to the most recent figures available, in 1972 more than 400 individuals reported incomes in excess of $100,000 per year, yet paid no federal income taxes whatsoever. And four Americans managed to earn more than $1 million in 1972 and paid no income taxes.

These massive tax avoidances by individuals, coupled with the well-published tax avoidance by corporations, have heightened taxpayer disillusionment and discontent.

The way in which the tax burden is shared is a key determinant of economic and social justice. Equity in taxation has always been one of the hallmarks of a free and democratic society and the tax policies of the federal government play a key role in managing the economy and helping to attain full employment, social progress and improved living standards.

We firmly believe that these two basic demands on the tax structure—to share the cost of government equitably and to be an effective tool for promoting balanced economic growth—are closely and directly interrelated.

Because of the nation's current economic crisis, the prospects for the next several years, and the great need for essential public investments to build and strengthen the nation, many demands will be placed on the tax structure. So long as the gross tax injustices remain, the nation's ability to meet these demands will be severely and unnecessarily limited.

We are here to urge enactment of additional steps toward tax justice—within the agenda set forth by the committee.

We feel that such a program should include:

● Loophole closing reforms which could raise approximately $20 billion in badly needed federal revenue.

● A continuation of individual income tax withholding at rates now in effect, eliminating any increases in 1976.

We want to comment on the issue of capital formation which is a major topic on the committee's agenda.

We have heard a great deal over the past year or so about this issue. Secretary Simon claims that the nation has a developing shortage in investment capital that is about to become severe. So he proposes to reduce personal consumption and increase business investment in plants and machines. In sum, he says, the way to increase capital investment is to give more to big corporations and the rich.

That's the old, discredited, trickle-down doctrine of the 1890s and 1920s.

The Administration and many business spokesmen are advocating a massive shift in the ways in which the American economic pie is to be divided. Give those at the bottom less, squeeze those in the middle even harder. Give those at the top—especially the corporations—more tax shelters, more loopholes, more opportunities for profit.

THIS SCARE TALK of supposedly inadequate levels of business investment and the need to reduce consumption is not based on facts. In the dozen years from 1962 to 1974, business outlays for plants and machines came to a total of nearly $1.2 trillion, despite a money-crunch mini-recession in 1967, two full-blown recessions since then and the highest interest rates since the Civil War. Total private investment, which includes residential structures and business inventories as well as plants and machines, came to a total of almost $1.7 trillion.

Today, business investment is weak and declining because the economy is weak. There is a large amount of idle productive capacity, excessive inventories and low levels of sales. Business investment will pick up when, and not until, sales rise enough to boost industry's operating rate substantially and to convince business executives that the expanded output of new plants and machines can be sold profitably.

85-Decibel Limit:

Labor-Backed Noise Standard Effective in Other Countries

FEDERAL STANDARDS for workplace noise should set levels that don't require ear plugs or other devices that "render workers stone deaf" while on the job to protect them from physical or emotional injury, AFL-CIO Economist George Taylor declared in a network radio interview.

Taylor said the 90-decibel level the Occupational Safety & Health Administration is pushing for a permanent noise standard is dangerously high. With that kind of noise in the workplace, he said, twice as many workers would suffer hearing impairment over the course of their lives than at the 85-decibel level the AFL-CIO urges as an "interim standard" while technological development goes forward toward an even safer 75-decibel noise exposure level.

At least half a dozen countries have already set an 85-decibel workplace noise limit, he said, stressing that "the United States is not, by any means, pioneering in this." Taylor appeared on the AFL-CIO program Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual radio network.

Taylor, who is executive secretary of the AFL-CIO standing committee on Occupational Health & Safety, renewed the long-standing call for a "policy and program that clearly demonstrates that the administrator of the act believes in it and wants to make it work." He said that very little of the on-the-job health and safety protection that Congress shaped into the Occupational Safety & Health Act nearly five years ago has been put into effect. Limited funding and a less-than-full commitment by Administration officials have hampered every effort of the labor movement and others to put the law to work, he said.

He said that an enormous job lies ahead, pointing out that 25,000 materials used in industry are listed as toxic—"of which 1,400 are known causes of cancer"—but the National Institute on Occupational Safety & Health is able to "develop health effects criteria" on only about 25 of those materials each year.

Taylor was questioned by Vickie Cahan of the Bureau of National Affairs and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE MOUNTING TOLL of discouraged unemployed—workers who lose jobs, can't find new ones, stop looking and thus drop out of the government's official unemployment figures—is larger than the Labor Dept. reports it is.

Also, women, blacks and youths make up a higher proportion of the discouraged unemployed than they do among the officially recorded jobless—even though these groups already have the highest jobless rates among separate categories reported on monthly by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Those are conclusions drawn from a report, "Unemployment and Job Discouragement," recently issued by the Urban Institute, a Washington-based nonprofit research organization.

The discouraged jobless are not recorded in the government's monthly report on the employment situation because it is based on persons in the labor force, which includes only those unemployed who are searching for work.

The Labor Dept. does, however, attempt to collect data on the unemployed dropouts from the labor force on a three-month basis. It has tabbed discouraged unemployment at an all-time high of 1.2 million for the second quarter of 1975, up by 560,000 over the past nine months.

The institute's report indicates that the number of persons who want jobs but have given up looking is considerably higher than that even though its emphasis is on what the discouraged-unemployment picture will be like in the future.

The institute estimates that there will be more than 1.5 million discouraged unemployed persons in the United States throughout 1976 even if the officially listed unemployment drops to 7.5 million from its all-time high of 8.5 million in June.

In terms of unemployment rates, the report finds that the 7.9 percent rate anticipated for next year by the Ford Administration would amount to a 9.4 percent rate if discouraged workers were to be counted.

On the basis of 8.5 million unemployed, economists believe that there are at least an additional 2 million people who want and need jobs but are discouraged from looking. The institute's figures would put it in line with that judgment.

WHY DO ECONOMISTS believe that discouraged unemployment is higher than the Labor Dept. reports?

For one thing, they contend that the government's data-collecting is inadequate because the survey does not sufficiently get into the city ghettos where actual unemployment is at its highest.

One economist said "we doubt that questioning to determine the extent of discouraged unemployment really brings out a valid count." He explained: "During a recession when people know jobs are not available, they are inclined to say they're not interested in getting one. In an expanding economy, they are much more likely to say they want employment."

Finally, economists point out that thousands of young people who seek jobs and don't find them return to school, or at least take some type of educational course. "They are youths who want a job but are not counted even among the discouraged unemployed."

The issue of discouraged unemployment is important because it must be in focus if the country is to have a meaningful measurement of joblessness. The public must understand that today's "true" unemployment rate undoubtedly exceeds 10 percent.

The major issue continues to be the reaction of the Ford Administration and many members of Congress to the plight of the unemployed and their claim that inflation is of greater concern than unemployment.

As Walter Heller, former economic adviser to President Kennedy, has emphasized, "there's a yawning chasm" of more than $200 billion a year between what the U.S. economy is producing and what it could and should be producing to close the gap and to create jobs for all of the unemployed.

EAR PLUGS or other devices to "render you stone deaf" are no substitute for safe noise levels in the nation's workplaces, AFL-CIO Economist George Taylor, center, who is executive secretary of the AFL-CIO standing committee on Occupational Health & Safety, said on Labor News Conference.

COLORADO LT. GOV. GEORGE BROWN told delegates to The Newspaper Guild's 42nd convention in Denver that lasting solutions to the nation's problems require more than "a one-way kind of communication . . . that is conducted without any effort for understanding." Brown was a member of the Denver Newspaper Guild during 15 years with the staff of the Denver Post. He was in the state senate 20 years before being elected to his present post last year. Others, from left, are TNG President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., former astronaut Wally Schirra, TNG Chairperson Barney Peterson (background), and John Mrozek, president of the Denver Area AFL-CIO.

In Convention Action:

Unity Goals Backed By Newspaper Guild

Denver, Colo.—Delegates to The Newspaper Guild's 42nd annual convention here called upon the union's officers to "move with all prudent speed toward eventual merger" with the Typographical Union.

At the same time they urged "continuation of TNG efforts to establish closer working relationships among all unions in shops where there are Guild members."

The delegates adopted the stand after hearing TNG President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., and ITU President A. Sandy Bevis report on a series of steps toward unity in addresses to the convention's opening sessions.

The convention said that "as much information as possible" on the prospects for merger of TNG, the ITU "and other major unions in the newspaper and broadcasting industries" should be provided "as quickly as possible to the general membership so the most intelligent appraisal of any possible merger can be made."

Citing what it labelled "the sluggish procedures" of the National Labor Relations Board in representation proceedings and unfair practice charges against employers, the convention also called for Congress to fashion suitable remedies.

It urged "particularly careful study" of pre-hearing elections—elections conducted quickly after petitions are filed, with decision on disputed employes left to be settled afterwards.

It also called for a "telescoping of the entire drawn-out NLRB election procedure, reducing the time that hearings are allowed to drone on, cutting the period for legal briefs and eliminating the board's review of regional directors' decisions except in unusual circumstances."

In another action, the convention pointed to what it called a "leadership vacuum" in the United States—"a President unwilling or unable to act in the face of economic crisis, a Congress that, despite the strengthening of its progressive wing . . . is unable to overcome the dead weight of the Presidency."

The delegates called on the Guild and other unions to "act and act effectively in the political arena" to seek to "reverse this dismal trend."

In a related action, however, the convention cautioned against "aligning the Guild officially with a major political party" or "fraction or 'rump' group" directly or indirectly, and instructed the Guild executive board to "withdraw its authorization of the TNG president's participation in the Democratic Conference," a group seeking to play a role in selection of the Democratic presidential nominee in 1976. The action came on a 204-198 rollcall vote.

At the same time, the convention rejected an effort to put to referendum a question on endorsement of a U.S. presidential candidate in 1976. An effort for a rollcall on the matter failed for insufficient seconds.

Perlik and Sec.-Treas. Robert M. Crocker were re-elected without opposition as were Regional Vice Presidents Warren E. Howard (the South), Hugh H. Harrison (the western U.S.), and Roger L. Stonebanks (western Canada).

Diane M. Woodstock of Madison was elected vice president representing the Midwest and Betsy Wade for the region that is New York City. Neither had opposition.

There will be referendum elections in mid-September for chairperson, where incumbent Barney Peterson is being challenged by Phillip M. Kadis of Washington; for at-large vice presidents, where seven are running for six seats, and for two regional vice presidencies—eastern U.S. and eastern Canada.

In a series of other actions, convention delegates also:

- Called for study of establishment of an industrywide pension plan for workers in Guild jurisdiction to provide portability for those changing jobs from one Guild-covered employer to another.
- Increased TNG's graduated, dependency-based strike-lockout benefits schedule by $10 a week across the board to $45 a week for a member with no dependents, at the low end of the schedule, and to $85 a week in a long strike for a member with five dependents, at the top.
- Condemned as "unrealistic and discriminatory" proposals by Seymour Wenner, chief administrative law judge for the U.S. Postal Rate Commission, which would restructure the entire postal rate system and significantly boost postal costs of labor as well as commercial publications.
- Called for "quick action" by the Senate to extend and expand the Voting Rights Act, calling it a "Magna Carta for U.S. minorities."
- Urged adoption of the Kennedy-Corman Health Security bill by "majorities substantial enough to discourage any veto by the Pesident.
- Endorsed International Women's Year and called on the U.S. and Canadian governments to implement the United Nations' plan to advance the status of women.
- Reaffirmed Guild support of the United Farm Workers' efforts "to win justice and decent working conditions for the American worker."
- Rejected, for the second year in a row, a proposal for biennial, rather than annual, conventions.

Quarterly BLS Report Pinpoints Dramatic Rise in Unemployment

The severity of the worst recession since the 1930s was underscored in a Labor Dept. report on overall trends in the nation's labor force showing unemployment dramatically increased during the second quarter of 1975.

Joblessness rose by 540,000 to 8,203,000 in the April-June period, and was 3.5 million above the year-earlier level, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The sharp annual increase "was disproportionately concentrated among adult men" who in the second quarter represented 44 percent of the jobless, up from 37 percent a year earlier, BLS noted.

At 8.9 percent, the average jobless rate for the quarter was six-tenths of 1 percent above the first-quarter mark, but 2.3 percent higher than the fourth-quarter 1974 average.

The average duration of unemployment rose to 13.9 weeks, the longest in more than a decade, BLS said. A year earlier the average was 9.7 weeks. The increase reflects the extreme difficulties laid-off workers have experienced in finding new jobs.

About 14 percent of the jobless, or more than 1 million workers, had been out of a job for more than six months, and an additional 19 percent had been unemployed between 15 and 26 weeks.

Other highlights of the second-quarter data:

- The number of discouraged workers—those who were not looking for jobs because they thought none was available for them—averaged nearly 1.2 million in the April-June period, about the same as in the previous quarter. Since the third quarter of 1974, the number of discouraged workers has increased by 530,000.
- The jobless rate for male family heads rose from 4.7 to 5.5 percent over the quarter, while the rate for female family heads was unchanged at 9.7 percent.
- Joblessness was up for every major worker group, including whites, blacks and persons of Spanish origin; residents of poverty and nonpoverty areas, and veterans and nonveterans.
- Employment, at 84,311,000 was up a bit following two quarters of sharp decline. The over-the-quarter rise was 165,000 but the total employment level still was nearly 2 million less than that for the third quarter of last year.

At 5.5 percent, the jobless rate for male family heads was nearly two and one-half times higher than it had been the previous year, BLS noted. The rate for whites moved from 7.6 to 8.2 percent over the quarter while the rate for blacks edged up from 13.7 to 14.3 percent.

Blacks, though comprising but 11.3 percent of the nation's labor force, constituted 18.2 percent of the unemployed and an even higher proportion—27.8 percent—of the discouraged workers, BLS observed.

For workers of Spanish origin, the jobless rate was 12.9 percent in the second quarter, substantially above their year-earlier rate of 7.7 percent. The Spanish jobless rate was below the rate for black workers—15.1 percent—but above that for whites, 8 percent.

Job Losses Spur Claims For Trade Act Benefits

Nearly 1,500 workers in five states were recently certified by the Labor Dept. as eligible to apply for trade adjustment assistance as a result of efforts by their unions.

The largest number in the group are 700 members of the Steelworkers formerly employed by the Anaconda Co. in Perth Amboy, N.J. The union petitioned for the aid last April on the ground that increased imports of refined copper led to their unemployment.

Other workers who stand to benefit from the assistance include 350 workers at the Brown Shoe Co. plant in Salem, Ill., another 275 shoe workers at the Florsheim Shoe Co. plant in Palmyra, Mo., and 150 more shoe workers at the Herbert Levine, Inc. plant in New York City. Their union, the United Shoe Workers, requested the aid claiming increased imports of women's footwear put them out of work.

Fifteen employes of the General Electric plant in Louisville, Ky., also have been certified eligible. Members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, they became unemployed as a result of increased imports of harnesses for dishwashers formerly produced at the GE plant.

Under the Trade Act of 1974, workers who believe they have been or will become unemployed due to increased imports may petition the Secretary of Labor for certification of eligibility to apply for adjustment assistance.

The assistance may include cash trade readjustment allowances, training, testing, counseling, job placement, job search grants and relocation allowances.

The readjustment allowances amount to 70 percent of a worker's average weekly wage—not to exceed the national average weekly manufacutring wage—for up to 52 weeks. Workers may receive up to 26 additional weeks of allowances to complete approved training.

Workers aged 60 or older when separated from their last job may receive up to 26 additional weeks of allowances.

Crafts to Assist Minority Youths

Building & Construction Trades Councils in Alaska and California received Labor Dept. contracts to prepare 171 minority youths for apprenticeships.

A federal grant of $144,807 will go to the Valley Area Construction Opportunity Program of Sacramento to train 121 persons in the Sacramento, Stockton, Marysville-Yuba City, Modesto and Fresno areas of California. The trades councils in those areas participate in the program.

The training contract of $125,998 for the Anchorage and Fairbanks areas of Alaska will go to the Anchorage Building & Construction Trades Council to prepare 50 persons for apprenticeships.

Fund Drive Hit By McClennan As Anti-Union

A fund solicitation letter from an organization called Americans Against Union Control of Government is merely a "slick" scheme to finance an anti-union lobbying effort, Fire Fighters President William H. McClennan warned.

McClennan noted in an editorial in the union's magazine that the organization's money-raising "pitch" is to frighten people into thinking that public employe unions are a threat because they are trying to promote "a labor dictatorship" over government.

Like the "right-to-work" groups it emulates, he said, the Americans Against organization pretends it really isn't anti-labor.

McClennan, who is president of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., noted that the three members of Congress listed on the letterhead of the fund solicitation had a COPE record through the 93rd Congress of only six "right" votes by labor's standards and 56 "wrong" votes. They are Sen. Jesse A. Helms (R-N.C.) and Representatives Steven D. Symms (R-Ida.) and David C. Treen (R-La.).

Food Stamp Program Omits Millions of Eligible Families

By helping some 20 million Americans with their grocery bills, the food stamp program has become one of the nation's most important social benefits. It can be particularly helpful to low-income workers and the newly unemployed.

But the program is only doing half a job because it's missing about as many eligible Americans as it's serving, writes Robert Greenstein in the AFL-CIO magazine, the Federationist. Greenstein is editor of CNI Weekly Report, published with labor support by the Community Nutrition Institute in Washington, D.C.

Greenstein cites enough gaps in the $5 billion a year federal-state program to conclude "the food stamp program is not doing very well." He blames the high price of food stamps, the lack of accurate information about them, the procedural maze involved in applying for them and poor services in some local areas.

But Greenstein also says that misconceptions contribute to perhaps 5 million eligible families remaining outside the program. Those families contain about 25 to 30 million Americans — or slightly more than are being served.

"Many factors contribute to this lack of participation," he says, "but one of the major reasons is that large numbers of working poor and near-poor families simply do not know they are eligible. The impression that food stamps are primarily for people on welfare remains widespread in many areas."

Greenstein emphasizes that the basic design of the program helps working families, because they're the ones who can claim the deductions used to compute eligibility.

Eligibility starts with an assets test, but a house, automobile, life insurance and household and personal effects don't count against the $1,500 assets limit, which applies to savings and checking accounts, stocks and bonds.

And having a household member who is aged 60 or more may raise the assets limit to $3,000, he notes.

If a family is eligible in terms of its assets, Greenstein says, it then must have cooking facilities and meet the income requirements.

This is where the deductibles come into play, much like the computation of tax liability. For instance, examples accompanying Greenstein's article show that a family headed by someone who makes $4 an hour for a 35-hour workweek might have deductions that reduce a $606 monthly income to $400—and be eligible for food stamps if there are four in the family.

Also, a family with $511 monthly income from unemployment benefits may have its income reduced to $311 by deductions, and a retired couple may have its $300 monthly social security benefit reduced to $227. The principal deductions are taxes, work-related expenses (including union dues), tuition, child care, medical costs and a portion of shelter costs, which include utilities as well as rent or mortgage payment.

Greenstein points out that the family can be eligible at seemingly high monthly income levels, depending on the number of dependents. With eight in the household, a family can be eligible with an income as high as $926 a month after deductions.

"The stamps are not free. They are purchased for less than they are worth," Greenstein says. And the amount paid is dictated by the income and household size.

The allotment for a family of four, for instance, is $162 in monthly food stamps — but the amount the family pays for that $162 in stamps varies widely according to its income.

With a net income of $75 a month or less, the family pays $16 for the stamps. With $540 net income, the stamps cost $138—but that's still a food stamp benefit of $24 a month.

Greenstein also blames the lack of utilization of the program on government's failure to conduct outreach campaigns—which are required by law.

"In 1971, Congress enacted a law requiring food stamp outreach efforts, but the U.S. Dept. of Agriculture and most states have studiously ignored this law," Greenstein charges.

"New Jersey last year brought thousands of non-welfare households into the food stamp program in the period of several months," Greenstein notes in an example of outreach. "New Jersey produced flyers on food stamps that were stuffed in grocery bags at food stores and ran TV and radio advertisements on food stamps.

"The flyers and the spots all gave the number of a toll-free telephone hotline set up to provide food stamp information," Greenstein writes. "The hotline answered over 18,000 calls in three months. About 47,000 non-welfare persons were added to the program, reflecting both the increase in unemployment and the success of the campaign."

Greenstein thinks the lack of outreach activity is about to be corrected because of a federal court order issued in October 1974 in Minneapolis. Judge Miles W. Lord ruled that the Agriculture Dept. had violated the 1971 law and ordered all states to have new outreach programs in effect by Aug. 1, 1975.

"Under Judge Lord's order, states will have to provide interested organizations with outreach materials on food stamps that can be published in newsletters, reproduced as flyers, or used in a wide variety of other fashions," Greenstein notes. "This information can play a role in informing families of their eligibility and their rights under the food stamp program."

But Greenstein feels that the new efforts to be undertaken by the states, "will not provide all the outreach work that is needed to locate eligible households and bring them into the program." He says "most of the outreach work needed can be performed only by organizations that have direct contact with those who are eligible—organizations like churches, child care programs, senior citizens' groups and unions."

Similarly, Greenstein notes the impact local organizations can have on straightening up the local administration of the food stamp program. He cites such horrors as the newly unemployed lining up at midnight each night at a Phoenix office for the 9:30 a.m. office opening, with the few who did get in told to come back for appointments with a food stamp eligibility worker "weeks or even a few months later."

Some of this has been alleviated, Greenstein says, by congressional action in June requiring immediate processing of applications and the issuance of food stamps to those who appear eligible, pending completion of the processing work that normally takes about 30 days.

"In late 1975 or early 1976, Congress will re-examine the entire workings of the food stamp program and consider major changes in the program," Greenstein says.

Among bills introduced in the Senate are measures that would lower the price of food stamps, increase the size of food stamp benefits, require more outreach and require all post offices to sell food stamps.

"But meanwhile, the Ford Administration is considering proposals that would replace the present series of income deductions with a mandatory standard deduction that would eliminate some working families from the food stamp program and require many other working families to pay more for their stamps," Greenstein says.

In addition, Greenstein says labor and liberal forces are now fighting harsh legislation introduced by Sen. James L. Buckley (R-N.Y.). It would cut as many as 10 million persons—including most low-income working families—out of the food stamp program.

Senate Panel Approves Bill on Public Works

The Senate Public Works Committee approved a pared-down version of a House-passed bill that was high on the AFL-CIO's action program to put America back to work.

As sent to the Senate floor, the bill would authorize $2 billion for two job-creating programs and $125 million for business development loans and guarantees.

Half of the job-creating funds—$1 billion—would be authorized for labor-intensive public works projects that state and local governments could get under way within 90 days after receiving federal approval.

Top priority would be given to areas where unemployment exceeded the national average.

The House on May 20 had voted 313-86 approval for a substantially larger program carrying a $5 billion authorization and designed to finance 125,000 construction site jobs and an equal number of off-site jobs.

The Senate bill, however, also would extend through fiscal year 1976 a Job Opportunities Program launched last December and administered by the Economic Development Administration. This provides funds for various federal programs that can put unemployed persons to work on useful projects, such as forest conservation and planting.

To date, $500 million has been appropriated for the program and the Senate committee bill would authorize up to $1 billion more.

If the Senate should approve the measure, a conference committee would have the job of reconciling the differing House and Senate bills. Whatever the outcome, the money would still have to be appropriated in separate legislation before it could be spent.

The Administration had threatened to veto the $5 billion House bill, even though a substantial number of Republicans had joined nearly all House Democrats in voting for it.

Johnson Confirmed For Illinois Post

Springfield, Ill.—Donald A. Johnson, a member of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, has been confirmed by the Illinois Senate as the state's director of labor.

Johnson, 40, was appointed to the post by Gov. Daniel Walker. He is a former president of the Quincy Building Trades Council.

He succeeds Kenneth W. Holland in the post. Holland, a member of the Machinists, was named earlier this year to head the state's Dept. on Aging.

SEIU Adds 13th Local Of Doctors

A group of New York doctors is the newest local union of practicing physicians to become chartered by the Service Employees.

Local 708, representing between 300 and 400 physicians in New York City and Long Island, is the 13th doctors' local to affiliate with SEIU since the Washington-based union began chartering physicians' locals in early 1972.

Dr. Leo A. Green, a spokesman for the new local, said that through their affiliation with SEIU, the doctors hope to combat what they view as their present-day role—that of "a form filler-outer and an insurance payments setter-upper."

At a charter ceremony, SEIU Organizing Director John Geagan told the newly-formed local that "unions mean collective strength and collective bargaining."

Fair-Share Tax System:

Aid to Cities, States Pressed as Urgent

Cities and states need revenue from a fair-share tax system to survive the current recession-inflation crisis, President Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employees declared.

Wurf told a National Press Club audience that there is blame to be shared for the plight of the cities, but the solution isn't to slash public services that make a city livable.

Both city and state governments, he said, are handicapped in obtaining adequate revenue by reliance on unfair sales and property taxes "which hit hardest at those least able to pay."

He spoke of the exodus of affluent persons who make their living in the city to wealthy suburbs that are walled off from inner city problems by restrictive zoning "that all new houses must be built on lots the size of small parks."

Wurf said the federal tax structure needs reform to close loopholes and halt the "unjustifiable rip-offs" that allow giant corporations to escape paying their share of taxes. But it remains "much more progressive than state and local tax systems."

He saw an urgent need for the emergency program of federal aid to cities with the highest unemployment that has been proposed by Senators Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.), Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) and others.

While corruption and mismanagement contribute to the problems of cities and states, Wurf saw the cutback in essential services as the greatest threat to the survival of the nation's major cities.

"A city begins to die when people resign themselves to twice-a-month garbage collection," he said, "to driving on bumpier roads and walking down littered streets, and to living with libraries closed on weekends or parks without concerts and recreation programs.

"A city dies a little more when a public health nurse makes her rounds for the last time because she's lost her job," he added, "when schools close during the summer and become little more than custodial institutions during the rest of the year, and when the city shuts down hospitals and padlocks police and fire stations."

Wurf listed as cities "that may die this year" because of cutbacks of services Detroit, Buffalo, Cleveland, Baltimore, Boston, Newark, Bridgeport, Atlanta, Memphis, Wilmington—and New York, "a special case."

New York City's problems are in part the result of poor planning, but much of the budget pressure has come "from the federal government's failure to assume responsibility for financing health and education" and the "holdup" by the banks which forced the city's cost of borrowing money "to a usurious and tax-exempt 9.5 percent."

To bring a greater measure of fairness to financing the needs of the cities, Wurf proposed:

- Keying increased federal aid to the states to the willingness of states to adopt progressive income taxes.
- Providing a federal subsidy to state and local bond issues instead of the present tax-exempt status and making the bonds available in smaller denominations so that middle-income investors could afford them.
- Making property taxes fairer by setting them on a statewide basis, with a "circuit breaker" system that would limit the amount of property tax that a middle class or poor family would have to pay as a percentage of its income.
- Modification of sales taxes to exclude such items as food and medicine "and allowing the less affluent to deduct their sales tax payments from their state income taxes."

FOOD SUPPLIES for the needy in Phoenix, Ariz., are collected by members of the Postal Workers and Letter Carriers to replenish a dwindling inventory at four area food banks and two charity dining rooms. Members of the two unions collected more than 15 tons of food items during their routine mail pickup and delivery operations.

Unions Near Deadline On Postal Contracts

nation's capital at the same time. The meetings were being held after the AFL-CIO News went to press.

The fourth union involved in the coordinated bargaining is the unaffiliated National Rural Letter Carriers Association. Together, the four unions represent about 600,000 postal employes.

While strikes are prohibited under the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970, the unions indicated they would pursue a "no contract, no work" policy. APWU, for example, is bound by a convention mandate to this effect, unanimously approved by delegates last year.

The current two-year contract expires on Monday, July 21, at one minute past midnight. The main obstacles to renewal of the agreement were wages and a no-layoff guarantee agreed to for the first time two years ago.

The breakthrough job security clause provides that the postal service must offer an employe another position within a 100-mile radius of his job if laid off for any reason.

Bernard Cushman, the chief negotiator for the unions, said progress in the intensive negotiations was difficult to judge. The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service entered the talks on July 10 at President Ford's request after negotiations appeared to reach a stalemate.

An ad hoc Postal Coordinated Bargaining Committee sought identical general wage increases across the board for all four unions. Other areas of bargaining included fringe benefits, the no-layoff clause, health and safety, subcontracting, technological change and mechanization of postal operations. Craft negotiations on special interest matters of the individual unions also were proceeding.

In summoning the 43 members of the APWU national executive committee to Washington, Filbey said he was requesting the meeting "because of the critical state of the negotiations." He urged all APWU locals to keep their members on the job until after the committee had concluded its meeting.

The current negotiations constitute the third round since passage of the 1970 Postal Reorganization Act.

Postmaster Gen. Benjamin F. Bailar said in a nationally televised interview on July 13 he hoped a strike could be averted, but that USPS was taking steps to move as much mail as possible with non-union personnel, if necessary.

APWU represents the largest number of postal workers, about 280,000. The Letter Carriers represent about 200,000, and the Mail Handlers, upwards of 50,000.

Site Picketing Law Termed 'Past Due'

tractors and employer organizations.

Hundreds of contractors from various parts of the nation moved on Capitol Hill wearing "Ban the Boycott" buttons—part of a campaign to portray the jobsite picketing bill as encouraging "secondary boycotts" of "innocent" employers.

Full-page newspaper advertisements carried the same anti-union message.

Biemiller stressed in his testimony that the prime contractor and the subcontractors he hires to work on the same construction site on the same job are not arms-length "neutrals" in a labor dispute.

He noted also that the Supreme Court has taken different views of picketing rights by industrial and building craft unions— denying the right to picket a subcontractor at a multiemployer construction site in a key 1951 decision, but 10 years later upholding the right of an industrial union to extend its picket lines during a strike to an entrance used by employes of a construction contractor working at the plant.

Biemiller scoffed at employer testimony that passage of the site picketing bill would add to the "enormous power" of the construction unions.

He noted that an employer spokesman had testified that the amount of construction done by non-union firms has doubled in the last 15 years.

"In large part," Biemiller suggested, "this has come about because the building trades have had both hands tied behind their backs" by the prohibition on construction site picketing.

As for employer contentions that the legislation would increase costs, Biemiller noted that Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop, an authority in construction industry labor-management relations, has testified that it would not affect the wage sructure in the indusry.

Congress Challenges Ford's Move To Eliminate Price Controls on Oil

fuel costs would translate into higher prices for almost all of the products and services that go into the cost-of-living market basket.

Ford formally submitted his plan, to take effect after five days unless either the House of Senate rejected it. But there appeared no doubt that a resolution of disapproval would be passed before the deadline.

The law controlling petroleum prices is scheduled to expire Aug. 31. The Senate voted 62-29 for a six-month extension, and the House is expected to concur.

The President is now expected to sign the temporary extension, but the White House did not rule out the possibility of a veto.

Under the present law, the $5.25 price ceiling applies only to "old" oil—that is oil produced up to the 1972 volume.

Oil above that amount, largely from recently-drilled wells, is not presently controlled and currently sells for about $13 a barrel.

The bill before the House—which the AFL-CIO said should be passed without any "crippling amendments" — would put this "new" oil under a $7.50 a barrel price ceiling. In some situations, where the drilling expense is high, the price could go to $8.50. Thus, there would be an immediate rollback of oil prices. In future years, an "inflation" price increase of 8 percent a year would be allowed.

The "old" oil would gradually be allowed to move up to the price level of the "new" oil so that the differential would be eliminated by 1980.

Under the House Commerce Committee bill, gasoline consumption would be held to 1973-74 levels and the President would be given authority to achieve this — and a 2 percent reduction, if feasible—through allocation and other forms of controls.

Subject to congressional approval, the President would have a broad range of powers—to impose rationing and to act as the sole purchasing agent for all oil imported into the United States.

On the Senate vote to extend oil price controls until Mar. 1, 1976, 51 Democrats and 11 Republicans voted for the bill, while 26 Republicans and three Democrats opposed it.

Musicians Share $10 Million Fund

New York—An all-time high $10 million will be paid this year to 41,000 Musicians by the Phonograph Record Manufacturers Special Payment Fund.

AFM President Hal C. Davis said this year's disbursement tops last year's record high by $2 million. The fund is part of AFM collective bargaining agreements with recording companies. Payments by manufacturers are based on sales.

Stowe Heads Panel For Rail Mediation

The National Mediation Board, which seeks to resolve disputes in the railroad and airline industries, has elected David H. Stowe as its chairman for the fiscal year that started July 1.

Stowe, a one-time administrative assistant to former President Truman, has been on the board since 1970. The agency traditionally rotates the chairmanship each year, and was held by George S. Ives for the past 12 months.

President Ford recently announced his intention to reappoint Ives to another three-year term on the board.

Meany Gives Support To National Bible Week

AFI-CIO President George Meany will serve as one of several honorary co-chairmen of this year's National Bible Week, scheduled for Nov. 23-30.

Sponsored by the Laymen's National Bible Committee, National Bible Week is an annual observance that began in 1941. Its aim is to motivate Bible reading and study.

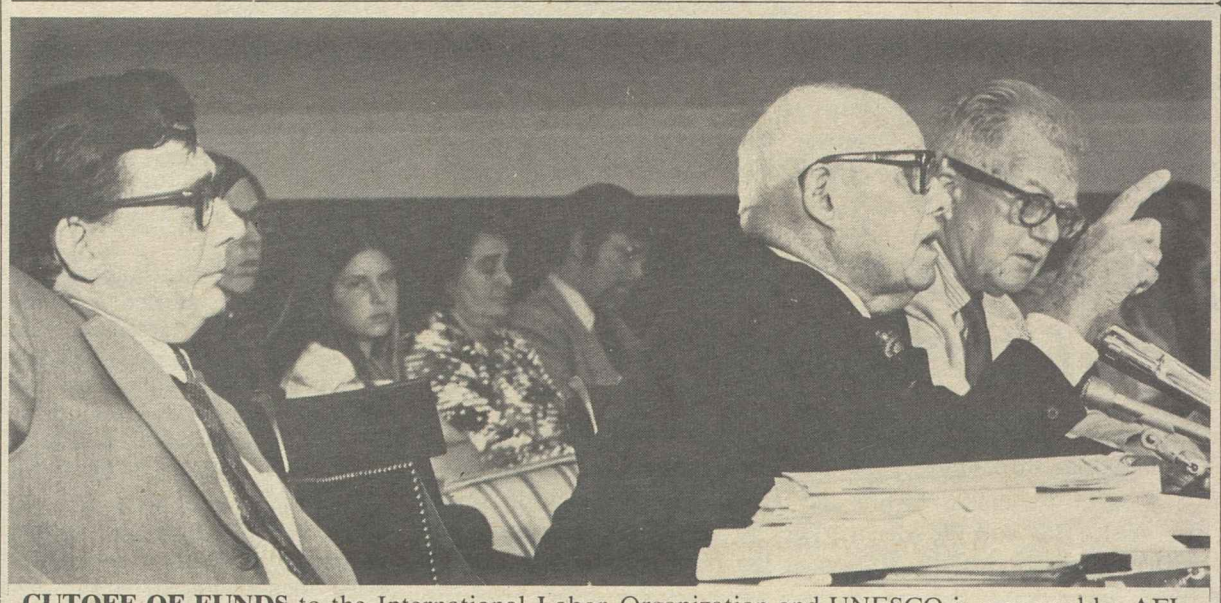
Meany Urges Fund Cutoff For 'Political' UN Bodies



CUTOFF OF FUNDS to the International Labor Organization and UNESCO is proposed by AFL-CIO President George Meany to the House International Relations Committee. He is flanked by Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, left, and Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller.

Sees ILO, UNESCO 'Perverted'

AFL-CIO President George Meany asked Congress to stop financing international programs and agencies that have been transformed into "instruments of political warfare" against the United States and Israel.

His targets, in testimony before the House International Relations Committee, were the International Labor Organization (ILO) and the United Nations Educational, Scientific & Cultural Organization (UNESCO).

Meany noted that both organizations were set up for humanitarian reasons and have done good work in the past, particularly the ILO. But in recent years, under the domination of the Communist-Arab bloc, the ILO and UNESCO "have been completely perverted," he charged.

Responding to a question, Meany said the United States should give the required two-year notice of intention to withdraw from both organizations. This would amount to setting a deadline for the ILO and UNESCO to "straighten out," he said.

Meany's formal testimony dealt with an indirect means of channeling U.S. funds into the two organizations—above the amount the United States pays in direct membership dues and assessments.

Included in the foreign aid bill, in appropriations for the U.S. Agency for International Development (AID), are funds for America's contribution to the United Nations Development Program. In recent years, the United States has contributed between 19 and 26 percent of the total UNDP budget, and a foreign aid authorization bill before the House committee pro-

Labor Hits Bid to End Oil Control

President Ford's plan to end price controls on oil produced in the United States is a prescription for "more inflation and more recession," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland charged.

Kirkland said the decontrol plan initially proposed by the President with the support of the big oil companies would add $30 billion a year to the prices Americans pay for goods and services by 1978—"more than $600 for every family of four."

Kirkland's statement was made before a House vote that narrowly defeated the oil pricing formula in the energy conservation bill that had been drafted by the House Commerce Committee.

The pricing formula, proposed initially by Rep. Bob Eckhardt (D-Tex.), would have pushed back the price of the decontrolled segment of U.S. oil production from its current level of about $13 a barrel to a ceiling of $7.50—still adequate for a substantial profit. Oil now controlled at the $5.25 level would be allowed to rise gradually to the $7.50 price level.

The AFL-CIO "strongly supports" that pricing provision, Kirkland declared.

Kirkland said America's workers "will not soon forget that it was the oil price hikes of the last two years that robbed their paychecks of buying power and plunged the country headlong into the worst recession since the 1930s."

Calling for rejection by Congress of all of the assorted decontrol plans that would "grossly" boost oil prices, Kirkland said decontrol would:

- Fix prices at the level set by a foreign cartel, "supported by the big oil companies and aided and abetted by the American government."
- Increase oil company profits "at the expense of the rest of American business and consumers, sapping the meager strength that exists for economic recovery."
- Make America's economy "even more dependent on the multinational oil companies."

The House was still considering the energy conservation bill as the AFL-CIO News went to press, and there were these developments:

- First, the House put aside its own bill to pass a resolution disapproving—and thus killing—President Ford's decontrol plan. The Food, Energy Pace CPI:

Real Earnings Slide As Prices Resurge

By James M. Shevis

Retail prices in June rose twice as fast as in the previous month, resulting in a further slide in workers' buying power, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Real spendable weekly earnings—take-home pay expressed in constant 1967 dollars—averaged $91.18 last month, largely reflecting a rise of eight-tenths of 1 percent over the month in the consumer price index, BLS said.

The dollar figure, which is calculated for a worker with three dependents, was 36 cents less than the May figure, 37 cents below the June 1974 average and 14 cents under the average for all of 1965.

The drop in real earnings came even at a time of reduced federal tax withholdings on workers' income. The decline in purchasing power over the month was four-tenths of 1 percent.

The June increase in the CPI was double the rise of four-tenths of 1 percent in May and the highest monthly jump in the cost of consumer goods and services since last December. The increase was the same both before and after adjustment for normal seasonal changes in some prices.

If prices were to continue to rise at the same rate as in June, consumers would face a 9.6 percent inflation rate in a year's time.

The June CPI rise was higher than the Ford Administration had expected, and was chiefly due to higher prices for food and energy. Also rising at a higher than usual pace were mortgage interest rates and used car prices.

The all-items CPI in June stood at 160.6 percent of its 1967 average, or 9.3 percent above its year-earlier level, BLS said.

Food prices alone climbed by a seasonally adjusted 1.5 percent last month, the steepest increase since a 1.6 percent surge last September and triple the May increase of five-tenths of 1 percent.

The cost of nonfood commodities rose five-tenths of 1 percent while charges for services went up seven-tenths of 1 percent.

In the nonfood commodities category, nearly half of the increase was due to higher gasoline prices.

House Nears Vote on Site Picketing Bill

The House began debate on a construction site picketing bill that the AFL-CIO and its building trades affiliates have sought for more than two decades.

By a 322-94 vote, the House approved the rule for taking up the bill. This was the first of a series of important votes on a major trade union issue.

The bill carries a 31-7 endorsement from the Education & Labor Committee as a long-needed remedy for a court ruling that treated a picket line at a construction site where various subcontractors are working on the same job as an illegal secondary boycott.

Employer groups want to keep it that way, and have launched a major compaign to sway Congress and to seek to tilt the Administration away from a presumed endorsement of the bill—even though it now includes several provisions inserted at the urging of Labor Sec.

Wages, Job Security Key to Postal Accord

A nationwide strike against the U.S. Postal Service was averted when four unions reached tentative agreement on new contracts providing increases in annual wages totalling $1,500 over a three-year period for about 600,000 workers, and retaining key job security protections.

The pacts, subject to membership ratification, replace two-year agreements with the USPS that expired at midnight, July 20. The new agreements were reached two hours after the old ones expired.

Postal strikes are prohibited under the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970 but the unions had indicated they would follow a "no contract, no work" policy adopted by their memberships. Involved in the coordinated bargaining were the Postal Workers, Letter Carriers, Mail Handlers—a division of the Laborers—and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers.

The "handshake" agreement must now be ratified by each union, a process expected to take about 30 days. Leaders of the unions, however, expressed confidence they would be approved.

"I feel our members will ratify by a substantial majority," Letter Carriers President James Rademacher said. APWU President Francis S. Filbey said that initial reaction from rank-and-file members across the nation was strongly favorable.

The settlement, reached with the aid of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, concluded 90

Voting Rights Extension Clears Senate Hurdles

With the help of two cloture votes that squelched a filibuster, the Senate neared passage of a bill extending and broadening the 1965 Voting Rights Act which opened the ballot box to millions of southern blacks.

The new legislation, like the bill the House passed in early June, broadens the law to make it easier for Spanish-speaking Americans and other "language minorities" to register and vote.

It also makes permanent a ban on the use of literacy tests in any state or locality. A temporary ban on literary tests had been added in 1970, when the law was last extended.

The present law expires on Aug. 6, when Congress will be in recess, and civil rights groups had strongly urged the Senate to adopt the House-passed bill intact to avoid any danger of a legislative snarl that would delay final action past the deadline.

Legal experts had warned that any interval between the expiration of the old law and the effective date of an extension could create prob-

PRESIDENT C. L. DENNIS, of the Railway & Airline Clerks, second from right, chats with other participants in recent rail talks which concluded with a new three-year agreement yielding major economic benefits for the union's members. Clockwise from Dennis are W. J. Usery, Jr., director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service; William H. Dempsey, chief negotiator for the railroads; George Ives of the National Mediation Board, and Ned Davis, BRAC counsel.

Major Benefits Gained:

3-Year Pact Solves Rail Clerks' Impasse

The Railway & Airline Clerks approved a new three-year agreement with the nation's major railroads, providing its members with major economic benefits.

BRAC President C. L. Dennis, announcing that the union's general chairmen had voted unanimously to ratify the agreement, described the settlement as "the best in the history of the American railroad industry."

Dennis said the new contract will raise wages and fringe benefits 43.8 percent over the term of the agreement. The figure assumes maximum allowances under the pact's cost-of-living provision.

Workers will receive an immediate 10 percent general wage boost retroactive to last Jan. 1. Other general wage increases amount to 31.1 cents an hour as of Oct. 1, 1975, 19.6 cents on Apr. 1, 1976, and 29.6 cents on July 1, 1977.

Settlement of the longstanding contract dispute averted a strike set for July 28. Agreement was reached July 18 at an unscheduled bargaining session called by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service and the National Mediation Board, which assisted in the talks.

The union had been free to strike since mid-June, but agreed to extend a 60-day cooling-off period that expired then for one more month.

The new agreement brings "long overdue and most equitable benefits to our people," Dennis noted. He said that, on a conservative basis, improvements under the contract will raise average wages from $11,818 a year to $16,582.

The total package breaks down to 40.3 percent in wage increases, 2 percent in health and welfare improvements, 1 percent for dental care, and five-tenths of 1 percent for an additional holiday on Christmas Eve.

The agreement also provides that vacation improvements, job stabilization, retraining and entry (apprenticeship) rates will be negotiated during the first year of the contract. If no agreement is reached during that time, a neutral will be brought in to resolve the differences.

The pact also includes procedures for changing the scope rule to bring more "excepted" employes under the BRAC banner. The procedures would bring 10 percent of the present 10,000 exempt positions within the union fold in the first 135 days of the agreement and the remaining 90 percent over the life of the contract.

Another key element in the settlement provides for continuation of the cost-of-living clause beyond the final period in the agreement so as to provide an additional payout on Jan. 1, 1978, up to a maximum of 23 cents an hour. It would be figured at the rate of 1 cent an hour for each rise of three-tenths of 1 percent in the government's consumer price index.

William H. Dempsey, chairman of the National Railway Labor Conference, the carriers' negotiating arm, said this 1978 COL adjustment would be made available to all other rail unions.

Dempsey described the settlement with the clerks as "reasonable" and "fair."

Dennis also expressed satisfaction over an agreement by railroad labor and management with key members of Congress on the provisions of a new railroad unemployment bill "which we hope will soon be passed."

"It will provide at last a decent cushion of compensation for those who lose their jobs on the railroads, or who become ill," he said.

Meanwhile, talks between the railroads and the four shopcraft unions that comprise the AFL-CIO Railway Employes' Dept., were still bogged down, with the department's executive council scheduled to meet July 28 in Chicago to consider future action.

The National Mediation Board proffered arbitration under provisions of the Railway Labor Act. And the National Railway Labor Conference which bargains for the carriers proposed a new negotiating session with the craft unions on July 29 in Washington.

If the new talks fail to produce an agreement and if the arbitration proffer is turned down, the way would be open for appointment of a Presidential emergency board to investigate the dispute.

The four shop unions involved are the Boilermakers-Blacksmiths, Carmen, Firemen & Oilers and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. A major stumbling block in the talks is the issue of contracting out rail shopmen's work.

A fifth rail union, the Yardmasters, also has yet to reach agreement with the carriers in this year's round of negotiations.

CONVENTION

The Seafarers convention will be held Sept. 2-5, 1975, in Washington, D.C.

Federal Appeals Court Rejects Undercutting of Seniority System

New Orleans—A federal district judge's decision that could have undermined union-negotiated seniority systems was overturned by a unanimous three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals here.

The case, which involves the issue of racial balance in layoffs and recalls, had been cited in a brief filed with the Supreme Court by the AFL-CIO and the Steelworkers as an example of preferential treatment that violates the intent of the equal opportunity section of the Civil Rights Act.

As the 5th Circuit appellate panel noted, none of the workers at the Continental Can Co. plant in Harvey, La., who would have been granted super-seniority had been discriminated against by the company. Past discrimination had ended before most of them were of working age.

By contrast, in the case before the Supreme Court, labor is supporting the effort of a group of black workers to have their seniority backdated to remedy the company's illegal discrimination in hiring practices.

The Steelworkers, which became the bargaining agent at the Bowman Transportation Co. in Louisiana through the merger of the previously unaffiliated District 50 union in 1972, is supporting the claim of the black workers for seniority to the date of their initial job applications with the company.

In that case, a 5th Circuit appellate panel upheld the workers' request for back pay to the date of their job applications and granted another group of workers transfer rights to more desirable jobs with companywide seniority. But it held that it did not have the power to award seniority prior to the date of actual employment.

The AFL-CIO, in a "friend of the court" role, joined with the Steelworkers in contending that the award of an earlier seniority date is proper and legal in this case.

An earlier seniority date is an appropriate remedy, the union brief contended, because it is a "make whole" solution which in effect puts the workers involved in the same relative position they would have held if there had been no illegal discrimination.

The brief urged the Supreme Court to uphold the seniority claim on that basic reasoning, rather than follow some other lines suggested as alternative legal paths by attorneys for the workers involved.

In their joint presentation to the Supreme Court, the AFL-CIO and the Steelworkers cited the legislative history of the Civil Rights Act to demonstrate these "two very clear objectives" of Congress:

- "To forbid discrimination and to make whole those who suffered discrimination.
- "Not to confer preferential rights upon minorities, either in the substantive or remedial provisions of the Act."

The brief also noted the trade union movement's very active support for the Civil Rights Act and especially for its fair employment provisions.

In the case where labor is supporting the seniority claims of the black workers, the brief notes that District 50 had sought to eliminate discriminatory seniority lines when it obtained bargaining rights in 1967, but the company had refused to agree and had continued to discriminate in hiring in defiance of the law.

Entirely different, the brief continues, is the contention that young minority and female workers "should be afforded special seniority protections against layoff, not because they themselves have been discriminated against, but because discrimination against others has produced a situation in which preferential protection against layoff is the only way to preserve racial or sexual balance in the workforce."

In the Continental Can Case, a layoff of half the workforce resulted in only employes who had been hired before 1952 keeping their jobs—a group that included only two blacks among the 152 employes. In 1971, when the layoffs began, there were about 50 blacks among the 400 workers.

The district court ordered recall of black workers with back pay to restore the racial balance that had existed before the layoffs and said future layoffs should preserve the ratio.

Speaking for the appellate court panel, Judge Paul H. Roney noted that such a solution would mean recalling some black workers who were not even of school age when white workers still on layoffs were first employed at the plant.

"Age, not race, is the principal reason that the plaintiffs in this case did not have sufficient seniority to withstand layoff," he held. "During the working life of these plaintiffs, there has been no history of discrimination, and none of them has suffered individual discrimination at the hands of the company."

Judge Roney added that recalling black workers before more senior white workers on the grounds that an earlier generation of blacks had been discriminated against would be to apply a preferential treatment based on race that is contrary to the equality envisioned in the Civil Rights Act.

Furniture Union Gains Won in 10-Week Strike

Sumter, S.C. — The Furniture Workers concluded a 10-week strike against Georgia-Pacific here with approval of a new three-year agreement providing significant gains in wages, benefits and working conditions for nearly 1,000 workers.

UFWA President Carl Scarbrough described the settlement as "a tremendous victory" for trade unionism and civil rights.

Wages were the chief issue involved in the dispute which erupted in a walkout on Apr. 25 after the firm failed to improve its position despite the efforts of federal and state mediators.

The new contract provides a series of wage increases ranging up to 75 cents an hour over the life of the agreement. That is more than triple the company's "final" offer last spring, Scarbrough noted.

Hourly wages at the Sumter plant were just pennies above the minimum wage under the old agreement. They ranged from $2.16 to $2.50—even for workers with more than 10 years of service. The workforce is predominantly black.

"This was the largest strike ever led by black trade unionists in the state of South Carolina," Scarbrough noted. The walkout and the negotiations were guided by UFWA's Southern vice president, LeRoy Clark, and Rep. Dean Culver, along with Local 273 Business Agent Herman Vaughn.

Besides wages, the right to dignity on the job was a key goal of union negotiators, Clark said.

"That is now assured with the provisions won in this settlement," he said. "No longer do workers have to get permission to go to the lavatory. Nor are they required to authorize the company to examine their private medical records when they are out sick."

Other highlights of the agreement include a greatly improved insurance program, a special increase in the night-shift differential, a first-time provision for three weeks of vacation, and addition of another paid holiday.

Clark noted that one of the most important gains was an increase in union membership. Even though South Carolina is a so-called right-to- work state in which union-shop agreements are outlawed, UFWA membership among Georgia-Pacific's Sumter workers has shot up to nearly 100 percent compared to around 60 percent before the strike, Clark said.

Clark expressed gratitude to the Carpenters, the Woodworkers and the AFL-CIO for their support during the walkout. "We got a big boost from the solidarity of the labor movement," he said.

The Carpenters represent units at several other G-P plants. The Woodworkers, who also represent employes of the company, agreed to respect the UFWA's 24-hour picket lines.

Convention Action:

Longshoremen Plan Boycott Of Grain Cargoes to Russia

By John R. Oravec

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Longshoremen will refuse to load U.S. and Canadian grain on ships bound for the Soviet Union unless there are assurances the shipments will not adversely affect the American public.

That ILA policy resolution was adopted unanimously with a standing roar of approval by the more than 500 delegates attending the union's 43rd convention here.

ILA President Thomas W. Gleason said the proposed boycott, to be carried out by the union's 132,000 members on U.S. and Canadian docks, would be coordinated with other AFL-CIO maritime trades unions.

The boycott resolution received the immediate endorsement of President Paul Hall of the Seafarers, who addressed the convention following its adoption.

In addition to expressing concern over the economic impact on the price of bread and baked goods and the added costs to taxpayers, Gleason cited the failure of Administration policy to guarantee that a fair share of the grain be transported in American-flag ships.

Despite White House promises that one-third of all the grain would be shipped on American bottoms, Gleason said at a news conference, U.S.-flag ships hauled only 11 percent of cargo from the previous Russian grain sale.

Gleason also questioned a statement of Agriculture Sec. Earl L. Butz that the new grain sale may affect American grain prices only nominally.

This "nominal increase" could mean the price of a loaf of bread going up to $1, Gleason warned.

The ILA resolution said in part:

"The American people have only recently recovered from the disastrous grain deals of 1972 in which the Soviet Union obtained American grain at bargain prices, subsidized by American credits and resulting in sharply increased prices in the American market.

"The Russian traders and the huge grain companies were thus enabled to derive undeserved advantages at the expense of the American farmer, the American consumer and the American taxpayer."

The resolution directs all ILA locals to honor the union policy established with the action and gives authority to Gleason to lift the proposed boycott "if the interests of the American public are adequately protected."

In an address at the opening of the ILA convention, AFL-CIO President George Meany said the sale of grain to the Soviet Union is the outgrowth of the "ill-conceived" Kissinger-Nixon-Brezhnev policy of detente.

"What it amounts to," Meany stressed, "is a series of unilateral concessions on the part of the United States of America to the Soviet Union."

He said that the one-way street of detente as it is presently conceived amounts to nothing more than appeasement, which proved to be an absolute failure in the past.

"This seems to be the philosophy, that the way to get along with the Soviet Union is to give and keep giving. Give them our money; give them our technical know-how; give them our machines, tools, everything."

In return, Meany said, America gets nothing—even in its efforts of trying to bring peace to Indochina and the Middle East.

"Detente means that the Soviet Union is cheating on the arms agreement, setting up missiles and naval bases to control the vital lifeline in the Indian Ocean, and all the while they receive from Good Old Uncle Sam technology, American know-how, 6 percent financing with American taxpayers' money, millions of tons of American wheat to make up for their own failures in the agricultural field."

Meany warned that the nation's present foreign policy is "a blueprint for disaster" that is undermining its commitments to NATO and its standing in other world organizations such as the United Nations, UNESCO and the International Labor Organization.

Meany said the labor movement could not buy the current international trade policy from an Administration that has already given the nation a 9 percent unemployment rate.

He said the American people must speak out in protest against phony detente.

"We in America are in favor of a real, genuine detente—a two-way street in which each side makes its maximum contribution to future world peace," Meany stressed.

In a report to the convention, Gleason said that international cooperation is essential if transport workers throughout the world are to achieve economic justice. He noted that cooperation with unions of other countries on the containerization issue has greatly benefited ILA members.

He also termed the ILA's 1974 master contract agreement, resolved without work stoppage, a major step forward for ILA members in wages, benefits and a guaranteed annual income.

Addressing delegates the day President Ford vetoed legislation that would have extended oil price controls and roll back other oil prices, Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) charged that Ford is worth a gusher a day in profits to the oil companies.

He said the worst recession since the post-war period and more inflation and unemployment are guaranteed because of Ford's economic and energy policies.

"He's got the country riding the pipeline to poverty," Jackson declared.

Other major speakers at the convention included Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop, Transportation Sec. William T. Coleman, Representatives Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.) and Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) and President Jesse Calhoon of the Marine Engineers.

Pilots Reach 3-Year Accord On Northwest

Minneapolis—The Air Line Pilots reached agreement on a new contract with Northwest Airlines that will provide some 1,500 pilots an average increase of 34 percent in wages and benefits over a three-year period.

Ratification by the union's Northwest master executive council is still necessary.

The pilots had been without a contract since July 1974, and were legally free to strike the airline on July 17.

Pay increases were to be made in three steps. After an immediate retroactive increase, other boosts were scheduled Jan. 1, 1976 and on Jan. 1, 1977.

High Unemployment Hits Record 129 Job Centers

The number of major job markets with "substantial" unemployment—6 percent or more—stands at 129, the highest since the Labor Dept. began its present system of classifying the nation's chief labor areas in 1955.

The increase resulted from the addition of Savannah, Ga., Louisville, Ky., and Roanoke, Va., to the list of major job centers with more than 6 percent joblessness and the removal of Madison, Wis.

The rise from 127 in April to 129 in June among the 150 chief areas of unemployment surveyed each month marked the third straight time that the figure was the highest in the past 20 years, the Labor Dept. said. The latest report combined May and June figures.

The new total is nearly three times the 45 areas on the list in June 1974. Substantial unemployment means the area has a seasonally adjusted jobless rate of 6 percent or more, with the rate expected to continue at that or a higher level for at least two more months.

Savannah's jobless rate rose because of job losses in the paper and allied products industry. In Roanoke, the majority of unemployed workers continued to be found in the textile, apparel and retail trade sectors. Recent cutbacks in construction and continuing layoffs in machinery resulted in Louisville's higher rate. Madison, which had been placed on the "substantial" unemployment list last March, went on the "moderate" list due primarily to employment increases in wholesale and retail trades and in the construction industry.

Public Employe Pacts End Strikes in 2 States

A total of 22,000 public employes in Pennsylvania and in Santa Clara County, Calif., ended separate two and one-half week strikes with ratification of new contracts, but 3,600 others employed by the city of Cleveland still remained off their jobs.

The Pennsylvania and California disputes involved locals of the Service Employees union, while the Cleveland walkout was carried out by members of the State, County & Municipal Employees.

The Pennsylvania strikes, involving SEIU Locals 688 and 675, began on July 1 following eight months of fruitless negotiations. Local 688 represents about 10,000 workers at state employment offices while Local 675 represents some 2,000 welfare workers.

The two locals accepted new two-year pacts that will raise the average annual wage from $11,360 to $12,648 over the term of the agreements. An initial immediate increase of 3.5 percent will be followed by a 2.5 percent boost in January 1976 and a 6 percent hike in July 1976.

The complicated Pennsylvania negotiations also produced an agreement from the state to add 8 cents to a health and welfare fund to enable the union to set up a dental plan.

The new contracts also include an improved grievance procedure, a health and safety clause to improve workplaces, greater job protection and a guarantee of no reprisals against first-level supervisors who honored the SEIU picket lines.

In California, some 10,000 Santa Clara County workers struck also on July 1 when their contracts expired. Involved were SEIU Locals 535, representing social workers, and 715, representing a broad spectrum of other county employes.

The two locals agreed to a settlement providing wage increases totaling 21 percent over a 2-year period. In the first year of the pact, all workers earning more than $10,000 a year receive a 7 percent pay boost. Workers who earn less will receive an additional $70.

The second-year wage boost provides for a 4 percent general increase, plus a cost-of-living adjustment.

The Santa Clara agreement also gives workers three additional personal leave days each year, increased funding for a health and dental plan, and an improved uniform allowance.

The Cleveland strike involves technical, clerical and blue-collar workers—members of AFSCME Local 100—who had been working without a contract since last Dec. 31. They walked off their jobs July 21, when negotiations broke down.

A federal mediator attempted to arrange another bargaining session between the union and Cleveland Mayor Ralph Perk but none had been scheduled by midweek.

Arnold Zander Dies, Pioneer In AFSCME

Green Bay, Wis.—Arnold S. Zander, a founder and the first president of the State, County & Municipal Employees, died at his home here on July 17. He was 74.

A native of Two Rivers, Wis., who received his higher education at the University of Wisconsin, Zander was one of a handful of Wisconsin state employes who began organizing fellow workers.

In 1932, they founded a small organization to fight for preservation of the state's civil service system against attempts to reinstate political patronage in state service.

The group, created as the Wisconsin State Administrative, Clerical, Fiscal & Technical Employees Association, evolved into a department of the Government Employees in 1935.

A year later, the organization was chartered as AFSCME by the AFL, and Zander served as its president through 1964 when he was succeeded by Jerry Wurf.

Wurf paid tribute to Zander as "a man who set in motion a force which has changed the very nature of public employment and has added a measure of dignity to employer-employe relationships in state and local government."

A Sensible Oil Policy

THE AFL-CIO STRONGLY SUPPORTS the oil pricing provisions in the bill sponsored by Rep. Bob Eckhardt and urges the House to reject all efforts to decontrol oil prices or any of the variations which would grossly increase oil prices.

The Ford Administration and the oil companies want to remove all oil price controls over the next 30 months—a plan destined to cause havoc with the economy. It is a plan for inflation and recession, costing every American family hundreds of dollars every year plus the loss of untold thousands of jobs.

The dollar-and-cents price tag for American consumers for decontrol of oil prices and the oil tariffs combined with a conservative ripple effect on all goods and services, will be more than $30 billion per year in 1978—or more than $600 for every family of four. If the OPEC nations carry out their threat of a price increase this fall, the cost will be even higher.

Workers will not soon forget that it was the oil price hikes of the last two years that robbed their paychecks of buying power and plunged the country headlong into the worst recession since the 1930s.

Workers see through the sham arguments of the proponents of decontrol.

- It will not result in free market pricing; rather it would legalize price fixing by a foreign cartel, supported by the big oil companies and aided and abetted by the American government.
- It would increase the profits of the big oil companies at the expense of the rest of American business and consumers, sapping the meager strength that exists for economic recovery.
- It would not foster energy independence; instead it would make the American economy even more dependent on the multinational oil companies.

THE ADMINISTRATION claims decontrol is essential for increased exploration and for conservation. Yet it offers not one shred of evidence, not one scintilla of proof.

The Eckhardt pricing provisions of $7.50 per barrel are more than sufficient to cover legitimate production cost inflation, while maintaining the reasonable controls the American government must have over such a vital segment of industry. The cartel price of $13.50 a barrel is not necessary to increase production.

Oil production would be maximized, with long-term price stability, under the provisions of the Eckhardt bill. Additional price increases would be windfall profits to the oil companies and encourage them to further delay oil production pending even higher prices in the future. This vicious cycle must stop now, and it is up to the Congress to stop it.

The Eckhardt bill provides for auto, industrial and appliance energy-use efficiency programs which are more effective and less disruptive than rationing by price. The alternative is the Ford program with its prescription for more inflation and more recession. We choose the Eckhardt bill.

Toothless Regulatory Agencies Chided by Ford for Growling

By John P. Roche

THERE AREN'T MANY LAUGHS in politics these days, but recently President Ford interrupted the seemingly endless wake for the Central Intelligence Agency with a bit of stand-up humor worthy of Groucho Marx. He solemnly summoned to the White House the chairmen of the many federal regulatory agencies and told them to lay off. To be precise, he called for a "maximum freedom for private enterprise" and chided the agencies (such as the Federal Power Commission, the Federal Communications Commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission) for allegedly harassing businessmen.

Anyone who knows anything about the activities of these so-called independent regulatory agencies immediately appreciated that the President was in effect telling a bunch of toothless tabbies to stop being tigers.

With few exceptions these agencies have long since been bagged up by the business interests they are supposed to regulate. Occasionally there will be an internal feud: the Interstate Commerce Commission, long a fiefdom of the railroads, faced in recent years a take-over bid by the truckers. And there have been various brawls in the Federal Communications Commission over the application of the "fairness doctrine," but Walter Cronkite put reality in a nutshell when he said of the networks, "We're big and we're powerful enough to thumb our nose at threats from the government, and I hope it stays that way."

The history of these agencies is interesting. Around the turn of the century there was a great outcry against corruption. What know they of corruption who only Watergate know? By current standards the situation was unbelievable. Henry Demerest Lloyd, one of the leading "muckrakers" (as Theodore Roosevelt, in a moment of anger, denoted the reformers) observed accurately that the only thing that Standard Oil could not do with the Pennsylvania legislature was refine it. The so-called "robber barons" were not without charm —one of them observed after a particularly ingenious raid upon the public interest that "nothing was lost but honor."

The thrust of the reformer's position was that regulating the "interests" could only be achieved by taking them out of politics. (This paralleled the effort to end corruption in government by establishing civil service as the alternative to patronage.) They decided that the chosen instruments for this depoliticization should be independent commissions whose members were appointed for set terms and were not responsible to the President. The staggered terms varied from agency to agency, averaging about seven years, though the members of the Federal Reserve Board are in for 14. They float in the constitutional blue, being subject to direction from neither the President nor Congress, a fact which often makes it very hard for an Administration adequately to implement policy—since the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board have been at daggers drawn.

THE FIRST BIG EFFORT came in the 1880s with a drive to regulate the railroads, which were joyously operating in a lucrative limbo created by the Supreme Court, which had held them immune to state regulation. Understandably the managers took a dim view of the proposed Interstate Commerce Commission, but in 1892 their crack lawyer, Richard S. Olney (later U.S. Attorney General), took a different view. He urged support for the commission because it "can be made of great use to the railroads. It satisfies the popular clamor for a government supervision of railroads, at the same time that that supervision is almost entirely nominal."

Then Olney, with brilliant prescience, anticipated the history of all such commissions: "Further, the older such a commission gets to be, the more inclined it will be found to take the business and railroad view of things. It thus becomes a sort of barrier between the railroad corporations and the people and a sort of protection against hasty and crude legislation hostile to railroad interests. . . . The part of wisdom is not to destroy the commission, but to utilize it."

Well, Mr. President, I trust the tabbies will become even more somnolent, and thanks for a good laugh.

Manipulations by Arab Bloc:

Reckless Moves Against Israel Pose Threat to UN's Survival

By Msgr. George G. Higgins

NEARLY 10 YEARS have passed since Pope Paul VI made his historic visit to the United Nations—a pilgrimage which, momentarily at least, lifted the spirits of mankind and held out some measure of hope that the nations of the world, at long last, might be able to resolve their differences and live at peace with one another. Pope Paul's trip to the UN served to symbolize rather dramatically, by word and deed, his strong support of the organization at a time when it badly needed such support and his prayerful hope, in the words of his predecessor Pope John XXIII, that the time might come "as quickly as possible when every human being will find therein an effective safeguard for the rights which derive directly from his dignity as a person, and which are therefore universal, inviolable and inalienable rights."

As of today, however, I rather suspect that if the Pope were to make a second visit to the UN and were to reaffirm his support for the organization, he would receive a much less favorable hearing and might even be written off by some as a naive and somewhat romantic idealist. In other words, the UN is today in serious trouble—so much so that even some of its staunchest supporters are beginning to fear that it may not be able to survive.

The reason for this ominous shift in public opinion is all too obvious. Increasingly in recent years reckless attempts have been made by some of the Arab nations and their allies in the so-called Third World to manipulate the organization and its specialized agencies, not in the interest of world peace, but to their own short-sighted political advantage. More specifically, they seem to have set their sights on driving the State of Israel out of the United Nations.

The Arab nations and their Third World allies launched their relentless attack on Israel in the UN General Assembly last year when they limited Israel's right to speak in the Palestine debate. They also limited Israeli participation in the UN Educational, Scientific & Cultural Organization.

This year they moved against Israel at the annual conference of the International Labor Organization. They also forced the World Health Organization to condemn Israel, and passed a resolution against "Zionism" at the International Women's Year Conference in Mexico City.

Now the word is out that, having gotten away with these outrageous moves against Israel, they may be preparing to go for broke at the next meeting of the UN General Assembly by demanding that the State of Israel be expelled from the organization. There is growing concern among UN officials and world diplomats—as well there might be—that such a move on the part of the Arab-Third World bloc could result in the destruction of the UN as it is now known. According to the Washington Post, these UN officials and diplomats envision votes on the General Assembly floor this year leading to the suspension of Israeli participation, a walkout by the American delegation, a cutoff of UN funds by the U.S. Congress, and perhaps fund cuts by Western European nations.

"For the first time," an American diplomat said, "I can visualize the destruction of the UN as we know it—its transformation into the Third World Congress."

This is a frightening prospect at a time when the United Nations is more badly needed than ever before. One can only hope and pray that the Arab-Third World bloc will have a radical change of heart between now and the next meeting of the General Assembly. On the other hand, if worst comes to worst, the United States will have no alternative but to support the State of Israel and, if necessary, walk out of the General Assembly.

TO THEIR CREDIT, the members of the U.S. labor delegation to the recent annual conference of the International Labor Organization (the oldest of the UN specialized agencies) followed this course of action when the Arab-Third World bloc rammed through a vote granting official observer status at the conference to the Palestine Liberation Organization, an Arab terrorist group which, on more than one occasion, has called for the destruction of the State of Israel. The chairman of the U.S. labor delegation explained the American walkout as follows:

"Our position is clear: We have never opposed legitimate movements fighting for their freedom and independence. And our history and record have demonstrated our support for such movements in North Africa and Black Africa . . . but we oppose the admission of liberation movements to the ILO which do not represent an oppressed state and we oppose the admission of liberation movements which seek the destruction of another state as a prerequisite to achieve their goals."

This is a sound position and, in my opinion, the only one that is consistent with the purpose of the United Nations and its specialized agencies. Pope John XXIII stated that purpose as follows in his encyclical Pacem in Terris: "The United Nations organization has as its essential purpose the maintenance and consolidation of peace between peoples, fostering between them friendly relations, based on the principles of equality, mutual respect, and varied forms of cooperation in every section of human endeavor."

The United States, as suggested above, will have no alternative but to live up to this statement of purpose, whatever the cost, if the Arab-Third World bloc is reckless enough to try to expel the State of Israel from the United Nations at the next meeting of the General Assembly.

Let's hope and pray that things will not come to such a dreadful pass—but if they do, our government, in the words of Sec. Kissinger, may be compelled (God forbid) to "depart the scene."

Support Gains in Congress:

National Health Security Plan Termed Key to Cost Controls

THE LONG-SOUGHT National Health Security program is the surest way to build the leverage and support needed to curb escalating medical and hospital costs, Max Fine, executive director of the Committee for National Health Insurance, declared.

Pointing out that Americans now spend more than $100 billion a year for health care, Fine stressed that those costs have been rising at double the pace of the overall cost of living. And, he said, all signs point to even higher health care costs unless the expensive and inefficient delivery system is overhauled along the lines of the Health Security program. Fine made the statements on Labor News Conference.

Appearing with Fine on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program was AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, who said that President Ford's contention that the economy rules out Administration support for any national health insurance bill this year just doesn't stand up.

He said that not only would Health Security keep America's health bill as low as possible, but since it would take some time to get the program operational, it could well come into being under different economic conditions.

Seidman and Fine agreed that widening public support and demand among the public at large for national health insurance have given the measure new momentum. Fine noted that 100 members of the House now co-sponsor the Health Security bill, "which is more than we've ever had." And, he added, at the same time that Health Security was gaining support, the catastrophic insurance bill pushed by the American Medical Association, lost 55 of its co-sponsors and supporters in the November elections.

REP. FRANK THOMPSON JR. (D-N.J.), a leader in helping win House passage of the job-site picketing bill, took to the House floor before the vote to explain why it is "an essential ingredient" in the nation's long commitment to collective bargaining.

These were some key "questions and answers" set forth by Thompson to aid new members of Congress in understanding the issue and to expose falsehoods, myths and half-truths in employers' attacks on the bill:

Q. Does the legislation legalize secondary boycotts?

A. No. It does not alter the law one whit as it affects the true or traditional boycott. It is the bill's premise that there simply is no "secondary boycott" when construction workers strike only to protest that a general contractor is subcontracting part of his total job obligation to a non-union employer.

Workers should have the right to strike to protest this subcontracting because it undermines their wage scales. Such a walkout is "primary," not "secondary."

Q. If a contractor brings onto a job a subcontractor who employs non-union labor, would building trades unions be allowed to picket the job as unfair?

A. Yes. The bill's purpose is to correct a court ruling, including a split Supreme Court decision in 1951, that literally would prohibit any building trades picket line on a job site that might turn away a supplier or customer.

"It generally has been recognized ever since that the decision is unrealistic and does not reflect the realities in the cnstruction industry where the contractor and subcontractor are related allies in a common venture, neither is 'innocent,' neither is 'unconcerned' in the labor disputes of the other."

Q. Has Congress ever before exempted any industry from the secondary boycott provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act?

A. Yes. In 1959, Congress amended the law to make sure the secondary boycott provisions would not apply to the clothing industry, which like the construction industry is marked by subcontracting of parts of a job.

Q. Would enactment of the situs picketing bill give workers in the construction industry "special treatment?"

A. No. In 1961, the Supreme Court held in a case involving General Electric that it was lawful for striking employes of a manufacturing concern to picket gates used by employes of contractors and subcontractors if their work aided or was "related" to operations of the manufacturer being struck.

Q. Does the bill authorize a union to picket any job site to force off a subcontractor of the site because he hires minority workers, women, or workers who have religious beliefs that conflict with joining a union?

A. No. The bill expressly makes it unlawful to picket where the object is to remove from the site any employe on grounds of sex, race, creed, color or national origin.

Q. Would an AFL-CIO union be permitted to picket a site because a subcontractor has a contract with an independent union?

A. No. The legislation expressly bans any picketing by one union in an effort to force an employer to recognize or bargain with a different union than the one representing his workers.

Q. Is the legislation consistent with our national commitment to encourage collective bargaining?

A. Yes. It adheres to public policy going back 40 years to the Wagner Act. It is one more fulfillment of Congress's guarantee of the right of employes to engage in "concerted activities, including the right to strike."

THE LEVERAGE WRITTEN into the Health Security bill is just what is needed to hold down escalating medical and hospital costs, said Max Fine, second from left, executive director of the Committee for National Health Insurance, and Bert Seidman, third from left, AFL-CIO social security director. They were questioned on Labor News Conference by Jerome Brazda, left, of Washington Report on Medicine & Health and Duane Emme of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO public affairs program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Rollcall on Construction Picketing Bill

The House on July 25 voted 230-178 approval of the construction site picketing bill, a major goal of the AFL-CIO and the building trades unions.

Right votes (R) for the bill were cast by 204 Democrats and 26 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 71 Democrats and 107 Republicans.

Numerals show districts; AL—at large; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not paired.

Actions Called Deliberate:

Housing Policies Hit As Drag on Economy

Chicago—Ford Administration actions on housing are "deliberately prolonging the recession," the AFL-CIO charged.

Terming the claims of recovery in housing construction a "sham," the Executive Council called for a comprehensive program to speed up construction under federal subsidy programs, halt the artificial propping-up of interest rates in the private market, expedite loans for housing for the elderly and protect the unemployed against loss of their homes.

The current situation in housing, the council said, is a series of undesirable records:

- The lowest rate of housing starts in 28 years.
- Employment figures that show 21 percent jobless among all construction workers, an even higher rate for workers in housing and a ripple effect on other segments of the economy.
- A slow turnover in new homes, despite the tax credit of up to $2,000 for new home purchases, with the malaise attributable to high interest rates.
- The highest mortgage delinquency rate in 23 years during the first quarter of 1975, foreshadowing an increase in foreclosures, while the inflation of recent years lofted the median price of a new home to $40,000 in May 1975.

No matter how great the recovery in the months ahead, the council said "housing production in 1975 will be only about half the 2.2 million units per year needed to meet the nation's basic housing needs."

In the face of all this, the council said the Ford Administration takes such hurtful actions as vetoing the first Emergency Housing Act, which would have made 6 and 7 percent mortgage financing available.

The measure Ford did sign, the council pointed out, empowered the Government National Mortgage Association to purchase mortgages with 7½ percent rates—meager improvement over the 7¾ percent funds available in 1974.

"Furthermore, GNMA is reselling at substantial discounts the mortgages that it has acquired, thus providing lenders with 9 percent yields," the council pointed out. It charged that this drains off available savings capital and helps to subsidize the "private mortgage interest rates so disastrous to the housing industry."

The Administration has also blocked effective use of low-income housing programs that could generate needed housing construction by allowing applications to languish in the processing pipeline.

Noting that "the history of past recessions is that a revival in the housing industry leads to a recovery," the council demanded that immediate federal action be taken "to expedite issuance of final commitments" for low-income and public housing projects.

This would free some applications pending since 1973, the council said, and it called for new applications to be accepted and processed to the full extent permitted by existing authorizations.

The council also called for a ban on the sale of previously purchased mortgages from the GNMA portfolio as the only way to stop the subsidizing of high mortgage rates.

The relief needed by unemployed workers is already on the statute books in the Emergency Housing Act of 1975, it was noted, with full implementation by the Ford Adminitration all that is needed now.

DISCUSSIONS FOR AFFILIATION of the Pottery Workers with the Seafarers were given added impetus as delegates to a special convention of the pottery union approved constitutional changes. Congress Ups Aid to Jobless Rail Workers

Congress swiftly approved higher unemployment and sickness benefits for railroad workers that had been negotiated by rail unions and management.

The program is fully financed by employers, but is spelled out in the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. The new agreement, passed unanimously by the House and Senate less than two weeks after it had been introduced, is the first change in the benefit schedule since 1968.

The previous maximum benefit of $12.70 a day during periods of unemployment or illness is increased to $24, retroactive to July 1. On July 1, 1976, it goes to $25. Up to the maximum, workers receive 60 percent of lost wages.

The initial waiting period for sickness benefits is reduced from seven to four days. However, under the new law unemployment compensation will not be paid until the eighth day of a legal strike. Previously it could be paid from the start of a strike.

While workers with 10 or more years of service have been eligible for extended benefits, the new law enables those with less than 10 years of service to obtain an additional 13 weeks of unemployment compensation through a "trigger" device. The added weeks become available when either the national insured unemployment rate or the jobless rate for railroad workers is at least 4 percent for three consecutive months.

'75 Wage Settlements Improve in Major Pacts

Larger wage increases were negotiated in major collective bargaining agreements during the first six months of the year than in the similar period of 1974 as unions sought to insulate their members against the effects of rising consumer prices.

Preliminary estimates issued by the Bureau of Labor Statistics show wage rate adjustments averaged 11 percent for the first contract year and 8 percent a year when measured over the life of the contracts. In the first half of 1974, comparable wage gains averaged 9.8 percent and 7.3 percent, respectively. These measures exclude additional increases provided under cost-of-living escalator clauses.

The BLS compilation is based on 344 collective bargaining agreements in the private nonfarm sector, each covering 1,000 or more workers. The settlements affect 1.3 million workers primarily in the construction, railroad and petroleum industries.

BLS noted that contract settlements with escalator clauses were negotiated in the first half of 1975 for 407,000 workers and provided annual wage-rate adjustments of 7 percent exclusive of cost-of-living adjustments. Contracts without the clauses provided average increases of 8.7 percent. A year earlier, the comparable gains were 6.1 and 9.1 percent.

However, total wage gains have averaged 12.9 percent thus far in 1975 settlements with escalator clauses. These include first-year negotiated increases and the COL adjustments.

BLS noted that 56 percent of all workers in major bargaining units are now covered by contracts containing escalator clauses.

Other key findings of the BLS survey:

- Combined wage and benefit increases in contracts covering 5,000 or more workers averaged 11.3 percent for the first year and 7.6 percent annually over the life of the contract. This compares with gains of 10.7 and 7.8 percent last year.
- The average duration of the contracts was extended to 28 months, compared with 21.7 months when these contracts were previously negotiated.

In manufacturing, an estimated 388,000 workers under new contracts will receive an average wage increase of 10.9 percent in the first year and 8.4 percent a year over the entire term of their contract. This is up from the 8.7 and 6.1 negotiated in 1974.

In nonmanufacturing, first-year increases for about 932,000 workers are also larger—11 percent, compared with 10.5 percent last year. But raises spread over the life of these contracts were down to an average of 7.8 percent from 8 percent in 1974.

Wage gains in first-half settlements in the construction industry declined to 8.1 percent for the first contract year from 11 percent in 1974, while the annual average over the life of the contract fell to 7.8 percent from 9.6 percent.

While construction industry settlements led other sectors in negotiated wage increases last year, BLS noted that the new contracts "had a somewhat moderating influence on the all-industries and nonmanufacturing measures in the first half of 1975."

Average first-year pay increases for all industries excluding construction amounted to 12.2 percent and adjustments for nonmanufacturing excluding construction averaged 13.2 percent.

Longshoremen Propose Aid to Inland Shipping

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Delegates to the Longshoremen's 43rd convention here called for federal programs to improve inland shipping lanes and provide stiffer enforcement of pollution controls.

The nearly 500 delegates unanimously elected Thomas W. Gleason to his fourth consecutive term as president of the 60,000-member dock workers union. Also re-elected to new four-year terms without opposition were Sec.-Treas. Harry R. Hasselgren, Executive Vice President John Bowers and General Organizer Fred R. Field, Jr.

Two new vice presidents were elected to the union's executive council, along with the 23 vice presidents who were returned to office. They are William B. Boyle of Miami and John H. Raspberry of Houston.

The convention also approved salary increases for top officers to provide catch-up raises because of higher living costs in the past four years.

Gleason's annual salary was raised from $40,000 to $60,000. Comparable increases raised the annual salaries of the executive vice president and the general organizer to $40,000 and the secretary-treasurer to $45,000.

Among the major resolutions adopted at the four-day convention, delegates directed the union's executive officers to initiate affiliation discussions with the Grain Millers, noting that members of both unions are often involved in similar occupations and work for common employers.

Earlier in the convention, delegates unanimously called on all ILA members to refuse to load grain bound for the Soviet Union until there are assurances the shipments will not adversely affect the American public.

In an effort to improve maritime traffic between the Great Lakes and Atlantic ports, the convention urged the federal government to investigate the possibility of refurbishing the Erie Canal to handle deep draft vessels.

Delegates also called for stronger enforcement of pollution control standards on the Great Lakes to insure the survival of the waterways.

Citing unnecessary delays in processing benefit claims for job injuries, the ILA asked for federal administrators to speed procedures under the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act.

Following the closing of the convention, the union's executive council named Vice President Anthony Scotto as legislative director and assistant general organizer, a new post.

New Vote Set For Disputed Senate Seat

The Senate gave up trying to decide who won last November's senatorial election in New Hampshire, declared the seat vacant, and ordered a new election held within 45 days.

A Republican filibuster had kept the Senate from resolving the contest between Democrat John Durkin and Republican Louis Wyman. Republicans had sought earlier to have a new election held and Democrats finally agreed after Durkin requested it as the only solution to the deadlock.

Wyman had initially been announced as the winner. A recount gave the election to Durkin by 10 votes, but a Republican-controlled state ballot commission subsequently declared Wyman a two-vote winner.

Both claimed the Senate seat.

U.S. Theater Sought to Fill Cultural Void

Chicago—The AFL-CIO called for creation of a National Theater of the United States that could fill a cultural void and help relieve the 80 percent unemployment among U.S. actors and other theater craftsmen.

"The United States annually contributes 7½ cents per person to the arts," the Executive Council statement said, calling that a miserly figure in comparison with the $2.42 per person in West Germany, $2 in Austria and Sweden, $1.40 in Canada, $1.34 in Israel and $1.33 in Britain.

Noting that the United States is the only advanced country in the world without a national theater, the council said its creation "would expand existing theater and make it available to Americans through a network of theaters."

The council pointed to the precedent of the Federal Theater, a WPA project in the 1930s that brought live theater to 15 million people and provided employment for more than 15,000 theater workers.

But today, because of "cost, distant location or a lack of past exposure, millions of Americans have never had the intellectual, emotional and creative enrichment which live theater provides," the council said.

By Decisive Margin:

Situs Picketing Bill Approved by House

mentary maneuver was soundly beaten, 322-94.

The bill then came before the House for debate and action—the first time in more than 20 years of legislative effort that a construction site picketing bill had progressed this far.

Several amendments, originally proposed by Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop, had been added to the bill by the House Labor Committee to broaden the legislation's bipartisan support. Thus, the bill requires a local union to give 10 days notice of intent to picket a joint construction site and also requires it to receive the approval of its international union before so doing.

But a barrage of more restrictive amendments, some of which would have virtually nullified the purpose of the legislation, were proposed from the floor.

Most of them were defeated, with Representatives Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), the chief sponsor of the bill, and James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) leading the defense of the legislation.

The congressional "Black Caucus" played an important part in knocking down an attempt by foes of the bill to exempt from picketing any "minority employer employing more than 50 percent minority employes."

Most of the black members of the House denounced this proposal as an attempt to undermine union-won standards that help black workers and as encouraging exploitation of black workers at substandard pay and conditions.

Rep. William Clay (D-Mo.) tore into that "very vicious" amendment he said would divide the nation's workers. Clay questioned the civil rights commitment of supporters of such an amendment and stressed that the key issue "is whether or not there will be job security and the ability of workers to get decent wages and working conditions."

Another black congressman, Rep. Parren J. Mitchell (D-Md.), warned that such an exemption would encourage "dummy corporations," supposedly headed by blacks but actually controlled by "unscrupulous" white contractors.

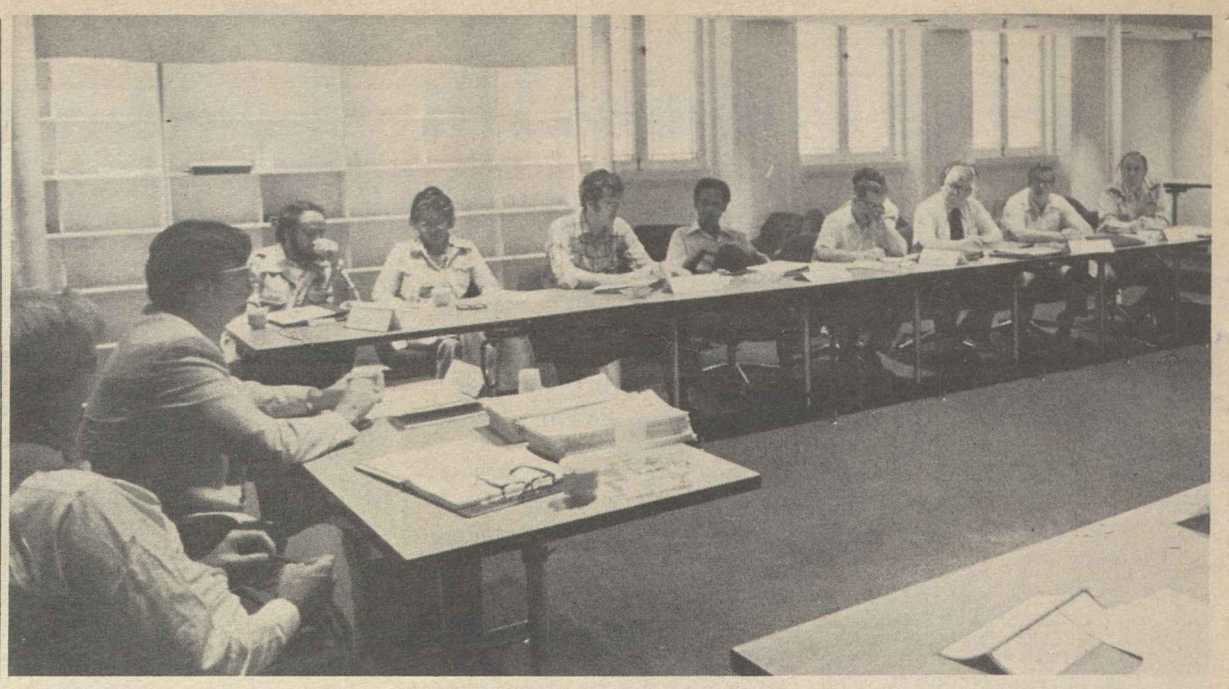
The House did allow an exception to common site picketing where a public agency, in compliance with state law, lets out separate bids for all of the trades involved, instead of operating through a prime contractor.

But it rejected, 222-176, another amendment that would have given a similar exemption to private employers who deal separately with subcontractors.

One amendment adopted continued present picketing restrictions in disputes over so-called "product boycotts." Another approved by a voice vote would prohibit common site picketing to force the removal of a worker who has been denied union membership or expelled for a reason other than failure to pay dues and initiation fees.

Of the amendments defeated, the closest battle was over a proposal to exempt all residential construction from the legislation —including large-scale developments. That was beaten, 202-200.

On the final passage vote, 204 Democrats and 26 Republicans supported the bill. Voting against it were 107 Republicans and 71 Democrats.



ROLE OF AMERICAN LABOR in international affairs is explored at a five-day conference at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center which drew representatives from 20 unions. Voting Rights Extension Cleared to White House

Congress completed action on a labor-backed bill that extends the Voting Rights Act for seven years and broadens its coverage to include Spanish-speaking Americans and several other "language minorities."

The original 1965 law is credited with enrolling a million new black voters in the South who had been kept from registering by discriminatory literacy tests and other devices to ensure white rule.

As a safeguard against backsliding, areas that had made it difficult for blacks to vote are required to get advance federal approval before changing their voting laws or district boundaries.

The House had originally passed a 10-year extension of the law, but went along with the seven-year bill adopted by the Senate to assure that the legislation would clear Congress before the Aug. 6 expiration of the present law. President Ford is expected to sign it.

Included in the new law is a permanent ban on literacy tests—in any state.

The new law also requires that election information be bilingual in most areas where at least 5 percent of the voting-age citizens are of Spanish-speaking origin, or are American Indian, Asian Americans, or Alaskan natives.

Where various language criteria are met and the voting participation in the previous presidential election was less than 50 percent, federal observers may be sent in to assure a no-discrimination policy, and approval of election law changes would be required.

In contrast to some previous civil rights battles, attempts by southern conservatives to block action were quickly and easily squelched by one-sided votes in the Senate—including two successful motions to limit debate.

The Senate then passed the bill, 77-12, and the House cleared the legislation for the President's signature by a 346-56 vote.

Ford had initially proposed a five-year extension of the present law but civil rights groups stressed that a 1980 expiration date would coincide with a census year that would be followed by widespread reapportionment and redistricting—an opportunity for gerrymandering to hold down minority representation in legislatures, city councils or Congress. They had urged a 10-year extension as well as the other provisions of the new law.

Unit on Aging, Ford Clash On Cutbacks

President Ford disavowed an advisory panel's protest against budget cuts in programs for the elderly and told Congress that a report by the Federal Council on the Aging "does not reflect the Administration's policies."

The 15-member body, all appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, is headed by a former Eisenhower Administration official, Bertha S. Adkins. Last December, it created some waves at the White House with a letter to Ford expressing concern at the financial hardships on the elderly that would result from proposed budget reductions.

In its current first annual report, which the President forwarded to Congress, the advisory body again spoke up:

"We continue to be distressed about the apparent lack of consideration for the economic plight of the elderly as reflected in Administration proposals for the 1976 fiscal year budget. Cutbacks in federal monies for social services for the elderly and ceilings on benefit programs financed from Social Insurance Trust Funds are particularly burdensome to this age group."

The Federal Council on the Aging urged that Ford "reconsider" his budget cuts out of humanitarian concern.

Ford's brusque retort was that government spending has to be reduced in order to curb inflation, which falls heaviest on the elderly. He found the report written from a "limited" perspective and said the Administration's policies "must reflect a broader range of responsibilities and priorities."

Nelson H. Cruikshank, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens and a member of the Federal Council on Aging, criticized Ford's "callous indifference" to the elderly poor. The advisory group, Cruikshank stressed, was not set up to reflect Administration policies but to make recommendations to the President.

Cruikshank noted that during his year in office Ford has sought to cut back on Medicare and Medicaid, to raise the price of food stamps, and to reduce the scheduled cost-of-living increase in social security.

Senate Votes Anti-Recession Aid For Hard-Pressed Cities, States

The Senate combined two labor-supported anti-recession programs into a single bill and sent it to a House-Senate conference committee.

It voted 58-36 to add to a public works bill a proposal advanced by Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.) and others for "counter-cyclical" financial aid to cities and states with high unemployment.

This would be a form of revenue-sharing, with the amount of federal funds keyed to the unemployment rate, intended to maintain needed services without the layoffs and tax hikes resorted to by New York and many other cities. Retrenchment by cities undercuts federal efforts to stimulate the economy, Muskie stressed.

Under the proposal, grants totaling $500 million would be authorized when the national unemployment rate was 6 percent or higher, with an additional $500 million for each percentage point above 6 percent. At a 9 percent jobless rate, the authorization would be $2 billion. Cities would get two-thirds of the money on a formula keyed to both local unemployment rate and taxes.

The bill to which it was added would authorize $2 billion for two other job-creating programs and $125 million for business development loans and guarantees.

The total includes $1 billion for labor-intensive public works projects that state and local governments could get under way within 90 day and an additional $1 billion to continue a job opportunities program that has put unemployed persons to work on projects such as forest conservation and planting.

The Senate passed the combined bill, 65-28. It must now be meshed with a $5 billion accelerated public works bill that the House passed last May by a 313-86 margin with a flurry of concern over high construction unemployment that drowned out an Administration veto threat.

In other developments before taking a month-long recess until after Labor Day:

- Congress gave speedy approval to a bill that will provide annual pay raises for House and Senate members, the vice president, federal judges and high-ranking government officials whose pay has in effect been frozen since 1969.

Under the legislation, which President Ford has endorsed, they will get the same percentage raise that federal white collar employes are supposed to get each October under a salary comparability law. The Senate voted 58-29 for the measure, but it barely squeaked through the House, 214-213.

- The House International Relations Committee approved full funding for the United Nations Development Program, which in turn channels a substantial portion of it to programs of the International Labor Organization and UNESCO. AFL-CIO President George Meany had asked the committee to stop further U.S. funding of agencies that have been transformed into "instruments of political warfare" against the United States and Israel.

- The House voted 390-35 to extend the Noise Control Act an additional 27 months. The program operated by the Environmental Protection Agency is intended to determine harmful noise levels and set noise control standards—an area that has resulted in some jurisdictional conflict with the Occupational Safety & Health Administration. EPA's experts have urged stricter limits on workplace noise than OSHA had proposed.

Steelworkers Get 9-Cent COL Boost

Pittsburgh—A cost-of-living increase of 9 cents an hour went into effect Aug. 1 for 400,000 Steelworkers in the basic steel industry. A similar 9-cent increase will become effective Aug. 15 for an additional 36,300 USWA members in the container industry.

The COL adjustments are being made under provisions of the USWA's 1974 contracts with 10 major steel producers and the container industry.

The contracts provide for quarterly wage adjustments of 1 cent an hour for each three-tenths of 1 percent rise in the government's consumer price index. Earlier adjustment for USWA members totaled 64 cents.

Price Surge Tied to Soviet Grain Deal

Meany Hits Butz 'Game' Of Deceit

A new surge in wholesale prices in July, paced by a 6.6 percent leap in farm product prices, was described by AFL-CIO President George Meany as "only the beginning" of the impact of grain sales to the Soviet Union.

Early reports of a new round of grain sales to the Russians were credited with touching off a 7.9 percent rise in grain prices, with a ripple effect that contributed significantly to an overall rise of 1.2 percent in the July wholesale price index. That's the largest rise since April, and is the equivalent of a 14.4 percent annual increase.

Meany termed the July figures "clear evidence" that Sec. of Agriculture Earl Butz "is back at his old game of deceiving the American people when he says the Russian grain deal will have little effect on domestic prices."

Already, Meany noted, "these price increases are on their way to the supermarket shelves" as the wholesale rises push up retail prices.

"The American consumer is paying the bill for the Administration's discredited policy of 'detente' at any price with the Russians," Meany said. He added:

"This Administration, which has consistently carped that it would be inflationary to put unemployed Americans back to work, continues to pursue economic policies that drive up the cost of food and fuel.

"Isn't it about time to ask: When will President Ford and his advisers put the interests of Americans ahead of the desires of the Kremlin?"

By contrast to the volatile rise in farm and food prices, the index for industrial commodities rose only four-tenths of 1 percent on a seasonal basis, and that was primarily because of higher prices for fuels—an area the Administration is seeking to further decontrol.

The overall wholesale price index rose to 175.7 in July, up 8.7 percent from a year earlier.

With 1967 as the base year, that means that a sampling of commodities sold in wholesale markets for $100 eight years ago rose in price to $175.70 last month.

The last big grain sale to the Soviet Union touched off a sharp

High Joblessness Engulfs Record 131 Major Centers

Economists Discount Dip in Overall Rate

By John R. Oravec

A record 131 of the nation's 150 major job centers were affected by unemployment of 6 percent or more in July even as the Labor Dept. reported a slight drop in the nation's jobless rate to 8.4 percent from 8.6 percent in June. The drop came despite an actual decline in jobs in construction and manufacturing.

Some government economists warned that the dip in the official jobless rate did not truly reflect the nation's employment situation, and that the picture could worsen in August.

The Labor Dept. added two new areas to the list of major job centers with "substantial" unemployment. They are Steubenville, O.-Weirton, W.Va., and Knoxville, Tenn.

An unemployment rate increase in Steubenville-Weirton to 7.6 percent was attributed to job losses in the primary metals industry. In Knoxville, the jobless rate climbed to 7.2 percent because of declines in apparel, textile mill products and retail trade.

For the nation overall, the number of workers the Labor Dept. counted as unemployed eased from 7.9 million to 7.8 million. But there were still 3 million more workers out of jobs last month than in July 1974.

The employment situation analyzed by the Bureau of Labor Statistics was mixed:

- Total employment, based on a sampling of 47,000 households, rose by 630,000 in July to 85.1 million.
- Total nonfarm payroll employment, measured by a survey of employers' records, increased only 88,000 from the June low of 76.3 million.

COLLECTION OF BADGES and buttons depicting the involvement of American labor in campaigns, conventions, elections and memorial tributes is presented by Chicago labor attorney Joseph Jacobs to AFL-CIO President George Meany. Convention Call Cites Dual Crises

An "acute economic recession" at home and assaults on freedom from abroad form the backdrop for the AFL-CIO's 11th Constitutional Convention this fall.

A convention call sent out by AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland summons the delegates to "deal forthrightly" with the nation's problems "in the best interests of working people and of all Americans."

Meany and Kirkland ascribed the economic crisis to "misguided governmental policies" they said have been "perpetuated by the lack of effective leadership in the Congress and in the White House."

The convention call cited these domestic concerns:

"Unemployment remains at an intolerably high level. Production and construction continue stagnant, under the weight of exorbitant interest rates.

"The energy crisis, brought on by America's growing dependence

Tops $108 Million:

Wage Law Chiseling Shows Sharp Rise

Labor Dept. investigators uncovered $108.8 million in illegal underpayments by employers to their workers in fiscal year 1975, a 13 percent increase from the previous year.

In the year ended June 30, the Employment Standards Administration reported that 472,404 workers were affected by the underpayments, compared with the 357,000 workers who lost $96.6 million to employer chiseling in fiscal year 1974.

The Labor Dept. managed to get employers to restore only about half of the income they illegally held back from workers during the year, but this represents a 17 percent increase over what was recovered a year earlier.

ESA's Wage & Hour Division recovered $58.2 million in income for 380,254 workers, while only $49.9 million was returned to 261,000 workers in fiscal 1974.

The Labor Dept. said the major reason for the lag between the total amount of money found due the workers and what was actually recovered is the refusal of employers to pay back wages in cases deemed unsuitable for litigation by the department's lawyers.

In such cases, workers have the right to initiate their own legal action for the recovery of back wages, but these amounts are not reflected in the statistics.

The failure to recover the full amount of back pay is also attributed to the statute of limitations, which generally limits the recovery to a two-year period prior to the filing of a complaint against an employer.

Council Affirms Stand On Seniority Principles

Chicago—The AFL-CIO affirmed its commitment to seniority principles in layoffs and job recalls—along with an equally firm opposition to racial or sex discrimination in employment.

A resolution adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its summer session here found no contradiction between the two principles. But it warned that "the natural alliance between the labor movement and the civil rights movement" is threatened by "demagogic attacks on the seniority system."

Job cutbacks resulting from "the Nixon-Ford depression" precipitated the attacks on the seniority system, the council said.

The statement noted approvingly a recent federal appellate court decision that rejected a claim that black workers who had not themselves been victims of discrimination should be recalled to work ahead of more senior white workers.

Citing an AFL-CIO brief in a case before the Supreme Court, the council reiterated that labor's position is that employment discrimination is forbidden by law and persons who have suffered discrimination are entitled to be restored to their full rights, but

Study Finds Ford Vetoes Cost Nation 638,500 Jobs

President Ford's vetoes this year cost the economy 638,500 jobs, according to a Library of Congress study.

Based on the job-creating impact of the funds involved, the President's vetoes actually knocked out more than 1.8 million jobs. But compromise legislation that subsequently became law reduced the net total to the figure cited.

The study was requested by Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) and made public by him. It shows the biggest job losses resulting from Ford's veto of the Emergency Housing Act, which cost an estimated 400,000 jobs, and the Emergency Employment Act, estimated at a 128,000 job loss.

Not all of the jobs would have come into existence this year, since some of the programs stretch funds over several years.

Indiana Loses Bid to Avoid Overtime Pay

Chicago — A federal appellate court here rejected both defenses that had been raised by the State of Indiana in its effort to avoid compliance with the Fair Labor Standards Act.

There was no dispute about the facts. Indiana conceded that it had not paid time-and-one-half overtime rates at a state mental institution and at a school for the blind and deaf. Neither had it kept the records required for federal enforcement of the wage-hour law.

Indiana's attorney general contended that the institutions involved are not covered by the law because they don't have sufficient ties to interstate commerce. And the state argued also that in any event federal courts don't have jurisdiction to enforce the Fair Labor Standards Act against "sovereign" states.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit noted that the Supreme Court has previously ruled that state schools and hospitals are within the constitutional scope of the law and said the "sovereign immunity" doctrine of the 11th Amendment does not apply to suits brought by the United States against a state.

Its decision found also that the state institutions have the required tie to interstate commerce because of the substantial amount of goods purchased from out-of-state sources.

The appellate court affirmed two lower court decisions against the state.

Bishop Heads Farm Panel In California

Sacramento, Calif.—A Catholic bishop has been appointed by California Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr., to head the state's new Agricultural Labor Relations Board.

The board, whose members are subject to confirmation by the state Senate, will oversee representation elections under the collective bargaining law that goes into effect Aug. 28.

Its chairman will be Bishop Roger Mahoney, secretary of the Catholic Bishop's Committee on Farm Labor and auxiliary bishop of Fresno.

Brown also appointed to the board Leroy Chatfield, a member of his staff who formerly was on the staff of the United Farm Workers; Richard Johnsen, Jr., a Sacramento farmer and executive vice president of the Agricultural Council of California; Joseph Grodin, who teaches labor law in San Francisco and has been with a law firm that represented both the Teamsters and AFL-CIO unions, and Joe Ortega, director of the Model Cities Center for Law & Justice in Los Angeles.

Vincent Lacapria Dies, ACWA Vice President

New York—Vincent Lacapria, a vice president of the Clothing Workers and co-manager of the ACWA New York Joint Board since 1952, died in his sleep Aug. 1 at his home in Hempstead, L.I. He was 76.

Lacapria, a native of Italy, went to work in the clothing industry as a youngster and was active in the 1914 movement that led to the founding of the ACWA. He also was a leader in the formation of the United Italian-American Labor Council.

Timeliness Guidelines Set for Disputes Cases

Chicago—The AFL-CIO Executive Council has adopted a policy that if there is "undue delay" in the filing of complaints under the federation's Internal Disputes Plan they may be barred as untimely.

The council issued its policy on timeliness in the filing of cases under Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution as it considered the findings of an impartial umpire on two cases in which the alleged violations occurred in the 1968-70 period.

A definition of "undue delay" under Article XX cannot be stated in a simple formula, "but will require development on a case by case basis," the council said. As a guide, it determined that on the facts and circumstances of the cases before it, "the complaints were not timely filed and should be dismissed."

The two cases involved charges by the Graphic Arts International Union that in the 1968-1970 period locals of the International Printing & Graphic Communications Union had raided established bargaining units of the International Brotherhood of Bookbinders, which later became a part of the GAIU.

The impartial umpire reported that GAIU's justification for a lapse of four to six years in the filing of complaints in the cases was that the Bookbinders "had a policy of not filing Article XX cases" and did not begin to exercise its rights under the article until its affiliation with GAIU.

The Executive Council policy statement noted that there is no rigid time limit stated in Article XX for the filing of a complaint.

"But it is plain," the council said, "that it would be unsound to permit the filing of complaints years after the events in question have occurred and even though there is no good reason for the failure to file promptly.

"If an affiliate does not make a complaint for a period of years, the fair inference is that it has no interest in pursuing its protest. Moreover, during the interim the individuals who have become the members of another organization have acquired rights in that union. Finally, the strength of the Article XX system depends on the diligence of each affiliate in protecting its interests. The rules for administering the system should therefore encourage diligence and discourage delay."

The council reaffirmed the doctrine set forth in an earlier case—National Video—that no union may decide for itself that an established bargaining relationship of another union has deteriorated to the point that is safe to proceed to represent the workers without regard to the Internal Disputes Plan.

The sole effect of its policy statement on timeliness, the council statement concluded, "is that an affiliate claiming an established collective bargaining relationship must perfect its right to protection by filing an Article XX complaint challenging alleged interference with that relationship within a reasonable time after the violation charged has taken place."

Nation's Crises Stressed in Call To Convention

on foreign sources, cartel pricing and the threat of blackmail, continues unabated.

"The President vetoes legislative measures designed to put America back to work and the Congress is unable to assert the leadership America needs to restore economic vitality and social progress."

As for international affairs, the convention call declares:

"Around the world, democracy and human liberty are in danger or in retreat. The free world is dwindling and its members are neutralized by fear or by delusions of detente."

The biennial convention is scheduled to open on Thursday, Oct. 2, in the Civic Auditorium at San Francisco. And in the traditional wording of the convention call, it will "remain in session from day to day until the business of the convention shall have been completed."

Jobless Benefit Rolls At 6.6 Million High

A record high of 6,671,000 Americans were receiving unemployment compensation during the week that ended July 19, the Labor Dept. said.

About 4 million of the jobless were receiving benefits under regular state programs as the unemployment rate for persons in insured jobs reached 6 percent — nearly double the 3.1 percent of a year earlier.

The remainder were drawing benefits under various special federal programs.

Broadcast Profiteers Hit:

Arts Unions Seek Royalty Protection

Performing artists should be compensated for repeated use of their work in broadcasts, juke boxes and piped-in music services that are making a big profit off them, labor told Congress.

Representatives of the AFL-CIO and three performers' unions told a House subcommittee considering updating the nation's copyright laws that electronically, things have changed since the basic law was adopted in 1909. And the unions have been trying almost that long to win some royalties for the performers.

Yet today, the performing artists still receive nothing. The union statements stressed that a few big name stars may receive enough compensation to secure their futures, but as a group, the performers had a median income of only $4,668 in 1970. They charged also that long periods of unemployment are traceable to the spread of recording devices that repeat their work.

Labor's case was made by Sanford I. Wolff of the Television & Radio Artists on behalf of his union and the Musicians, recording artist Theodore Bikel, who is president of Actors' Equity, and AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller.

Specifically, the union representative asked the House to incorporate the same protection for the original artists that are being considered for the television producers against repetition of their work on cable television (CATV).

Wolff pointed out that the actors, singers and musicians have been seeking "a modicum of justice" for almost 40 years and that much of the opposition to such copyright protections has disappeared since the subcommittee considered the issue in 1966. Now, he said, the unions "enjoy the support of the current Administration, the National Endowment for the Arts and the Register of Copyrights.

Wolff pointed out that Congress cited "concerted opposition" in 1966 as an excuse for not acting then, even though admitting that the unions' arguments were so compelling that there was "little direct response to those arguments."

All three spokesmen stressed that the only opposition now comes from those making a profit off free use of recorded music. They termed it ridiculous of the brodcasters to claim that their use helped record sales, thus assisting the performers.

Quite the contrary, it was noted that repetition wears out popularity and the spread of inexpensive taping systems allows recording off the broadcast instead of buying anything. It was also pointed out that payment of a royalty by those who intend to make a profit off the recording is fairer to the individual consumer who now pays the same price as the profit-maker.

Bikel termed it "insulting to America's artists and audacious in the extreme for broadcasters to ask that you deny the very same principle to the recording artist that they wish you to uphold in their behalf against CATV."

In a letter to the subcommittee, Biemiller stressed that "Congress and the courts have now clearly established that a sound recording can be the subject of copyright protection."

He said that such protection was demanded by every legal, moral and economic argument.

Meany Assails Grain Deal as Prices Surge

price rise for all grain-related products, coupled with domestic shortages.

In a related development, Thomas W. Gleason, president of the Longshoremen and chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee of AFL-CIO Maritime Unions, sand Agriculture Sec. Butz hadn't come up with a persuasive defense of the new grain sales.

Gleason, Seafarers President Paul Hall and Marine Engineers President Jesse M. Calhoon met with Butz and members of his staff.

"We discussed the Russian wheat deal and our determination that it not be another ripoff of American housewives and farmers," Gleason said.

He announced that "because of the urgency of the situation," leaders of all maritime unions will meet with Meany on Aug. 18 at the AFL-CIO headquarters.

Public Employes Urge Mandatory Jobless Aid

The AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. has urged Congress to include mandatory coverage of all local and state government workers in legislation overhauling the unemployment compensation program.

Last December, Congress temporarily extended unemployment compensation coverage to workers excluded by state law. Otherwise, thousands of persons who lost their jobs in local and state government cutbacks would have been without benefits.

John A. McCart, the department's executive director, noted that this temporary coverage will expire after March 1977—leaving about 7.8 million public employes without protection.

Only eight states cover both local and state workers, McCart told a House Ways & Means subcommittee, and 22 do not provide any public worker coverage.

"Employes in state hospitals are often covered," he noted, while "employes in city hospitals are not. Maintenance workers in state higher education facilities may be covered; maintenance workers in local school districts are not."

McCart saw "no logical explanation for treating groups of employes differently simply because they have a different government employer."

As did the AFL-CIO, the Public Employee Dept. urged approval of a bill sponsored by Subcommittee Chairman James C. Corman (D-Calif.) that would provide nearly universal coverage and set benefit standards keyed to two-thirds of lost wages for most workers.

On Coke Oven Standard:

Steelworkers Assail Job Health 'Politics'

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers accused the Administration of playing politics with the lives of coke oven workers by diluting the recommendations of experts calling for a reduction in cancer hazards.

The USWA two months ago endorsed a coke oven health standard drafted by an advisory committee of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

But the proposed regulations issued July 24 by Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop ignored many of the committee's recommendations, USWA President I. W. Abel charged.

"The Ford Administration is following a politically inspired strategy," Abel declared. "The pattern has now become familiar. A committee of experts is appointed, and the committee makes its report and recommendations. These recommendations are then shunted aside in favor of a decision more acceptable to industry."

The Labor Dept.'s proposed standard mocks the federal safety and health act, Abel said, adding that it will not save any lives because it will not clean up the coke oven batteries.

The decisions to revise the recommendations of the experts "were made by people who know nothing about coke oven technology and seemingly cared little about the health of coke oven workers," Abel said.

The proposed standard would affect about 15,000 workers who are exposed to coke oven emissions at 65 plants across the country. The USWA represents about 90 percent of the coke oven workers in the United States.

Citing scientific findings on the coke oven health hazard, Abel pointed out that "topside" coke oven workers are 10 times as likely to die of cancer than the average Steelworker or the average citizen.

"If the government does not act forcefully on this kind of pollution issue," Abel warned, "all hope that this Administration will do something about cleaning up the air in this country is gone."

The OSHA advisory committee, composed of three representatives each from labor, industry and the public, called for the mandating of specific engineering controls and work practices that would virtually eliminate all emissions from the coke oven batteries

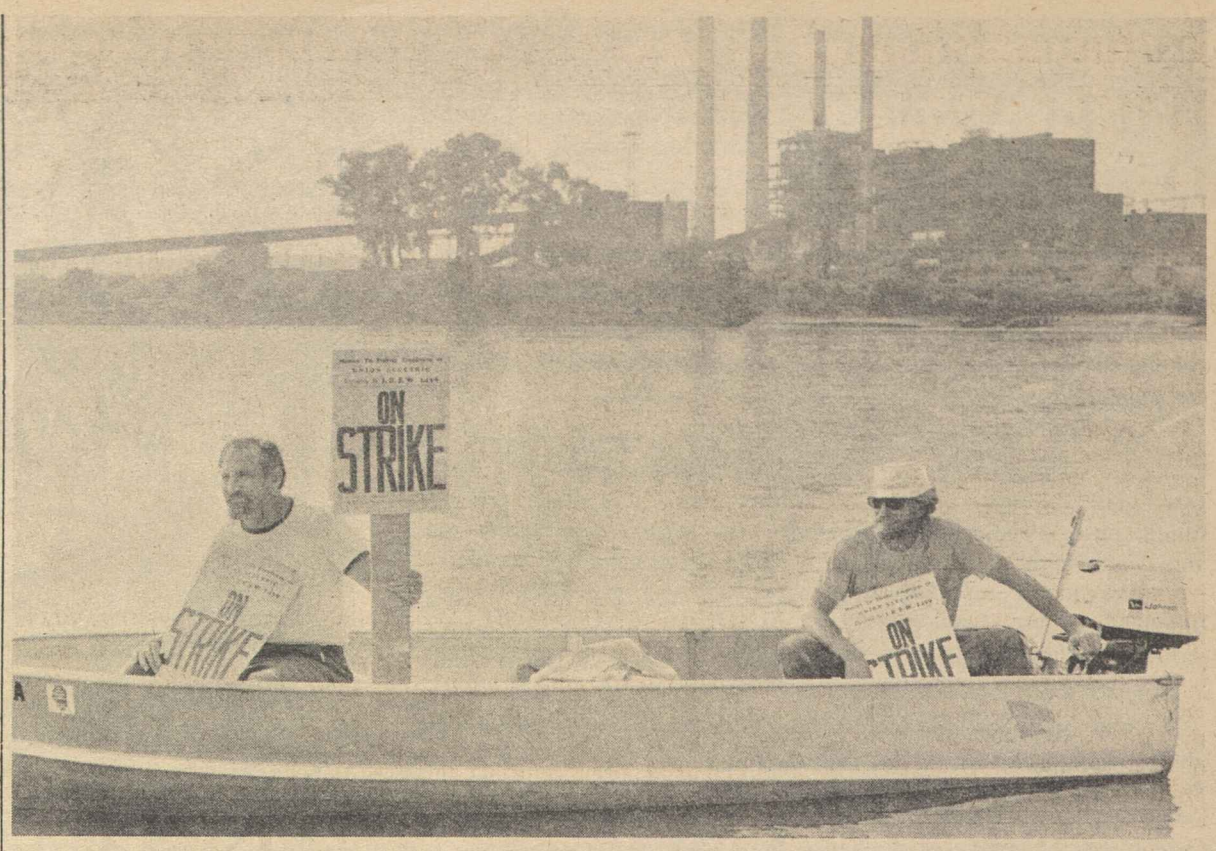
The committee urged an eventual reduction of coke oven emissions to 0.2 micrograms of benzo-a-pyrene per cubic meter of air in the work environment. Benzo-a-pyrene is a known cancer-producing agent, the USWA pointed out.

The union also noted that industry representatives on the committee had agreed that such controls would be effective, but did not want them made mandatory. It said that the Labor Dept. adopted the industry viewpoint in the final proposal.

Under another committee recommendation, a worker could demand to be transferred from a coke oven without affecting his pay or seniority if he felt his health was being endangered by continued exposure to coke oven emissions.

But this recommendation also rejected by the Labor Dept., the USWA said. As the proposal is now written, the standard would not give coke oven workers any earnings safeguards or protect them from discharge because of health impairment.

Abel said the USWA will continue its fight to get effective measures reinserted into the standard. The Labor Dept. has scheduled public hearings on the proposal to begin Nov. 4.



PICKET BOAT manned by members of Local 1439 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers patrols the Mississippi River at St. Louis in the IBEW strike against Union Electric Co. The union local has the boats in operation around-the-clock to alert barges hauling coal to the company's generating plant of the strike. A number of union barges have refused to cross the "picket line," the union reported.

Labor Dept. Calls Imports Cause Of 18,000 Chrysler Auto Layoffs

The Labor Dept. has certified 18,000 of 41,000 jobless and underemployed Chrysler Corp. employes eligible for trade adjustment assistance because imports of cars and auto parts from Canada adversely affected their jobs.

About 23,000 other Chrysler workers were denied certification even though the Auto Workers insisted in petitions filed with the Labor Dept. that all 41,000 were equally hurt by the imports. The Labor Dept. ruled that there was no proof the imports "contributed importantly" to 23,000 of the layoffs.

The UAW legal department said it will likely ask the U.S. Court of Appeals to review the denials under provisions of the 1974 Trade Act. The law provides for judicial review of decisions denying certification.

However, because of the certification of the 18,000—the largest group of workers yet to qualify for trade adjustment benefits — the UAW is now considering petitions for Ford Motor Co. and General Motors Corp. workers whose jobs also were wiped out by imports from other countries.

According to Labor Dept. reports, a total of 26 certifications covering 12,000 workers were issued under the 1974 law prior to the Chrysler-UAW action, while 3,600 workers covered by eight petitions were denied benefits.

Although the statistics appear to show that more workers displaced by imports are certified for benefits than denied, labor economists have warned that the Labor Dept. figures do not take into account "partial certifications."

These involve union petitions on behalf of a group of members who lost jobs to imports, but for which only a portion of the group is certified while the remainder is not counted as being denied certification.

AFL-CIO Economist Elizabeth Jager said that the Labor Dept. has failed to make available data on the number of workers who lose out on benefits in the partial certifications.

The 41,000 workers covered by the UAW petition were employed at 10 Chrysler plants in Michigan, Missouri, Delaware and Illinois. The affected workers were involved in the production of engines and trim and in assembly work.

Certifications were issued for workers at Chrysler's Mound Road engine plant and Lynch Road assembly plant in Detroit; an engine plant at Trenton, Mich.; a trim plant at Lyons, Mich., and an assembly plant at Fenton, Mo.

However, workers involved in the production of six-cylinder engines at the Trenton plant and in the assembly of compact cars in Fenton were not covered by the certification.

The 23,000 workers denied certification were employed at a trim and an assembly plant in Detroit and at assembly plants in Hamtramck, Mich.; Newark, Del., and Belvidere, Ill.

Trade adjustment assistance also has been approved for 1,200 workers who lost their jobs because of increased imports of television and aircraft parts. But at the same time, union petitions for assistance to another 435 workers in the electronics and shoe industries were denied.

Certified eligible for benefits were 800 Machinists formerly employed at a Rohr Industries, Inc., plant in Chula Vista, Calif.

After the IAM filed a petition on behalf of the displaced aircraft workers, the Labor Dept. found that increased imports were a key factor in the job losses.

Also approved for assistance were 400 members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers who were laid off by the GTE Sylvania plant at Batavia, N.Y. The Labor Dept. attributed the job cutbacks to higher imports of transformers for television sets the IUE members had been producing.

However, another 300 IUE members were denied assistance because Labor Dept. investigators held that imports did not significantly contribute to their layoffs at the Wurlitzer Co. plant at North Tonawanda, N.Y.

The Labor Dept. also denied assistance for 135 workers producing women's footwear components at the Northland Shoe Corp. plant in Fryeburg, Me.

Under provisions of the Trade Act, workers whose jobs are adversely affected by imports may become eligible for cash readjustment allowances, training, testing, counseling and job placement.

The cash benefits amount to 70 percent of the worker's wage—not to exceed the national average in manufacturing — for up to 52 weeks.

NLRB Toughens Rule On Employer Violations

Employers illegally blocking union organizing drives may find their unfair labor practices costlier under a new National Labor Relations Board ruling.

The NLRB in a 4-to-1 decision ruled that remedial orders against employers found guilty of refusing to recognize or bargain with a union take effect the date the unfair labor practices began.

Previously, the bargaining remedy order took effect on the date of the board's decision, allowing employers to profit by continuing their unfair labor practices during lengthy NLRB proceedings and court appeals.

The new policy ruling came in a case involving a wholesale grocery firm in Albany, N.Y., and the Teamsters. The board found that Trading Port, Inc., committed flagrant violations of the labor law in combatting efforts of IBT Local 249 to organize the firm's warehouse employes.

In effect, the decision revises the remedial procedures specified in the NLRB's Steel-Fab ruling issued a year ago.

Citing deficiencies in the past date-of-decision remedial bargaining order, the board said:

"In some instances, this left unremedied an employer's unilateral changes in working conditions made after a union had established its majority status.

"This led to the unwanted result that an employer, by committing serious unfair labor practices, could delay the holding of an election indefinitely . . . and insure himself a substantial period of time until the board issued a remedial bargaining order, during which he would not have to deal with a union."

An employer has a right to an election so long as he does not fatally impede the election process, the decision pointed out.

But once the employer has impeded that process, the board stressed, "he has forfeited his right to a board election and must bargain with a union on the basis of other clear indications of employes' desires. It is at that point, we believe, the employer's unlawful refusal to bargain has taken place."

Signing the majority decision were NLRB Chairman Betty Southard Murphy and Board Members John A. Penello and Howard Jenkins, Jr. Member John H. Fanning concurred and Ralph E. Kennedy dissented.

Ralph Mueller Named To Labor Dept. Post

Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop announced he has appointed Ralph R. Mueller as deputy assistant secretary of labor for policy, evaluation and research.

Mueller, who is 38 years old, served previously as a program planning and review official in the Transportation Dept. He has been in government service since 1960.

Miss Thierens Dies, AFL-CIO Paris Staffer

Paris—Jeanne de Thierens, secretary to the AFL-CIO European representative with service to the American labor movement dating back to 1948, died of a cerebral hemorrhage July 30. She was 58.

Miss Thierens's secretarial duties as a bilinguist included assisting the American worker delegation at conferences of the International Labor Organization in Geneva.

A native of Belgium, Miss Thierens had been with the federation's European office in Brussels before it was moved to Paris.

In a message of sympathy to her sister, Mrs. Simone Peeters, AFL-CIO President George Meany said it was a shock to learn of her death.

"To all of who have known her these many, many years, it was not only a great personal loss, but a professional loss as well.

"We knew Jeanne as a charming girl, but we also knew her as American labor's standard bearer in Europe. She will be greatly missed. Mrs. Meany joins me in extending to her family our most heartfelt condolences," Meany said.

Government by Veto (1)

WITH CALLOUS DISREGARD for the American people, President Ford vetoed the Education Appropriation bill. He said it was "too much to ask the American people—and our economy—to bear."

We wholeheartedly disagree.

Unless this veto is overridden local taxpayers will have to bear the increased burden of maintaining the standards needed for a decent education for their children, and parents will have to dig deeper into their savings to subsidize the increased costs of higher education.

Among the programs which would be severely crippled or altogether eliminated by the President's proposed cuts are: Vocational and bilingual education, impact aid, education for the handicapped, institutional assistance in higher education and library resources. If these cuts are made, education will suffer.

The AFL-CIO, its members and their families have a vital stake in education. The future development of this nation's human resources is under attack by an administration that has no faith in America's economic strength.

We call upon the members of the Congress to vote to override this ill-conceived veto by the President.

Government by Veto (2)

PRESIDENT FORD has scared the Congress and some opinion makers into putting a higher priority on keeping the budget deficit down than on meeting the needs of the people.

As a tactic in his campaign to govern by veto, he has created a phony issue. The real issue in America today is the needs of the people, not figures on a chart.

America today is in an economic war for the survival of its way of life, as vital and with as much at stake as in World War II, when the nation fought for the survival of free, democratic governments.

The Congress must not surrender to this phony issue. The 535 men and women elected to represent the American people must have the courage, confidence in America and the foresight to provide the legislation needed to put America back to work. That is the way to insure a healthy economy tomorrow. That means they must pass legislation to create jobs for unemployed Americans, recognizing that government by veto is really the minority forcing its will on the majority.

The policies of the Administration will inevitably prolong the period of large deficits. Every 1 percent decrease in unemployment cuts the deficit by $16 billion—$14 billion in tax receipts and $2 billion in the social costs.

Therefore, we call upon the Budget Committees in the House and the Senate, in their upcoming budget review, to demonstrate concern for the plight of the American people and provide necessary funds for programs to create jobs, ease the suffering of the unemployed and thus reduce the budget deficit.

A Word Edgewise:

Smart Operators, Giant Firms Manipulate 'the Dismal Science'

By John P. Roche

I DON'T KNOW HOW YOU FEEL about it, but by me it's too hot for politics. New England has joined the tropics, and besides my wife is going through that disconcerting exercise called anticipatory packing. That is, she is thinking about what to pack for our vacation when she gets to packing.

This involves a complete inventory and a number of baffling questions. For example, "If it's been this hot in July, don't you think we'll have a chilly August?" This question is not abstract—it concerns the direct matter of whether or not to pack that category known as fall clothes in addition to light summer wear. Since, as you know, my prophetic powers are limited, I suggested she consult the National Weather Service on the long-range forecast. This was decidedly not, from her point of view, a friendly reply.

Thinking about this exchange led me to meditate on my vast areas of ignorance, particularly economics. In the fall of 1940 I enrolled for an economics course in college but, after two weeks devoted to the law of marginal utility, departed for philosophy. Except to study the history of economic theory, I have never revisited "the dismal science."

I have also never played the stock market (which always struck me as the country club version of the numbers racket) though, of course, I am involved indirectly through my pension fund. Thus, as a complete and dedicated amateur, I find there are certain aspects of the economy that defy rational explanation—and logic is an area in which I am thoroughly at home.

For example, take the Dow-Jones average. What precisely controls its gyrations? The phases of the moon? I vividly recall the day President John Kennedy was murdered: I was at a legal conference at the University of Chicago Law School and we had just sat down for lunch. The grim news arrived and a radio arrived with it, and as we sat there—food uneaten—the dreadful coverage from Dallas was interrupted by a bulletin: the Dow-Jones average had plunged. This struck me as insane—the United States was still the United States—and I turned to my neighbor and long-time sparring companion Father Robert S. Drinan (then dean of the Boston College Law School, now my congressman) and said with some anger, "What did they throw that in for?" Bob, a true Jesuit and always more wordly than I, replied, "So smart operators can buy." Within several days the Dow-Jones was back up, and I suppose a lot of panic-stricken suckers took a bath.

Then there is the intriguing question of how great American corporations could hide their domestic political contributions and their baksheesh to various foreign potentates from their auditors. Every year I get a statement from the Teachers' Insurance & Annuity Association, which handles educational pensions, that lays out in detail its annual operations. At the end is a solemn statement by a distinguished auditing firm that they have gone over the books and everything is kosher. Presumably stockholders in various corporations like United Brands, Mobil, Exxon and American Airlines receive similar documents winding up with an auditor's statement virtually signed in blood.

WHEN THE PRESIDENT of United Brands committed suicide, the Securities & Exchange Commission suddenly awoke and discovered that the firm had been paying off the President of Honduras to get cut-rate bananas. Since then it has been disclosed that other corporations have been engaged in the same practice.

I know enough about the seamy side of life to know that in many countries you can't shake hands with a potential supplier without paying off everybody above the rank of colonel in the dictatorship. (Indeed, a similar "finder's fee" used to exist openly in many states here—and, for all I know, still does.) But my question is: How do you hide a million-dollar bribe from the auditors—and thus from the stockholders? And what about the Internal Revenue Service?

To put it in personal terms, if I gave 10 professors $1,000 each to assign my latest book to their big classes (and I hasten to add that the academic profession is immune to such temptation) and then deducted $10,000 from my income as "Advertising," my hunch is the IRS would shortly be knocking at my door. So under what heading do these corporations carry their "finder's fees?" I can only speculate, but given the up-to-date, "with-it" attitudes of some trendy young executives, perhaps they carry these funds under "Affirmative Action" and "Community Development."

Recovery Claims a 'Sham':

Program Pressed by Council To Revive Housing Industry

Following is a statement on housing by the AFL-CIO Executive Council on July 30, 1975, at Chicago.

ADMINISTRATION CLAIMS of a recovery in housing construction are a sham. Rhetoric cannot hide the facts:

- The annual rate of housing starts for June was 1,070,000 units, down 5 percent from May, and the lowest June level in 28 years.
- Unemployment among construction workers generally is 21 percent. Unemployment among workers in housing is much higher. Additionally, a significant portion of the 12 percent unemployment rate in manufacturing is attributable to the depression in the housing industry.
- The unsold inventory of new homes at the end of May was 382,000, despite some increase in new home sales related to tax credits of up to $2,000 for new home purchases. The median price of a new home sold in May was about $40,000.
- Housing starts for the first half of 1975 were fully 33 percent below the total for the first half of 1974. Even if there is some improvement in the second half of the year, housing production in 1975 will be only about half the 2.2 million units per year needed to meet the nation's basic housing needs.

The picture on the price scene is equally disturbing.

Inflationary pressures upon rents and prices of housing are already being felt as shortages develop. During the past year, rents have increased 5 percent, the median price of existing homes sold has increased 10 percent and the median price of a new home has gone up 12 percent. Further increases can be expected so long as the nation is building only half the housing units it needs.

Mortgage interest rates are still at levels of about 9 percent for homes and 10 percent for apartment projects. These high rates place monthly housing expenses and required rents beyond the economic reach of most American families.

Nevertheless, the President vetoed the original Emergency Housing Act that would have made 6 and 7 percent mortgage financing available.

The subsequent Emergency Housing Act he did sign authorizes the Government National Mortgage Association to purchase mortgages with 7½ percent interest rates. That is little change from the 7¾ percent mortgage funds available during 1974 which utterly failed to spark a housing recovery. Furthermore, GNMA is reselling at substantial discounts the mortgages that it has acquired, thus providing lenders with 9 percent yields, absorbing large amounts of savings capital and helping to sustain the high private mortgage interest rates so disastrous to the housing industry.

At the same time, the Administration has in effect vetoed effective use of low-income housing programs that could generate needed housing construction. While funds were reserved for 35,000 new units under the Section 8 program by June 30, it will be many months before those units are under construction because of delays in processing the applications.

Meanwhile, another 300,000 units still have not received final approval even though they have been in the processing pipeline since 1973, primarily under the Section 236 and low-rent public housing programs. Further, effective use of the housing for the elderly loan program has been blocked by the Administration's refusal to make long-term loans. Instead, the Administration offers only construction loans, contrary to the intent of the law.

CONTINUED HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT is making it increasingly difficult for out of work homeowners to meet their mortgage payments. Mortgage delinquency figures for the first three months of 1975 were the highest in 23 years, foreshadowing an increase in foreclosures.

The history of past recessions is that a revival in the housing industry leads to a recovery. By its actions in holding down the housing industry, the Administration is deliberately prolonging the recession.

Therefore, to stimulate recovery, provide needed housing and reduce unemployment, we demand that the Administration take the following immediate actions:

1. Expedite issuance of final commitments for housing projects—especially under Sections 235, 236 and public housing—that have been delayed in the processing pipeline since 1973, so that construction can be started.

2. Accept and process new applications under the same programs to the full extent permitted by existing authorizations.

3. Cease actions to keep mortgage interest rates high by stopping the sale of previously-purchased mortgages from the GNMA portfolio.

4. Make long-term mortgage loans for housing for the elderly projects.

5. Implement the emergency mortgage relief provisions of the Emergency Housing Act of 1975 to protect unemployed homeowners against loss of their homes.

On Wages, Benefits:

Federal Employes Still Lack Effective Bargaining Rights

TRUE COLLECTIVE bargaining on wages and fringe benefits for federal workers is needed to put sense and stability into federal labor-management relations, President Clyde Webber of the Government Employees declared on Labor News Conference.

The product of those negotiations would then be part of the proposed budget the President sends to Congress, Webber said, stressing that pay adjustments in the private sector would be a major factor in the bargaining.

"The principal difference," he said, would be the "give-and-take of true collective bargaining, with the possibility of going to a third party if we failed to reach agreement," instead of the present "unilateral system in which we are only consulted." He said the system would operate along the same lines as negotiations are now conducted between the postal unions and the Postal Service.

Webber said it is "tragically true" that federal employes have been "patsies" for the Administration's so-called anti-inflation wage controls. He pointed out that even the last federal pay increase was based on "data gathered under wage controls," although the increase didn't take effect until five months after controls had expired.

Webber charged that "as a practical matter, federal employes are still being paid under the wage controls of the Nixon Administration."

Turning to the drive to amend the Hatch Act to expand the rights of federal employes to take an active part in politics, he said the AFGE strongly supports the Clay bill, which has now cleared the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee. He said the main provisions of that measure would permit federal employes to work in campaigns, make contributions and be candidates for office. He said the present Hatch Act provisions are overly restrictive on the rights of federal employes, who should be able to be active in politics on their own time, if they so choose.

Reporters questioning Webber on the AFL-CIO produced interview were Ben Rathbun of the Bureau of National Affairs and Harry Conn, of Press Associates, Inc. The program is broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

SINCE 1866 the metric system has been a legal but not a mandatory system of measurement in this country.

As other industrialized nations adopted the metric system there has been a growing pressure for the United States to take a similar step. In 1966 Congress passed a measure requiring the Dept. of Commerce to study the feasibility of greater use of the metric system.

Finally, in 1972 the Senate passed legislation to implement the recommendations of the Commerce Dept. study but the move died in the 92nd Congress when the House failed to act.

In October of 1973, the House Science Committee reported legislation that would have set up a national board to coordinate and plan a voluntary conversion program.

The problem faced by the 1973 legislation, leading to its defeat on the House floor, was the committee's argument that the costs of the conversion should "lie where they fall" and that there should be no funds to assist small business to convert or to help workers buy the new tools or complete any necessary retraining. Faced with this, many unions opposed the measure.

Recently the House Science & Technology Committee reported out a new metrics bill that carefully bypasses the position taken by the House Committee in 1973.

It would set up a 25-member national board to help coordinate voluntary conversion to metrics. The board would deal with such questions as subsidies for workers, retraining and so on. The 1973 bill called for a 10-year conversion period target. The new measure does not set a time period.

Basically, the board under the new bill would have three basic responsibilities. It would draw up a broad program to plan and coordinate voluntary conversion by industry, carry out education programs to make the metric system familiar to the public and conduct research to determine the effects of conversion on consumers, labor, small business and other groups.

Trade union representatives would have preferred that the bill call for protection of workers during the conversion period. But since the bill did not deal directly with this issue it was thought that unions could go along with the measure.

However, the report of the committee may well undermine that prospect. A committee report is part of the critical legislative history of a bill and therefore has a hefty impact on interpretation.

"The committee feels that minimum costs will be incurred if conversion is accomplished, in general, without federal subsidies," the report said. "A program of automatic general reimbursement by the federal government would be very difficult to administer."

Then, almost as an afterthought, the committee report suggested that the board could recommend legislation if it identified "unresolved problem areas."

Union representatives who have been working on the metrics bill believe that the language in the committee report seems to condemn the whole concept of a general subsidy program to help workers pay for metric tools. This, apparently, is contrary to the understanding labor representatives worked out with the committee.

Tom Hannigan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, one of the union representatives, observed: "The bill is acceptable. The report is a disaster."

Several steps may yet be taken to bring labor support to the bill. One could be amendments on the floor of the House that would correct the legislative history as provided in the committee report. Meetings have been held with Rep. James W. Symington (D-Mo.), chairman of the subcommittee that wrote the original bill, to decide on a course of action.

But if Committee Chairman Olin E. Teague (D-Tex.) wins a rule from the House Rules Committee that would bar amendments this could well lead to defeat of the measure as in 1973.

SENSE AND STABILITY in federal labor-management relations would be the sure product of true collective bargaining for wages and fringe benefits for federal workers, Government Employees President Clyde Webber, center, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Harry Conn, left, of Press Associates and Ben Rathbun of the Bureau of National Affairs.

House Rollcall on Oil Price Rollback

The House on July 30 approved a labor-supported amendment to an energy conservation bill that would retain price ceilings on oil from "old" wells and partially roll back the inflated price being charged for "new" oil. The vote was 218-207.

Right votes (R) for the price rollback amendment were cast by 203 Democrats and 15 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 79 Democrats and 128 Republicans.

Committee Actions:

Labor-Backed Bills Clear Key Hurdles

Two union-backed bills won committee approval before Congress began a summer recess that will last through Labor Day.

The Senate Labor Committee approved a construction site picketing bill almost identical to the measure the House passed on July 25. And the House Judiciary Committee endorsed a bill designed to crack down on employers who hire illegal aliens.

Senate voting on the jobsite picketing bill is likely to be considerably closer than the 13-1 margin in the Senate Labor Committee.

The committee added to the bill passed up by a subcommittee several amendments similar to those adopted by the House. One would retain existing restrictions on common site picketing in cases where, in order to comply with state laws, cities and states had let out bids for each phase of a construction job instead of operating through a general contractor who hires subcontractors.

But it turned down anti-union amendments that are likely to be offered when the bill reaches the Senate floor, including one by Sen. Paul Laxalt (R-Nev.) that would prohibit common site picketing in "right-to-work" states that ban the union shop.

Laxalt was the only committee member to vote against sending the bill to the Senate floor. Its chief sponsors are the chairman and senior Republican on the committee—Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) and Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.).

The House Judiciary Committee voted 26-5 for a bill that is intended to crack down on employers who hire illegal aliens — usually as a source of cheap workers who can be intimidated by threats to turn them in to immigration officials.

As approved by the committee, the bill seeks to strike a balance by combining its penalties for employment of aliens with an "amnesty" provision that would make it possible for many "illegals" with long residence in the United States to obtain permission to stay, and reinforcing the ban against job discrimination based on national origin.

The legislation would set up a three-tier system of penalties.

The first stage would be a "citation"—a form of warning without penalty to any employer who hires an illegal alien or employment service which refers an illegal to a job. For this stage, it is not necessary to prove that the violation was "knowing."

Within two years thereafter, however, an employer who knowingly repeated the offense would be subject to a fine of up to $500 for each illegal alien in his employ.

Further such violations are made misdemeanors, subject to fines of up to $1,000 and imprisonment up to one year for each illegally employed alien.

The so-called amnesty provision would authorize, but not require, the Attorney General to grant permanent resident alien status to illegals who have been continuously in the United States since June 30, 1968, and who are closely related to U.S. citizens or permanent resident aliens.

Under present immigration law, there is no penalty for employers who hire illegal aliens and they are specifically exempted from being prosecuted for unlawfully "harboring" an illegal alien. The House bill would remove that exemption.

Similar bills have passed the House in both the 93rd Congress and the 92nd Congress, but on both occasions were kept off the Senate floor by an Immigration subcommittee headed by Sen. James O. Eastland (D-Miss.).

The AFL-CIO Executive Council noted at its mid-winter meeting this year that Eastland's only interest has been in reviving the bracero program which admitted large numbers of farm workers from Mexico each year.

Federal Wage Law Violations Jump Sharply

Union economists point out that additional millions of dollars in income is lost by thousands of workers because numerous cases of wage chiseling go undetected or unreported.

Labor Dept. investigations cover only a small percentage of employers each year, and these are largely based on complaints filed by workers.

Employer violations of the time-and-one-half wage rate for overtime work again led the illegal underpayments during the last fiscal year, although the amount of income lost was down slightly from fiscal 1974.

In fiscal 1975, 254,968 workers were underpaid $45.8 million for overtime work. This compares with 214,412 workers being underpaid $47.1 million in the preceding year.

An additional 228,210 employes were underpaid $29.8 million because of minimum wage violations, an increase from the 138,370 workers who lost $22.4 million in minimum wage underpayments a year earlier.

Violations of equal pay provisions that guarantee women the same wages men receive for substantially equal work increased to $26.4 million from $20.6 million in fiscal 1974.

Age discrimination violations were $6.5 million, up from $6.3 million.

Reed Elected To No. 2 Post By Laborers

W. Vernie Reed, first vice president of the Laborers, has been elected secretary-treasurer by the union's executive board to succeed Terrance J. O'Sullivan.

O'Sullivan, who held the post since 1968, submitted his resignation to the executive board at a recent meeting in Chicago.

Mason Warren, manager of the Laborers' California-Arizona-Nevada region, was elected a vice president to fill a vacancy.

Reed, 59, has been a member of the Laborers since 1936 and held a number of offices in LIU Local 252 at Tacoma, Wash. He also served in regional posts of the union and with the Washington state Building & Construction Trades Council.

He was appointed to the LIU headquarters organizing staff in 1960 and later that year was named director of the department of organization and jurisdiction. He was elected a vice president of the LIU in 1961.

MODEL NATIONAL AGREEMENT to protect the rights and jobs of transit workers is signed by union and employer association officials as Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop watches. From left are President Daniel Maroney of the Amalgamated Transit Union, President Matthew Guinan of the Transport Workers, Stanley Gates and B. R. Stokes of American Public Transit Association.

Transit Pact Protects Job, Union Rights

The Amalgamated Transit Union and the Transport Workers signed a national agreement with an employers' group to protect workers who may be affected by federal operating assistance grants to local transit systems.

The model agreement between the two unions and the American Public Transit Association, which has 270 public transit employer affiliates, establishes standards and procedures to safeguard the jobs and interests of transit workers.

It provides protection from layoffs, job downgrading and relocation resulting from technological changes and the takeover by municipalities of private transit systems.

Under the agreement, employers are required to preserve and continue collective bargaining rights of their workers, assure jobs to employes of acquired mass transit systems and provide training programs and paid allowances to laid-off workers.

Operating assistance grants to transit systems are administered by the Dept. of Transportation under the 1964 Urban Mass Transportation Act. A section of the act gives the Secretary of Labor the responsibility of guaranteeing the rights of transit workers.

Witnessing the signing of the document, Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop said he expects the National Employee Protective Agreement to set a national pattern for unions and employers. He pointed out, however, that the national agreement may not be appropriate in some situations.

Several other unions representing railroad and transportation workers participated in the negotiations, but final approval is under review by their leadership.

Dunlop congratulated the parties in the agreement, stressing that effective collective bargaining again proved successful in resolving conflicts over federal rules affecting labor and management. He also praised the role of Lewis M. Gill, a Philadelphia mediator, who helped bring the sides together after the discussions reached an impasse.

The Labor Dept. said that the agreement is expected to speed certification of applications for grants. The number of certifications during the first half of 1975 have been running well above the total number for all of 1974.

President Matthew Guinan of the Transport Workers and President Daniel V. Maroney, Jr. of the Amalgamated Transit Union were the signatories representing labor.

Public Bargaining Law Pressed by McClennan

Chicago—A federal labor relations law covering public employes and giving their unions the same kind of protection the Wagner Act provided for unions in industry is the principal legislative goal of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., President William H. McClennan said at a news conference here.

"There are some problems that have to be worked out by the various government employe unions so that we can talk with a single voice in support of an agreed-upon approach," McClennan said.

Some of these problems involve the determination of the bargaining unit, the eligibility of supervisors to belong to the union, and the question of the right to strike, particularly as it applies to uniformed services like the fire fighters and police.

"If the right of strike is to be denied these two groups, there must be a satisfactory alternative, through impasse mediation and binding arbitration," McClennan said. He is also president of the fire fighters.

He reported that the Public Employee Dept., which is preparing for its second convention on Sept. 3 and 4, has moved ahead since its creation last November and now has 29 affiliates with a total membership of about 2.5 million.

He charged that the "cities are in crisis" and badly need financial aid if they are to survive. "We have helped people all around the world," McClennan commented, "and now we ought to be able to help our own people in the cities of America."

Some politicians are recommending a wage freeze for municipal employes, the PED president said, "but that didn't work for the nation in the Nixon Administration and it won't work now in the public sector. The cities have terrible problems; I know the unions recognize this and want to cooperate. But we can't expect public employes to subsidize the cities through wage cuts or a wage freeze."

Inflation Impact Pushes Families Into Poverty

Although the income of American families increased last year, it did not keep up with inflation, and the number of people living in poverty rose for the third year in the last five, according to the Census Bureau.

Median family income—the point at which half of all families are above and half are below—was figured by the bureau at $12,840, up seven percent over 1973. But real median income declined by some 4 percent because of an 11 percent increase in the rate of inflation last year.

Among families whose breadwinners were able to keep their jobs in 1974, median income was $16,072, up 10 percent from 1973, but down about one percent when adjusted for rising prices.

The bureau reported that families with income over $20,445 were in the top 20 percent among America's 55.7 million families; those over $31,948 were in the top 5 percent; those over $50,000 were in the top 1 percent.

The bureau's latest report showed once more that distribution of family income has changed little over recent years. The top 20 percent of all families had about 40 percent of the income. The bottom 20 percent had only about 5 percent of all income.

The bureau also found that 24.3 million persons lived below the government's official poverty line of $5,038 in annual income for a family of four—an increase of 1.3 million, or 5.6 percent, from 1973. That meant that 11.6 percent of the country's population—about one out of nine persons—were living in poverty as the government defines it.

Since 1959 when the government first began keeping an official figure as to what income was needed to keep a family from being classified as living in poverty, the number has increased in only four years and three of them have been in this decade: 1960, 1970, 1971 and now 1974.

The bureau also released figures to show which groups of people live in poverty. Last year, the impoverished included 15.7 percent of all people over 65; 8.9 percent of the whites; 31.4 percent of the blacks; 15.5 percent of all children under 18 and 40.7 percent of all black children under 18.

Severe Joblessness Grips Record 131 Major Centers

Even with the statistical gains, the BLS report showed that the jobless rates remained the same or showed little improvement for adult men, full-time workers, household heads and white workers.

Over the month, the jobless rate did ease a bit for adult women, teenagers and black workers. Yet unemployment in July for women was 7.9 percent, for teenagers 19.1 percent and for minority workers 13 percent.

While the jobless rate declined for blue-collar workers from 12.6 percent to 12.1 percent in July, the rate for white-collar workers held steady at 4.8 percent.

Based on the household survey data, the unemployment rate for construction workers was 20.8 percent in July, down slightly, and dropped almost a full percentage point in manufacturing to 11.1 percent.

Yet, the BLS payroll survey showed that the number of jobs in contract construction dropped by 44,000 in July to 3,360,000 and in manufacturing declined 39,000 to 18,032,000.

These losses were offset by the employment gains in the service-producing industries, including 55,000 more jobs in retail trade, 65,000 in services and 25,000 in state and local government.

BLS pointed out that the number of manufacturing jobs in July was 2.3 million below the pre-recession high in December 1973, noting that most of the falloff occurred since last September.

Even with the 88,000 increase in payroll employment over the month, the total number of jobs remains about where it was in March and 2.1 million below the level of July 1974, the BLS report showed.

Although the household survey showing the 630,000 increase in employment over the month pleased some government economists, they expressed doubt that it was the beginning of a long-term trend.

The Wall Street Journal quoted one White House economist, who cited the contrast between the household and payroll employment gains, as suggesting that the current unemployment rate may actually be closer to 8.9 percent and that the August survey could bear this out.

The household survey is conducted and tabulated by the Census Bureau for the BLS and is the basis for establishing the unemployment rate. Statistics on payroll employment are collected by state agencies from payroll records of employers and are tabulated by the BLS.

Both surveys are generally conducted during the week containing the 12th day of the month.

BLS said that the number of unemployed workers who lost their last job declined by 240,000 to 4.6 million July, the first decline in 11 months.

However, the number of long-term unemployed continued to rise last month. There were 3 million workers unemployed 15 weeks or longer, comprising 3.2 percent of the labor force. This is triple the rate of July 1974.

The average duration of unemployment was unchanged in July at 15.4 weeks and is about five weeks longer than a year ago.

For workers covered by state unemployment insurance programs the jobless rate declined in July to 6.2 percent from 7 percent in May and June, BLS reported.

It also noted that the number of workers who had taken part-time jobs because no full-time jobs were available declined 700,000 from the April-May level to 3.2 million last month.

The average workweek for all production and nonsupervisory workers on nonfarm payrolls edged up to 36.1 hours after holding steady at 36 hours for three months.

The average workweek in manufacturing rose four-tenths of an hour in July to 39.5, but was still 1.4 hours below pre-recession levels of early 1973.

Factory overtime also rose last month by two-tenths of an hour to 2.6 hours. However, this was eight-tenths of an hour below July 1974 and 1.5 hours below April 1973 peak.

BLS said that the hourly earnings index rose only two-tenths of 1 percent last month. And after adjustments for increased prices over the year, the purchasing power of the average worker declined seven-tenths of 1 percent during the 12-month period ended in June.

Job Quality Index

Handbag Jobs Periled By New Tariff Slashes

Further reduction in tariffs on imported handbags would soon wipe out the entire domestic handbag industry, leaving thousands of additional persons jobless, the Leather Goods Workers warned at U.S. foreign trade hearings.

"Our industry is fighting for its life," Leather Workers President Benjamin Feldman declared, and "our workers for a livelihood that has already been depressed by imports."

In a six-year period through the end of 1974, Feldman said, employment in the U.S. handbag industry dropped 17 percent—from 24,000 in 1968 to about 20,000 last year—because of the competition from low-wage imports.

Feldman presented the testimony to the Trade Policy Staff Committee, an interagency panel that advises U.S. negotiators currently involved in trade talks in Geneva.

He reiterated the union's position against additional cuts in tariffs and stressed that his members are opposed to extending preferential tariff treatment to so-called developing countries that are exporting handbags to the United States.

"Any government action which would accelerate the rate of import growth—such as would result from reduced import duties in general or granting duty-free treatment on handbags from developing countries—would only hasten the demise of this industry," Feldman declared.

He said that Leather Goods Workers have lost more than just their jobs to the imports, since the foreign competition has eroded wages.

"Workers who remain are largely members of minority groups whose alternative employment opportunities are limited," Feldman told the panel. "Their earnings are substantially below the national average for workers in manufacturing industries."

He also noted that the unemployment rate in the handbag industry is about double the national rate.

This all stems from the substantial rise in imports over the past several years to the point where at least 40 percent of the U.S. market has been captured by foreign handbags, Feldman said.

Tracing the increase in imports, he pointed out that in 1967 foreign handbags in the U.S. market amounted to 40 million units valued at $45 million. By 1973, imports totaled 67 million units valued at $108 million, representing a 67 percent rise in quantity and a 140 percent increase in value.

Feldman said it is essential for the survival of the industry and the jobs of his members that U.S trade negotiators refrain from extending duty-free treatment to the developing countries which pay their workers substandard wages.

He also called on the committee to seriously consider negotiating an increase in tariffs on imports that endanger American industries. He pointed out that it was the intent of Congress in drafting the 1974 Trade Act to provide such protection for endangered industries through an increase in tariffs.

Plan for On-Site 'Consultations' Hit As Dilution of Job Health-Safety Act

Enforcement of the federal Occupational Safety & Health Act shouldn't be diluted to provide on-site "consultative" services to employers, union witnesses testified at House hearings.

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. F. Howard McGuigan, Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman of the federation's Industrial Union Dept. and Steelworkers Legislative Director John J. Sheehan expressed concern at bills that would direct the Labor Dept. to offer guidance to employers on compliance with safety and health regulations.

The thrust of their testimony to a House Labor subcommittee was that this would divert the Labor Dept. resources from the key enforcement mission and would be a wedge for employer groups who would like to see the teeth extracted from the job safety law.

McGuigan said most states already provide consultative services for employers — either through state-operated programs approved by the Labor Dept. or through the 50 percent federal financing available to states that do not operate their own safety enforcement programs so they can set up advisory consultation services to employers.

McGuigan and George Taylor, who is executive secretary of the AFL-CIO's standing committee on job safety and health, noted that labor doesn't object to on-site consultation as "one means" of encouraging safety compliance.

But McGuigan stressed that state reliance on "consultations without enforcement" was a principal reason why a federal job safety and health law became necessary.

As for protests by or on behalf of small employers about their problems with enforcement, McGuigan suggested that there are better means than a "consultation" program, which experience indicates would seldom be used.

There is a real need, he suggested, "for OSHA to develop simple pamphlets which tell an employer who runs a laundry, a machine shop, a small construction company, a retail establishment, a service station, what OSHA standards apply . . . and how to obtain further, detailed information and assistance."

Clayman told the subcommittee that the IUD has supported small business educational programs "because most workers are employed in small shops and because conditions in these workplaces probably exceed in horror conditions found in most large industries."

He spoke of auto mechanics inhaling deadly asbestos fibers while working on brakes and clutches, of cleaning fluids used by dry cleaners that carry a high cancer risk and of difficult to comprehend standards "developed in the language of the technicians of the major industries."

With Clayman were Sheldon W. Samuels, the IUD's health, safety and environment director, and associate Legislative Rep. Howard Hague, Jr. A study they undertook found a broad array of private and public consultative services available, but often little used.

There is more that can be done with "will and leadership," Clayman said, but it would be a mistake to merge the role of enforcement with education.

Sheehan told the panel that labor's position has always been that enforcement should remain a federal responsibility while the states should be encouraged to provide education, training and consultation services in the job health-safety area.

He charged that much of the pressure to get the Labor Dept. involved in consultative services to employers is generated by groups whose real objective is to weaken the enforcement of the law and eliminate first-violation penalties.

Council Calls Seniority Rule Key Safeguard

that there is no justification for conferring "preferential rights" upon minorities.

The council statement stressed that seniority is a safeguard even for those who are laid off, because it assures that they will have preference in rehiring over other job-seekers. They don't have to "start from scratch in securing re-employment."

In other action, the Executive Council:

- Passed a resolution of tribute to Arnold Zander, first president of the State, County & Municipal Employees, who died recently. Public employes and all trade unionists are in his debt, the council said.
- Asked AFL-CIO affiliates to "respond generously" to the fund drive to sustain the Jewish Daily Forward, a Yiddish-language newspaper that "has been in the forefront of labor's battles" since 1897 and a champion of freedom at home and abroad. The council voted a $10,000 contribution to start off the fund drive.
- Voted contributions also to the following organizations: Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, League for Industrial Democracy, Clergy Economic Education Foundation, Jewish Labor Committee and National Planning Association.

'Hometown Lobby' Spurs Labor's Legislative Goals

Meany Asks Updating of Jobless Aid

Congress was urged by AFL-CIO President George Meany to use the 40th anniversary of the Social Security Act as a catalyst for improving the unemployment compensation system, rather than as an occasion for platitudes.

Unemployment insurance was one of the income safeguards written into the 1935 law, Meany noted, along with the basic retirement and survivor benefits, grants to the states for aid to dependent children, and an array of social and health services.

But while other portions of the law have been frequently updated, the federal-state unemployment compensation provisions are "virtually unchanged" and are keyed to the economy of the 1930s, Meany said.

It's been the "first line of defense against poverty and recession . . . but the line has become very thin. Millions of workers are still not covered," Meany said. "Benefits are far too low and their duration often too short. Employers have forced the states to underfinance the program and to impose harsh disqualifications on workers who are entitled to unemployment insurance protections."

To remedy these defects, the AFL-CIO is supporting the bill introduced by Rep. James C. Corman (D-Calif.). Meany termed the Corman bill "the first serious effort in many years to provide the nation with an unemployment compensation program to meet the needs of a modern industrial society."

The labor-backed bill would provide close to universal coverage of unemployment compensation, set benefit payments at two-thirds of lost wages for most workers, establish a program of extended benefits without a cumbersome "trigger-on" mechanism, strengthen financing and establish qualifying standards.

Quick enactment of this legislation, Meany said, "would be the ideal way to celebrate the 40th anniversary of social security."

Meany termed the social security system "basically sound" and noted that currently:

- More than 31 million persons —retirees, disabled persons, dependents and survivors — receive $5 billion a month in benefits under the old age, survivors, disability and Medicare programs.
- Another 4 million aged, blind and disabled persons receive about $500 million a month in Supplemental Security Income payments.

Grain Costs Continue to Shoot Up

U.S. grain prices shot upward as traders anticipated shortages due to poor growing conditions and the likelihood of more large-scale grain sales to the Soviet Union.

"We do want to sell more to the USSR, and if this crop materializes it will be easily within our capacity to do so," Agriculture Sec. Earl L. Butz told a news conference even though the department had just announced that the outlook for the 1975 harvest had deteriorated from earlier forecasts.

Butz nevertheless backtracked and said he would ask grain exporters to refrain from further sales to the Soviets for an indefinite period. He said forecasts for the 1975 harvest should be clear by Sept. 1. The Soviets already have contracted to buy 9.8 million tons of American grain.

The fear in many quarters, including the labor movement, is that huge sales of grain to the USSR at a time of domestic shortages will drive up food prices for American consumers. Massive purchases of U.S. grain by the Soviets in 1972 touched off sharp price rises that led to double-digit inflation.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, at its recent mid-summer meeting in Chicago, warned against another great grain giveaway to the Soviet Union.

The council called for "effective government regulation of exports . . . when such exports will create domestic shortages and inflation."

Inflation's Toll:

Expenses Jump 11% For Retired Couples

New evidence of the toll taken by the nation's double-digit inflation last year is provided in government figures showing that the cost of living for a retired couple rose 11 percent above the year before.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics says it costs a retired couple $6,041 a year to maintain an "intermediate" standard of living in an urban center. That's 11 percent more than the previous budget.

But the $6,041 figure is for the fall of 1974 and the BLS notes that the consumer price index went up another 5 percent while the figures were being compiled.

That would bring the cost to $6,343 for the middle level, $4,439 for the "lower" budget and $9,417 at the higher level. The October 1974 figures were $4,228 for the lower budget and $8,969 for the higher.

The budgets are based on a hypothetical package of goods and services that might be purchased by a man aged 65 or more and his wife. They are assumed to be self-supporting and in reasonably good health.

The jump of 11 percent between 1973 and 1974 did not stem as much from food costs as did the increase of the year before. Yet the food cost increase was still sizable, up 10.4 percent in the latest intermediate budget, compared to 20 percent between 1972 and 1973.

But some other costs increased even more. Transportation, reflecting the surge in oil and gasoline prices, jumped 15.7 percent for the higher budget, 14.1 percent for the middle and 14.3 percent for the lowest.

Retirees who relied on public transportation fared slightly better than the auto owners. Housing and medical care cost increases were

Major Bills Top Agenda In Congress

The AFL-CIO's state and local central bodies are using the August recess of Congress to push labor's legislative program at hometown meetings with congressmen and senators.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller wrote central body officers that their help is "of vital importance" to the AFL-CIO's program. He listed a series of major votes coming up soon after Labor Day, including two attempts to override President Ford's vetoes.

Only once this year has Congress mustered the two-thirds majority needed to overturn a veto, and important parts of labor's program depend on improving that record.

The first veto override attempt will come in the Senate on the bill extending present limited price controls on oil for an additional six months. Without such controls, the present $5.25 a barrel price for oil from old wells would be free to rise to the $13 range of uncontrolled oil, or to whatever the market will bear.

If the Senate votes to override, a House vote will follow.

"Termination of controls means continued escalation of oil prices to the consumer," Biemiller warned.

On Sept. 9, the House is scheduled to vote on overriding Ford's veto of the $7.4 billion education appropriations bill.

"Unless this veto is overridden," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said at its recent meeting in Chicago, "local taxpayers will have to bear the increased burden of maintaining the standards needed for a decent education . . . and parents will have to dig deeper into their savings to subsidize the increased costs of higher education."

HEW Chief Urged to Cancel Plan To Ban Aid to Strikers' Children

AFL-CIO President George Meany has asked the new Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare to withdraw a punitive anti-striker welfare regulation that had been initiated by Caspar Weinberger before he left office.

In a telegram to HEW Sec. F. David Matthews, Meany said the proposed regulation would "unfairly penalize the children of strikers" in states that allow aid for dependent children payments to needy families where the father is unemployed. About half the states make such federally-assisted payments.

If the regulation becomes final—after a 30-day period for public comment—a state would not be permitted to pay AFDC benefits to a family with a father unemployed because of a labor dispute, unless that state's law also allowed unemployment compensation to be paid under those circumstances.

Only two states allow jobless payments to strikers, and then only after long waiting periods. And some states even disqualify workers laid off because of disputes in which they are not directly involved.

The AFL-CIO's position, Meany said, is that "welfare benefits should be available to citizens who are demonstrably in need without regard for the cause of that need. We firmly oppose the concept of punishing children because their father is exercising his legal right to strike."

Meany asked Matthews "to withdraw this proposed regulation pending your personal study of the question."

The controversy has been simmering since the Supreme Court in 1972 struck down a Maryland state regulation that barred welfare aid to families of strikers. The court held that the restriction was not in accord with HEW regulations that were silent on the issue.

In 1973, HEW responded with a regulation that had been opposed by labor, church and child welfare groups allowing a state to disqualify

Network Schedules Set for Labor Day

AFL-CIO President George Meany, Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and Vice President I. W. Abel will make nationwide radio addresses on Labor Day, Monday, Sept. 1.

The networks and times set for the broadcasts are:

Abel, CBS, 7:35 p.m. (EDT)

Kirkland, Mutual, 7:45 p.m. (EDT)

Meany, NBC, 9:45 p.m. (EDT)

Local radio stations may air these broadcasts at different hours and should be checked for exact broadcast times.

ADVANCEMENT OF LABOR during the nation's first 200 years is covered in an eight-page booklet presented by the Air Line Employees Association to AFL-CIO President George Meany. The bicentennial observance booklet, titled Labor's Long, Hard Road, is based on a series of talks by Constance LaPare, an ALEA local council chairman in Miami, who makes the presentation with ALEA Eastern Regional Director John Manchester.

Texas Delegates Spur Massive Voter Drive

Dallas—Emphasizing the convention theme of "time to clean house," the 950 delegates to the Texas AFL-CIO convention voted to undertake a six-point political action program which would begin with a massive voter registration drive.

The delegates left no doubt about what "house" they hope to clean as they cheered speaker after speaker who urged the election of a Democrat as President in 1976.

In his report, Texas AFL-CIO President Harry Hubbard said, "We cannot stand eight more years of Republican rule. Unfortunately, we cannot depend upon the Democratic Party to provide the leadership or the mechanism for a general election campaign.

"That's why it's so important that we develop our own mechanism for contacting union members and encourage them to vote."

National COPE Director Al Barkan criticized the foreign policy of the Nixon-Ford Administration, as well as its domestic policies, and encouraged delegates to show their support for the COPE program by raising voluntary funds and working on voter registration and get-out-the-vote programs.

Hubbard and Sec.-Treas. Sherman Fricks were both re-elected without opposition on the convention's final day.

Fricks reported that affiliated membership in the Texas AFL-CIO had increased by more than 15 percent in the last two years to over 240,000 and that because of this the federation was in sound financial condition.

The convention also voted to establish a special task force to develop and carry out a long-range program aimed at passage of a "right-to-contract" law in Texas, whose legislature has prohibited union and agency shop agreements.

During the U.S. Senate debate on extension of the Voting Rights Act, delegates passed a resolution supporting the bill including the provision for extending the act's coverage to Texas.

The bill was approved by Congress and Texas's Democratic Senator, Lloyd Bentsen, who had been scheduled to be a speaker at the convention, stayed in Washington to vote for it.

Two other announced candidates for the Democratic nomination for President, former Sen. Fred Harris of Oklahoma and former Georgia Gov. Jimmy Carter, did speak to the convention and stressed the need for a new morality in the White House.

Programs urged by the convention included:

- Establishment of a regular Community Services institute.
- Establishment of a labor studies center in a state university.
- A campaign for passage of national legislation to prohibit the hiring of illegal aliens.
- Establishment of a public employes department within the Texas AFL-CIO.
- Cooperation with the Texas Senior Citizens Association to promote voter registration and political awareness among retired union members.
- Overhaul of the state's unemployment benefit system.
- A campaign against the unrestricted import of foreign goods and for use of the union label to signify that products are "made in America."
- Major changes in the state's worker's compensation law.
- Passage of a farm workers labor act, similar to the one recently approved in California.

Shopcrafts Set Rail Deadline As Talks Stall

The four shopcraft unions that make up the AFL-CIO Railway Employees' Dept.—still without a contract since their old one expired last Dec. 31—threatened to strike the nation's railroads Sept. 4 if a new agreement is not reached.

"All practical methods provided in the Railway Labor Act for adjusting the dispute have been exhausted without effecting a settlement," said Department President James E. Yost.

The main differences focus on work rules, wage inequities and local issues. The National Mediation Board, which has been involved in the dispute, has asked both sides to meet in Washington on Aug. 19.

If a settlement is not reached soon, President Ford could name an emergency fact-finding board to recommend a solution. That would delay any possible strike for 60 days.

The four shop unions involved are the Boilermakers-Blacksmiths, Firemen & Oilers, Carmen and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. All other rail unions, except the Yardmasters, have settled with the carriers in this year's round of negotiations.

Further Job Losses Forecast:

Unions Push Fight to Block New Round of Tariff Cuts

Additional tariff cuts on imports should be delayed until there is a substantial reduction in U.S. unemployment and a marked rise in the utilization of the nation's productive capacity, labor representatives urged at government trade hearings.

Further U.S. tariff concessions would bring an increased surge of imports and the economic consequences on American workers and industry would be devastating, the Stone, Glass & Clay Coordinating Committee of nine AFL-CIO unions warned.

The committee's position statement was delivered by Executive Sec. Howard P. Chester before the Trade Policy Staff Committee, an interagency panel that advises U.S. foreign trade negotiators.

Under the 1974 Trade Act, the President was given extensive authority to slash duties on thousands of imported products. Duties on most products in the stone, glass and clay industries could be totally eliminated and duties on other products could be cut 60 percent.

"We cannot see how cuts of this magnitude can help our economy," Chester declared. He charged that earlier tariff reductions helped wreck a number of U.S. industries and wipe out U.S. jobs.

American foreign trade policy and actions should relate directly to the nation's domestic employment situation, the labor committee said in its advice to U.S. negotiators currently engaged in international discussions in Geneva.

"We submit that negotiations go forward," the statement said, "but implementation of duty cuts be delayed until unemployment falls below 5 percent."

The committee also called for postponing other tariff cuts until the nation's output reaches 90 percent of capacity. Currently, output is running at about 68 percent, the statement noted.

"This plan would insure a healthy U.S. economy," Chester attested, "instead of prompting additional devastation of an already sick economy by allowing torrents of imports to flow into the U.S. market, displacing American workers and American business.

"Other countries consider their labor force and industry in their trade policies. Why shouldn't the U.S.?" he asked.

Noting the adverse impact of imports on American jobs, Chester said that displaced workers would prefer holding onto a productive job than collecting trade adjustment assistance.

The direct effects of imports on a particular industry were traced by President Lester H. Null of the Pottery Workers, who pointed out that the workforce in the domestic earthenware industry has been reduced by 70 percent since 1954—from about 15,000 to the current 4,500.

These 10,000 displaced workers, Null said, are "victims of goods produced in the sweatshops abroad where wages are measured in pennies an hour. They have been the victims of the actions of foreign governments, by which they directly or indirectly subsidize their exporters, while America has sat idly by and discussed the outmoded philosophy of 'free trade.' "

Null also submitted in his testimony a list of 35 pottery firms that were forced out of business between 1950 and 1972 because of imports, resulting in thousands of layoffs. He said there were undoubtedly many other firms the union is unaware of that had been forced to shutdown.

Executive Vice President Wayne Yarman of the Glass & Ceramic Workers detailed the extensive inroads foreign products have made into U.S. markets and the resultant loss in jobs in both the ceramic tile and flat glass industries.

Chester said that a major cause of the flow of imports to the United States stems from the exploitation of workers in underdeveloped countries by U.S.-based multinational corporations that pay substandard wages.

Chester cited a recent Wall Street Journal article which explored the practices of some U.S. firms in quest of ever-cheaper labor that employ prison inmates in Colombia to avoid paying the minimum wage, which was recently raised to $1.33 a day.

Chester said that American-based firms making use of this "slave prison labor" include Marcor Inc.'s Container Corp of America, B.F. Goodrich and others. He also noted that efforts to expand the source of prison labor in Colombia are getting financial support from Dow Chemical Co., IBM and the Bank of America.

"This is scandalous exploitation of slave labor for a profit," Chester declared. "And the U.S. is proposing duty-free treatment to a country that permits this exploitation of human beings?"

Private Aid Group Names Meany Adviser

AFL-CIO President George Meany was named to the national advisory council of No Greater Love, an organization that sponsors programs of friendship and care for the children of servicemen missing or killed in action, hospitalized veterans, GIs overseas and senior citizens without families.

Meany was named to the council by baseball star Hank Aaron, who is president of No Greater Love. Other labor members are Presidents John H. Lyons of the Iron Workers, S. Frank Raftery of the Painters, Edward J. Carlough of the Sheet Metal Workers and William H. McClennan of the Fire Fighters.

The No Greater Love office, in the United Unions Building, 1750 New York Ave., Washington, D.C., was donated by the four unions.

Federal Workers Ask Bargaining As Best Route to 'Comparability'

Collective bargaining is the best means to achieve "comparability" in pay between the private sector and federal government, union witnesses told a panel of government officials.

The pay panel, headed by Vice President Rockefeller, is exploring problems that have arisen in carrying out a congressional mandate to relate federal salaries to private industry rates through an annual pay survey and consultation with public worker unions.

Some business groups complain government workers have been overpaid under this formula; unions contend it is the federal employes who have been shortchanged.

Clyde M. Webber, president of the American Federation of Government Employees, charged that the Executive Branch—"especially under the Nixon Administration" — has acted to delay and reduce pay adjustments so as to "frustrate" achievement of comparability.

He and John A. McCart, executive director of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., pointed to the experience of the postal workers in negotiating comparability.

"The record speaks for itself," McCart said. "It is one of massive underpayments to classified federal workers versus the comparability acquired by postal workers through collective bargaining."

Before 1970, the pay level of the largest group of postal workers was tied to the Grade 5 level of the classified civil service, McCart noted.

Since then, he said, collective bargaining has raised the postal pay level 28.8 percent above the current pay of a Grade 5 federal employe.

Webber told the Rockefeller panel that the 1970 revisions of the Federal Pay Comparability Act were intended as a transitional step towards collective bargaining. He said the machinery of consultation with unions in the pay-setting procedure should have developed into a form of negotiations "similar to the spirit of collective bargaining in the private sector."

Instead, he said, union proposals have been generally rejected or disregarded, while the White House has in recent years consistently sought to delay or reduce comparability pay adjustments.

The AFGE president proposed national negotiations to set the salaries of the government's 1.3 million white-collar employes and regional negotiations to establish wage rates for the 536,000 blue-collar workers whose pay is now keyed to area prevailing wage rates in private industry.

Comparability with private industry can be achieved only if federal workers are not singled out to be involuntary examples of wage restraint sought by the Executive Branch, Webber stressed.

"Federal employes should receive identical treatment with private enterprise employes," he said. "To the extent that private enterprise pay and benefits are affected by congressional statutes or presidential orders, the pay and benefits of federal employes should be equitably and concurrently modified."

But government workers shouldn't be subjected to pay freezes, ceilings or delays that aren't required of private sector workers, the AFGE declared.

Over Past 10 Years:

Public Unions Pace Membership Growth

Three AFL-CIO unions in the public sector more than doubled their membership over the 1964-74 decade, according to a preliminary listing by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

They were among 14 unions—12 of them AFL-CIO affiliates—that reported membership gains of more than 100,000 over the decade.

The BLS report showed a 344 percent gain for the Teachers between 1964 and 1974, to reach the 444,000 mark. The State, County & Municipal Employees listed a 176 percent rise to 648,000 last year, and the Government Employees posted a 116 percent increase over the 10 years to reach 300,000.

On a percentage basis, other big gainers over the 10 years were the Service Employees, Communications Workers, Meat Cutters, Retail Clerks and Laborers.

Three unions with more than 1 million members had the biggest numerical gains over the 10 years — the Teamsters, Auto Workers and Steelworkers. But their percentage rise was smaller because of their size.

During the two years since the previous BLS tally, membership in what the BLS terms "labor unions and public and professional employe associations" rose 4.8 percent to 24.2 million in 1974.

Membership in organizations the BLS lists as labor unions rose 700,000 to 21.6 million—a total that includes Canadian members of U.S. unions.

Within the United States, the BLS said, union membership was up 661,000 over two years—substantially more than the 54,000 rise from 1970 to 1972 and the biggest gain since the 1966-68 period.

As a portion of the labor force, however, there was little change. Union members made up 25.7 percent of the nonagricultural workforce and 21.6 percent of the total labor force.

The BLS report listed AFL-CIO affiliates with 16.9 million members in 1974, compared with 16.5 million in 1972. These represented 78 percent of all union members in AFL-CIO unions, compared with 79 percent in 1972 and 77 percent in 1970.

Most of the 17.5 percent rise in employe association membership reported by the BLS was credited to the National Education Association, which functions as a union in a number of collective bargaining situations.

Overall, the BLS said, unions and employe associations had 5.9 million members in white-collar occupations in 1974, an increase of 673,000 over a two-year period. It said white-collar workers made up 24.3 percent of membership, up from 22.6 percent in 1972 and 21.8 percent in 1970.

The number of women members rose 300,000 to 6 million in 1974, but their proportion of total membership has been close to 25 percent since 1970.

HEW Hit On Child Aid Ban For Strikers

from welfare aid a needy family headed by a man who left his previous job for a reason that would disqualify him for unemployment benefits in that state.

In states that chose to impose that restriction, strikers would be disqualified along with persons fired for misconduct or otherwise deemed ineligible.

A federal district court ruled that was too restrictive in that a man discharged for cause was nevertheless unemployed and the reason he was fired had nothing to do with his family's eligibility for welfare assistance. It said regulations allowing a state to disqualify families of strikers would have to be more narrowly drawn.

Although the issue is currently before the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals, HEW isn't awaiting the outcome. Weinberger had published in the Aug. 8 federal register for public comment the labor-opposed proposal that would in effect compel most states to disqualify families of strikers.

That's close to the path that had been urged by the Chamber of Commerce, which sought to intervene in the court case with the argument that no state should be allowed to pay welfare benefits to the family of a striker.

10,000 Press Walkout At Nuclear Sub Plant

Groton, Conn.—About 10,000 members of the Metal Trades Council of New London County continued to picket General Dynamic's Electric Boat Division plant here as their strike neared the end of its seventh week.

The workers, who belong to 11 different unions affiliated with the council, left their jobs at midnight on June 30 when their old three-year contract expired and negotiations reached a standstill.

Talks broke off on Aug. 7 following a brief meeting attended by a representative of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. Work rules rather than economic issues are at the center of the dispute at its present stage.

The plant, located on the Thames River, produces nuclear submarines for the United States Navy, including the Trident and the 688 class of fast-attack submarine.

The striking workers include clerical employes and laborers as well as various categories of skilled workers including welders, machinists, pipefitters and grinders.

Operating Engineers Get New Training Grant

The Operating Engineers received a new Labor Dept. grant of $1.5 million to provide on-the-job training for 530 jobless and underemployed workers in nine states.

Pilots' Pact Solves Strike At Northwest

Minneapolis — The Air Line Pilots ended a three-day walkout against Northwest Airlines that had grounded most of the carrier's operations.

But Northwest has yet to settle its differences with some 2,000 cabin attendants and pursers who have been without a contract for nearly 20 months.

The attendants and pursers, members of the Flight Attendants, an affiliate of ALPA, were to vote Aug. 15 whether to authorize a strike. They have been without a contract since Dec. 31, 1973.

The pilots struck the airline Aug. 4 when a dispute arose over precise provisions in a tentative agreement reached July 19.

"We thought we had an agreement," a union spokesman said. But, he noted, "the company began making major changes" when it came to working out the contract. The disputed provisions centered on pensions, retroactive pay and hours of duty.

With the differences ironed out, the union's master executive council then ratified the pact. A vote by the pilots is not required.

Settlement terms of the new agreement were not immediately available, but the July 19 agreement provided the 1,550 pilots an average increase of 34 percent in wages and benefits over a three-year period.

The new pact replaces one that followed a three-months strike against the carrier in 1972. The pilots had been without a contract since July 1974 when the old one expired. The new agreement is retroactive to that date, and will be in force through June 1977.

Mobile Field Office Aids Michigan COPE Project

Lansing, Mich.—The Michigan AFL-CIO is getting a jump on the 1976 general elections through its voter identification project that is geared to boosting registration and increasing participation of union members in political activities.

A key element of the project is the state federation's mobile field office which has been criss-crossing the state to work directly with local unions and central bodies.

The project was launched late last year under the direction of state COPE Director Paul Seldenright and staff representative Dee Lyons. With the cooperation of the central bodies, the voter identification has been completed in several Michigan counties.

Lyons, who has been working with a team of 30 students from Lansing Catholic Central High School, said she expects to have all AFL-CIO union members identified in the majority of the counties by the end of August.

The identification program begins with securing lists of members from national and international unions and checking the names against voter registration logs from cities, townships and counties. Each union member is then identified by precinct and registration status.

Additional cross-checks are made in telephone and address directories to update any changes in location or telephone numbers.

When this phase of the project is completed, the information is relayed to the national COPE office in Washington for processing on the AFL-CIO computer. Here, the data is transferred to key punch cards and will serve as the master list of Michigan AFL-CIO members.

When the final list is compiled, central bodies will be charged with the responsibility of updating the records through periodic checks on address changes, shifting of precinct boundaries and other changes.

State AFL-CIO President William C. Marshall said the tedious task of voter identification will benefit the Michigan labor movement greatly in future elections.

"The work we are doing now is going to pay off in 1976," Marshall declared. "We will know where our members are and we'll be able to reach them during the political campaign with our message and involve them in the election process."

Social Security Bank Deposit Plan Extended

Persons receiving social security benefits will soon be able to have their monthly checks sent directly to a bank, savings institution or credit union for deposit to their account.

This voluntary program is already in effect in many states and will be available in all states by November. The National Council of Senior Citizens termed it "a valuable new service."

No one will have to switch to the direct deposit plan, and checks will continue to be mailed to the homes of people who don't designate a bank. But the direct deposit system eliminates the risk of stolen checks and mailbox break-ins — a major hazard in some neighborhoods.

The retired, disabled and others receiving social security benefits will receive information on the direct deposit option with their social security checks. Banks and savings institutions have the required forms for participation in the direct deposit plan and will set up accounts for persons who do not have bank accounts. Deposits may be made to either savings or checking accounts.

Jobless Aid for the '70s

THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT was meant to be broad in scope. In the words of the presidential committee on whose report the bill was based:

"A program of economic security . . . must have as its primary aim the assurance of an adequate income to each human being in childhood, youth, middle age or old age—in sickness or in health. It must provide safeguards against all of the hazards leading to destitution and dependency."

This aim has been realized only in part. In the 40 years since its passage, the Social Security Act has been amended and updated many times, but its original unemployment compensation provisions, oriented to the needs of the depressed economy of the 1930s, have remained virtually unchanged. The act needs to be modernized and redesigned to meet the needs of the 1970s.

Unemployment compensation is an important economic stabilizer for workers, employers and the whole national economy. For workers who lose their jobs, it means at least a partial wage replacement income to tide them over the period of joblessness and to provide food, housing, clothing, transportation, and other essentials for themselves and their families. It also:

- Reduces the pressure on jobless workers to abandon their skills during temporary periods of joblessness.
- Assists in facilitating the return of unemployed workers to jobs.
- Contributes to the mobility of labor throughout the nation.
- Assists employers and communities to preserve trained work forces. It also helps maintain purchasing power in a neighborhood, town, or region where workers have been laid off and helps prevent the secondary unemployment of workers employed in stores, shops, restaurants, laundries and all other types of firms that serve public needs.

This program has been the nation's first line of defense against poverty and recession for 40 years, but the line has become very thin. Millions of workers are still not covered. Benefit payments are far too low and their duration often too short. Employers have forced the states to underfinance the program and to impose harsh disqualifications on workers.

That is why the AFL-CIO is supporting legislation introduced by Congressman James C. Corman, chairman of the House Subcommittee on Unemployment Compensation.

Congressman Corman's bill represents the first serious effort in many years to provide the nation with an unemployment compensation program to meet the needs of a modern industrial society. It would extend coverage to 12 million workers who are still denied protection. It would improve the benefit structure to reflect current wage levels. It would establish reasonable qualifying and duration standards. It would improve the solvency of state funds and restore financial responsibility within the system.

In short, the Corman bill would restore to the nation an unemployment insurance program consistent with the objectives of the original Social Security Act: to provide economic security for all who are unemployed. We urge the Congress to enact this legislation without delay. It would be the ideal way to celebrate the 40th anniversary of social security.

"Is That What 'Jerry-Built' Means?"

A Word Edgewise:

College Graduates Must Take Responsibility for Own Future

By John P. Roche

EVERY NOW AND THEN in the course of my varied reading, I come across an item that really hits the funny bone. This one is a letter to a university alumni journal, in the course of which a young woman casually observes: "In my opinion, the university does not do enough for its undergrads or graduate students in terms of securing jobs or graduate school positions for them. Furthermore, there is a dearth of information about possible careers and career alternatives. As seniors, too many students find they have fulfilled the requirements for a major but have no idea where to go from there."

Admittedly my reaction to this wail of woe was influenced by the fact that between the ages of 19 and 23 I had an assured career. I never had a moment's worry about adequate guidance: it was provided by my commanding officer. Furthermore, my draft board in no way discriminated against me because I had majored in history and philosophy; indeed, I never knew them to hold anyone's undergraduate major against him.

Only women were discriminated against: they were exempt from selective service. Allegedly a few conscripts were rejected on medical grounds, but by 1942-43, if you could see lightning and hear thunder, you were in tiptop shape.

So much for therapy. If we take this complaint seriously, what does it suggest about the character and role of a university? Recall that the average senior is roughly 23 years old, but from this description one might conclude that he or she was toddling from nursery school to kindergarten.

Now, of course, there is a case for institutionalized guidance in secondary schools, though my personal reaction to a number of guidance counsellors I have met is that they believe that children are born with college board scores tattooed on their foreheads, scores which will—as in Plato's "Republic"—determine their status for life. But should a college or university be a settlement house?

To say this is not for a minute to repudiate the obligation of the teacher to advise his or her students when so requested. I spent about 20 years as pre-law adviser to interested undergraduates, and I spend a good deal of time trying to place my graduate students in good positions. But this was not a matter of playing psychiatrist or guidance counsellor: If a student came to me and asked, "What should I be when I grow up?" I simply passed. (I know one such student, financially well-off, who after getting his AB went on to three years of law school, received a JD, and is now in his fifth year of work on a PhD. If, when he gets the PhD, he still doesn't know what he wants to be when he grows up, I suppose there is the option of five or six years of medical school.)

One of the reasons I have always been opposed to mechanized education — the allowance of advanced credit for special courses in high school so that a student can enter college as a sophomore, the speed-up to get the AB in three years, or the AB and JD in six—is that I consider a university primarily as a place where young people can mature in an intellectual, challenging environment.

This calls for time; time for seepage, meditation and osmosis. Integration, I have always argued, takes place in the student's mind, not in the curriculum. Education is definitely not collecting the necessary number of green stamps, presenting them for an AB, and then—as the author of the letter which touched this all off suggested—being tucked into one's appropriate niche in society by one's academic mother.

THUS IF A SENIOR has fulfilled the requirements of a major and has "no idea where to go from there," I would recommend—at the risk of seeming unloving—that his or her first stop should be the United States Employment Service to register for a job. Another useful tip would be for him or her to buy the paper and look at the "Help Wanted" advertisements.

If this doesn't pay off, and the old man isn't around with a credit card to tide one over the terrible period of indecision, I recommend my old alma mater, the Armed Forces (which no longer discriminate against women).

You get paid, fed, clothed and, above all, plenty of time to meditate on what you want to be when you grow up. If it isn't too demeaning for a college graduate, you can even learn a useful trade. Right now the prospects for carpenters and electricians are a lot better than those for graduate students.

Inflation-Recession Impact:

New National Priorities Needed To Rescue Cities from Decay

By Bayard Rustin

THE FINANCIAL CRISIS of New York City is a dramatic and much needed reminder of the continuing plight of all American cities. For although New York's plight is more serious, the same woes are affecting other large cities.

Inflation and recession are the immediate causes of the cities' troubles. Enormous price increases for energy and other goods have increased the costs of services that cities provide while the recession has slashed the tax revenues needed to provide those services. To solve immediate problems, nothing would be more helpful than a national economic policy to quickly restore full employment.

President Ford and his advisers not only have no program for a quick and full economic recovery; they provide no remedial program to aid the hard-pressed cities. They condescendingly tell the cities to pull themselves up by their bootstraps, offering a formula of benign neglect that will be as disastrous to the cities as Nixon's benign neglect was for blacks.

The cities have already suffered from decades of neglect that has been anything but benign in its effects. It is no solution to attack the leaders of New York City as spendthrifts, for the problems of the cities are the result of national failures: years of neglect, lack of planning, and racism.

The cities have been forced to bear the nationwide burden of poverty, because we have no national welfare program. Poor people from the South, from Appalachia have moved to the cities to escape grinding poverty and almost nonexistent welfare programs. Compassionate and generous cities are now suffering for bearing the burden for the stingy and hateful.

We have not had a comprehensive, well-thought national program to save the cities. Programs have been enacted ad hoc and all too often have contributed to the decay of the cities. Federal programs have torn up black neighborhoods, destroyed black institutions, while encouraging businesses and middle class whites to move to the suburbs, the tax base has been eroded, making it more difficult to provide services. Deteriorating services in turn lead even more of those able to afford it to flee the cities.

To many of our leaders, the cities have become racial and economic enclaves that are not worth saving. Since the cities are thought to be not worth saving, little aid is given, the cities are allowed to deteriorate further, and the bill for rebuilding them becomes even greater.

Many of the reactions to the problems of the cities not only ignore the fundamental causes of urban decay, but could well be disastrous for workers, blacks, and the quality of urban life. The most common reaction, to blame municipal workers and their unions, is a convenient smokescreen for anti-labor and anti-worker forces to divert attention from the disastrous effects of the Nixon-Ford economic policies and the continuous national neglect of our cities.

MUNICIPAL WORKERS have been underpaid for many years and have only recently begun to catch up. Many municipal workers in New York City still earn less than $12,000 a year, clearly not enough to support a family given New York's high cost of living.

Any effort to place the burden of saving the cities on working people will be unfair. It will be especially unfair to blacks, many of whom are employed as municipal workers.

Raising taxes or cutbacks in service through layoffs are not realistic answers to the problems of the cities. Either course will be self-defeating by hastening the flight to the suburbs and making the cities more and more unliveable.

Steps need to be taken immediately to solve the pressing financial problems of America's cities and to halt their deterioration. Federal aid should be extended to those cities suffering from high unemployment. Emergency aid is needed to keep the cities from collapsing but more will be needed to repair the damage of years of neglect. The federal government must assume a much greater portion of the nation's welfare, mass transit, and health costs.

Above all, we need new national priorities and a basic strategy to make cities places where a modest income can buy a decent life, where parents are glad to raise their children, where streets are not only safe but pleasant, where life is not simply bearable but enjoyable.

40-Year Record:

Social Security System Hailed For Service to Entire Society

THE SOCIAL SECURITY system was praised by AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman for its 40-year record of protecting tens of millions of Americans from "destitution, hunger, starvation" and disruption of family life.

Pointing out that social security ranges far beyond the retirement system most people consider the core program, Seidman said it is now time to "take the next big step in social insurance and set up a comprehensive, universal national health insurance program" along the lines of the proposed Kennedy-Corman National Health Security Act. He appeared on the network radio interview Labor News Conference.

Seidman said that while there is a short-term problem with the Social Security Trust Fund resulting from the steep inflation and high unemployment of recent years, the fund is not "in deep danger of going broke" as some critics have charged. He said that the purpose of the trust fund is to balance out periods when income exceeds benefits and periods when payouts are greater than payments into the fund, which they have in the last few years.

But, he stressed, "if we deal with the problems of inflation and unemployment, we are going to right that situation in a very short time," and return to the more usual situation where the fund's income exceeds payouts.

Seidman renewed the call for a general federal revenue contribution to help finance the social security system, noting that most of the countries around the world have tripartite financing through contributions from employers, employes and the national government, recognizing that the system benefits the entire population.

He also urged a gradual increase of the earnings base on which social security taxes are paid, from the present $14,100 to $28,000, within the next few years, and thereafter to keep pace with the increased wages. That, he said, would increase the equity of the financing of the program and get back to the situation at the outset of the program, when taxable earnings were much closer to actual earnings.

Reporters questioning Seidman were Lloyd Schwartz of Fairchild Publications and Tom Joyce, of Newsweek magazine. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

MOST OF THE 19 MILLION Americans receiving food stamps during this recession summer are in families existing on below-poverty incomes. Ninety-two percent of the recipients are earning less than $7,000 a year. Only a small fraction were in the above-$10,000 category.

The incidence of fraud in the food stamp program "is very low" and errors in issuing and payment are as much the responsibility of food stamp certifiers as of food stamp recipients. The program continues to be mainly a low-income program, primarily serving Americans who can least afford an adequate diet.

Those and other findings in a report, "Who Gets Food Stamps?" released by the Senate Select Committee on Nutrition Needs, effectively answer the barrage of attacks on food stamp programs coming from businessmen and the Ford Administration.

The report, which supports labor's call for an adequate, readily accessible program, ought to quiet food stamp critics, but it probably won't. Food stamp legislation is on the agenda when Congress returns from its August vacation and attacks made on the program in recent years are likely to continue.

President Ford, at the beginning of this year, sought to increase the cost of food stamps and cut the budget for the program, but Congress blocked his effort. Facts in the report appear to underscore the importance of the congressional victory.

In an introduction to the report, Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.), chairman of the select committee, points out that since last November there have been long lines at food stamp certification centers as "people who once thought they would never need food stamps have needed them, and used them, just to survive economically."

Certainly the cost of a food stamp program has increased, McGovern observes. Lower- and middle-income families have suddenly found themselves in the extremely low- or no-income category as the country's economy has steadily deteriorated.

People who previously supported the program but never used it, he notes, "now are drawing on it to sustain their families during the worst recession since World War II, a national economic crisis that is a personal economic catastrophe for each of them."

Ford, despite his constant fretting over increasing the federal budget even when such increases involve human needs, recently asked Congress to appropriate an additional $3 billion to cover food stamp costs for fiscal 1976, conceding that his original request for $3.8 billion was inadequate.

Still, he again pumped for his scheme of requiring participants to pay more for their food stamps and called for tightening eligibility and participation requirements in the program.

However, McGovern in an introduction to his committee's report emphasized that the rising cost of the program is a side effect of an unhealthy economy and an Administration's refusal to accept measures to get the economy moving.

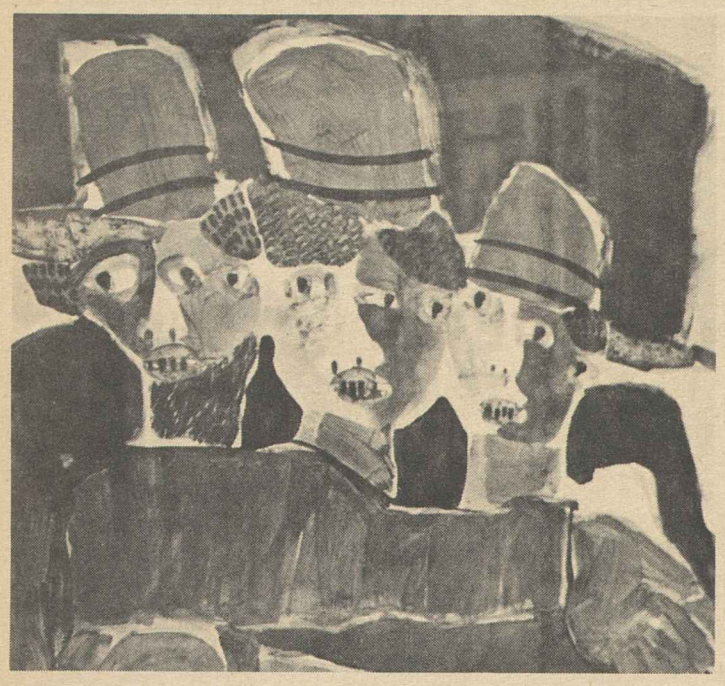
CONGRESS APPEARS to be moving in an opposite direction from Ford. The Senate has passed a bill to extend the food stamp program to the aged, blind and disabled. Similar legislation is expected to be acted upon in the House when the recess ends.

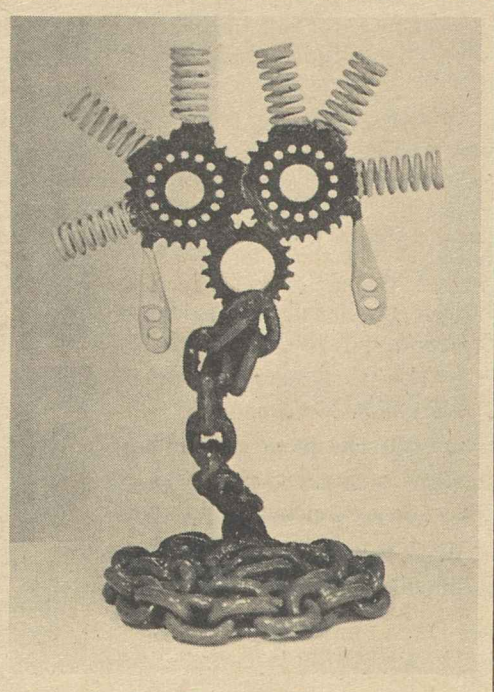
The Senate, in passing its bill, adopted an amendment sought by the AFL-CIO and individual unions that would speed up the certification of food stamp applicants.

The amendment, approved by a bipartisan 61-35 vote, would provide an immediate 30 days of food stamp benefits for a family that appears eligible. A check into the family's finances and resources would then be made during the 30 days of temporary certification.

Meanwhile, Chairman John Foley (D-Wash.) of the House Agriculture Committee has announced that it will launch a comprehensive study of the food stamp program with a view toward seeing that "all those who need food stamps get them promptly," and improving the program, as well as eliminating any abuses.

MILLIONS OF AMERICANS have been spared "destitution, hunger, starvation" and disrupted family life by the social security system created 40 years ago, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, center, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Lloyd Schwartz, left, of Fairchild Publications and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine.





MURAL PAINTING commemorating the 75th anniversary of the Ladies' Garment Workers is one of a dozen art works on display at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center. Viewing the mural are the center's curator, Nina Felshin, and Executive Director Fred Hoehler. Below, is an acrylic by Lloyd McNeill of Musicians Local 161-710, and a sculpture by Richard Loffler of International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 3. The exhibition features works by unionists from eastern states.

Art Works Of Unionists Form Display

A collection of paintings and sculpture crafted by union members from Eastern states is on display at the Labor Studies Center through Labor Day.

The exhibition, titled Union-Made: East Coast, consists of 12 works, including oil and acrylic paintings, watercolors and sculpture.

An up-coming exhibition will feature art works by union members from the West Coast, currently on display by the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO. Future exhibitions are planned by the Studies Center to include the works of union members from other sections of the country.

Art exhibitions at the Studies Center are made possible through a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts. The exhibitions have been rotated periodically since the center opened last year.

In developing the East Coast exhibition, Studies Center Curator Nina Felshin pointed out that the collection does not attempt ot distinguish between "professional" and "amateur" artists. Instead, the focus is on art as an activity that can be created and enjoyed by any worker.

Felshin, formerly a curator with the Corcoran Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C., said the selection for the East Coast exhibition was made after viewing hundreds of works.

She said the number of entries was pared down because of a limited exhibition area at the center, but that the final selection provides a wide range of works, including subject matter that is "clearly and proudly labor-related."

BLS Survey Reveals Dollar Value of Unions

A new report by the Bureau of Labor Statistics reveals a dramatic differential in the wages and fringe benefits earned by workers in union establishments above their non-union counterparts.

The biennial report, prepared by BLS's Office of Wages & Industrial Relations, shows unionized workers in the nonfarm economy drew an average rate of compensation of $5.83 an hour in 1972 compared to $3.53 for non-unionized workers.

Unionized workers received an average of 36 cents an hour for paid leave while non-union workers got 13 cents. For private pension plans, unionized workers received an average of 23 cents an hour, non-union workers got 5 cents.

For life-insurance and health-benefit programs, the union worker received an average of 37 cents compared to 13 cents for the non-union employe.

Compensation for non-office workers in both manufacturing and non-manufacturing was higher in establishments in which the majority was covered by collective bargaining agreements than in those in which none or a minority was covered, BLS noted.

"In non-manufacturing, the gap in the level of compensation between workers in union and non-union establishments was nearly double that in manufacturing, reflecting the influence of unionization, as well as industrial composition, and perhaps geographic location," BLS said.

"In manufacturing, unionization is much more uniformly spread among its component industries than in non-manufacturing, where unionization is concentrated in high-wage industries such as public utilities, construction and transportation."

Unionized workers in non-manufacturing areas of the economy received compensation averaging $6.24 an hour compared to $3.36 for unorganized workers.

Organized workers in manufacturing received $5.50 an hour, while non-unionized workers were paid only $4 an hour, the BLS study showed.

Inflation's Toll:

close to the 11 percent overall average rise in all three budgets, with personal services slightly higher.

Like the urban famliy budgets for a worker with dependents, the government's retiree budgets show the sheer force of necessity in the spending patterns. For instance, food costs were up a full 2 percent more in the lower budget than in the other two, reflecting the greater share of income the lower-income couple must spend to eat.

But other factors in the cost of living are weighted differently by BLS for the retirees than for workers' budgets. Housing costs, for instance, reflect the higher likelihood of ownership.

Still, the retiree budgets are austere. The lowest reckoning is well below the government's April 1975 poverty level of $5,050 for a working family, and any retired couple that was totally dependent on social security income would be strictly confined to the "lower" level.

In October 1974, the average social security benefit for couples was $341 a month, or $4,092 a year. And the maximum possible social security benefit, $512 for a couple, is still well short of the "higher" BLS retiree budget.

Thus supplemental income of some kind would be necessary for retirees to reach either of the higher two budgets. The social security maximum of $512 would approximate the intermediate budget at the October 1974 level, but not with the 5 percent increase in living costs since then.

In general, the retired couple fares a little better if its home is in a smaller, southern city. In areas classified by BLS as "metropolitan," the costs are decidedly higher.

The intermediate budget average of $6,041 was lifted decidely by such figures as $7,105 for New York City, $7,075 in Boston and $6,489 in San Francisco. In contrast, comparable figures were $5,403 for Baton Rouge, La., and $5,506 for Austin, Tex.

Unlike earlier retiree budgets, the October 1974 figures make no allowance for personal income taxes. The BLS says its entire tax estimation procedure is being reviewed to reflect changes in taxation.

At all three levels, the 1974 budgets reflect the reality that retirees spend almost exclusively on necessities. The allotment for gifts and contributions is tiny in all budgets compared to the share taken for "family consumption," and such items as life insurance premiums are provided in the highest budget only.

Raftery Joins Board Of Arthritis Foundation

President S. Frank Raftery of the Painters has been elected to the board of directors of the Arthritis Foundation.

In accepting the appointment, Raftery stressed that the Painters are vitally concerned with the health of their members on and off the job. He noted that the union is currently conducting a nationwide program of physical examinations to determine the effects of members' exposure to toxic substances on the job.

Clothing Union Seeks Raises For 100,000

New York—The Clothing Workers have called for a substantial wage increase and improved benefits for 100,000 workers it represents in the cotton garment, outerwear and single pants industries.

The union's bargaining program was underscored by ACWA President Murray Finley and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman in negotiations in the three areas of the clothing industry, where existing contracts expire Sept. 1.

Finley pointed out that since the last pact was negotiated three years ago, the Consumer Price Index had advanced 26.7 percent, with another 1.5 percent almost certain before the new contracts would be effective. Since wage increases in cotton garments and outerwear had risen approximately 20.8 percent as a result of the last negotiations, the workers in these industries were already between 7.5 and 8 percent behind where they were prior to the 1972 negotiations.

"And when you consider that the workweek in these industries has declined by 5 percent, the workers have to catch up 12.5 percent just to stay even," Finley said.

In addition to the hourly wage increase, the union is also proposing "just, moral and necessary" improvements to the health, welfare and retirement programs.

Poor Diets Harm Health:

Nutritional Problems Mount For Lack of National Policy

The United States has put a lot of money and commendable effort into fighting hunger, but it has never come close to a national nutrition policy.

And filling an empty stomach is not the same thing as adequate nutrition, food economist J. B. Cordaro writes in the AFL-CIO magazine, the Federationist.

If anything, U.S. diets have gotten worse in the 30 years the government has been keeping tabs on "recommended dietary allowances," Cordaro writes.

He says fad diets and phony, gimmick foods contribute to the poor overall state of the U.S. diet, but it could also be improved by such basic steps as putting some nutritional standards into the food stamp program.

Nutritional problems are tied closely to the state of the nation's health, and Cordaro lists a potential saving of $30 billion a year on the nation's health bill from improved diet.

But the first step would be some form of national nutritional policy, and Cordaro notes that government has danced around that topic for a long time without getting closer to adopting such a policy.

"Contrary to popular belief, U.S. hunger and malnutrition were not 'discovered' in 1967," Cordaro says in tracing a long series of government commissions, study groups and legislative proposals dating back to 1917.

"But it wasn't until 1968, beginning with the activities of the Senate's Select Committee on Nutrition & Human Needs, that an effort was made for the first time at the federal level to develop an overall framework into a national policy," he notes.

Cordaro, a nutrition specialist for the Congressional Office of Technology Assessment, notes that during all these same 30 years, the U.S. nutritional level was slipping. He cites these findings from a 1971-72 survey:

- Over half the U.S. population can be said to have poor diets when the intake of basic nutrients —carbohydrates, fats, proteins, minerals and vitamins—of the average person is weighed against the Agriculture Dept.'s required daily allowance, or RDA.
- Approximately 40 percent of the children 1 to 5 years old and 75 percent of the females 18 to 44 years old had vitamin A intakes below the RDA established by the National Academy of Sciences in 1974.
- In the age group 18 to 44 years, approximately 60 percent of the diet provided less than the RDA for calcium; 81 percent of Negro females aged 18 to 44 had inadequate calcium intake.
- Approximately 50 percent of the children 1 to 5 years and 60 percent of females 18 to 44 years had vitamin C intakes below the required norm.
- Approximately 95 percent of children 1 to 5 years and females 18 to 44 years had iron intakes below the norm.

That and other surveys show, quite predictably, that low-income groups are the worst victims of poor nutrition, but Cordaro notes that the need for nutritional improvement is found at all income levels.

"High income does not insure good nutrition," Cordaro notes, citing a 1965 USDA finding that "more than one-third of the households with incomes of $10,000 or more had diets that were well below the RDAs for one or more nutrients."

"Besides, health problems associated with high income diets, or overnutrition, may be greater than the problems of undernutrition," he points out. He cites the claim of one national publication in the field that "the most expensive type of quackery in the U.S. today is the promotion of vitamin products, special dietary foods and food supplements. Millions of consumers are being misled concerning the need for such products."

But for all the studies that have been done, Cordaro isn't so sure but what a little noticed 1975 court decision may have the farthest reaching effect.

"In June 1975, a federal appeals court ruled that the USDA was not complying with the food stamp law since USDA's food stamp allotments did not provide the opportunity for all recipients to obtain an adequate diet," Cordaro writes.

He says it's still anybody's guess as to what this might mean to federal food programs and future congressional actions, but he thinks it gets near the heart of a key problem with the federal initiatives in school lunch, special food services, school milk and the food stamp program.

"The food stamp program puts money in the hands of families and lets them choose their priorities for spending it. That may be a reasonable approach to assisting a family with its food bill, but it does not deal with nutrition as a health goal."

But setting what he calls a "national baseline" of nutritional goals is not an easy task, because at present no one branch of government has adequate information.

Cordaro says the solution can come only from a series of current initiatives which include imposing a single focus on the various government programs; requiring food programs to provide at least 35 percent of RDA with each meal; allowing more fortification of foods than is currently permissible under federal regulations; and providing adequate research to fill the information gap and assess current U.S. nutritional status.

Without this kind of national policy, Cordaro feels, America will go on being the world's best-fed nation—but not necessarily its best nourished.

Board Applies Picketing Notice Rule To Construction Work at Hospitals

A 3-2 majority of the National Labor Relations Board gave a controversial interpretation to a 1974 law dealing with strikes and picketing at private hospitals and other health care institutions.

At issue was whether a requirement for advance notice of a strike or picketing applies to construction at the site of the hospital or, as the union involved contended, merely to picketing by hospital workers or their unions.

The 1974 amendment to the Taft-Hartley Act extended collective bargaining rights to workers at non-profit health care facilities, who had been previously excluded. It also imposed a requirement of a 10-day notice of intent to strike or picket any private health care facility. The notice would enable the institution to make other arrangements to care for its patients.

In the case before the NLRB, there was no picketing of a hospital at Stuart, Fla. The picket signs carried by members of Plumbers Local 630 protested the lowering of wage standards through use of a non-union subcontractor, and the picketing was conducted only at a gate reserved for employes of that subcontractor. It was apparently legal even under the severe restrictions on construction site picketing.

There was no interference or attempt at interference with hospital workers or deliveries.

All of these facts were undisputed, according to the NLRB decision.

But the board was sharply divided over the meaning and intent of this sentence of the 1974 law:

"A labor organization before engaging in any strike, picketing or other refusal to work at any health care institution shall, not less than 10 days prior to such action, notify the institution in writing and the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. . . ."

To the NLRB majority of Chairman Betty Southard Murphy, Ralph E. Kennedy and John A. Penello, this covered any picketing at the hospital grounds, even if not directed against the hospital.

If Congress had intended to exclude construction work at the hospital site, the majority reasoned, it would have specifically done so.

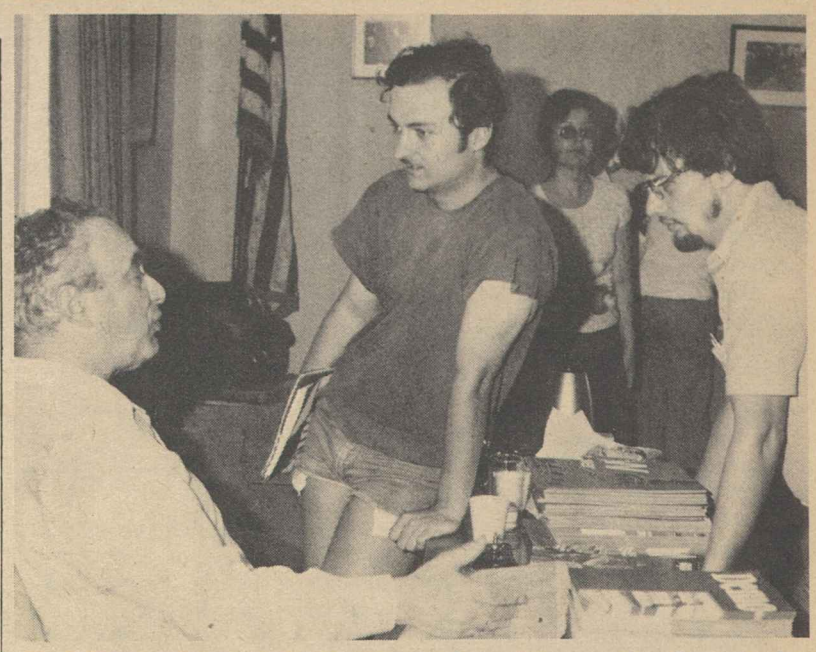
NLRB members John H. Fanning and Howard Jenkins, Jr., vigorously dissented.

The entire thrust of the legislation was to regulate the bargaining relationship between hospitals and their employes, they stressed. The word "at," which the majority took to mean at the site of the hospital, can properly be read as joining the phrase "refusal to work at."

While you can picket a hospital, Fanning and Jenkins noted, you can't "refuse to work a hospital."

And apart from the grammatical dispute, the dissenters emphasized, there is absolutely nothing in the legislative history of the bill to leave the impression that Congress intended to deal with construction industry labor disputes when it extended bargaining rights to a large group of hospital workers.

The 10-day notice dispute as it applies to construction workers may fade away if Congress passes the jobsite picketing bill.



LABOR'S WIDE ROLE in domestic and international affairs is discussed by Deputy Director Donald Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services with young political activists at Front Royal, Va. The three-day leadership institute, sponsored by the League for Industrial Democracy, drew 50 representatives from 23 Eastern states.

Youth Groups Explore Causes of Discontent

Front Royal, Va.—Young political activists involved in labor-supported voter education and registration programs gathered at a three-day conference here to explore the growing discontent caused by the faltering economy and government policies.

Participating in the leadership institute were 50 persons between the ages of 16 and 30 from 23 states in the eastern half of the country. The sessions were sponsored by the League for Industrial Democracy in cooperation with Frontlash and the Youth Institute for Peace in the Middle East.

William W. Winpisinger, a vice president of the Machinists, told the group that "if workers are alienated and insecure today, it is because of the state of the economy."

His remarks were underscored by Frank Fernbach, assistant to the president of the Steelworkers, who described the underlying causes of the nation's economic crisis and explained the AFL-CIO program for recovery.

The development of labor's role in political action programs and in the special problems of the minorities was traced by Donald Slaiman, deputy director of the federation's Dept. of Organization & Field Services, and Ernest Green, executive director of the Recruitment & Training Program.

On international affairs, Tom Kahn, an assistant to AFL-CIO President George Meany, warned that the survival of political democracy is one of the most critical issues facing the world today.

Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. detailed the link between American labor and Histadrut, the Israeli trade union movement, and the continuing support for Israel's defense.

The institute also heard author and Soviet dissident Lev Navrosov, who gave a dramatic account of life and oppression in the Soviet Union.

In workshop sessions, 15 experienced organizers, headed by newly-elected Frontlash Executive Director Chris Gersten, explained the development of programs dealing with voter registration, volunteer recruitment, precinct analysis, increasing voter turnout, election law reforms and media techniques.

Aders Named To No. 2 Post In Labor Dept.

Robert O. Aders, an attorney who formerly was chairman of the board of the Kroger Co. supermarket chain, has been appointed Under Secretary of Labor.

The Labor Dept.'s number two spot has been vacant since February, when Richard Schubert resigned to return to the Bethlehem Steel Corp.

During the wage-price controls period, Aders was a management member of the Cost of Living Council's Wage & Salary Committee.

Since last year, Aders has been a partner in the Washington law firm of Ginsburg, Feldman & Bress. He is 48.

His appointment has been confirmed by the Senate.

Poisonous Gas Release Spurs URW Lawsuit

Ashtabula, Ohio—A $2.5 million damage suit has been filed by the Rubber Workers against the Olin Corp. and General Tire & Rubber Co. for alleged injuries to workers from "repeated and frequent spills or escapes" of phosgene and other gases.

The suit, filed in Ashtabula County common pleas court, seeks $500,000 compensatory damages and $2 million punitive damages on behalf of URW Local 595 members employed at a General Tire plant adjacent to the Olin plant. General Tire owns the property upon which Olin is situated.

URW President Peter Bommarito charged that the release of the gases at Olin not only has caused injury and illness to employes of General Tire but constitutes "a threat" to the surrounding area.

"When these gases are released, stricken Local 595 members at adjacent General Tire have had to crawl to safety for oxygen treatment," Bommarito said. "The dehumanizing and debilitating effects of these emissions are intolerable and must be stopped."

"Imagine going to work each day with the threat of inhaling poisonous gas," Bommarito said.

"This lawsuit comes only after many, many attempts by the local union to persuade the companies to alleviate this health hazard," he said.

Labor's 'Hometown Lobby':

City, State Councils Aid Congress Drive

When Congress reconvenes, the House will seek to complete action on a labor-supported energy conservation bill.

Before the recess, the House approved a compromise amendment, by Rep. Harley Staggers (D-W.Va.) that set up price ceilings for various types of oil, including a partial rollback of the inflated price being charged for "new" oil.

"Efforts will be made by the oil lobby to weaken this key provision," Biemiller warned. "We strongly oppose any such crippling amendments."

Biemiller urged central bodies to stress their support for legislation passed by both the House and Senate authorizing more than $4 billion for job-creating public works projects in cities and states. The Senate bill, he noted, includes over $1.5 billion in anti-recession grants to communities with the highest unemployment.

The legislation is now before a House-Senate conference committee and Biemiller pressed for speedy final approval.

Before the recess, the Senate Labor Committee approved a construction site picketing bill similar to the labor-supported measure that passed the House.

Biemiller said it probably will be sent to the Senate floor soon after Congress reconvenes. The AFL-CIO supports the bill without damaging amendments.

A federal unemployment compensation standards bill being considered by the House Ways & Means Committee is "of great importance to workers," Biemiller said. He urged "prompt action" on it.

Coming up in the Senate, Biemiller noted, is a battle over natural gas controls, which the Administration wants to remove. They should be continued, Biemiller urged, and any attempt to link natural gas to oil prices should be rejected.

Labor's opposition to the lifting of controls on domestic oil isn't affected by a 3-2 federal appellate court ruling that President Ford exceeded his emergency powers when he imposed a special $2 fee on each barrel of imported oil.

The import fee, which the AFL-CIO had termed the wrong way to lessen the nation's reliance on imported oil, added substantially to gasoline and fuel prices, particularly in the Northeast.

If the ruling becomes final (it may be appealed to the Supreme Court) the issue of reimbursing consumers who have paid the higher gasoline and fuel prices would be up to the courts or Congress.

Some White House officials have contended that ending the import fee would make the expiration of controls on domestic oil more palatable, since part of the rise in domestic fuel would presumably be offset by the elimination of the import fee.

President Signs Voting Rights Act

President Ford has signed into law a seven-year extension of the Voting Rights Act that had the support of the civil rights and trade union coalition.

In addition to continuing safeguards for southern blacks, the new law also sets up procedures to make it easier for Spanish-speaking Americans and other "language minorities" to register and vote.

The new legislation also permanently bans the use of literacy tests as a voting qualification in any state.

ELDERLY CITIZENS receive pointers on meat purchases in a consumer education program conducted by Meat Cutters Local 342 in Brooklyn, N.Y. Members of the local explain how to economize on meat buying and how to identify and prepare various cuts of meat.

Crop Forecast, Exports Shoot Up Grain Prices

AFL-CIO President George Meany planned to meet on Aug. 18 at the federation's headquarters with members of the Ad Hoc Committee of AFL-CIO Maritime Unions "because of the urgency of the situation."

The Longshoremen have adopted the position that they will not load grain destined for Russia without safeguards that the American public will not be victimized as it was in 1972. Their stand was supported in statements adopted by the Executive Council.

The government's latest crop estimates, based on conditions as of Aug. 1, showed corn production at 5.85 billion bushels—a record, but still 196 million bushels, or 3 percent, less than the July 1 estimate. This year's wheat crop was estimated at 2.1 billion bushels, again a record and just under the July 1 forecast.

At the same time, the government noted that dry weather has cut yield prospects in Soviet grain production and that the Russians would need to import about 25 million tons, an increase of about 5 million tons from earlier estimates.

Dry weather in key producing areas of the United States—particularly the corn belt of Iowa and Nebraska—has caused concern that the summer's harvest may be considerably less than at first indicated.

The Agriculture Dept. predicted Iowa farmers will harvest 1.1 billion bushels of corn—an 11 percent reduction from estimates earlier this summer.

Don Paarlberg, USDA's chief economist, told newsmen that poor growing conditions since the department's Aug. 1 survey have jeopardized U.S. corn production.

"We don't know how bad the impact is, but the rain has been sparse and scattered," he said.

In reaction to these reports, Midwest futures traders began to bid up prices of various grains at close to their allowable daily limits.

- More than 3 million families, including 8 million children, are helped with more than $700 million a month under the public assistance program.
- Over 6 million unemployed workers receive monthly benefits of more than $1 billion under the federal-state unemployment compensation program.

The unemployment compensation portion of the Social Security Act has been "an important economic stabilizer for workers, employers and the whole national economy," Meany noted.

"For workers who lose their jobs, it means at least a partial replacement income to tide them over the period of joblessness and to provide food, housing, clothing, transportation and other essentials for themselves and their families."

Other benefits cited by Meany include lessened pressure on jobless workers to abandon their skills during temporary periods of joblessness, machinery for referring workers to available jobs, and an opportunity to seek work in other communities.

Further, Meany noted, the at least partial maintenance of purchasing power helps prevent the ripple effect of unemployment from costing additional jobs in retail stores and other firms serving the community.

It is especially important, Meany said, as what economists term "an anti-cyclical force" to combat economic downturns.

Congress Given Plan On Rail Reorganization

Congress within the next two months will decide the fate of a plan to reorganize the country's bankrupt Northeast-Midwest railroads. What the lawmakers do will have far-reaching impact on the rail industry, its workers and the nation's economy.

The final plan for restructuring the giant Penn Central and six other bankrupt carriers—Central of New Jersey, Lehigh Valley, Lehigh & Hudson River, Reading, Ann Arbor and Erie Lackawanna—was sent to Congress by the U.S. Railway Association.

USRA was established by a Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973, passed with support from railroad unions. The plan becomes effective if Congress does not disapprove of it within 60 working days. However, the lawmakers must amend the act to implement the plan, primarily with regard to financing.

Through this route Congress could make changes. Some opposition already has developed to USRA's proposal that marks 5,100 miles of so-called "low density" (branch lines) for elimination. Bills are pending that would require a new Consolidated Rail Corp. (ConRail) to operate them for two years with the federal government picking up the tab for their deficits.

A number of members of Congress also maintain that reorganization of the seven carriers, to be profitable, will have to be accompanied by some form of government ownership of tracks and rights-of-way, which would in turn be leased to ConRail. At one time, USRA had considered recommending such a corporation, Consolidated Facilities (ConFac), to go with ConRail.

The reorganization plan calls for a federal investment of $1.8 billion in ConRail over a five-year period, 1976 through 1980, to provide for rehabilitation, capital investments, working capital, and early operating losses.

USRA Chairman Arthur D. Lewis said at a Washington press conference that ConRail will operate at a deficit of about $232 million in 1976, its initial year. However, he projects that deficits can be reduced so that the new rail system will be $36 million in the black by 1979, and show a profit of some $579 million by 1985.

ConRail also needs the benefit of "competitive rail service into the major markets" of the East and Midwest, Lewis said. The reorganization plan proposes selling about 2,000 miles of the Reading and Erie Lackawanna, plus small segments of the Penn Central, to the Chessie System. The plan also envisions purchase of sections of the bankrupt carriers by the Norfolk & Western and the Southern Railway.

The plan projects a ConRail work force of approximately 90,000 employes. This would mean the loss of jobs by some 3,300 workers, Lewis said. It is USRA's estimate that between 8,100 and 10,800 employes to be acquired by the last three mentioned roads, mainly the Chessie, would keep their jobs. However, Lewis admitted that this isn't a certainty.

Rail unions fought hard and successfully to maintain job protective conditions in the 1973 act that were the result of a labor-management agreement. The Nixon Administration tried unsuccessfully to knock out the provisions while the legislation was moving through Congress.

In summary, the protective features require that any worker with more than five years service, if released, is guaranteed monthly earnings until he reaches 65, dies or retires. Employes with less than five years service who might lose jobs are guaranteed severance pay geared to length of service. Employes can be transferred to other locations, but they must be paid moving expenses, including any loss on sales of homes.

Food, Fuel Send Price Index Soaring

1.2% Rise Steepest In 10 Months

By James M. Shevis

Massive retail price hikes—particularly for food and fuel—lifted the government's consumer price index by 1.2 percent in July, the steepest monthly increase in the CPI in 10 months, raising the specter of a return to double-digit inflation.

"Obviously consumers are in for more bad news in the near future," AFL-CIO President George Meany declared, pointing out that the "incredible" price increases were registered before the impact of the following developments could be determined:

- "The fantastic 1.2 percent jump in wholesale prices announced on Aug. 7, with food prices up an astounding 6.6 percent in one month.
- "The staggering increase in grain prices already occurring as a result of the new Russian grain deal.
- "The certain increase in fuel prices that will take place if the President's announced veto of continuation of oil price controls is not overridden."

In a separate report, the Bureau of Labor Statistics noted a further drop of five-tenths of 1 percent in the buying power of the average worker's pay.

Real spendable weekly earnings for a worker with three dependents averaged $90.88 in July, a decline of 48 cents from June and 30 cents from a year earlier. The figure is expressed in terms of take-home pay stripped of the effects of inflation since 1967.

Reporting on the latest round of price increases, BLS said the July CPI was 162.3 percent above its 1967 average, nearly 10 percent higher than a year ago.

The July rate, if it were to continue for the next 12 months, would put the inflation rate at 14.4 percent—the same blistering pace that seared the nation's economy in 1973 and 1974.

Sidney L. Jones, the Treasury Dept.'s assistant secretary for economic affairs, described the new inflationary surge as "not representative of what we have seen . . . or what we are likely to see."

Yet, in remarks earlier in the week at an American Accounting Association conference in Tucson, Ariz., Jones warned that the next few months likely will be a "turbulent" period for the American economy.

Last month's CPI increase compared with a rise of eight-tenths of

Meany Supports Dockers On Soviet Grain Embargo

MARITIME TRADES leaders discuss with AFL-CIO President George Meany the economic impact of the 9.8-million-ton Russian grain purchase on American consumers and the U.S. shipping industry during a meeting at the federation's headquarters.

Asks Action To Protect Consumers

By John R. Oravec

AFL-CIO President George Meany strongly reaffirmed support for the Longshoremen on holding up new shipments of grain to the Soviet Union unless the interests of the American consumer and the U.S. maritime industry are fully protected.

Organized labor wants assurances that the new grain sales will not bring a repeat of the economic consequences that grew out of the 1972 Russian wheat deal, Meany said in support of the ILA policy.

Meany told a press conference that consumers, the shipping industry and even American farmers were "ripped off" by the secret grain deal three years ago. The resultant higher food costs paid by consumers did not really benefit farmers, he stressed.

Meany said the position of the maritime trades unions—which met in an ad hoc committee session earlier—is quite clear: "They're not going to load any grain to the Soviet Union under the new purchase arrangements made since the first of July unless there is a policy set forth and agreed to that will protect the American consumer and the American shipping industry."

Within hours after the ILA grain embargo was announced, dockworkers in Houston halted loading operations on ships destined for Russian ports. But they were ordered back to work a day later under a temporary restraining order issued by a federal district judge

At Second Convention:

Farm Workers Gear For Key Union Votes

Fresno, Calif.—The Farm Workers second biennial convention geared up for crucial representation elections in California's growing areas and called on the state's new agricultural labor relations board to clarify organizing and balloting rules.

UFW President Cesar Chavez told some 700 delegates that current regulations do not provide ease of access to the state's ranches for union organizers.

Unless a clear access rule is spelled out, Chavez warned, UFW members will stage protests at the state capital in Sacramento.

Chavez, who arrived at the convention site after a six-week 1,000-mile walk from the Mexican border to build support for the elections, also asked the board to permit the symbols of the two major competing unions—the UFW and the Teamsters—to be printed on the ballots. He wants the UFW's black eagle emblem on the ballot to make it easier for farm workers to make their choice.

Chavez and the UFW received solid assurances of help and support in the elections from a broad representation of organized labor. California's new law giving farm workers the right to petition for secret-ballot elections to decide which union, if any, they want to represent them goes into effect on Aug. 28.

Enacted by the state legislature and signed by Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr., less than three months ago, the law provides that an election must be held within seven days after the initial petition is filed. Chavez predicted that the UFW will win back a majority of the contracts it lost to the Teamsters two years ago when many growers signed "sweetheart" pacts with the larger union.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, at its midsummer meeting in Chicago, instructed the Dept. of Organization & Field Services to provide assistance to the UFW, consistent with the federation's long

Court Okays New Reforms On Elections

The 1974 election reform law—propelled through Congress by the Watergate scandal and strongly supported by organized labor—has met and passed its first legal test.

In unanimously upholding most main provisions of the law, an eight-judge panel of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia said any "incidental impact" it might have on free speech is fully warranted by the history of big-money abuses in American politics.

The law authorizes public financing of presidential elections, calls for strict disclosure of contributions

Studies Center Offers 28 Training Courses

The AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center will begin its new academic year in September with a schedule of 28 tuition-free training courses for full-time union officers, representatives and staff members.

Most of the one-week or two-week programs will be presented at the center's new 47-acre campus in Silver Spring, Md., which opened last October.

Eight institutes will be held at state university campuses in Alabama, Colorado, Illinois, Michigan and California.

The program of training for union officials includes three types of courses:

- Improvement of personal skills such as speaking, writing, reading, presiding, administration, handling media relations, budgeting and bookkeeping and psychology.
- Background on major issues such as economics, corporate power, international affairs and women in the labor force.
- The sharpening of skills for specific union activities in such areas as arbitration, negotiating,

Complaints Up Sharply On Wage-Hour Chiseling

Workers' complaints of employers violating the federal wage-hour law rose sharply over the last two years while investigations initiated by the Labor Dept. dropped substantially.

In fiscal year 1975, complaints totaled nearly 53,000, a steep rise from 41,000 in the previous year and 38,400 in fiscal 1973.

Warren D. Landis, director of the Labor Dept.'s Wage-Hour Division, noted in an interview with the Bureau of National Affairs that 85 percent of the agency's investigations last year were based on complaints and only 15 percent were "directed" investigations.

Three years ago, 40 percent were directed investigations and 60 percent grew out of workers' complaints. The decline in agency-initiated investigations points up labor's contention of the lack of adequate federal funds to provide for more wage-hour compliance officers.

About 10 percent of the 53,000 complaints filed in fiscal '75 involved employer violations of new provisions added by the 1974 amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The amendments not only in-

Woodworkers Submit Forestry Pacts to Vote

Vancouver, B.C.—The Woodworkers reached tentative agreement with the British Columbia forest industry on new two-year contracts covering 38,000 members throughout the Canadian province.

The agreement, which calls for a $1.55 an hour wage increase over the two-year period, has been submitted to IWA members for ratification votes on a local by local basis. The tally is expected to be completed by Aug. 28.

IWA negotiators recommended acceptance of the terms which were proposed by a special mediator appointed by the provincial government.

Meanwhile, members of two striking pulp and paper unions rejected similar proposals. The unions — the Canadian Paperworkers Union and the Pulp, Paper & Woodworkers of Canada—walked out at 21 pulp and paper mills in British Columbia and in Ontario on July 16.

CPU officials have been critical of the industry, charging that it has failed to bargain in good faith. The union, which gained autonomy last year from the Paperworkers, reported no significant progress toward settlement of any of its 80 or so contracts covering 40,000 members.

Some 7,200 CPU members are on strike in British Columbia; another 3,400 have struck in Ontario. Nine of the struck mills are newsprint producers.

The differences in the British Columbia dispute center on wages and length of contract. The CPU wants a one-year agreement, not two. In Ontario, the obstacle is management's refusal to accept the makeup of the union bargaining group.

The IWA pacts cover about 30,000 workers at logging, sawmill and plywood plants along the coast of British Columbia and on Vancouver Island and another 8,000 elsewhere in the province.

The union negotiated with the Forest Industrial Relations Association, representing about 100 coastal companies and the Interior Forest Labor Relations Association embracing a smaller number of firms in the southern and interior sections of British Columbia.

When talks between the three unions and the industry broke down earlier this summer, IWA members remained on their jobs pending the special mediator's proposals.

The IWA agreements retain the cost-of-living escalator clause first negotiated last year. Top wages under the tentative agreement woul rise to $9.29 an hour at the start of the second year of the contracts next June.

Other benefits include management agreement to increase its contribution to pension plans, a move that would more than double the benefits.

Safety Review Panel Gets New Chairman

President Ford has appointed Frank Barnako, the newest member of the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission, to serve as chairman of the panel in place of Robert D. Moran.

Moran, who headed OSHRC since it was established in 1971, has two more years remaining in his term and will continue as a member of the commission. Union safety representatives have been sharply critical of his approach to enforcement of the federal job health and safety law.

Barnako, a former official of the Bethlehem Steel Corp., was confirmed by the Senate in mid-July to succeed James F. VanNamee, whose term expired Apr. 27. Timothy F. Cleary is the third member of the commission.

OSHRC reviews citations and proposed penalties issued by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration for violation of federal job safety standards.

Network Schedules Set for Labor Day

AFL-CIO President George Meany, Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and Vice President I. W. Abel will make nationwide radio addresses on Labor Day, Monday, Sept. 1.

The networks and times set for the broadcasts are:

Abel, CBS, 7:35 p.m. (EDT).

Kirkland, Mutual, 7:45 p.m. (EDT).

Meany, NBC, 9:45 p.m. (EDT).

Local radio stations may air these broadcasts at different hours and should be checked for exact broadcast times.

Wage Law Chiseling Spurs Sharp Jump in Complaints

creased the federal minimum wage —currently $2.10 an hour and due to reach $2.30 next Jan. 1 for millions of workers—but also extended coverage to an additional 7 million workers and reduced the number exempt from overtime pay protections.

Landis told BNA that the '74 amendments don't pose a serious enforcement problem for the wage-hour agency, noting that only 5,500 of the 53,000 complaints in the past fiscal year resulted from the "new coverage."

However, the lack of needed manpower restricts the scope of the agency's enforcement activities. The division is requesting an additional 100 compliance officers in the fiscal 1976 supplemental appropriations bill now before Congress.

The agency's current compliance staff of less than 1,100 must enforce provisions of not only FLSA, but also the Davis-Bacon Act, Equal Pay Act and the Age Discrimination in Employment Act.

Although he expressed little concern for overall enforcement of the new amendments to the FLSA, Landis did cite certain areas that could be troublesome.

One is the use of tips to supplement the federal minimum wage. Congress made it clear that tipped employes are to retain all their tips. If the tips add up to enough, the employer may deduct up to one-half of the worker's minimum wage.

While the amendments do not prohibit the pooling of tips among employes who are customarily tipped, employers cannot designate other workers to benefit from the tip pool if they normally are not tipped. Thus, a restaurant employer could not use the tip pool to supplement the wages of kichen workers, janitors, laundry attendants and others.

Another problem may arise with a suit against the Labor Dept. by a group of employers in fast food service operations—such as vending machines, ice cream stands, hamburger carryouts and caterers—seeking to be classified as restaurant operations.

The reclassification would mean that such establishments would have to pay overtime premiums only for work in excess of 46 hours a week, an exemption reserved for restaurants.

In a recent opinion letter, Landis pointed out that a business place selling food is not a restaurant unless the customer can come in and sit down and place his order from a full menu.

Landis told BNA that he expects increased activity in child labor civil penalties under new regulations that went into effect July 18. Penalties may go as high as $1,000 per violation.

In fiscal '75, the number of minors found illegally employed amounted to 16,966. Of the total, 10,452 were in retail trade and 5,622 in restaurants. The remaining 900 were in other industries.

The federal law forbids employing a minor under age 16 in nonfarm work and bars employment between ages 16 and 19 in hazardous nonfarm occupations. The 1974 amendments also prohibit employment of children under age 12 on farms other than those operated by their families and on farms not subject to the federal minimum wage. Children between 12 and 14 may be employed on covered farms where their parents are employed.

On state and local government employes, the wage-hour agency has run into an enforcement obstacle with the stay by Chief Justice Warren Burger of regulations covering fire fighters and police. A suit brought by the National League of Cities challenges the extension of the act to all state and local nonsupervisory employes.

Amendments to FLSA in 1966 extended coverage to 3 million employes of public schools, hospitals and transportation systems, and the 1974 amendments added the remaining 3.4 million nonsupervisory workers in state and local governments.

Landis said recently that the Labor Dept. has adopted the position "to take no action with respect to noncompliance situations involving employes covered for the first time as a result of the 1974 amendments where the local government entity places in escrow any monies that might be required to cover potential back wage payments resulting from noncompliance situations.

Normal enforcement activities are continuing, however, with respect to other state and local government workers, Landis said.

Last year's FLSA amendments also extended coverage to most federal employes and some others in related services. Enforcement authority for most of the government workers was given to the Civil Service Commission. The wage-hour agency was assigned enforcement for workers in the Postal Service, Postal Rate Commission, Tennessee Valley Authority and the Library of Congress. But the library was also given a degree of self-enforcement authority.

Textile Workers Hit NLRB Ruling Upholding J.P. Stevens Discharges

A three-member panel of the National Labor Relations Board ruled in a split decision that J. P. Stevens & Co. had the right to discharge 22 employes who got up and asked questions at company meetings held to discourage organizing efforts by the Textile Workers Union of America.

The ruling was branded "a rank injustice" by TWUA President Sol Stetin who charged the decision "legitimizes the brain-washing activities of employers."

The NLRB has, "in effect, turned its back on workers who had the courage to stand up and challenge company propaganda during the course of a 'captive-audience' meeting," Stetin said. "It now appears to be a crime for pro-union workers to exercise their right of free speech."

Upholding a 1974 finding by an NLRB administrative law judge, Board Members John A. Penello and Ralph E. Kennedy held that the workers' questions were aimed at disrupting the company meetings at several plant locations between late 1972 and early 1974.

A different majority of Penello and Member John H. Fanning ordered the reinstatement of a 23rd worker who they found had not taken part in the alleged plan to disrupt the company meetings. Kennedy would have approved the discharge of all 23.

Fanning, however, said that the entire group of workers should be restored to their jobs because their rights under the National Labor Relations Act were clearly violated.

Fanning charged that the facts of the case do not "even remotely suggest" the existence of a scheme to disrupt speakers at the company metings. In a lengthy dissent, he declared:

"There is not a scintilla of evidence of a conspiracy to heckle or otherwise interrupt respondent's speakers so as to prevent an effective presentation of the speech. Nor is there testimony of an agreement among employes, explicit or implicit, to ask disruptive questions."

The NLRB ruling covered a consolidation of charges involving J.P. Stevens plants in Wallace, S.C.; Turnersburg, N.C.; Roanoke Rapids, N.C.; and Rockingham, N.C. The events of the case occurred during a bitterly contested campaign by the TWUA to organize Stevens employes.

Two days before the Sept. 19, 1973, representation election at the company's two Wallace plants, the plant managers arranged meetings for employes to hear their arguments for not voting for the union.

At these and similar meetings at other plant locations, employes arose during the company speeches and asked for an opportunity to speak or to ask questions. Other employes commented on the firm's anti-union campaign.

In upholding the subsequent discharges, the NLRB panel majority maintained that the employe speakers sought to disrupt the meetings with questions that were "loaded, loud and distracting."

But Fanning, in his dissent, objected to this characterization of the facts and noted that Stevens's "entire course of conduct in the latter stages of the union campaign clearly reflected its desire to chill concerted partisan activity by inquisitive employes rather than to insure the unencumbered presentation of its speeches."

Fanning said the firings were indiscriminate and without advance warning. "Three people were fired for merely standing without saying anything," he observed.

Airline Unionist Named To CAB Advisory Unit

President Kelly Rueck of the Flight Attendants, a division of the Air Line Pilots, is one of 20 persons named to a special Civil Aeronautics Board advisory committee on procedural reforms.

The panel members—all of them from outside the government—represent a cross-section of interests in the aviation industry. Rueck is the only union representative.

The committee was established to study the procedural aspects of the CAB, and to recommend changes to reduce costs and delays in the administrative processes.

'Recovery' Claim Rejected:

Plasterers' Parley Stresses Job Needs

Las Vegas—The head of the Plasterers & Cement Masons blasted both the Ford Administration and Congress for failure to adopt strong measures to restore the economy's health.

Hard times are even more keenly felt in the building and construction industry, which today "has its back to the wall," President Joseph T. Power declared at the union's 43rd convention here.

Power strongly criticized President Ford's vetoes of bills to aid the construction industry as well as the Democratic majority in Congress for its inability to override the vetoes. He urged the delegates to undertake a massive letter-writing campaign to secure passage of the situs picketing bill which the Senate is slated to take up when it returns from its recess next month.

He noted that while average joblessness in the construction industry is about 21 percent, it is about 30 percent among plasterers, cement masons and shop hands who belong to the union.

This figure easily climbs to as high as 55 percent in some of the nation's highly urbanized areas, Power said.

"No matter what the Administration economists pronounce about the business end of the recession," Power declared, "the human recession of unemployment will continue for the rest of this decade unless strong actions are taken immediately."

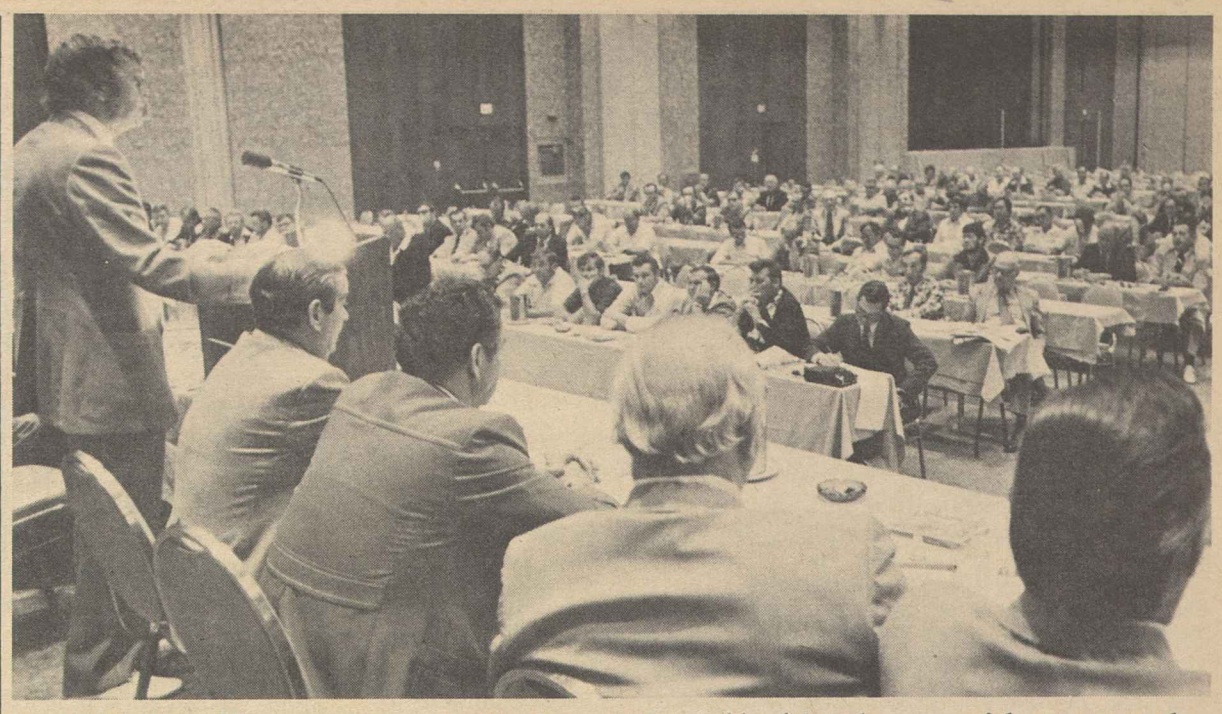
The delegates re-elected Power to a new four-year term of office along with Sec.-Treas. John J. Hauck, Executive Vice President Melvin H. Roots, seven members of the executive board and 15 vice presidents.

The labor-backed site-picketing bill received strong support from William J. Usery, director of the Federal Mediation & Concilation Service, who told the delegates that the measure now making its way through Congress "represents another step toward finding our way to mutual labor-management peace."

Usery said he viewed the legislation as "the first adjustment in what I feel is a long overdue tuneup of construction industry labor-management practices." He noted the high incidence of strikes in the industry, and added that "not only do we have more strikes in the construction industry; they last longer."

Usery said the average work stoppage in the industry last year lasted 29 days compared to 19 for all other industries. He noted, however, that the Plasterers & Cement Masons had fewer strikes than the average building trades union, "and those walkouts ended sooner than the average by nearly five days."

Also addressing the convention during its early stages were Alan Kistler, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services; Executive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning of the California AFL-CIO and Daniel O'Sullivan, executive vice president of Union Labor Life Insurance Co.



SOLAR ENERGY SYSTEMS under development for residential and commercial use to cut the need for oil consumption would bring about new job opportunities, Sheet Metal Workers President Edward J. Carlough told a conference of the union's business agents in Toronto.

Sheet Metal Workers Open Drive For Solar Energy Development

Toronto—A major effort to use solar energy—sunlight—for air heating and cooling in America's commercial and residential buildings was touched off here at the National Business Agents Conference of the Sheet Metal Workers.

President Edward J. Carlough told the 600 union officials that by the most conservative estimates, use of solar energy systems could cut the nation's oil consumption by an eventual 400,000 barrels a day. Immediate "retro-fitting" of the heating and air condtioning systems in present commercial, industrial and institutional buildings could lead to savings of 100,000 barrels of oil a day, Carlough added, citing Treasury Dept. estimates.

He said the volume of work involved in the conversion of heating and cooling systems using large quantites of energy could provide jobs for "every unemployed sheet metal worker. . . . It would guarantee full production and full employment for our industry."

The Sheet Metal Workers, he added, will ask Congress and the state legislatures to pass emergency laws for tax credits for business expenditures made now to achieve energy savings for the future.

The conference devoted a day to a workshop on solar energy—theoretical, scientific and practical—by leading experts in the field. They included Prof. George Lof of Colorado State University, known as the "father of solar energy;" Vice President Charles Zraket of the Mitre Corp., a Boston non-profit engineering firm; Dmitri Gorschov of the Mitco Corp., which is developing solar engineering systems; and several representatives of contracting and supply firms.

All agreed that the use of air, rather than water, in solar energy heating and cooling could open the way to vast expansion of these systems in the years ahead.

A study prepared for the union by the Mitre Corp. indicated that within the next 25 years the sun's energy would provide heating and cooling for nearly 2.5 million single family homes, 22,000 apartment buildings, 80,000 retail stores and 66,500 low-rise office buildings.

Solar energy work would be a welcome lift for an industry now hit with heavy unemployment, Carlough told the union business agents.

President Robert Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. told the conference that in the construction industry "1974 was a disaster, and 1975 looks no better."

The dollar volume of building permits is still very low, he said, and the electrical utilities industry has had to cut $61 billion out of a projected $81 billion construction programs.

That means, he estimated, a loss of 220,000 construction jobs in the next four years.

"There is folly and waste in our present economic policies," Georgine declared. "People stand ready to work, while we cut back needed projects to make us independent on the energy front."

He hailed the recent House passage of the bill to permit construction unions to picket unfair subcontractors at the job site and asked for heavy mail to members of the Senate, where action on the bill is due in September.

The conference gave unanimous support to Carlough in a flaring dispute with "SMACNA" — the Sheet Metal & Air Conditioning National Association, which represents a majority of contractors in the union's jurisdiction.

The dispute involves the action of SMACNA's board of directors in rescinding, after a period of several months, an agreement with the union on arbitration of disputes involving payments to the industry fund that finances SMACNA and other activities, including a lid on the spread of non-union work. Although agreement had been reached with the union officers and had been ratified, a group of directors forced the trade group to repudiate the action.

The union has notified the employer group that unless it lives up to the original agreement the Sheet Metal Workers will withdraw from the joint national labor committee of SMACNA and notify local unions and non-affiliated contractors they have no further obligation to negotiate or make payments into the industry fund.

Labor Studies Center Offers Varied Courses

organizing, administering pension plans, worker education, job safety and health and civil rights.

Special programs will be offered this year for building trades representatives and for union editors.

AFL-CIO President George Meany, chairman of the Labor Studies Center trustees, announced the new program in a 48-page catalogue just published by the center. He said:

"It is clear that labor leaders now have the opportunity to keep pace with the long standing AFL-CIO objective of improving the quality of labor's voice in the affairs of the nation and in speaking for the interests of the members they represent."

Meany urged all AFL-CIO unions to plan their educational activities around the center's 1975-1976 calendar. Last year 14 unions used the center for their own training programs.

The AFL-CIO has provided all funds for the purchase and operation of the 47-acre campus, including reconstruction, redecorating and furnishing of the three buildings now in use. A fourth building, an auditorium, is being rebuilt and a fifth, a second residence hall, will be built during this academic year.

Since the center was organized six years ago, its enrollment has totaled 3,451 union leaders, 845 since it moved to its new campus last fall.

CONVENTION

The New Hampshire State AFL-CIO convention will be held Oct. 23-26, 1975, in Nashua.

Participation in a Labor Studies Center institute is limited to 25 persons, normally not more than three from any one national or international union. Leaders and staff personnel of the AFL-CIO state and local central bodies are also eligible.

Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., formerly a professor at Michigan State University, is the center's executive director.

A copy of the new AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center catalogue for 1975-1976 is available on request from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Public Relations, 815 16th St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Window Glass Cutters, GBBA Complete Merger

Media, Pa.—The Window Glass Cutters merged with the Glass Bottle Blowers effective Aug. 1 after members of the Glass Cutters overwhelmingly approved the action in a referendum, Presidents Harry A. Tulley of the GBBA and Arthur L. Markham of the Glass Cutters announced in letters to the AFL-CIO.

GBBA officials were authorized by convention action to make merger arrangements with other unions in the stone, glass and clay industries.

The Glass Cutters, headquartered in Columbus, O., have been affected by a declining membership in recent years brought on by foreign imports, a severe drop in housing construction, and industry conversion to float glass production.

The seven remaining Glass Cutters' locals with a membership of about 460 were redesignated as new locals of the GBBA.

Markham has joined the GBBA staff as an international representative to service the Glass Cutters' membership in the GBBA. Albert Noe, Jr., secretary-treasurer of the Glass Cutters, is retiring.

Cotton Dust Warnings Urged in Textile Mills

Columbia, S.C. — The Textile Workers urged the South Carolina Dept. of Labor to require the state's cotton textile mills to post warning signs alerting employes to medical evidence that has clearly established that cotton dust is a serious threat to their health.

Fire Fighters Form Unit on Study of Burns

The Fire Fighters have established a union committee to encourage expansion of governmental research on burns, their treatment and rehabilitation of burn victims, President William H. McClennan announced. The committee will also serve as a clearinghouse of information for IAFF local unions on activities in the field of burn treatment and prevention.

Announcing his appointment of the committee, McClennan noted that the IAFF has long sought to focus attention on the problems of burn prevention and treatment. Many IAFF views on the subject are contained in the "America Burning" report of the National Commission on Fire Prevention & Control.

"A good start has been made," McClennan said. "Many organizations are now operating in the burn research and prevention field in the United States. The Fire Prevention & Control Act of 1974 has authorized an appropriation of $8 million for burn care facilities.

"Now we must make the next move. We must see that funds are made available and are used wisely, in research, treatment and rehabilitation programs. We in the IAFF are going to do everything we can to see that this vitally important work goes forward as it should."

The Public Interest

AS NEW YORK slowly sinks into financial disaster, it becomes urgent for other communities to examine the fate of the nation's greatest city. No wall separates this massive pile of people and property from the rest of the country. This shining metropolis is the mirror in which other towns and cities, states and indeed the nation itself can see what the future may hold in store for them.

The shadow of bankruptcy falls on all. Rich and powerful as we are, we have not been able to balance the books, to reconcile hope with capacity, need with resources. A powerful force, transcending all boundaries, tears us apart with conflicting inventories of profits up and human values down.

Desperate for help, New York has sought it to no avail in Washington and Albany. The answer has been "stew in your own juice," or "live within your own means." Thus denied, the City Fathers, as a last resort, have turned for salvation to the bankers.

Some may find irony in turning for help to those who have in the first place been the cause of much of the present difficulty. To them, the bankers have always been in charge, in any case. The joint board of financiers, affectionately dubbed by New Yorkers as Big Mac, is merely a formal device whereby the money community may more directly take over the running of the city.

The assumption now is that what the elected officials are unable to do, Big Mac will accomplish. It deals directly with the heads of the municipal unions. And presumably, in time it will itself direct, or dictate to those with the elected authority to direct, programs for streets and schools, bridges and tunnels, subway fares, etc. etc.

BY AND LARGE, financiers are fine fellows when encountered on the golf links or on the yacht or at the club. But during so-called working hours, they concentrate on business—and their business is to maximize profits. In banking, their major interest is the interest rate. Their responsibility is all pervasive; they provide the fuel for profit-making throughout the entire American economy.

Presumably, they will run the city as they run any other enterprise. There will be no interference with what they skim off the economy. And if the store doesn't make money, they may have to close it down. Before that happens, they will cut here and trim there. The fate of the city will be determined by whether or not the rate of return to the financiers can be maintained.

Americans who 200 years after the founding of this nation may still believe one of its basic purposes is to provide for the general welfare, must now learn that municipal governments may have to be excluded from this purpose, as the pursuit of happiness and the pursuit of the buck become synonymous.

All levels of our government provide proof of the wisdom of the money men. Those who put the interest rate above human fate have packed our cities with empty office towers while the housing shortage grows more crushing, are preparing once again to ship wheat to nations determined ultimately to destroy our way of life and at profit-laden prices underwritten by higher food prices for the American worker.

They are ready to do business with blackmailing oil suppliers because tax loopholes insure their own record-breaking profits, while in our own garment industry, they hesitate not for a moment to wipe out jobs by pioneering in the establishment of sweatshops throughout the world.

A Word Edgewise:

Summer 'Retreat' by the Sea Refreshes Body, Mind, Spirit

By John P. Roche

IT WAS 21 YEARS AGO this summer that my wife and I discovered Martha's Vineyard. It was quite a drowsy spot in those days: you could simply drive to the ferry station at Wood's Hole and invariably, without reservations, get your car on the next boat. We loved it, particularly since we were welcomed by friends to membership in a family cooperative that dated back to 1919, and have thus been able each summer to renew our acquaintanceship with the same sturdy band, their children, grandchildren, and now even an occasional great-grandchild. Like ourselves in the 1950s, new families have joined; alas, the formidable matriarchs of yesteryear have joined God and doubtless give Her as much good advice as we received.

One of the nicest aspects of this permanent yet changing commune, and the one I'm convinced that has assured its survival, is its total absence of ideology. Over the years dedicated animosities have developed, but always of a non-theoretical character. If, from time to time, when the spirits were high and the flagons low, some sharpness surfaced, the aura of civility was always restored by the next morning. Again, no formalities, no structured apologies: just the pretense that nothing worth remembering had occurred. Now and then, perhaps, some malicious gossip behind the Barn, but St. Augustine's analysis of human character is not altered by a boat ride.

Sometime in the 1960s the Vineyard was "discovered" and became the "in" vacation spot among the exhausted elites of New York, Cambridge and Washington. Various members of our outfit, on encountering friends from these spots who had bought or rented houses, have always returned with the same story: it is impossible to explain our setup to "foreigners." We have, for example, a regular meal schedule seven days a week: breakfast at 8, lunch at 1, and dinner at 7 —all announced by vigorous ringing of a large ship's bell.

This strikes some observers as positively monastic; indeed, when my wife and I are invited to a friend's place for a drink after the beach and quietly exit around 6:30, I always explain we have to be back for Vespers. But our meals are not just food inputs—they are opportunities for conversation with friends one has not seen since last August and will in all probability not again encounter till next summer.

There are probably as many definitions of a "vacation" as there are people. The two main schools of thought on the island are those interested in recharging their batteries and others who are dedicated to overcharging their livers. Never having signed the pledge, I have no intention of criticizing the latter. However, we live on different wavelengths—for me a vacation is a kind of secular retreat. I have never been a "nature boy" and most of the savages I have known were anything but noble, but I find that I am refreshed by contact with the sea and the sky.

There is an elemental power in the sea that is virtually immune to human meddling. As a child whose father spent years at sea, and later as a devoted reader of Joseph Conrad, I learned respect for the ocean, respect later empirically buttressed by riding breakers and feeling their prodigious power.

OFTEN IT SEEMS as though the sea and sky are in competition. Some evenings, notably those which follow very hot days on the mainland, we sit in the barn door and watch the fog roll in. The first stars to vanish are on the horizon, but gradually the soft night extinguishes the others and your flashlight throws an eerie tunnel of illumination. However, when the skies are clear the view is literally stunning. Not only is there very little smog, but the metropolis of West Tisbury throws little reflection into the night sky.

The other night, for example, you could reach up and grab the Kite's tail, and other constellations were equally overpowering. On top of this, we are in the shooting star season, and in the course of three hours spotted a couple of dozen slashing down through the heavens. My wife claims that watching the sea and the stars brings out the secret mystical strain in me.

I can't testify to the truth of that, but I will admit I get a probably badly needed sense of humility from stargazing and sea-watching. A columnist, who by definition is supposed to act as an authority on everything, suddenly realizes that the light he is seeing from a distant star set out on its journey when our earth was still lifeless, molten mass.

Significance for Workers:

Meany Charges Detente Policy Undermines Democratic Values

The following is excerpted from an article by AFL-CIO President George Meany which appeared in the Aug. 14, 1975, issue of the Daily Telegraph of London, England, on detente and the interests of the democratic workingman.

ON THE RECORD SO FAR detente has brought about no favorable changes within the Soviet bloc—certainly no easing of the plight of Soviet dissidents—but it has brought about some unfavorable developments within the West, including, it would seem, the downgrading of anti-communism as an integral part of the democratic philosophy.

This is a matter of no small importance to the workingman of the West. Political democracy recognizes that groups and classes of people have conflicting interests, and lays out the means by which conflicts can be expressed and resolved. Since Communist societies proclaim that they have abolished class conflict, they naturally purport to have no need of these means.

But for working people in the western world, political democracy has not been a dispensable luxury. It has provided the essential tools by which workers could create unions and acquire the power to advance their social and economic interests. Without the freedoms of speech, assembly, association, and other modes of collective expression, a union simply cannot function—not well, not poorly, not at all. And if unions cannot function, then you have a society in which it is presumed that the worker is not the best judge of his own interest—that those interests must be defined and decided by somebody else in the society, i.e., the state.

This is, of course, the very system that prevails in the Soviet Union. The destruction of independent workers organizations—no less thorough than under fascist regimes—is justified in the Communist world by an ideology that claims to have seized control of the state for the workers. The bitter and illuminating irony, of course, lies in the absence of any means by which the workers themselves can, even indirectly, ratify—or reject—this seizure of power in their name.

This is why the AFL-CIO has refused, and will continue to refuse, to engage in exchange visits with representatives of so-called unions behind the Iron Curtain. They simply are not unions. They are instruments of the state whose function is the regimentation, not the representation, of workers. To legitimate them as trade unions amounts to a betrayal of the Russian workers.

Governments must relate to one another regardless of the social systems they represent. The dreams of anarchists to the contrary notwithstanding, there can be no power vacuum within a country: somebody has to govern.

The same standards cannot be applied to unions. There are countries where they don't exist; there are parts of my country where unions are weak or non-existent—or where so-called "company unions" exist. We don't invite them into our federation just because they are the only show in town. We think it is vital to maintain the distinction between real unions and phony unions. Western history in this century is full of examples of the terrible consequences that flow from calling things unions that are not unions.

In sum, then, I am arguing that to the extent that the present policy of detente leads to a depreciation of democratic values in the West—and I see considerable evidence of this already—it will be even more harmful for the workingman than for anyone else. Remember, the trade union movement's commitment to democracy grows out of the very commonsensical observation that a system that puts numbers above wealth is likely to produce a better deal for the worker than any system that diminishes, frustrates, or obliterates majority rule.

WE BELIEVE THAT the cause of social and economic justice in the United States must be pursued directly and head-on. That's what the AFL-CIO is in business for. We also believe the cause of peace must be pursued directly, not as a hoped-for fallout from dubious commercial relationships.

The fact is that a policy of firm resistance to Communist expansion, backed by the military means to make the policy credible, is the best way to keep the peace. When such a policy was followed in Cuba in 1962, it brought no conflagration but a Soviet retreat (and subsequently a slight thaw in Soviet-American relations based on a healthy respect for American power.) Our stand in Korea stopped Communist expansion there—without bringing on World War III. Scare words like "cold warrior" should not blind us to the fact that it was America's nuclear superiority that prevented World War III, not peaceful Soviet intentions.

No policy for peace—whether it goes by the name of detente or something else—can be successful unless it is based on a clear recognition of where the threat to peace comes from. In our era, that threat comes mainly from the Communist world—from its imperialist drive to dominate world society. Not accidentally, the greatest threat to workers rights emanates from the same source.

There is a peace to be had by accommodating to this threat—or by remolding our institutions and values in its image or in an image more to its liking. But that is not a peace in which the workers of the world can hope to advance their deepest aspirations for a better life.

Whatever our government may do, whatever our capitalists may do, we will not accommodate to the commissars.

Prospects Brightest Since '51:

Drive for Jobsite Picketing Bill Gains Momentum in Congress

FEDERAL LEGISLATION to give craft unions the same jobsite picketing rights long held by industrial unions is closer to passage now than at any time in the struggle that began in 1951, President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. said.

Georgine said the measure is aimed at allowing craft unions to "peacefully advertise" grievances in a way that will bring about prompt settlement of disputes. He said that although the proposal has strong bipartisan support in both Congress and the White House dating back to President Eisenhower and every Administration since, employer groups determined to stop passage and their supporters in Congress have used all possible parliamentary roadblocks to prevent a vote on the issue. He pointed out that House passage of the measure shortly before the August recess is the best progress ever for the bill.

Appearing on Labor News Conference, Georgine said that the two central arguments made against the measure—that it would legalize secondary boycotts in construction and would give the unions a powerful hammer in collective bargaining—just don't stand up.

The bill does nothing to legalize secondary boycotts, he asserted, but only corrects improper definition of such action. He also stressed that the measure doesn't affect collective bargaining at all, since the craft unions already have the right to picket and shut down a whole jobsite when a contract has expired.

Turning to the economy in the construction industry, Georgine said that the predicted turnaround in housing never has developed. "During the current recession, no industry has been hit harder than construction," he said, and while employment has picked up in some industries, there has been no rebound in construction—particularly housing. He blamed the Administration's tight money and high interest rate policies.

He said the craft unions have urged the Administration and Congress to adopt policies and programs that will hold mortgage interest rate to "no more than 6 percent—maybe 6½ percent."

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE LABOR DEPT.'S Occupational Safety & Health Administration has completed the first stage of hearings on a permanent noise standard in the workplace with the cries of industry that it could not afford lower limits on sound still ringing in the ears of those in attendance.

Industry touted a study commissioned by OSHA which estimated that if the standard was set at 85 decibels it would cost $30.5 billion. The Environmental Protection Agency, which supports the 85-decibel level along with organized labor, had its own study which showed that the OSHA estimate was nearly twice as high as it should be.

All of these warnings that safety on the job and the protection of the limbs and health of workers cost just too much money are hard to believe—and for good reason.

Businessmen traditionally proclaim that it is economically and technically impossible for them to meet reasonable environmental and health standards.

We don't have the returns in yet on noise standards but we do have sufficient data on polyvinyl chloride (PVC) to fully appreciate the "crocodile tears" of industry.

In January 1974 the B.F. Goodrich plant in Louisville reported deaths of several of its workers who handled PVC. They died from a rare form of liver cancer known as angiosarcoma. In six months 21 confirmed deaths from the disease were reported, 15 in the United States.

In May 1974 OSHA, reacting to strong pressure from organized labor and scientific groups, issued proposed PVC standards that would limit the concentration in a plant's atmosphere to "no detectable level"—in practice, one part per million.

The industry let out a howl and let loose with its biggest scare tactic—a claim that the standard would close out 2.2 million jobs and as much as $90 billion in production.

THE INDUSTRY CONTENDED that even though 50-ppm of vinyl chloride produced many forms of cancer, including angiosarcoma of the liver in experimental animals, it was still safe enough for the American worker.

President Peter Bommarito of the Rubber Workers, testifying on behalf of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., lashed out at the industry's claims as "blackmail."

On April 1, 1975, the permanent PVC standard went into effect and all the dire predictions of management apparently have withered and died in the summer winds.

Last month the Wall Street Journal featured an article headlined: "Crying Wolf? Vinyl chloride plants keep humming under new federal rules."

The WSJ went on to report that four new plants have opened in the past six months and not one has closed. Industry found that not only can they live with the new regulations but are even boasting of their success in reducing work exposure in the chemical.

Then, the other day the Louisville Times, which had a role in first reporting the deaths at the B.F. Goodrich plant, suggested that the standards might be tightened even more without causing any hardships and offered this observation:

"The disparity between what the doomsayers predicted and what actually happened should cause the public to be wary of those, including strip miners, who claim that society cannot afford to make them operate responsibly. Usually that is not true, as the plastics industry discovered to its surprise and, we suspect, embarassment.

"There may be a lesson for industrialists in all this as well. They might find more sympathy for their admittedly very serious problems if they didn't always kick and scream like spoiled children, when told to do the right thing."

And the Labor Dept. might well remember these words in considering the permanent noise standards in the workplace.

EQUAL RIGHTS for craft and industrial unions are closer to reality now than at any time in the 25-year fight to correct a distorted definition of secondary boycotts, President Robert A. Georgine, center, of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Dale McFeatters, left, of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Duane Emme of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO public affairs interview is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

How to Buy:

Bait-Advertising Complaints Hit Big Retail Chain Stores

By Sidney Margolius

SOME OF THE BIGGEST retail chains recently have been charged by federal and state agencies with exaggerating claims of sale savings on both general merchandise and food.

Latest to be charged is the giant Sears Roebuck chain. A court complaint filed by California State Atty. Gen. Evelle J. Younger alleges false advertising and unfair business practices.

The basic question raised by this and some of the other recent complaints is, when is a sale really a sale?

The complaint claims that Sears offers goods at "price reductions" although the sale price really is the price at which Sears usually sells such merchandise. The attorney general's office charged that the "sale" price doesn't result in any real savings to consumers since it is offered so often and regularly, and such a large percentage of the sales occur at that price, that in fact it is the company's regular price.

The complaint alleges that the time limit is also misrepresented; that statements such as "four days only" were misleading in that the goods could be bought at the advertised price any time the consumer went to the store.

One of the most interesting aspects of this complaint is the reference to Sears' frequent washer and dryer sales. The complaint alleges that Sears advertises a combination of these two items to create "the misleading impression" that the consumer will save by buying them together. But no savings will be made by buying both, the complaint charges.

The complaint has not, of course, been tried and settled by a court decision.

In past years Sears often has been the object of charges by competitors that its salesmen tried to "trade up" consumers to higher-priced models than the advertised specials. Trade papers making surveys of Sears sales practices have reported experiences both ways in various Sears stores: hard-sell efforts to trade up, and willingness to sell the advertised special without a fight.

In 1972 the Wisconsin Office of Consumer Protection also took legal action against Sears. The state agency showed that the two low-priced sewing machines which appeared almost all the time in Sears' ads actually comprised only 6 percent of the stores' sales of all sewing machines. The state's records showed that Sears advertised its Model 1104 at prices from $46 to $58 at that time—sometimes even less than the $53.64 Sears itself had paid for the machines, Home Furnishings Daily reported at the time.

Sears signed a consent order to discontinue the practice but did not admit the charge. It denied it had intentionally used such selling methods.

The Wisconsin authorities at that time also reported complaints that Sears salesmen had tried to discourage purchases of TV sets and deep freezers advertised at low prices. But the agency said its investigation on these items was not conclusive.

The Federal Trade Commission also has charged Sears with using "bait" ads to try to sell costlier zig-zag sewing machines than the $58 model it had advertised. The FTC also alleged that Sears' compensation system "rewarded" salesmen for selling higher-priced models and discouraged sale of the low-priced special. The charges have not yet been decided.

THIS REPORT is not to pass judgment on Sears' values. Nor is Sears the only large chain to have faced charges of bait advertising. The rug, furniture and jewelry trades have been especially notorious for such complaints.

Many large food chains also have been recent targets of complaints for failure to have enough stock to back ads for specials. A & P has figured in several such actions. Other large chains that have been targets of FTC or local actions include National Supermarkets, Thriftimart stores and Vons.

Another revealing type of questionable "savings" claim was reported by Gerald Gold in the New York Times. One chain had posted "Special 69 cents" shelf signs on baked goods when the packages themselves were labeled with the non-special price of 69 cents.

Soup to Nonsense:

You, Too, Can Put on Pounds By Sticking to Low-Cal Foods

By Jane Goodsell

I'VE BEEN DIETING for six days. This morning I weighed myself, before breakfast and stark naked (I even removed my wristwatch) and I'd gained, yes gained, three-quarters of a pound. Now that I've calmed down enough to think more or less rationally, I'm beginning to understand how, and why, it happened.

The trouble with a diet is that when I'm on one I can't think about anything but food. Instead of reading the morning paper at breakfast, I study my diet list and calorie chart to learn what I can and cannot eat.

I bypass cinnamon buns at 200 calories each, and munch dry melba toast (25 calories) and sip tea. So far, so good. But my appetite, normally not voracious in the morning and diminished further by the daily news, is whipped up by that diet list.

I develop a craving for corned beef hash with a fried egg on top (300 calories). As I continue my study of the calorie chart, I come to doughnuts (200 calories each) and the thought of a plump glazed doughnut refuses to go away.

To get my mind off doughnuts, I start contemplating lunch. Should I have a tomato and cottage cheese salad or a poached egg on dry toast? I do not normally think about lunch until lunchtime. Now I can't think about anything else. By ten o'clock I can stand it no longer, and I eat an apple (100 calories) in the hope that it will dull my appetite and take my mind off a liverwurst and cheese sandwich on pumpernickel. No such luck.

So I scan the diet list again to find something else that might satisfy me without making me fat, and I discover to my surprise that a banana is only 100 calories. I eat one but this time, in looking over the calorie chart, I set my taste buds screaming for a stuffed pepper (300 calories). At 11 o'clock I eat three saltines (100 calories), and I want a club sandwich more than I have ever wanted anything. But I resist temptation. Instead, for lunch I eat a poached egg (76 calories) on rye toast (43 calories) and a glass of skimmed milk (89 calories). Although I have eaten not one single thing I really want, I have consumed 633 calories by 12:30 p.m., which is a lot more than I normally eat, and I still have the afternoon to live through. It's a long afternoon.

IN A DESPERATE effort to get my mind off hashed brown potatoes, lemon tarts, veal paprika, fettucini and popovers with strawberry jam, I munch my way through 325 calories of cottage cheese, celery stalks, carrot sticks, grapefruit, apples and diet crackers. I eat a spartan dinner of ground round (150 calories), one-half cup of green beans (26 calories), a small dish of pickled beets (50 calories) and a 100-calorie orange. I feel very sorry for myself.

To get away from the refrigerator, I go to bed and try to think of something more exciting to think about than food. A size 10 ultra-suede dress. Paul Newman. It's no use. Visions of meatloaf with mushroom sauce dance in my head. I tiptoe downstairs and eat a couple of hard-boiled eggs and five low-calorie crackers.

And that is how it happened that I gained three-quarters of a pound. I'm going off that diet tomorrow. I can't go on like this, thinking about food all the time.

Public Employee Dept. Slates 2nd Convention

The AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. has scheduled its second convention in Washington Sept. 4-5. The two-day session is expected to draw 125 delegates from the department's 29 affiliated unions.

The federation's newest department was established at a founding convention last November. Its affiliates represent 2.5 million employes of federal, state and local governments and the U.S. Postal Service.

The convention, to be held at the Shoreham Americana Hotel, will open with a keynote address by PED President William H. McClennan. Scheduled speakers include Senators Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) and Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.) and Representatives Carl Perkins (D-Ky.) and Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.).

Future departmental conventions will be held biennially.

Bureau's History Traced:

Fight to Create BLS Led by Early Unions

BEFORE THERE WAS a U.S. Dept. of Labor there was a Bureau of Labor Statistics, founded in 1885 after a 20-year fight by organized labor.

Although several state labor agencies preceded it, the BLS was the first national agency of its kind in the world. Six years after it began operation, France organized the first European labor agency, Office du Travail. England established a similar agency in 1893, Spain in 1894, Belgium in 1896, Austria in 1898 and Germany, Italy and Sweden in 1902.

"The European countries had been ahead of America both in collection of statistics and in enacting social legislation," Jonathan Grossman, labor historian of the Dept. of Labor and department historical researcher Judson MacLaury write in the department's Monthly Labor Review.

However, they note that the United States was clearly the leader in creating labor bureaus.

"Altruism and fear were the guiding stars of the drive for a labor statistics bureau," say the authors, "but the political power of the growing labor movement was the wind in its sails."

During the Civil War decade, unions fought for both national and state labor bureaus. In 1864, Rep. Gottlieb Orth of Indiana introduced a bill to create a federal labor department. Although the bill failed it was probably the first time that Congress considered establishing a department of labor.

Under the leadership of William Sylvis, the National Labor Union in 1868 urged that the national census include labor statistics and called for a federal bureau of labor with its "sole object the care and protection of labor."

In 1871 Congress did consider two bills to create a labor bureau but neither was acted upon. One passed the House but was tabled in the Senate. And with the death of Sylvis the idea died for a decade.

On the state level, labor politics, write Grossman and MacLaury, produced the first successes. In 1869 the governor of Massachusetts signed a bill creating the first government bureau of labor in the world. Other states followed so that 15 states had such bureaus by 1885.

In response to increasing pressure by labor, in 1882 the Senate Committee on Education & Labor opened a hearing into the "relations between labor and capital, the wages and hours of labor . . . strikes . . . and the causes thereof."

Among the unionists who testified were such figures in labor history as Peter J. McGuire, the founder of the Carpenters union; Adolph Strasser, president of the Cigar Makers; Louis Post, a journalist and a member of the New York City Central Labor Union; John Jarrett, president of the Amalgamated Iron & Steel Workers Union, and John Swinton, a leading labor journalist and publisher of John Swinton's Paper.

Also testifying was Carroll D. Wright, then commissioner of the Massachusetts Bureau of Labor Statistics who was destined to head the new federal bureau. He said that a federal bureau "should be constituted entirely on a scientific basis; should not be run on theories at all, but absolutely as a statistical bureau." He wanted it free of policies and lodged in the Interior Dept. rather than as a separate bureau.

Grossman and MacLaury said that "the strong support and growing power of organized labor and the labor press were crucial to the success of the drive for a federal labor bureau." The fledgling Federation of Organized Trades & Labor Unions, the predecessor of the AFL, strongly favored such a bureau.

From a trickle in 1879 a stream of bills by late 1883 and early 1884, Congress started seriously considering a labor statistics bureau.

Ironically, the bill finally winning House approval was authored by Rep. James Hopkins (Pa.) chairman of the House Labor & Education Committee, who was also vice president of the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce. The Senate subsequently passed it.

GAIU Delegates Told:

Bargaining Strength Held Vital in Slump

Toronto—Although the graphic arts industry is normally the last to feel the effects of any economic downturn, "the harsh reality of the current economic recession, for the first time since 1929, has confronted the industry with the problem of high unemployment," the first constitutional convention of the Graphic Arts International Union was told by President Kenneth J. Brown.

Brown warned the 353 delegates that there is a growing militancy by employers, who are increasingly trying to take advantage of the situation by "testing" the union as never before with take-it-or-leave-it ultimatums and a willingness to take a strike to see if the union can withstand the pressure.

Two main employer weapons being used, he reported, are strike insurance and the formation of PACT (Printers Accommodate Customers Together), whereby arrangements are made with other companies to handle struck work.

To counter the depression, the union will continue to support the remedial proposals of the AFL-CIO and the Canadian Labor Congress, Brown said, but he stressed two facets of the union's bargaining as more valuable than ever.

Those with cost of living clauses, he pointed out, (4 cents for every point rise in the Consumer Price Index) "have gained approximately 4 percent over the rise in the cost of living, while those without such contract protection have not even maintained their purchasing power through 1973 and 1974."

The other bargaining stress was placed on even closer coordination of negotiations, such as in Canada, where the most substantial contract packages and improvements are being obtained.

This first regular GAIU convention since Labor Day 1972 (there was a special one in 1973), when the three unions of Lithographers, Photoengravers and Bookbinders were combined into one, was described as "the end of phase 1." During that time, Brown said, the merged union "has achieved functional integration in all its departments, with everyone on the staff able to handle the numerous day to day problems on which locals request assistance. Our organization now has a new focus."

Two of the three leaders who formed the three former unions into the GAIU announced their retirement as of next Apr. 1. Given ovations by the delegates were Executive Vice Presidents William J. Hall, former president of the Photoengravers, and John Connolly, former president of the Bookbinders.

With a membership that is one quarter women, the GAIU has taken "a steady and positive position on equal opportunities in the three years since merger," the officers reported. "Our constitution reflects this. We have initiated many programs for equal opportunities, changing local constitutions, revising local bylaws, changing local contracts."

Compliance with Equal Employment Opportunity Commission regulations was called "a fact of life" that all locals must respect. "However," Brown stated, "it's time we turn completely from responding to the requirements of the law to practicing equal opportunity as a way of life—as a matter of course, so that we will be in the forefront of those organizations practicing equal opportunities."

Special attention was given to the relationship of the international union with its Canadian members, "where the winds of nationalism are blowing in opposition to foreign domination in many areas."

A conference of Canadian local presidents in September 1974, Brown reported, "unanimously approved a policy statement that recognized the international has, by its structure and full representation for Canadian members, been in full compliance with the CLC guidelines even before such guidelines were issued." Brown decried "separate Canadian internationals, artificially divided from U.S. union members solely by virtue of nationality."

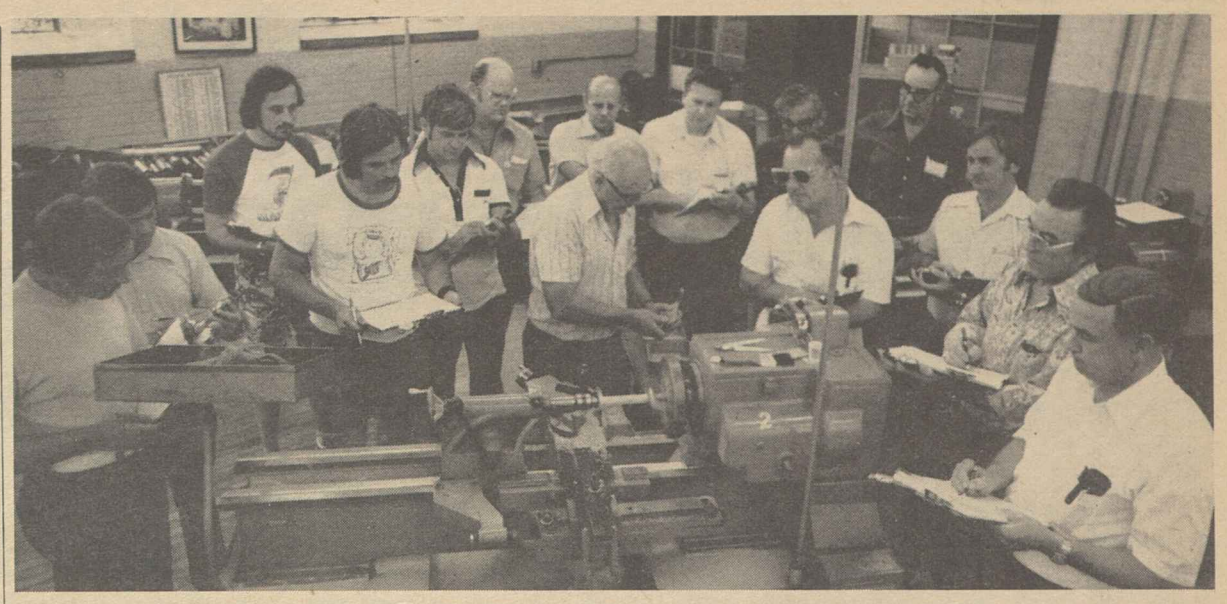
CLC Executive Vice President Shirley Carr enumerated a list of programs to the delegates on which the AFL-CIO and CLC "see eye-to-eye," including measures to counter the high unemployment in both countries.

President Charles A. Perlik, Jr. of The Newspaper Guild drew the vigorous response of the delegates on his proposal for "a joint no-raiding agreement among all four major unions in the industry (Guild, GAIU, Typographical, Printing & Graphic Communications)." He called for "a summit meeting of all four union presidents in San Francisco during the AFL-CIO convention."

Brown responded that it was "a practical presentation" and that the merged GAIU "will be prepared to explore any and all opportunities to create a new era of cooperation among all of the graphic arts unions."

Perlik reported that the recent TNG convention was enthusiastic about the first joint legislative conference GAIU and the TNG conducted last May and "wholeheartedly" authorized another joint effort for next year.

Delegates faced a workload of 76 resolutions that were cleared for floor action. They also prepared to make nominations for the first elections since GAIU's formation. Despite the merger agreement's attrition formula that will reduce the governing council from 50 to 32, there will be 48 positions to be filled in a membershipwide referendum later in the year.



WORK MEASUREMENT STANDARDS widely used in industry are studied by union representatives and staff members at Union Industrial Engineering Institutes at Madison, Wis. Two-week courses in work standards, job evaluation and related collective bargaining are cosponsored annually by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research and the University of Wisconsin School for Workers. Fifty-six students participated in this year's sessions.

Farm Workers' Delegates Gear For Key Elections in California

established policy of support to the union.

Alan Kistler, the department's director, recalled Federation President George Meany's assurance to Chavez a year ago in Washington:

"When a member of our family is in trouble we don't stand on the sidelines. We get into the battle. It becomes our fight."

Kistler, addressing the delegates, declared:

"Let the black eagle fly over every ranch in California. Let it be stamped on every box of grapes and every box of lettuce that comes from the soil of California."

The AFL-CIO has urged all of its affiliated unions and central bodies in California to extend all possible aid to the struggling union.

Executive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning pledged the California AFL-CIO's full support of the UFW, stressing that "if the union is to survive, it must win the elections." Executive Sec.-Treas. Sigmund Arywitz of the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO observed that the spirits of the convention delegates were high "because you know the labor movement is behind your efforts."

A resolution given a ringing endorsement by the delegates cited "the solidarity that has been built with the affiliation" of the UFW with the AFL-CIO and expressed the union's gratitude to the federation's leaders and members.

It hailed Meany's position "in the forefront of the fight for human dignity and social justice in America, especially in leading the condemnation of the Teamsters for their strikebreaking activities in 1973."

Auto Workers President Leonard Woodcock was among the speakers pledging support for the union's cause. Others included AFL-CIO Region VI Director William L. Gilbert; John Squires, vice president of the British Columbia Federation of Labor; and William Soltero, representing the Building & Construction Trades of Arizona.

Also addressing the convention was Msgr. George C. Higgins of the U.S. Catholic Conference who said the Farm Workers could count on the support of the Catholic community. He added his prediction that the UFW would win "a minimum of 85 percent" of the upcoming elections.

Appeals Court Upholds Election Reform Law

and expenditures, and limits the amount of money a person may give to candidates for federal office as well as candidates' spending.

The legal challenge is being led by Sen. James L. Buckley (R-N.Y.) and former Sen. Eugene McCarthy (D-Minn.). They expressed "disappointment" and indicated they would appeal to the Supreme Court. Although four judges dissented to portions of the ruling, dissents generally centered on incidental sections of the law.

Warning that the "corrosive influence of money" has blighted the election process in recent years, the judges concluded: "The situation not only must not be allowed to deteriorate further but . . . cannot be tolerated by a government that professes to be a democracy."

The court used unusually strong language in discussing abuses and particularly addressed itself to the abuses in former President Nixon's 1972 re-election campaign.

"Revelations of huge contributions from the dairy industry, a number of corporations (illegally) and ambassadors and potential ambassadors, made the 1972 election a watershed for public confidence in the electoral system," it said.

The principal argument made by challenges to the law was that its new limits on financial contributions curtail the freedom of contributors and candidates to express themselves in the political process.

The judges decided that these impositions were overshadowed by the need for curbing "ever-increasing campaign expenditures and reliance on large contributions from monied and special interests."

As to the plaintiff's objections to the rules on disclosure—including the requirement that names and addresses of $10 contributors be recorded—the court said that openness in political expenditures justifies a small sacrifice of privacy.

The court rejected arguments that public subsidies for Presidential candidates are a misuse of taxpayers' money and give candidates of the two major parties an unfair advantage over minor-party and new-party candidates.

The judges emphasized that anyone who does not want his money to go to candidates he doesn't support "can simply refrain from checking off his dollar" in the tax-return box. The system for financing minority- or new-party candidates, the court added, is not "invidiously discriminatory."

The panel found only one provision of the law unconstitutional —a provision requiring disclosure of information by anyone who spent money to influence an election. The wording in the law, it said, could be interpreted to include groups involved in "completely nonpartisan discussion of issues."

The court did not rule on a challenge to the legality of the Federal Election Commission, created to enforce the act. Since the commission has not yet exercised most of its power, the question is not yet a "ripe" constitutional issue, the judges declared.

Larson, Glaspar Boats On Labor's Boycott List

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has endorsed a consumer boycott against Larson Industries of Little Falls, Minn., which produces boats sold under the Larson and Glaspar labels.

The boycott action was taken at the July 31 meeting of the Executive Council in Chicago. Announcement was delayed in an effort to encourage the company to negotiate a contract with the Steelworkers, which represents Larson workers.

Following is the text of the council's statement:

"In October 1974, the United Steelworkers of America won an NLRB election at the Larson Industries in Little Falls, Minn., which manufactures boats for recreational purposes. From November until March the union unsuccessfully sought to negotiate a reasonable contract with the company.

"By its refusal to bargain responsibly on such basic issues as grievance procedure, seniority provisions and union security, the company forced the union members to strike on Mar. 24, 1975.

"The union members remain determined to win their struggle for their first contract and are backed by broad community support.

"Because of the company's intransigence, the USWA has called a consumer boycott on Larson boats, which are also sold under the name Glaspar.

"The AFL-CIO wholeheartedly endorses and supports this boycott and calls on those union members, who as a result of their union contracts now enjoy leisure time and the financial means to afford Larson products, to refuse to buy Larson or Glaspar boats until the company negotiates a decent and fair contract with its workers.

"We urge our state and local central bodies to rally union members and all consumers behind this boycott and the labor press to fully publicize it."

John C. Miller Named Acting NLRB Counsel

John C. Miller, a member of the National Labor Relations Board's legal staff since 1958, has been designated by President Ford to serve as the agency's acting general counsel.

Miller, 49, took over the spot on Aug. 15 when the term of Peter G. Nash, ended. Nash, appointed four years ago by former President Nixon, was not a candidate for reappointment.

Real Earnings Drop Further:

Cost of Living Index Takes Sharp Upturn

1 percent in June and an average monthly increase of about five-tenths of 1 percent in the first five months of the year. The July rise was exactly double the increase for January.

Price increases for meat, poultry, fresh fruits and vegetables, gasoline and used cars accounted for about three-fourths of the July CPI rise, BLS noted.

Food prices overall jumped by 1.7 percent, the largest increase since August of last year. Prices in this category rose 1.5 percent in June. Leading the way last month were large boosts in prices for meat, poultry and fish.

"Since April when price increases for these products began to accelerate, beef, pork and poultry prices have risen almost 20 percent," BLS noted.

"Prices of dairy products increased noticeably for the first time this year, and egg prices moved up after declining in the two preceding months."

Food purchased in supermarkets rose 2.9 percent from June to July. The cost of food away from home —restaurant meals and snacks— rose by five-tenths of 1 percent, more than in both May and June.

About one-third of the July increase in grocery-store prices stemmed from an astronomical 16.7 percent jump in fresh vegetable prices, BLS noted. Increases were particularly sharp for potatoes, green peppers, onions and tomatoes.

Almost three-fifths of the June-to-July increase of nine-tenths of 1 percent in commodity prices was due to higher prices for gasoline and fuel oil. During the past four months, BLS noted, gasoline and motor oil prices have increased about 9 percent.

The U.S. city average price of a gallon of regular grade gasoline last month went from 56.7 to 59.1 cents, with premium gas going from 60.7 to 63.2 cents.

Other sharp non-food price rises were recorded in July for used cars and for other commodities such as toilet goods and housekeeping supplies.

Charges for services rose five-tenths of 1 percent last month, with almost a third of the increase due to higher costs of medical care.

"Among household services, charges for electricity rose sharply, and home-maintenance and repair services continued to increase," BLS noted.

The outlook for the consumer is for almost certain retail price increases in the coming months as higher wholesale prices are passed on to shoppers. The government's report on wholesale prices earlier this month showed prices rising at their sharpest rate since April.

Corporate Profits Show 2nd Quarter Rebound

Corporate earnings bounced back in the second quarter of the year, with manufacturers' after-tax profits rising 10 percent seasonally adjusted over the previous three-month period, the First National City Bank of New York reported.

Furthermore, the bank noted in its August newsletter, the quality of profits was "significantly better" since less of the gain was attributable to inventory profits arising out of inflation.

The findings were based on Citibank's regular quarterly survey of corporate earnings which in the April-June period covered 912 manufacturing firms and 420 non-manufacturing companies, with total reported after-tax profits of $11.5 billion.

The start of an apparent turnaround in manufacturing profits—they had plunged 40 percent on an adjusted basis from third-quarter 1974 to the first quarter of 1975—was of little consolation to millions of unemployed workers, however.

In the week ending Aug. 9, another 475,300 jobless persons filed initial claims for unemployment insurance benefits under various state and federal programs. And, for the latest reporting period (the week ended on Aug. 2), 6,406,100 workers drew jobless benefits.

The marked upswing in second-quarter earnings was better than seasonal, Citibank noted, and seemed to indicate a slow recovery in production might be under way.

At about the same time, the Federal Reserve Board reported that industrial output registered a slight rise of five-tenths of 1 percent in July, the second consecutive monthly rise. Earlier, the Commerce Dept. announced retail sales were up last month.

Personal income, however, dropped in July after an unusually strong advance in June, the Commerce Dept. noted. The June increase was boosted by the one-time $50 bonus to social security and railroad retirement beneficiaries plus Supplemental Security Income payments to elderly, poor and disabled persons.

Housing starts in July increased 14 percent over the previous month, the Commerce Dept. said, but were still 6 percent off the year-ago level. July starts were at an annual rate of 1,238,000, compared to 1,314,000 in July 1974. Both rates were depressed and contrast with rates in excess of 2 million in 1971, 1972 and 1973.

Obstacles in the way of a strong recovery in the housing field include rising mortgage interest rates and higher prices for homes. Interest rates generally, including the key prime rate that major banks charge their best corporate customers, are moving up again and threaten to abort any meaningful recovery, economists observe.

SUPPORT OF LONGSHOREMEN in their decision to hold up loading American grain for the Soviet Union is announced by AFL-CIO President George Meany. He said assurances are needed that interests of U.S. consumers and shipping industry are protected before the embargo is lifted.

Meany Asks Grain Sale Policy To Protect Consumer, Shipper

pending a full hearing on the issues.

The boycott covers the 9.8 million tons of "new grain" that the Soviet Union had arranged to buy since July 1. "Old grain," which includes some of the original orders placed in 1972, is not affected by the boycott, the ILA said.

"New wheat" that was being loaded at Gulf of Mexico ports constitutes part of the harvest from southern states. The full impact of the ILA embargo will not be felt until mid-September when wheat, corn and soybeans still to be harvested in the Midwest will be reaching Gulf, Great Lakes and Atlantic ports.

Drawing a parallel between the grain deals of 1972 and this year, Meany noted that prices already have risen substantially since July 1.

In the 45-day period through Aug. 14, he cited price increases of 23 percent for flour, 36 percent for wheat, more than 13 percent for corn 20 percent for soybeans.

"What this adds up to in the name of detente," Meany observed, is that "we're giving the Russians an open door to our private grain market and doing it in a way that is going to cost the American consumer billions of dollars."

Reflecting on the impact of the 1972 Russian grain deal, Meany said the price of a bushel of wheat shot up from $1.65 a bushel to as high as $6.50 after Russian purchases—"and the American housewife is still paying for that."

"The Maritime Trades, with the backing of the AFL-CIO, have made up their minds that that is not going to happen again," Meany stressed.

The ILA boycott position has been building since the Agriculture Dept. announced the new Soviet grain purchases in early July. Within days, ILA convention delegates unanimously adopted a resolution authorizing President Thomas W. Gleason to take the boycott action.

Attempts by maritime union leaders earlier this month to get assurances from Agriculture Sec. Earl L. Butz that the Russian grain sales will not have a negative impact on consumers and the shipping industry were unfruitful.

The maritime union leaders were not persuaded by Butz's claims that the Russian purchases would have "minimal impact" on U.S. food prices.

One day after the meeting, the report on the government's wholesale price index for July showed that it had shot up 1.2 percent, or at an annual rate of 14.4 percent. Most of the increase was attributed to higher prices for farm products.

After the Agriculture Dept. revised downward its estimates of the American grain harvest, Butz called for a freeze on further sales to Russia until the department's September grain report is issued.

Meanwhile, President Ford told Iowa farmers during a political campaign swing through several midwestern states that he expects additional grain sales to be made to the Soviets.

Meany told reporters there were no new meetings scheduled with Ford Administration officials and suggested that any future discussions would have to be initiated by them. A problem afflicting American foreign policy, Meany observed, is Henry Kissinger's lack of knowledge in economics.

"Foreign policy is too damned important to be left to the Secretary of State," he declared. "The American people should have a voice in every phase of foreign policy, and it shouldn't be conducted behind closed doors and kept secret from the American people."

Ford subsequently called Meany from the presidential vacation retreat in Vail, Colo., asking him to meet with Labor Secretary John T. Dunlop to discuss the grain loading embargo.

Expressing concern over the continuing decline in maritime jobs, Meany said at his news conference that American shipping interests are being wiped out by U.S. foreign policy and the situation should be changed.

The Executive Council at its July meeting noted that U.S.-flag ships were grossly short-changed on the 1972 Russian grain shipments.

Although U.S. merchant fleets were assured of handling one-third of the grain cargo to the Soviet Union, ships manned by American seamen carried only 11 percent, the council statement noted.

Meany warned that the heavily subsidized Soviet maritime fleet is wrecking the American shipping industry. He said U.S. lines are being priced out of the market because the USSR is not part of the competitive system and can set any rates it wishes.

Meany also called for government-to-government negotiations on grain sales to the Soviets. He proposed that the U.S. government purchase the grain from American farmers and sell it to the Soviet government, rather than allowing private grain traders to cut their own deals.

Meany noted that Congress would probably be holding hearings in September on such legislation. A bill introduced by Rep. James Weaver (D-Ore.) would make the Commodity Credit Corporation the agent for export sales, provided adequate domestic reserves are established.

Among the maritime trades representatives meeting with Meany and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, in addition to Gleason, were Presidents Paul Hall of the Seafarers, Jesse Calhoun of the Marine Engineers, William Steinberg of the American Radio Association, and Frank Skavo of the Masters, Mates & Pilots and Sec.-Treas. Mel Barisic of the National Maritime Union.

Musical Salute, Picnic Open Bicentennial Year

Union members in the Washington area will kick off the AFL-CIO's Bicentennial activities September 1 with an old-fashioned family picnic and a "Musical Salute to Labor Day" at Wolf Trap Farm Park for the Performing Arts.

The affair is sponsored by Wolf Trap, the National Park Service, the AFL-CIO and the Musicians union's Music Performance Trust Funds. Admission to the park, situated in the Virginia suburbs of Washington, will be free and the general public is invited. The program will start at 2 p.m.

Appearing on the big park's main stage will be AFL-CIO President George Meany along with such performers as Theodore Bikel, president of Actors' Equity, folk singer Odetta, the Billy Taylor Trio and singer Oscar Brand, the show's coordinator.

Scores of local musicians will perform on three stages and while strolling the grounds. Their offerings will range from 18th Century chamber music to Dixieland, country and western, the "big band" sound of the 1940s and the newest contemporary music.

Traditional labor songs will be featured by the Folk Lore Society of Greater Washington. Masters of Ceremonies will be Washington radio personalities Hardin & Weaver.

Action to Cut Joblessness Keys Labor Day Demands

ECONOMIC PLIGHT of workers whose jobs were wiped out by imports is described by Manuel Vega, second from left, a member of the Clothing Workers. He was on hand for an ACWA press briefing announcing the union's intention to seek trade adjustment assistance for 20,000 union members adversely affected by imports. From left are ACWA Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman, Vega, President Murray Finley, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and ACWA Vice Pres. Howard Samuel.

Meany Says U.S. Nearing 'Calamity'

Administration policies that "perpetuate recession while fueling inflation" have brought America to "the edge of another economic calamity," AFL-CIO President George Meany declared in his 1975 Labor Day message.

"But it is not too late for the President and the Congress to prevent it from happening," Meany said, as he outlined labor's program for cutting the nation's high level of joblessness.

"There is nothing wrong with the American economy that more jobs wouldn't cure," he observed. "Putting people to work means more tax revenue and a lower budget deficit. Jobs mean workers can sustain their standard of living and enjoy a more prosperous life."

Jobs are what Labor Day is all about, Meany noted. "On this day, when America honors workers and their labors, there should be a new resolve on the part of the government to put America back to work," he declared.

In a separate message AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland also focused on the economic woes besetting America's workers. Labor Day 1975 is no holiday for the nation's unemployed, he observed.

For the jobless, Kirkland said, "today is just like every other day, filled with enforced idleness that dulls the spirit, fraught with fear of the future, consumed with worry about somehow keeping the family together."

Meany warned that the current high unemployment—nearly 8 million—represents "a time bomb ticking in the foundation of this society."

Even for those lucky enough to

Grain Deal Opposition Unaltered

AFL-CIO President George Meany said labor's opposition to the Soviet grain deal was not altered after initial meetings with President Ford and Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop.

The federation is supporting the Longshoremen's boycott of the grain loading in an effort to get assurances that the sale of American grain to the Soviet Union will not be done at the expense of U.S. consumers and the American maritime industry.

Following a 90-minute meeting at the White House that included Ford, Administration officials and maritime trades leaders, Meany said that the session produced more information, but that the "situation has not changed." Additional discussions between the Administration and labor were scheduled.

Agriculture Sec. Earl L. Butz was not present at the White House discussions. Maritime trades officials, who had met earlier in

Postal Unions Approve New 3-Year Pacts

The nation's 600,000 postal employes have approved new agreements providing each worker a total of $1,500 in wage increases over a three-year period.

Latest to ratify the settlement was the Postal Workers which voted acceptance by a majority of better than 3 to 1.

A week before the APWU vote was announced, the Letter Carriers ratified the contract by a 2 to 1 margin. The Mail Handlers, a division of the Laborers, does not require formal ratification. Earlier in the month, the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers, the fourth union involved, approved the settlement at its convention.

Imports Slash Jobs:

Clothing Union Files Aid Bid for 20,000

By John R. Oravec

The Clothing Workers are seeking federal benefits to aid 20,000 of the union's members whose jobs have been adversely affected by imports of men's and boys' apparel.

Petitions will be filed with the Labor Dept. covering 10,000 workers laid off by plant shutdowns and production cutbacks and an additional 10,000 whose earnings were severely reduced because of the import competition, the union said.

Organized labor views adjustment assistance under the 1974 Trade Act as temporary relief for affected workers, but not as an adequate answer to the problems of job erosion caused by rising imports.

Those points were stressed by ACWA leaders and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland at a press conference as the union announced its intention to file the petitions.

ACWA President Murray H. Finley said that the "real answer would be more adequate regulation of imports. The government's present program of import agreements, although better than nothing, is not doing the job it was meant to do: protecting jobs of workers in this industry."

Kirkland said that trade adjustment assistance "is at best only a Bandaid" and not a cure for the import problem and the lack of jobs. "But," he stressed, "these 20,000 Clothing Workers need the Bandaid immediately."

Unemployment caused by Ford Administration policies must be answered by massive government programs to get the unemployed back to work, Kirkland declared, "not optimistic rhetoric and more tax breaks for corporations and banks."

He suggested that the government start by acting swiftly to approve the adjustment assistance for the ACWA members and urged that Congress move immediately to improve the nation's unemploy-

Textile Workers Rally Against Stevens Stalling

Roanoke Rapids, N.C.—A year ago the Textile Workers Union of America scored a breakthrough victory in a National Labor Relations Board election at area plants of J. P. Stevens & Co. employing 3,500 workers.

The win followed a decade of organizing efforts and came in the face of repeated union-busting tactics and court-defying actions by the company. But it was only the prelude to a new round of virulent anti-union tactics by Stevens, TWUA President Sol Stetin told a rally marking the anniversary.

"It is now one year since the Roanoke Rapids workers chose TWUA as their union in a government-run election," Stetin said, "and there still is no contract—not even a sign of the company's intention to negotiate an agreement with its employes."

In a telegram to Stetin, AFL-CIO President George Meany declared the Stevens workers have "the full support of the

Stalemate on Controls Clouds Oil Price Scene

Congress and President Ford remained stalemated over government oil price controls as they were due to expire over the Labor Day weekend, raising the prospect of a quick surge in prices and new damage to the economy.

Senate Democratic Leader Mike Mansfield of Montana was to have met with Ford on Aug. 29 to try to persuade the President to withdraw his threat to veto a congressionally-passed bill extending the controls for another six months.

The law controlling domestic petroleum prices is scheduled to expire on Aug. 31. Under the current price controls, oil from "old wells" that were in production before 1972 sells for an average ceiling price of about $5.25 a barrel. Oil from wells put into production since 1972 is not controlled and currently sells at $13 a barrel.

The AFL-CIO has warned both the President and Congress that "an energy crisis of massive and ominous proportions" exists, and that removal of federal price controls from old oil would nearly triple oil prices, sending shock waves reverberating throughout the economy.

The federation's Executive Council at its midsummer meeting in LIGHT CONVERSATION between President Ford and AFL-CIO President George Meany precedes serious discussions at the White House on the Longshoremen's Soviet grain embargo. Joining in the talks were Administration and maritime trades officials.

Labor Remains Firm On Soviet Grain Deal

August with Butz, criticized his claims that consumers would be affected only "nominally" by the Russian grain sales.

Butz has since forecast that food prices would increase about 9 percent in 1975 with 1.5 percent of that rise attributable to the sale of 9.8 million tons of grain to the Soviets.

Federal Reserve Board Chairman Arthur Burns later predicted that additional sales to Russia would force food costs even higher. He estimated the grain sale impact would be closer 2.5 percent by end of next year.

Because of extensive crop failures in the Soviet Union, some government officials have estimated that the USSR will have to import 25 million tons of grain this year.

Public reaction—based on letters, telegrams and telephone calls to the AFL-CIO—has been overwhelmingly in favor in labor's opposition to the Soviet grain sales.

The federation's Dept. of Public Relations said that mail on the issue has been running 20 to 1 in support of the boycott. Most of the mail is coming from housewives and non-union workers expressing fear of rising food costs resulting from the grain sales. Included in the group are hog, cattle and dairy farmers who are already feeling the impact in rising feed prices.

One Minnesota pig farmer said that feed prices had shot up $32 a ton in a 10-day period.

Opposition to labor's position on the grain embargo has come largely from businessmen who deal with grain farmers and organizations representing large farms.

In addition to securing guarantees that consumers will not bear the brunt of the Russian grain sales as they did in 1972, maritime unions want assurances that U.S.-flag ships will get a larger portion of foreign shipments.

Although U.S. shipping firms were assured of carrying one-third of the 1972 grain cargoes, American crews actually handled only 11 percent.

Shortly after the Longshoremen put their boycott into effect at Texas ports, they were ordered back to work under a temporary restraining order issued by a federal district judge. That court action was followed by a temporary injunction forbidding the dock workers to refuse to load the Soviet-bound grain.

U.S. District Judge Owen Cox in Corpus Christi, Tex., said in his ruling that Longshoremen as a group are not protected by the Constitution in expressing their political views by blocking shipment of American wheat to the USSR.

Cox said that the ILA cannot stage a work stoppage because it has a contract with the shippers.

"The court is not concerned with the pros and cons of shipping grain to the Soviet Union," Cox added.

Although he said his injunction would remain in effect pending a hearing for a permanent injunction, Cox certified the case for expedited appeal to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans.

ILA attorneys said they would seek a stay of the temporary injunction pending the appeal.

Participating in the White House discussions in addition to Meany were AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, ILA President Thomas W. Gleason, Seafarers President Paul Hall, Marine Engineers President Jesse Calhoun and Sec.-Treas. Mel Barisic of the National Maritime Union.

Solzhenitsyn Texts Offered In Pamphlet

Two historic addresses by Aleksandr I. Solzhenitsyn to the American people under the auspices of the AFL-CIO are now available from the federation in booklet form.

"Solzhenitsyn: The Voice of Freedom" is a 48-page illustrated booklet containing the texts of the addresses by the Russian novelist and freedom fighter in Washington and New York. The publication includes the introductions to the two addresses by AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland.

Copies of the booklet, AFL-CIO Publication No. 152, are available from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006. Single copies are free. The price schedule for up to 50 copies is 35 cents per copy; 51 to 100 copies, 25 cents each; 101 or more copies, 20 cents each.

Implementation Problem:

First Farm Labor Elections Loom Under California Law

Sacramento, Calif.—Early in September, the first farm labor union recognition elections in the nation may be conducted by the new California Agricultural Labor Relations Board on several as yet unspecified farm units.

As of Aug. 28, the California Agricultural Labor Relations Act enacted last spring, authorizes workers on farms where at least 50 percent of the seasonal workforce is currently employed to petition the CALRB for elections. The board then must conduct elections within seven days.

CALRB officials anticipate several hundred elections will be conducted during the month of September as the United Farm Workers, the growers and the Teamsters compete for the support of the work force.

One observer of the recent California farm struggles, Ronald B. Taylor, author of the new book, "Chavez and the Farm Workers," predicts that the implementation of the law will be difficult both because there was too little time to create adequate election machinery before the fall harvests started and because of the complexities of the farm labor force itself.

It is normal, Taylor observes, for a farm—large or small—to have a 400 percent turnover in employes in a year. An 11,000 acre fruit and row crop farm that has 200 permanent employes will have a peak of 2,000 harvesters, but in the course of a year the company turns over 8,000 W-2 forms to meet its labor needs.

He also cites estimates of the Immigration & Naturalization Service that one-third to one-half of the seasonal farm labor force in California is made up of illegal aliens. "This," Taylor says, "makes the job of a union organizer a nightmare. The workers—legal or illegal—are here today, gone next week, replaced by somebody else who stays a week or a month and is gone."

The UFW — led by Cesar Chavez — through strikes and boycotts brought the grape growers to the bargaining table in 1970 and signed contracts establishing a union hiring hall.

Taylor points out that when the Teamsters and the table grape growers signed contracts in 1973, the UFW's hiring halls were wiped out and the Teamsters allowed agribusiness to return to the nefarious labor contractor-crew boss system, putting the farmer back in control.

"There is ample evidence — including a California state supreme court decision — to indicate the growers invited the Teamsters into the fields to replace Chavez," Taylor points out. "And now it is the Teamsters who are sitting on the inside, holding the most contracts, and the UFW organizers are on the outside where they have difficulty getting to the workers."

Chavez has warned that if UFW organizers do not have equal and adequate access to the farm workers in the fields, he will lead new protests at the state capitol. In addition, the UFW has called on the CALRB to use "symbols" on the ballots as well as the spelled-out names of the unions, so that illiterate workers will not be confused.

Support for Chavez's position on both equal access and the use of ballot symbols has come from the Catholic Bishops' ad hoc Committee on the Spanish-speaking.

The committee also called on the CALRB to investigate charges that the Teamsters are receiving favored treatment in contacting farm workers.

"On the basis of a number of affidavits and other information we have in our possession," the committee said," we are convinced that members of the Teamsters union in California are readily given access to speak with the farm workers in order to induce them to sign a contract with them, whereas the members of the United Farm Workers union are not given this same opportunity."

AMF-Head Hit With Order to Restore Jobs

Boulder, Colo. — The strike-bound AMF-Head Division here has been hit by an order from an administrative law judge of the National Labor Relations Board to rehire two workers and to stop its illegal actions against employes supporting the Clothing Workers.

Administrative Law Judge James T. Barker issued the ruling after a full hearing based on charges brought by the Midwest Joint Board of ACWA. He ordered AMF-Head to cease and desist from:

- Discouraging membership in the union by discharging employes or discriminating against them because of their support for ACWA.
- Interrogating employes about their union sympathies or threatening them.
- Discontinuing certain previous benefits following an NLRB election in which the workers voted for ACWA representation;
- Interfering with, restraining or coercing employes in the exercise of their rights under the National Labor Relations Act.

More than 130 members of ACWA Local 1156 have been on strike at the Boulder plant since May, following four months of fruitless bargaining. A nationwide consumer boycott of skis and tennis rackets manufactured by Head has been endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

September Schedule Set By Labor Studies Center

A five-day institute on the preparation and presentation of grievance cases before an arbitrator highlights the September program at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, Silver Spring, Md.

The tuition-free institute is open to full-time officers, representatives, and staff members of any AFL-CIO national or international union.

In addition to instruction on the preparation and presentation of cases, the institute will cover the issue of what is and what is not arbitrable and the problems of selecting arbitrators.

Participants will prepare and present cases before a professional arbitrator. Each case will be videotaped for replay and analysis.

The institute begins at 4 p.m., Sunday, Sept. 21, and runs to Friday, Sept. 26.

Other activities at the 47-acre campus during September include:

Organizing—The AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services is sponsoring a conference of 28 directly affiliated local unions in the brewery industry, Sept. 4 to 6.

Carpenters—A seminar for new business agents of the Carpenters will cover the pension reform law, leadership skills, collective bargaining developments, the law of picketing, the Davis-Bacon Act and equal opportunity laws. Participants will spend one day at the Carpenters' headquarters building in Washington. From 4 p.m., Sunday, Sept. 4, to Friday, Sept. 12.

Electrical Workers—An institute on job evaluation, time study and wage incentives for local union officers of the IBEW Western Electric Council. From 4 p.m., Sunday, Sept. 14, to Friday, Sept. 19.

Flight Attendants—An institute on preparation and presentation of grievance arbitration cases for local officers of the Association of Flight Attendants. From 4 p.m., Sunday, Sept. 21, to Friday, Sept. 26.

Professional & Technical Engineers—A program for federal employe locals of the Professional & Technical Engineers. Subjects will include collective bargaining in the federal sector, organizing and legislative issues. From 4 p.m., Sunday, Sept. 28, to Friday, Oct. 3.

Meat Cutters—An institute on the preparation and presentation of grievance arbitration cases for officers of District 2 Council, Meat Cutters & Butcher Workmen. From 4 p.m., Sunday, Sept. 28, to Friday, Oct. 3.

More information on these and other programs may be obtained from Executive Director Fred Hoehler, AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Phone 301/431-6400.

On Organizing, Defense Funds:

Graphic Arts Union Slates Referendum

Toronto—Delegates to the Graphic Arts International Union's convention here voted to send to a membership referendum two constitutional amendments that would beef up the union's organizing efforts and strengthen its defense fund.

One amendment calls for a 25-cent-per-month increase in per capita payments that would be allocated solely for organizing purposes. The convention called this "essential to the preservation of job security and the protection of working standards of the union members, while eliminating the unfair competition of non-union employes working under inferior conditions."

The second proposition would bolster substantially the union's ability to combat what GAIU President Kenneth J. Brown described as the "recent growth of employer militancy that has been reflected in many more strikes."

It would combine the defense fund of the bookbinder members of the union with that of the lithographers-photoengravers, setting a ceiling of $6 million and a floor of $3 million. When the combined fund falls below the floor, there would be an assessment until the $6 million ceiling is restored. Strike benefits would be equalized at $60 per week the first four weeks and $70 thereafter.

The delegates also authorized a study on financing a fund that would extend training and retraining to bookbinder members of the union, similar to the program the lithographers-photoengravers have had since 1966.

Retirements of several full-time leaders long identified with the union were announced, including Sec.-Treas. Wesley A. Taylor and Vice Pres. Jack H. Wallace (director of organizing), as well as Executive Vice Presidents William J. Hall and John Connolly.

In the GAIU's first elections since its merger, there are 69 nominees for 48 positions that will be decided by membership referendum later this year. However, of the 12 full-time international officers, 10 were nominated by acclamation, with only two of the eight vice presidencies contested. New three-year terms begin next Apr. 1.

A record 20 resolutions on legislative and political issues were acted upon, headed by a call for passage of the Kennedy-Corman National Health Security bill.

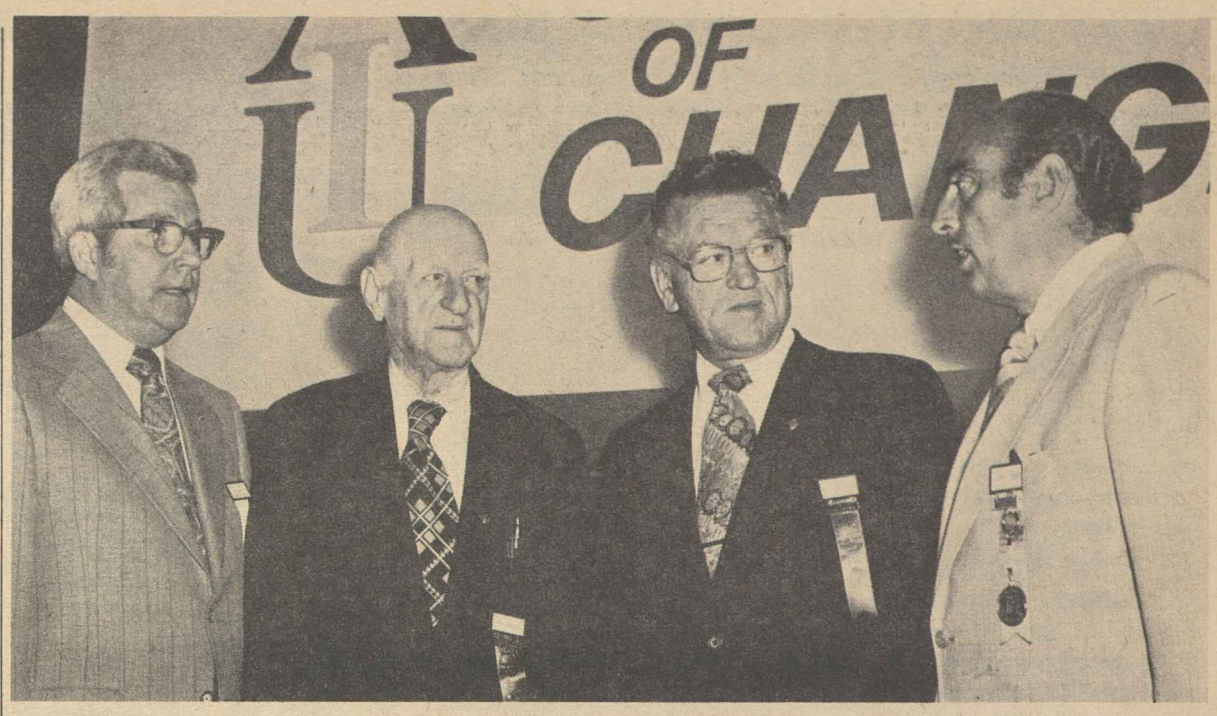
Auto Workers President Leonard Woodcock, in an address to the delegates, warned "the entire industrial world can be brought to catastrophe unless we act now on the energy crisis about which nothing has been done since it began two years ago." Charging that the oil companies' "only motive is profit," he called for a national energy board with broad powers "such as similar boards had in World War II, so the oil companies can't be allowed to cripple our economy and society."

A convention resolution placed the "direct cause" of today's high prices and serious economic troubles on "the concentration of economic power by a few giant corporations that control and dominate an overwhelming percentage of the market in their particular industries." It urged the AFL-CIO and the Canadian Labor Congress to encourage legislative investigations and support legislation that would restore "full, free and fair competition, including nationalization where necessary and practical" in those industries that vitally affect the cost of living.

Sen. George S. McGovern (D-S.D.) echoed this to the 353 delegates at the convention, with this charge: "The way to prevent inflation is to break monopoly power. We need to warn the economic royalists in 1976 just as we warned the British in 1776 that they are not to tread on us."

Stephen Lewis, leader of the New Democratic Party and candidate for premier of Ontario, gave an analysis of the problems of occupational health and safety and the measures needed.

He called for vigorous countermeasures in both countries to combat government "indifference and negligence—the brutal, moral paralysis where the fate of workers is involved."



WIDER COOPERATION among unions in the printing and publishing industry was endorsed by officials of the Newspaper Guild and the Graphic Arts International Union at the GAIU convention in Toronto. From left are Guild President Charles A. Perlik, GAIU Executive Vice Presidents John Connolly and William J. Hall and President Kenneth J. Brown.

Aid Sought for 20,000 as Imports Slash Jobs of Clothing Workers

ment insurance program.

Finley described the impact of imports from low-wage countries on the American clothing industry as devastating. He said that according to official estimates, imports increased last year to 7 million units of men's and boys' tailored suits, sportcoats and trousers. During the first six months of 1975, Finley said, imports have been coming in at an annual rate of 8 million units.

Between April 1974 and the present time, he said, jobs in the Clothing Workers' jurisdiction dropped from 93,000 to about 76,000. He also cited a 27 percent drop in actual working time, noting that the average workweek throughout the industry is now 31 hours.

Imports were the cause of 113 plant shutdowns in 1973 alone, he said. Another 93 clothing firms went out of business last year and during the first six months of 1975.

ACWA Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman said the petitions to the Labor Dept. for aid will cover workers affected by imports since last Oct. 3 who were either laid off or whose earnings were reduced 15 percent or more.

On hand for the press briefing were three ACWA members who lost their jobs in plant shutdowns.

Manuel Vega, 35, of San Diego, said he had been working for the same firm 17 years until his layoff. But because of the high unemployment rate in his home area, he said it's been difficult to find a job in any other field.

Vincent Scannapieco of Philadelphia said that at age 48, he was told he was "too old" to be hired as a toll collector with the city transit authority. He is still job-hunting.

Raymond Smith of Richmond, Va., who lost his job after 30 years as a clothing worker, said he considered himself more fortunate than 800 fellow workers who were laid off in a plant closing. He found a job with the city government, but noted that his earnings are down about 50 percent from his previous wages.

The ACWA petitions represent the second largest block of workers to be covered in a special application for adjustment assistance by a union.

Recently, the Auto Workers were granted certification for 18,000 of about 41,000 UAW members formerly employed by Chrysler Corp. whose jobs were wiped out by imports from Canada. The Labor Dept. denied certification of 23,000 Chrysler workers.

Certifications for assistance issued by the Labor Dept. have been running slightly ahead of denials since the new trade act went into effect.

During a nine-day period in mid-August the Labor Dept. certified 2,365 workers as eligible for benefits, but another 2,125 were denied certification on the ground that imports "did not contribute importantly" to their layoffs.

The certifications included 1,300 members of the Molders who had been producing weaving machinery for Rockwell International Corp. at Hopedale, Mass. Rockwell closed the plant last month.

In addition, 1,065 shoe workers, represented by both the Boot & Shoe Workers and the United Shoe Workers, were certified. The group includes 500 workers formerly employed by Brown Shoe Co. at Brookfield and Charleston, Mo.; 400 at Florsheim Shoe Co. at Chicago; 115 at Weyenberg Shoe Manufacturing Co. in Waupun, Wis., and 50 employes of the International Shoe Co. at Perryville, Mo.

However, the Labor Dept. denied certification for 965 shoeworkers: 600 at Brown Shoe plants at Fulton and Versailles, Mo.; 250 at International Shoes' plant in Evansville, Ill., and 115 at Fisher Footwear, Inc. in Eldon, Mo.

The largest group of workers turned down for assistance during mid-August were 1,160 members of the Auto Workers laid off by Allis Chalmers Corp. at plants in Pittsburgh and in Gadsden, Ala.

Benefits under the trade act, when coupled with regular state unemployment compensation, amount to 70 percent of a worker's weekly wage with a ceiling of $176 a week. Most workers may collect benefits for up to 52 weeks, in addition to counseling, training, job placement and other assistance.

Any group of workers denied adjustment assistance may file for a review by the U.S. Court of Appeals.

Chicago said that a combination of old oil price deregulation, the impact of a second dollar-per-barrel tariff on imported oil imposed by President Ford in June, and an expected new boost in crude oil prices by the "Arab-dominated oil cartel" threatens the United States with "more inflation and more recession."

"The spreading effects of such energy cost-increases on prices of fertilizer, food and most other goods can boost the total cost even higher," the council added. "The major beneficiaries would be the oil-exporting countries and the giant international oil companies.

"If such a huge reduction of American purchasing power occurs, it will surely have a disastrous impact on production and jobs."

The President's decontrol plan would add $30 billion a year to the prices Americans pay for goods and services by 1978, the AFL-CIO has charged. A family of four would end up paying an additional $600 a year in living costs, the federation estimated.

In warning of potential price hikes on oil by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries this fall, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared that any such increases should be viewed as "an act of economic hostility" and met with economic retaliation by the United States.

The congressional measure to extend the oil price controls was to have gone to the White House on Aug. 27 or 28, but Mansfield ordered it held in Congress until after his meeting with Ford.

Meanwhile, the President held another energy meeting with 16 of the nation's governors to seek ways of easing a potential natural gas shortage later this year. The threatened veto of the oil control bill would not affect the regulation of natural gas, however, since the latter is controlled by the Federal Power Commission.

Nebraska Labor Backs Raises for Legislators

Scottsbluff, Neb.—Delegates to the Nebraska AFL-CIO's 20th annual convention endorsed a new effort to provide members of the state legislature with a "living wage."

The combination of low salaries and long sessions discourages qualified candidates from seeking public office, state federation President William E. Brennan pointed out.

State senators serving the unicameral legislature receive only $4,800 a year, one paid round-trip to the state capitol and no per diem. Many are in financial hardship because sessions run as long as six months.

Sec.-Treas. Nels Petersen noted that a number of labor-backed incumbents had been forced to abandon plans for re-election because of financial hardship—leaving the seats open for wealthy bankers and farmers who fail to represent the interests of workers.

Nebraska voters had rejected earlier attempts to increase the salaries of the legislators.

Delegates were also urged to spur local union cooperation with the state AFL-CIO's voter identification program in preparation for the registration and voter-turnout drives in the 1976 elections.

Voters will be electing one-half of the state legislature, the state's three congressional representatives and one U.S. senator in 1976. The state's entire congressional delegation is Republican.

State COPE Director Victor G. Meyers noted that current voter registration figures show that Democrats have greatly narrowed the GOP advantage and that Democratic and independent registrants together outnumber Republicans.

In key resolutions adopted at the three-day convention, the 198 delegates called for:

- Extension of state unemployment benefits to county and city employes. State employes now qualify for such benefits.
- Passage of a state anti-strikebreaker law.
- Establishment of senior citizens clubs for retired union members.
- Lowering the age for full social security benefits.
- Passage of National Health Security.

The Bicentennial Challenge

AMERICAN WORKERS see the bicentennial as more than the biggest and best birthday party yet. They see it as a challenge—a challenge to make the next 200 years of government of, by and for the people even better than the first 200.

America is a representative democracy. For any democracy to survive and flourish, it must attain the highest possible citizen participation.

In the 1974 election, less than 40 percent of this country's eligible voters cast ballots. Whatever the reason—Watergate, the economy, disenchantment, archaic voting laws—that is a deplorable record. And one of the goals of the bicentennial year must be to improve that record.

Obviously if the citizens are to respect their government, government must first respect the citizens. That means respect for their wants, needs and aspirations, as well as their individual liberties. And it means telling the people the truth.

If honesty is restored to government—honesty in personal behavior but honesty, too, in keeping the people informed about the grave problems of the day—then the people will trust their government, participate in elections, and we'll be once again the nation that was founded 200 years ago.

'All Hail to Labor Day!'

LABOR DAY BEGAN in 1882 and was officially declared a holiday in 1894. It became a day of picnics, parades, gaudy floats, pompous political speeches, and the old-fashioned "good clean fun." But it was also a day of recognition, assessment, and encouragement to the thousands of people who labored and cared about their union, their country and their future.

Something of the spirit and meaning of Labor Day is reflected in an editorial from the Iron Molders Journal of September 1896:

"Of all the holidays of the year, Labor Day, to the trade unionist, should stand out as of preeminent importance, and judging from the increasing enthusiasm displayed in its celebration year after year, it would appear that the working classes generally accept this view of it.

"It should be recognized, not as a reminder of our servitude or dependence, but as the day on which labor arises to do honor to itself, the day on which pledges are renewed, whereby we promise to toil on for the betterment of the condition of those who, through the bone and sinew of our land and the foundation of its industrial supremacy, are compelled to fare the humblest and seek for very shame to hide their poverty and rags.

" 'The poor ye shall have always with you.' To the Divine dictum we bow in humble reverence, but it is ours to see that none are poor through lack of opportunity to be otherwise. By the law of both God and man, he who is willing and able to work that he may provide for the wants of himself and those depending on him has a right to the opportunity, and if that right be denied him by society, then society is his enemy.

"It is not the brass band and gaily decked banner, the grand parade and magnificent oration of Labor Day we would laud. No. We uphold it, we praise it as the day of earnest thoughtful men, filled with the love of their kind and laboring for their emancipation and elevation. All hail to Labor Day and its celebrants!"

Religious Leaders Stress:

Fundamental Rights of Workers Remain Unmet Goals for Many

THE BASIC RIGHTS to organize for collective bargaining and to overcome the hazards of unsafe workplaces are still unmet goals of many American workers who contribute so much to the wealth of society, representatives of the three major faiths declared in Labor Day statements.

Their messages stressed that the efforts to build a more just society deserve the consideration of all Americans.

"Our strength as a nation has been derived from the contributions of individual men and women — America's laborers — giving their unique talents and skills, weaving the fabric of our society and making our world a richer, better place to live," said Rabbi Joseph H. Lookstein, president of the Synagogue Council of America.

"Labor Day 1975," Rabbi Lookstein observed, "serves to remind us that the role of man, created in the image of God, is not simply to be a cog in the machinery of production and not simply to produce more and more material goods, but to be a partner with God in the continual process of creation."

The Rev. Howard E. Spragg, executive vice president of the United Church Board for Homeland Ministries, said that Labor Day is a time "to consider what is the true worth of a human being, the value of his honest work, and to remember the sacrifices people continue to make in order to improve their life's conditions."

Dr. Spragg noted that the church's concern for the right of workers to organize is under a severe test in California's agricultural industries.

He reaffirmed the suport of the United Church Board for the Farm Workers and "that union's valiant efforts to improve the life of migrant farm labor" by securing the fundamental rights of collective bargaining.

Dr. Spragg also expressed the hope that California's new farm labor law would be as beneficial to the field workers as the Wagner Act has been to industrial workers.

That point was reinforced by Msgr. George G. Higgins, secretary for research of the U.S. Catholic Conference, who said that even with its amendments, the California law is an excellent working model for other states and the Congress to build on.

"The California statute, which was generations overdue, will not automatically resolve every issue in the farm labor dispute," Msgr. Higgins said. "It will, however, provide the parties with a set of enforceable procedures through which they can begin to settle their differences."

HE FURTHER WARNED that a revival of the Bracero program, used in the past years to provide growers with cheap labor from Mexico, would bring added hardships for the American farm workers.

When the Bracero program was terminated in 1964, growers and agribusiness employers complained that they would be unable to recruit enough American workers to harvest their crops, Msgr. Higgins said.

"What they really meant was that it was easier and cheaper for them to have the government recruit their workers than to do their own recruiting," he observed. "Most of all, they dreaded the prospect of having to offer higher wages and better conditions as the only possible way of recruiting an adequate number of American workers."

He noted that it's easier to understand the Mexican government's support for revival of the program because of its serious employment situation than it is to sympathize with the position of the growers.

If the government has an obligation to aid Mexico with its economic problems, Msgr. Higgins said, a solution must be found without undermining the UFW and the wages and conditions of agricultural workers — "the most disadvantaged and most exploited workers in the American economy."

Dr. Spragg also expressed concern for the widening range of hazards workers face on their jobs, stressing that no one's health should be jeopardized in his pursuit of a livelihood—a national policy established with passage of the federal occupational safety and health act.

"The AFL-CIO and its Industrial Union Dept. are to be greatly commended for their outstanding efforts in fighting to make this goal a reality," Dr. Spragg declared.

"Organized labor and the AFL-CIO need the help and encouragement of community leaders and organizations in order to accomplish these goals. Working together we shall build a better and more just society."

Over Two Centuries:

Opening of Bicentennial Year Recalls Early Labor Struggles

By Harry Conn

LABOR DAY 1975 is not only a labor holiday marking the passage through three-quarters of the 20th Century, but it also launches labor and the U.S. Bicentennial celebration.

In 1976—July 4, 1976, to be specific—this nation observes its 200th birthday. The workers who built this country—its cities, its homes and schools and hospitals and railroads and highways and its vast industrial system — are rightfully proud of their accomplishments over the last two centuries.

Labor Day and the start of the bicentennial year give labor and the nation a brief pause to look back and then ahead in quest of the American dream.

It all started before the Revolution when the Sons of Liberty, composed chiefly of workingmen, led the fight against unpopular measures forced on the colonies by the British.

Using tactics still employed by unions today, they conducted boycott campaigns against goods made in England and organized protest demonstrations in New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Charleston.

And, it will be recalled, it was workers who drew the line precipitating the strong stand against British troops that led to the Boston Massacre in 1770 and the Revolutionary War.

Only two years after the signing of the Declaration of Independence, early union winds were blowing. In New York City, journeymen printers combined to demand wage increases. They won their fight but, successful, abandoned their organization.

Eight years later, in 1786, the first authenticated strike in the new nation took place when Philadelphia printers gained a minimum wage of $6 a week. Philadelphia carpenters struck in 1791, unsuccessfully, for a 10-hour day and the following year Philadelphia shoemakers organized the first local craft union for collective bargaining.

Thus the nation and its workers were off to an exciting history with both rich successes and disastrous setbacks, but all along building a progressively democratic society with a living standard that has been the envy of the world.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, in declaring Labor Day 1975 to Labor Day 1976 as "Labor's Bicentennial Year," issued a pledge "to make this time a memorable one for American workers and for the American people."

Stressing that labor "is proud of its accomplishments" and is preparing to participate fully in the bicentennial activities, the council declared:

"We in the American labor movement have steadfastly held to the proposition that the system of government created by our founding fathers, although imperfect, remains the best system for a free people yet devised by man. It allows for change and for new directions to meet the challenges now facing America and the world."

It was Labor Day 1882 when labor received its first proper recognition, and the New York City Central Labor Union successfully put on the first formal Labor Day parade. In 1894, Labor Day officially became a national holiday.

Labor Day traditionally has been a time for working men to lay down their tools and relax. Many give serious thought to the future for themselves, their families, the nation and even the world. This year, marking the opening of the bicentennial celebration, accentuates this stock-taking at a historic period in our history.

And while the times are not as perilous as those faced by our forefathers two centuries ago, workers during the labor bicentennial year will be encountering their own pattern of difficulties which for many mean misery and deprivation.

PARAMOUNT AMONG THESE is the continuing high level of unemployment. Even if the Ford Administration's most optimistic forecasts are accepted, it will be a disastrous year for at least seven million workers. Administration spokesmen insist that we are moving out of the deepest recession since the Great Depression, but they give no real hope that unemployment will materially ease in the coming year.

Efforts by the 94th Congress to enact emergency legislation to provide income and jobs for these millions of jobless have come to little as President Ford has exercised his veto. And the Congress, to date, has not been able to muster the needed two-thirds vote to override the veto on key jobs measures.

During the labor bicentennial year organized labor and the nation itself will be girding for the critical elections in November 1976. By next Labor Day most of the primary elections will be behind us and the two major political parties will have selected their candidates for President and Vice President.

Not only will the White House be up for grabs next year but also the entire U.S. House of Representatives, one-third of the Senate, 15 state houses and hundreds of state legislators and county and municipal offices. Votes cast on jobs creation measures and other pieces of legislation directly affecting the lives of workers and their families will serve to direct the suport or opposition of trade unionists. (PAI).

Goldfinger Warns:

White House Inaction on Jobs Stifles Economic Recovery

THERE IS LITTLE HOPE for solid economic recovery very soon, unless the Ford Administration begins to act to put the nation's millions of jobless back to work, AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger warned.

The recession can't be ended by "just declaring it over," Goldfinger said on the network radio interview Labor News Conference. He said it's hard to figure out just what the Administration and its economic advisers mean when they say they are "right on target" and that things are going smoothly.

"As we see their 'target' it looks dismal," Goldfinger declared, pointing out that the Administration's official mid-year budget review said the nation can expect "very high levels of unemployment for the rest of this decade." That, he said, means 6 to 8 million on the jobless rolls until at least 1980, and that is a "very bleak picture."

"Five or six years of continuing very high levels of unemployment can tear this country apart," Goldfinger warned. He said it is clear that lack of confidence in the economy has been pervasive throughout the country for quite a while.

Goldfinger scored the "detente policy with the Soviet dictatorship," which, he said, has led to sharp jumps in wholesale farm prices that will soon translate into new price hikes at the supermarket. He said the President's oil decontrol plan, coupled with a new round of higher crude oil prices by the Arab-dominated oil cartel, due in October, will throw another big load on the American people.

The result, he said, is "rising food prices on top of already intolerably high food prices . . . rising fuel prices on top of already very high fuel prices; price increases that have nothing to do with wages, employment, unemployment . . . except that they could trigger a further drop of purchasing power, a drop of employment and a further increase of unemployment."

Agriculture Sec. Earl Butz is way off mark when he says the new Russian grain deal won't affect prices here, Goldfinger stressed. "Butz told us this kind of nonsense" in 1972, "when it was his policies and the policies of the Nixon Administration that touched off the fantastic soaring rise of food prices" through late 1972 and on into 1973 and 1974.

ANATOLE FRANCE, a champion of freedom and equality in the early part of this century, once said: "The law, in its majestic equality, forbids the rich as well as the poor to sleep under bridges, to beg in the streets, and to steal bread."

The outcome of two recent court cases—one involving a huge corporation whose product was linked to scores of deaths and poisonings, the other concerned with a wealthy banker and political figure—gives credence to France's bitter observation.

Case one: In April 1971, the government's Center for Disease Control reported that 394 cases of blood poisoning and 50 deaths were linked with 25 hospitals' use of intravenous solutions manufactured by Abbott Laboratories.

The Food & Drug Administration ordered Abbott to cease production of the solutions and to recall existing stocks. The Justice Dept., following an investigation, charged the company with shipping solutions containing live bacteria in interstate commerce and with mislabeling containers as "sterile." A federal grand jury issued a 60-count indictment against the company.

The trial did not begin until two years after the indictment was issued. The company contended it couldn't get a fair trial because of publicity given to the case. Time passed. A federal district court granted Abbott's motion to dismiss, a U.S. Appeals Court reinstated the indictment, the U.S. Supreme Court refused to overturn the appeals court decision.

Just a few weeks ago, while the case was in its fourth week of resumed trial in U.S. District Court in New Bern, N.C., the government—the prosecution—suddenly agreed to dismiss all of the original charges except for one count of the indictment, and Abbott was allowed to plead no contest on that single count.

The plea, on a single misdemeanor, allowed the company to get off with a $1,000 fine.

Case two: At the high point of his power, C. Arnholt Smith of San Diego controlled a bank with nearly $1 billion in deposits, a $200-million conglomerate, Westgate-California, and an array of other companies almost beyond count.

Millions in Smith's U.S. National Bank of San Diego were siphoned back and forth among companies over a long period of years. Federal examiners looked over the bank's records for almost as many years. In 1962, one of them recommended Smith's dealings be reported to the Justice Dept. for possible criminal prosecution. But the Comptroller of the Currency overruled the examiner.

Meanwhile, Smith became dominant in Republican politics. One of his best known friends was Richard Milhous Nixon. Reportedly, he raised $1 million for the 1968 campaign. His personal contribution was set at $250,000.

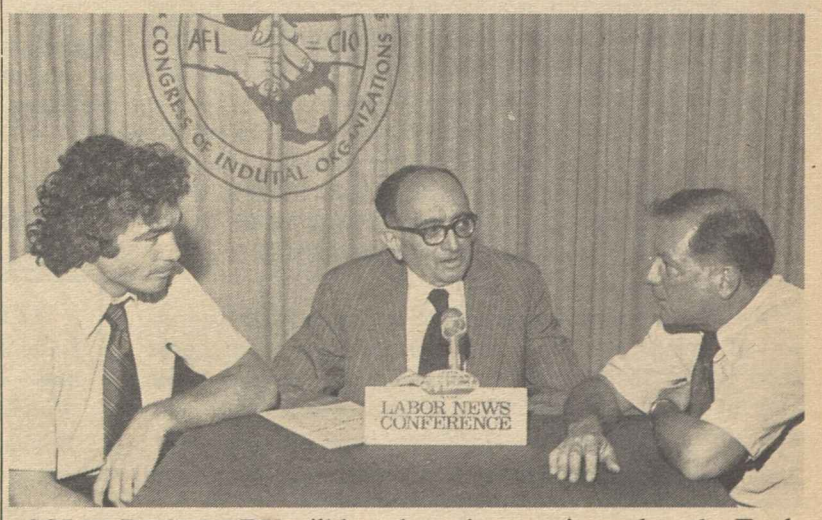
In 1972, a new examiner again found evidence to sustain possible criminal prosecution. In October 1973, one year later, USNB failed. Smith's financial empire began to come apart.

Forbes, the business magazine, said the bank's failure likely cost the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. "more than the failure of all other U.S. banks combined since 1933."

The magazine noted that bankruptcy trustees described Smith's operations as "one of the largest systematic lootings of a public company ever recorded in the history of the country."

In June, Smith pleaded nolo contendere to charges of conspiracy, misapplication of bank funds, filing false statements and making false entries in USNB's books. His "penalty": five years probation and a token fine of $30,000 to be paid at the rate of $100 a month over 25 years. Forbes concluded "it was the merest slap on the wrist for one of the great swindlers of our time."

The outcome of the Abbott and Smith cases proves that America still has a long way to go in the achievement of justice. Without progress, as the Forbes article concludes, no one should wonder at the charge that our system has "two kinds of justice: one for ordinary men and another, more lenient kind for the rich and powerful."



SOLID RECOVERY will be a long time coming unless the Ford Administration is willing to act and show leadership in the fight to put the nation's millions of jobless back to work, AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger, center, warned. Questioning him on Labor News Conference were David Nyhan, left, of the Boston Globe and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine.

Meany on Labor Day:

Labor's Jobs Program Vital to Recovery

By George Meany

ONE YEAR AGO, on Labor Day 1974, the American labor movement expressed its deep concern for the future because of the serious and continuing erosion in the living standards of most Americans, caused by recession and inflation.

That erosion continues today and has picked up steam, threatening to wipe out a generation of gains made in the standard of living of average Americans.

Administration policies that perpetuate recession while fueling inflation are the cause; reduced buying power, increased unemployment and a bleak future are the effects.

Most seriously affected, of course, are the unemployed. At best, for those covered by unemployment insurance, their standard of living is cut in half. Because that is all that unemployment insurance covers.

For the unemployed workers who are daily exhausting even this meager protection, mere survival has now become a problem.

Every unemployed worker is faced with making painful decisions for his or her family: Which is more important, food on the table or a roof over their heads? Which bill must be ignored in order to buy medicine or school clothes?

And while their physical standard of living is halved, their mental standard of living also suffers—fear of harassment, unpaid bills, idle hours, loss of self-esteem, stresses and strains on family relationships, sometimes leading to divorce, alcoholism, drug abuse and crime.

Continued high unemployment is a time bomb ticking in the foundation of this society. In 6 percent of America's working families, the head of the household is unemployed. The average unemployment now lasts 15 weeks—50 percent higher than a year ago and it is getting longer. And high unemployment is forecast to continue for the rest of this decade, aggravating old social problems and creating new ones.

The damage to the standard of living of an unemployed family may never be repaired.

There is no way to count the number of young people whose college dreams were shattered when their parents became unemployed; no way to measure the effects on young children forced to grow up in unhealthy neighborhoods; no way to counter the bitterness a child accumulates while he watches a jobless parent lose hope.

This, too, is part of the lost standard of living, but it doesn't appear on any economist's chart or graph.

Then there is the persistently high unemployment among minorities which makes a mockery of equal opportunity laws. And the fact that high unemployment among teenagers means that the first "work experience" of the young is long-term unemployment.

For those who are lucky enough to be employed, their standard of living is also suffering. They've lost ground compared to where they were a decade ago. Real spendable weekly earnings in June—the take-home pay of the average worker—were less than in 1965, ten years ago.

Gasoline, coffee, meat, bread, groceries are going up. Rent, mortgages, heating fuel, electricity are going up. Tuition, books, school clothes are going up.

The only thing not going up is the people's standard of living. It is going down.

The majority of American families have been priced out of decent housing; they can't afford the high monthly payments that result from 9 to 10 percent interest rates. Their children are being priced out of higher education by tuition increases and President Ford's veto of education funds. It is imperative that this veto be overridden when Congress returns.

The Administration's answer to the American people is that they will just have to accept a lower standard of living. All that they have worked for—the better life they have sought for their children—is being taken away from them by deliberate government policies. This is no accident.

Are the corporations asked to accept a lower standard of living? No. The Administration wants to boost their profits through tax breaks. Those who earn their way by honest labor must take less, while those who can afford to let money work for them will get more.

It seems to me that the Administration has its priorities upside down.

That's why its economic policies haven't worked, aren't working and won't work. The Administration places dollar signs ahead of people, and the American people won't buy that.

It is worth remembering that 6½ years ago—when Richard Nixon became President and an economics professor named Arthur Burns was given the reins of the economy—unemployment was at 3.4 percent and the cost-of-living was rising at an annual rate of 4.2 percent.

Six and a half years ago, Arthur Burns said that the 4.2 percent inflation rate was too high. For 6½ years, under both President Nixon and Ford, he has applied essentially the same economic policies to reduce inflation. He tightened up on money supply; he forced interest rates up.

And 6½ years later, inflation is more than double and the number of unemployed has tripled. That sorry record indicates only one thing — the policies were wrong, and those who had a hand in developing those policies should be removed from government.

They should be replaced before it is too late. For, despite the Administration's optimistic pronouncements that the recession is over, the truth is less comforting. True, the headlong downhill plunge of last winter has abated, but the economy is still in the throes of the recession.

No recession can truly be said to be over until the unemployed are back to work. And only when there is full employment and full production will the economy be safe from another, more dangerous recession.

In recent weeks, Administration policies have recreated precisely the same set of conditions that caused the current recession, and, thus, there is today the very real danger of a deeper, more serious recession starting again before the economy has had sufficient time to recover.

These are the warning signs:

First, the Federal Reserve Board under Dr. Arthur Burns has reimposed a tight money policy and forced interest rates to increase. Similar policies in 1973-74 were a major factor in creating the recession plaguing America today. In fact, continuing high interest rates on long-term loans have discouraged expansion of the economy, particularly home-building. The rise of interest rates now—with more than 8 million unemployed and one-third of industry's productive capacity idle—could turn a possible recovery into a disaster.

Let me emphasize the economic stupidity of this policy. Earlier this year the Congress enacted an emergency tax cut to stimulate the economy. It was felt that by putting money in the hands of average Americans, the money would be spent on consumer goods and, thus, stimulate sales. It worked. In fact, the emergency tax cut was one of the reasons why the rapid downturn of the economy was slowed.

So, what's Arthur Burns trying to do now? By tightening money, he wants to counteract the positive stimulus of the tax cut. He wants to slow down the recovery, even before it builds up enough steam to get the unemployed back to work.

In other words, Burns is taking away from the people the money they received by way of the tax cut. This is sheer nonsense.

Second, the Administration has permitted the Soviet Union to again purchase huge amounts of American grain. This grain giveaway, a repeat of 1972, will boost already intolerably high food prices and shorten domestic supplies.

No American consumer needs to be reminded of the outrageous increases in food prices that resulted from the last grain deal. It makes no sense for an Administration—which claims it is fighting inflation—to force increases in food prices, when consumer buying power is already below the levels of 10 years ago.

Third, another runaway inflation in fuel prices has begun as a result of the Administration's energy policy of making consumers pay more and more for less and less energy. Fuel price inflation could get even worse if the Arab countries carry out their threat to hike the price of crude oil.

Rising energy prices could cost the American economy as much as $40 billion. For industry, this means that money that should go to expansion and new machinery will be siphoned off to pay higher fuel bills. For consumers, this means that their family budget will have to be stretched further and their standard of living lowered even more.

Fourth, because of the President's veto of housing legislation, the housing construction industry remains in a depression. The history of past recessions is that a revival in housing—a bellwether industry—leads to recovery. By its actions in holding down the housing industry, the Administration is clearly prolonging the recession.

The most important factor preventing a revival in housing is high interest rates, which place the monthly payments beyond the reach of most families. Reduce the mortgage interest rate to 6 percent and the housing will be built—it is just as simple as that.

Fifth, the President has vetoed congressional programs that would have stimulated a genuine recovery and put America back to work. As a result, the meager recovery to date has not been strong enough to even restore the economy to health.

Adoption of the emergency tax cut and some other parts of the AFL-CIO Action Program to Put America Back to Work, as well as the operation of the decline of the economy.

Finally, consumer purchasing power remains weak and consumer confidence low. With the threat of still more unemployment hanging over the heads of many workers, they are understandably hesitant to make major purchases. Coupled with the certain price increases for food and energy, consumers are worried about the future.

This sorry state of affairs didn't just happen. It is the result of deliberate policies adopted by the Nixon-Ford Administrations. With the economy so weak and so vulnerable, these six points I have just mentioned could well set off another recession on top of the current one, which is already the worst since the 1930s.

America is at the edge of another economic calamity, but it is not too late for the President and the Congress to prevent it from happening. We in the AFL-CIO believe the following steps should be taken immediately:

1—The individual income tax cuts, scheduled to end on Dec. 31, should be extended for another year.

2—Existing programs to boost the home-building industry should be fully implemented by the Administration.

3—An accelerated works program to create jobs should be passed by the Congress and signed by the President.

4—The public service employment program should be greatly expanded, creating jobs for the unemployed in state and local governments.

5—The Federal Reserve Board should be ordered to cut interest rates and to allocate credit to such important areas as housing.

6—State and local communities hard-hit by high unemployment should receive immediate federal aid.

7—The nation's railroad tracks and roadbeds should be restored.

8—The outmoded unemployment insurance system should be overhauled immediately.

9—Major loopholes in the tax structure, which yearly rob the federal Treasury of $20 billion, should be closed.

10—A comprehensive energy policy should be adopted that does not permit uncontrolled price increases for fuel.

11—The government should regulate the export of American goods and products in short supply to prevent inflation.

12—The President should more rapidly release previously impounded funds to create jobs.

In short, there is nothing wrong with the American economy that more jobs wouldn't cure. Putting people to work means more tax revenue and a lower budget deficit. Jobs mean workers can sustain their standard of living and enjoy a more prosperous life.

Indeed, jobs are what Labor Day is all about. On this day, when America honors workers and their labors, there should be a new resolve on the part of the government to put America back to work.

Only with full employment and full production will America have a stable, healthy economy and a secure future.

Network Schedules Set for Labor Day

AFL-CIO President George Meany, Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and Vice President I. W. Abel will make nationwide radio addresses on Labor Day, Monday, Sept. 1.

The networks and times set for the broadcasts are:

Abel, CBS, 7:35 p.m. (EDT).
Kirkland, Mutual, 7:45 p.m. (EDT).
Meany, NBC, 9:45 p.m. (EDT).

Local radio stations may air these broadcasts at different hours and should be checked for exact broadcast times.

Kirkland on Labor Day:

Improvements in Jobless Benefits Overdue

By Lane Kirkland

LABOR DAY THIS YEAR is no holiday for this nation's unemployed workers. Today is just like every other day, filled with enforced idleness that dulls the spirit, fraught with fear of the future, consumed with worry about somehow keeping the family together.

So the sense of celebration that the American labor movement usually feels on Labor Day is absent this year. Instead, our thoughts turn to the millions of unemployed workers and their plight.

There is only one sure cure for the ill of unemployment, and that is jobs. But with the Administration's forecasts of continued high unemployment for the rest of this decade and the President's reckless use of the veto power to obstruct the job-creating programs that are needed, today's unemployed worker has scant chance of getting a job.

So, for that worker, the immediate concern is the unemployment insurance check. That unemployment insurance check is all that stands between a jobless worker and total financial ruin.

An estimated 20 million workers will be unemployed at some time during the next year. Each of them will be looking to their unemployment insurance to help tide them over until they get back to work.

Unemployment insurance is also vital to the economy, because it is a brake on recession. Cushioning the loss in purchasing power that happens when a worker becomes unemployed helps to prevent unemployment from feeding on unemployment. Because of their unemployment benefits, jobless workers are able to purchase some of the basic necessities of life. This keeps stores open and sales from dropping to zero, and jobless workers and their families from starving to death. But that's all.

Unemployment insurance was enacted as part of the Social Security Act in 1935. It was one of the social insurance mechanisms developed to help prevent future depressions like the one in the 1930s.

To that extent it has worked—but it must be better.

At the present time, unemployment benefit payments are running about $1.2 billion per month—money that is being plowed back into the economy immediately, sustaining retail sales, and keeping the recession from getting worse.

But the unemployment insurance system badly needs modernization.

More than 6.6 million jobless workers are receiving unemployment compensation benefits. But, for many of the long-time jobless, those benefits will soon vanish, for they will have exhausted their benefit entitlement.

The average weekly benefit received by jobless workers—$68—replaces only 42 percent of the average wage in nonagricultural employment. For many workers, this wage replacement benefit represents no more than 20 or 30 percent of lost wages. This is a complete distortion of the original intent of unemployment insurance to restore to jobless workers at least one-half of their former weekly wage during periods of unemployment. And even 50 percent—and we are a long way from it—is much too low.

Further, the imposition of arbitrary and harsh disqualifications are depriving millions of jobless workers of the protection of the program. During 1974, more than 3 million workers were disqualified from receiving benefits. These disqualifications are imposed in the majority of cases without any type of impartial hearing to determine the merits of the reason for denying the worker's benefit claim.

More than 12 million working men and women are still excluded from the regular unemployment insurance program. These workers — farm workers, domestic workers and public employes—need and deserve the same unemployment compensation protection other workers have.

The financial structure of the program is no longer sound due to the erosion of the taxable wage base and the overpowering influence of experience-rating on state tax rates. Currently, eight states have depleted their reserve funds and an additional 30 states are expected to exhaust their reserve funds before the end of this year.

That is why we in the AFL-CIO are supporting unemployment compensation reform legislation introduced by Rep. James C. Corman, chairman of the subcommittee on Unemployment Compensation of the House Committee on Ways & Means, and Sen. Walter F. Mondale of the Senate Committee on Finance.

These bills—HR 8366 and S 2079—represent the first serious effort in many years to provide the nation with an unemployment compensation program to meet the needs of modern industrial society. It would make improvements in the program that have been discussed for 40 years and are still needed.

The Corman-Mondale bill would extend coverage to 12 million workers denied the protection of the program at this time. It would improve the benefit structure so that payments to jobless workers would enable them to maintain a decent standard of living. It would establish reasonable qualifying and duration standards that state programs would have to meet. It would improve the solvency of state funds and restore financial responsibility within the system.

In short, the Corman-Mondale bill would restore to the nation an unemployment insurance program consistent with the objectives of the original Social Security Act to provide economic security for all who are unemployed. It is a measure long overdue and we urge the Congress to enact it without delay.

Ending Slump Is Top Priority

Labor Day statement by I. W. Abel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

THE MILLIONS of Americans without jobs or the prospect of jobs are a tragic reproach to the national leaders whose inept and mistaken policies cast such a grim shadow over Labor Day 1975.

For months now, the working people of the United States have been telling our national government that jobs are needed now. Yet we mark labor's holiday with unemployment rates hovering well over 8 percent, and with the frightening prospect of continued high unemployment for years to come.

The overriding obligation of our federal government is to get people back to work. Policies and programs are needed to repair the mistakes of government that have sickened our national economy to the point where factories, mills, and commercial establishments limp painfully from day to day at slow and faltering levels of activity.

The Ford Administration has focused its attention on inflation, while ignoring the need to provide jobs for the working Americans who are the basis of our nation's economic progress. We, too, are concerned about inflation—and we feel the Administration has not been successful in that area—but we know our nation must never forget that jobs represent the true basis of progress and national well-being.

We cannot afford to wait for some mysterious "natural force" to repair our economic ills. They were caused by human actions—or inactions—and human actions can repair them. America certainly has the moral, intellectual and physical means to pull itself out of recession in a manner that provides fairly for the worker who is in himself a basic resource of national strength.

Surely it is fitting on Labor Day 1975 that we demand from the Administration and the Congress programs that will provide jobs now and head our country back to economic health.

Programs to Spur Construction Could Revitalize Sick Economy

From a Labor Day statement by Robert A. Georgine, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

EACH YEAR FOR the last 93 years, a special day has been set aside in the United States to encourage all citizens to recognize the contributions of the laboring man and woman to the nation, its economy, society, education, laws and culture.

It is to be hoped that on this Labor Day 1975 the citizens will recognize another circumstance, notably the plight in which the labor segment generally, and the construction worker in particular, now find themselves.

Not since the depression days of four decades ago has such a large percentage of workers been out of jobs, either totally or much of the time. In the construction industry, the figures disclose employment situations actually worse than in the 1930s. And perhaps never before has inflation had such a damaging effect on the ability of Americans to live decently, much less comfortably.

Yet, strangely enough, in spite of the dismal situation existing today, there are grounds for optimism. There are means—and not very difficult means, at that—by which we could turn the current depression into one of the most productive and beneficial periods in the entire history of our nation.

It is general knowledge, for example, that Americans in all walks of life need new homes, some of them desperately. But, almost literally, hardly any new homes are being built; the cost to finance them exceeds the potential of the buyer who requires them.

Is this really such a difficult problem to solve? On the contrary, it seems clear that merely a reduction in the almost usurious mortgage rates could thaw the freeze. That could be accomplished by the Congress, the federal administration or both without fanning inflation, simply by providing lower-interest mortgages, which the private financial sector now adamantly refuses to do.

Also, it does not necessitate the services of a private detective to ascertain that our cities need rebuilding in an amount and to a degree that they never have needed before.

There are millions of jobs here, work benefitting countless additional millions.

Energy and power shortages are familiar to all of us. Perhaps not so familiar is the fact that, since last November, scarcely any new starts have been made in building new utility facilities. Does this require the plan of a genius to get things moving?

And as long as everybody on this day is recognizing labor, it would be well if they could finally bring themselves to recognizing that labor never has been accorded the status it deserves.

Happy Labor Day.

DOMINANT THEME of 1975 Labor Day messages issued by leaders of the trade-union movement is expressed in this banner displayed at a rally of J. P. Stevens workers in Roanoke Rapids, N.C. The rally marked the first anniversary of a representation election victory by the Textile Workers Union of America at the company's seven plants in the Roanoke Rapids area.

New Policies Demanded:

Jobs Crisis Forms Labor Day Theme

hold jobs in the recession still plaguing the economy, purchasing power has dropped and eroded their living standards, he noted. Real spendable weekly earnings are less than they were in 1965.

A year ago, Meany pointed out, organized labor expressed its deep concern for the future because of the ongoing erosion in living standards, brought on by recession and inflation.

"That erosion continues today and has picked up steam," he observed. While buying power is dropping, prices are going up.

In July, retail prices rose at an annual rate of 14.4 percent.

Noting the Administration's proposals for new tax breaks for corporations at a time when "those who earn their way by honest labor must take less," Meany accused President Ford of having his economic priorities upside down.

"That's why its economic policies haven't worked, aren't working and won't work," Meany declared. "The Administration places dollar signs ahead of people, and the American people won't buy that."

He called for adoption of the AFL-CIO's program to restore the economy to health, including a year's extension of the current income-tax cuts, an accelerated public works program to create jobs, tax reform, regulation of exports, modernization of the nation's unemployment insurance program, restoration of railroad track and roadbeds, credit allocation and lower interest rates in areas such as housing, a national energy policy, immediate federal aid to states and local communities hard hit by joblessness, and release of presidentially impounded funds to create employment.

"Only with full employment and full production will America have a stable, healthy economy and a secure future," Meany observed.

Kirkland noted in his message that "the sense of celebration that the American labor movement usually feels on Labor Day is absent this year."

"Instead, our thoughts turn to the millions of unemployed workers and their plight," Kirkland said. Because of Administration forecasts of continued high joblessness for the rest of the '70s and the President's "reckless use" of his veto power to obstruct job-creating programs, today's unemployed worker has scant chance of getting a job, he observed.

While jobs are the only cure for unemployment, the immediate concern of the jobless worker is his unemployment insurance check, Kirkland said. Often it is not enough—for many workers the average weekly benefit is no more than 20-30 percent of lost wages, he noted.

The unemployment insurance system badly needs modernization, Kirkland declared.

The AFL-CIO, he said, is supporting unemployment compensation reform legislation sponsored by Rep. James C. Corman (D-Calif.) and Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.).

Corman and Mondale have introduced bills to extend coverage to 12 million more workers, improve the benefit structure, and establish reasonable qualifying and duration standards that state programs would have to meet.

In other Labor Day statements, President I. W. Abel of the Industrial Union Dept. observed that the millions of jobless Americans cast "a grim shadow" over this year's Labor Day. He blamed the Ford Administration for focusing all its attention on the problem of inflation while ignoring the need to provide jobs.

"We, too, are concerned about inflation—and we feel the Administration has not been successful in that area—but we know our nation must never forget that jobs represent the true basis of progress and national well-being," Abel declared.

"We cannot afford to wait for some mysterious 'natural force' to repair our economic ills," Abel said. He urged Americans to demand from the Administration and Congress "programs that will provide jobs now and head our country back to economic health."

Robert A. Georgine, president of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., noted that the high unemployment in the construction industry could be reduced if the nation turned to providing the homes that are desperately needed, rebuilding its cities and starting up new utility facilities.

"There are means—and not very difficult means at that—by which we could turn the current depression into one of the most productive and beneficial periods in the entire history of our nation," Georgine said.

Unemployment in the construction industry, well over 20 percent, is far above the national average. In many parts of the country, it is actually worse than in the Great Depression four decades ago.

'I Gotta Get Back in Shape!'

J. P. STEVENS EMPLOYES in Roanoke Rapids, N.C., still without a contract a year after the Textile Workers Union of America won the right to represent them, marked the first anniversary of the TWUA election victory with a rally and parade. State, regional and national labor representatives pledged all-out support of the workers in their efforts to end Stevens's delaying tactics. The company employs about 3,500 workers in seven local plants.

Textile Workers' Rally Protests Year of Stalling by J. P. Stevens

AFL-CIO and its 14 million members.

"Trade unionists everywhere stand with the valiant workers of J. P. Stevens as they fight for economic justice and human dignity. Your cause is our cause," Meany said. "Your fight is our fight."

Noting the company has frustrated every attempt by TWUA to negotiate a contract, Meany declared:

"It is time that Stevens stopped living in the 19th Century. It is time this law-breaking company began to obey the law of the land."

The rally drew more than 1,200 workers plus regional, state and national leaders both in and out of the labor movement who pledged a determined effort to overcome the stalling by Stevens.

"We want a union contract that makes it possible for workers to support their families in decency and live in dignity, with self-respect," Stetin declared. "Yet, for an entire year, this company has kept saying 'no' to each of our proposals.

"Its attitude clearly adds up to still another violation of the National Labor Relations Act," he charged.

Stetin served notice on the company: "We will never give up this cause. Absolutely no way.

"We are well aware that the masterminds of J. P. Stevens—and the high-priced lawyers it spends its money on—are convinced that if they hold out long enough the union will eventually dry up and blow away," he said. "But let me remind these gentlemen we know the meaning of struggle"

TWUA Sec.-Treas. William M. DuChessi reported on the union's frustrations in getting the company to the negotiating stage and said the stalling was typical of Stevens's repeated bad-faith dealings.

Nicholas A. Zonarich, organizing director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., which is coordinating TWUA's campaign in the textile industry, assured the workers, however:

"You're not going to be second-class citizens much longer. It's time to turn Roanoke Rapids into a first-class community."

Wilbur Hobby, president of the North Carolina State AFL-CIO who presided, noted that the entire state labor movement is providing assistance in the Stevens campaign. He cited especially the efforts of the Communications Workers, Boilermakers, Paperworkers, Steelworkers and the garment unions.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) told the rally that the Stevens workers' struggle for their rights was not theirs alone but the entire nation's.

"All of us are in this fight against industrial greed," Rangel said. "Not too long from now, J. P. Stevens will run out of holes to hide in."

Rangel joined Stetin and other speakers in scoring government policies that reward law-breaking firms such as Stevens by giving them federal contracts running into millions of dollars. He called for a formal congressional investigation of the practice.

LaDonna Harris, wife of former Oklahoma Sen. Fred Harris, compared the Stevens employes with farm workers and coal miners in their struggle for economic and social justice.

A group of workers at Stevens's seven plants in the Roanoke Rapids area described the low wages, poor working conditions and other inequities they endure daily. Others who spoke included TWUA Regional Director Scott Hoyman and Harold McIver, IUD coordinator for the Carolinas.

The rally was held in the local high-school auditorium. With the temperature outside 97 degrees, the workers sweltered without air conditioning; yet at times the rally reached the pitch of a revival meeting.

The speechmaking gave way to a mile-long march through this town of 13,000, past three of the firm's plants and back again to the high school for a barbecue.

In his rally speech, Stetin noted that within a stone's throw of the meeting place "is a company which is furnishing the most brazen example of how the National Labor Relations Act is being flouted in defiance of the Congress and the courts of the nation."

In the past dozen years, Stevens has fired hundreds of workers simply because they sought to exercise their legal right to join a union, he observed. The firm even resorted to—and was found guilty of—bugging the motel room of union organizers, Stetin recalled.

He reported that the TWUA has filed new charges with the NLRB accusing Stevens of bargaining in bad faith in Roanoke Rapids. He noted the union also has charged that the company closed down its Statesboro, Ga., plant to discourage workers from joining TWUA.

"We have always pursued the goal of peace and cooperation between labor and management," Stetin said. "So far, Stevens has spurned this approach. It prefers conflict and law-breaking."

Postal Service Unions Ratify 3-Year Pacts

The contracts with the U.S. Postal Service were reached last month with the aid of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service and averted a strike that had been set for July 20.

Besides the pay boosts, the contracts include a cost-of-living escalator provision providing for an increase of 1 cent an hour for every rise of four-tenths of 1 percent in the consumer price index.

The contracts also retain a no-layoff clause which both sides regarded as a major issue in the negotiations. The clause was first won by the unions two years ago.

Under the agreement, a $400 wage increase takes effect immediately. The next raise of $250 goes into effect on Mar. 21, 1976. The schedule calls for another $250 increase on Nov. 21, 1976, and a $600 raise on July 21, 1977.

The settlement boosts the Postal Service's contribution to health insurance premiums from 65 to 75 percent of the cost. USPS will continue to pay the full cost of basic life insurance coverage.

USPS also agreed to reduce the number of "casual" hires from 7 to 5 percent of total manpower and to give the unions the right to take new work or time standards to arbitration.

Meany Assails Grain Deal As Benefiting Speculators

Ford Action On Federal Pay Scored

President Ford's move to override his own advisers and limit "comparability" pay increases for 3.4 million federal white-collar employes and military personnel to 5 percent was described by AFL-CIO President George Meany as a "cruel Labor Day present for federal workers."

He said the AFL-CIO "would oppose any such presidential action to deny federal workers the pay increase they need and which is rightfully theirs under the law" and called on Congress to reject the President's action.

The federal pay comparability law is designed to assure that salaries in federal jobs match those of comparable positions in private industry, based on surveys by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Under the latest BLS survey, completed last March, federal employes would need an increase of 8.66 percent to keep pace with their counterparts in the private sector.

This 8.66 percent boost was recommended in August by the U.S. Civil Service Commission and the federal Office of Management & Budget, the President's "pay agents," one of three groups involved in making recommendations to the President on the annual federal cost-of-living raise.

The 8.66 percent figure also was endorsed by the Advisory Committee on Federal Pay, which consists of three private personnel experts, and was accepted by the unions that make up the Federal Employee Pay Council.

Ford's action in cutting back the increase to 5 percent can be overturned by a majority vote of either the House or the Senate within 30 days. Federal employes would then be eligible for the full 8.66 percent raise in October.

In sending his alternative plan to Congress, Ford said that the "pay act gives me authority to propose whatever alternative pay adjustment I consider appropriate in the light of economic conditions affecting the general welfare. The pay increase I have chosen will allow the federal government to lead the fight against inflation by example, and not just words alone."

Meany charged that "it is grossly unfair for the President to say federal employes must sacrifice while his Administration's food and energy policies are forcing up the prices of everything they must buy."

Ford's move also drew strong fire from other representatives of federal workers.

MUSICAL SALUTE to Labor Day features a Washington area folk group belting out union songs at Wolf Trap Farm Park in Vienna, Va., to open labor's Bicentennial Year. A number of top performers and music to fit every mood and taste highlighted the six-hour program.

Labor Day Talks Focus On Job Needs

America must reassess its domestic and foreign policies to better serve the interests of its working men and women, top labor officials stressed in Labor Day radio addresses.

In a series of speeches carried on three national networks, they explored the state of the faltering economy and the economic impact of detente on consumers. They also called on the Ford Administration to reconsider its opposition to essential social and jobs programs and problems compounded by presidential vetoes.

Speaking on the NBC radio network, AFL-CIO President George Meany said that the economic

Nationwide Celebration:

U.S. Workers Open Bicentennial Year

By John R. Oravec

Labor's Bicentennial Year—saluting the contribution of American workers to the building of the nation from the time of the Revolution to the present—was opened Labor Day with a series of events across the country.

Picnics, parades, barbecues, musical salutes, state fair exhibitions, television programs and Labor Day masses marked the workers' holiday. And millions of other union members celebrated it as a day off with their families.

The various celebrations, sponsored by labor organizations and civic groups throughout the country, focused on efforts to bring a greater public awareness of the role of unions and craftsmen in the nation's first 200 years.

The national theme for labor's bicentennial observance was set with a musical salute at Wolf Trap Farm Park in Vienna, Va., near Washington, with the cooperation of the National Park Service and the AFL-CIO.

Addressing the observance at Wolf Trap, Federation President George Meany observed that Labor Day is more than a holiday to workers; it is also, traditionally, a day when we take a look at our country and measure what progress we have made and what remains to be done."

With the start of labor's bicentennial celebration, Meany said that the reflection will be on America's achievements in its first 200 years and the "challenges that face us as a people struggling to maintain our freedoms and to reach farther toward our long-range goals of economic and social justice for all Americans."

In an appearance earlier in the day on the NBC television network, Meany noted that the traditional Labor Day parade is giving way to a day of workers relaxing with their families—picnicking and playing golf.

Farmers, Consumers Victimized

Organized labor's boycott of the Soviet grain deal is not aimed at America's family farmers, AFL-CIO President George Meany declared, but is directed at government policy that "benefits only commodity speculators and the big dealers and that rips off the American consumer in the interest of so-called detente."

Attempts to portray federation support of the Longshoremen's grain embargo as anti-farmer could not be further from the truth, Meany said in a letter to officials of AFL-CIO state federations.

"Those making these false charges are trying to drive a wedge between the labor movement and its traditional allies, America's family farmers," he charged.

Meany assured the state labor leaders that the federation intends to fight for government policies that will protect consumers, farmers and workers from a repetition of "the disastrous 1972 Russian grain steal."

He said that the ILA boycott went into effect because the government was doing nothing—either through its actions or its inaction—to provide this protection.

"We believe America must not be forced to sacrifice in order to benefit the Soviet Union and the greedy millionaire grain dealers," he said. "The inflation this deal is already causing is intolerable."

Noting that the state federations have close ties with organizations that may be upset by accusations against labor's boycott, Meany cited the following points:

- "The current grain sale to the

Labor Backs Bill to Curb 'Redlining'

A Senate bill to help eliminate discrimination in mortgage lending and boost the homebuilding industry at the same time has drawn strong support from the AFL-CIO.

The bill, sponsored by Senators William Proxmire (D-Wis.) and Adlai E. Stevenson III (D-Ill.), would require banks and savings and loan associations in metropolitan areas to make public disclosure of information showing where "redlining" is practiced.

Redlining is a term used to describe the practice of banks in denying mortgage loans for the purchase of good homes in older neighborhoods where minority and

Override of Oil Price Control Veto Pressed to Prevent Deeper Slump

The AFL-CIO called upon Congress to override President Ford's promised veto of a bill extending price controls on "old" domestically-produced oil, warning that lifting of the controls could send the economy into a new tailspin.

"Removal of controls on oil prices could send the economy into an even deeper recession, because industry would be forced to use money set aside for expansion to pay higher fuel bills or would be forced to cut production, thus increasing already intolerable unemployment," AFL-CIO President George Meany warned in a letter to Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.).

Jackson is chairman of the Senate Interior Committee which is holding hearings on the possible effects of Ford's expected veto.

Just before going on its August recess, Congress passed a measure to extend for six months the Emergency Petroleum Allocation Act which authorized controls on prices of oil from "old wells" that were in production before 1972. The bill lay unsigned on the President's desk while the controls act expired at midnight on Aug. 31.

Ford had until Sept. 9 to veto the bill, a step he said he would take; if he failed to veto the bill, it would become law retroactive to Sept. 1. Anticipating a veto, the Senate scheduled an override attempt for Sept. 10.

In his letter to Jackson, Meany urged every member of the Senate and the House to vote to override what he called "this outrageous" veto.

Ford Assailed On Bid to Cut Federal Raise the Government Employees observed that "it is exceedingly tragic that federal employes have once again been singled out to be the Administration's sacrifice toward the solution of the nation's economic difficulties."

President William H. McClennan of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. called the proposed 5 percent limit "another example of the callous economic strategy of the Ford Administration which supports business tax credits with one hand while taking money from workers with the other."

Despite the intention of Congress in adopting the federal pay comparability act in 1970, both the Nixon and Ford Administrations have opposed and delayed federal government wage increases.

During the first phase of his economic stabilization program in 1971, President Nixon ordered a 90-day-freeze on federal pay raises. But the U.S. comptroller general later ruled that the freeze could not be applied to 260,000 of the federal employes and ordered retroactive payments for them.

In 1972, Nixon delayed the cost-of-living raise due in October for three months, but this action was overturned by a court suit and retroactive payments were again necessary.

In 1973, Nixon again tried to delay the October raise for three months, but the Senate rejected the proposal on a 72-16 vote.

Last year, Ford placed a 5.5 percent ceiling on the October raise and then tried to delay payment for 60 days. The Senate upheld the ceiling, but rejected the delay by a 64-35 vote.

Sleeping Car Porters Adopt Dues Increase

Chicago—A dues increase from $12 to $15 a month and a boost in the initiation fee were approved by the 50th anniversary convention of the Sleeping Car Porters here.

The 26 delegates representing 1,500 members referred a number of resolutions reflecting contract proposals to the union's negotiating committee. They rejected a move to shift the union's international headquarters from Denver to Chicago.

The convention called for passage of National Health Security legislation, urged full citizenship rights for the late Eugene V. Debs and called for full participation in programs of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

Two retired members who have been working for the union were named to the executive board—J. W. Cohen, Sr. of Jacksonville, Fla., and Leon B. Thompson of Los Angeles.

The convention also re-elected President C. L. Dellums and Sec.-Treas. W. W. Seymour, Sr., along with other officers.

Delegates voted to continue support of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights and the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

Dellums gave an extensive report on the state of the union and negotiations with the carriers.

Representative Ralph H. Metcalfe (D-Ill.) recalled that he talked about a Nixon recession at the union's convention in 1971. "Now I'm talking about a Nixon-Ford economic crisis," he said, adding that the key to the problem is jobs.

Stanley L. Johnson, president of the Illinois State AFL-CIO, thanked the Sleeping Car Porters for their support of equal rights and labor legislation in the Illinois General Assembly.

William A. Lee, president of the Chicago AFL-CIO, recalled the early days of the union and the contributions Milton Webster and A. Philip Randolph made to the labor movement in Chicago and the nation.

Montana Labor Affirms Stand on Environment

Great Falls, Mont.—The Montana State AFL-CIO, in a major resolution proposed by the State Carpenters Council, reaffirmed its stand that new power generating plants and other facilities should be approved only if they conform to Montana environmental laws.

The 19th annual convention of the state federation also adopted a resolution introduced by the State Building & Construction Trades Council that set off a labor boycott of an appearance by President Ford to dedicate the Libby Dam in northwest Montana.

The resolution said that it seemed senseless to "dedicate" a partially complete dam and that "footdragging in Washington" was responsible for the construction delay. It said completion of the dam "will need extensive red tape cutting" by Ford in Washington and not "switch throwing" in Libby. The resolution nevertheless gave thanks for the timing of the incomplete dam "because it provided much needed employment for Montana workers . . . before Mr. Ford could veto it or impound the construction funds."

Charles Bradford, executive director of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute, in an address to the delegates, urged them to make maximum use of the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act in Montana.

Bradford urged the state labor movement to help improve the CETA programs by working with local Human Resources Development representatives as manpower experts who know the community.

Other speakers included Gov. Thomas L. Judge, Lt. Gov. William Christiansen, Montana House Speaker Pat McKittrick, U.S. Sen. Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.) the state's two Democratic congressmen, John Melcher and Max Baucus, and Vice President Matthew Schoenwald of the Ladies' Garment Workers, who is chairman of the American Trade Union Council for Histadrut.

In other convention action, delegates unanimously approved an additional one-cent increase in per capita payments, boosting it to 33 cents per month as of January 1976 instead of the 32-cent rate originally scheduled. An escalator clause providing for one-cent increases each year will remain in effect until the per capita reaches 36 cents on January 1, 1979.

Top officers of the State AFL-CIO were re-elected without opposition. They are Vincent Bosh, president; Robert G. Kokoruda, vice president; and James W. Murry, executive secretary.

12-Cent COL Boost Set At Aluminum Plants

Pittsburgh—A cost-of-living adjustment of 12 cents an hour went into effect Sept. 1 for about 30,000 Steelworkers employed by three major aluminum companies.

Under previous COL adjustments, hourly wages were increased a total of 62 cents for production workers at Aluminum Co. of America, Reynolds Metals Co. and Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical.

Meany Tells State Bodies:

Farmers Not Target Of Grain Embargo

Soviet Union, undertaken in the name of this thing called detente, is another billion-dollar ripoff of the American consumer that will bring little benefit to the average family farmer.

- "The only beneficiaries will be the gigantic grain dealers and the Soviet Union.
- "As by-product of this deal, the American merchant marine industry is also endangered."

For those reasons, Meany noted, the federation's Executive Council unanimously endorsed and supported the ILA boycott.

He pointed out that under the 1972 Russian grain agreement—negotiated with the cooperation of Agriculture Sec. Earl L. Butz—the USSR obtained American grain at bargain prices which U.S. taxpayers subsidized.

The resultant runaway increases in food and feed prices not only adversely affected housewives and workers, but also dairy and hog farmers and cattle raisers.

Many farmers were subsequently forced out of business or had to increase their prices to further compound the inflation problem, Meany observed.

"Today," he said, "history is repeating itself."

Meany noted that before the current Russian grain deal was announced, Butz had made statements that the huge U.S. harvest would cause prices to fall for farmers. Under those conditions, the USSR was able to order secretly more than 400 million bushels of grain at relatively low prices.

But after the Russian grain sales were confirmed, prices increased rapidly, Meany pointed out. He cited statistics showing price rises over a 45-day period of 28 percent for flour, 43 percent for both wheat and soybeans and 14 percent for corn.

"These price increases, now on their way to grocery shelves across America, occurred at the very time Mr. Butz was saying the sales to Russia would not have much effect on U.S. prices," Meany observed. "Obviously, Mr. Butz was not telling the truth."

Meany also noted that farmers who sold their crops before the Russian grain deal was disclosed were deprived of a better price for their products, "but the grain dealers handling the sales lined their pockets with profits."

Mail received by the AFL-CIO has been overwhelmingly in favor of the federation's stand in support of the ILA grain embargo.

Meany said that one Minnesota farm wife, who expressed her support of the action, asked: "Is it any wonder that the grain dealers drive Cadillacs while small farmers have to 'make do'?"

He pointed out that the AFL-CIO has supported programs to provide farmers with a reasonable price for their products, including recent legislation that President Ford vetoed on the claim that it was inflationary.

"Today, his Secretary of Agriculture says that the Russian grain deal is not inflationary, despite the fact that it has already raised consumer prices far more than the farm bill would have," Meany said.

The AFL-CIO supports the establishment of a national food policy that will serve the interests of consumers and farmers, as well as the world's need for food, he noted.

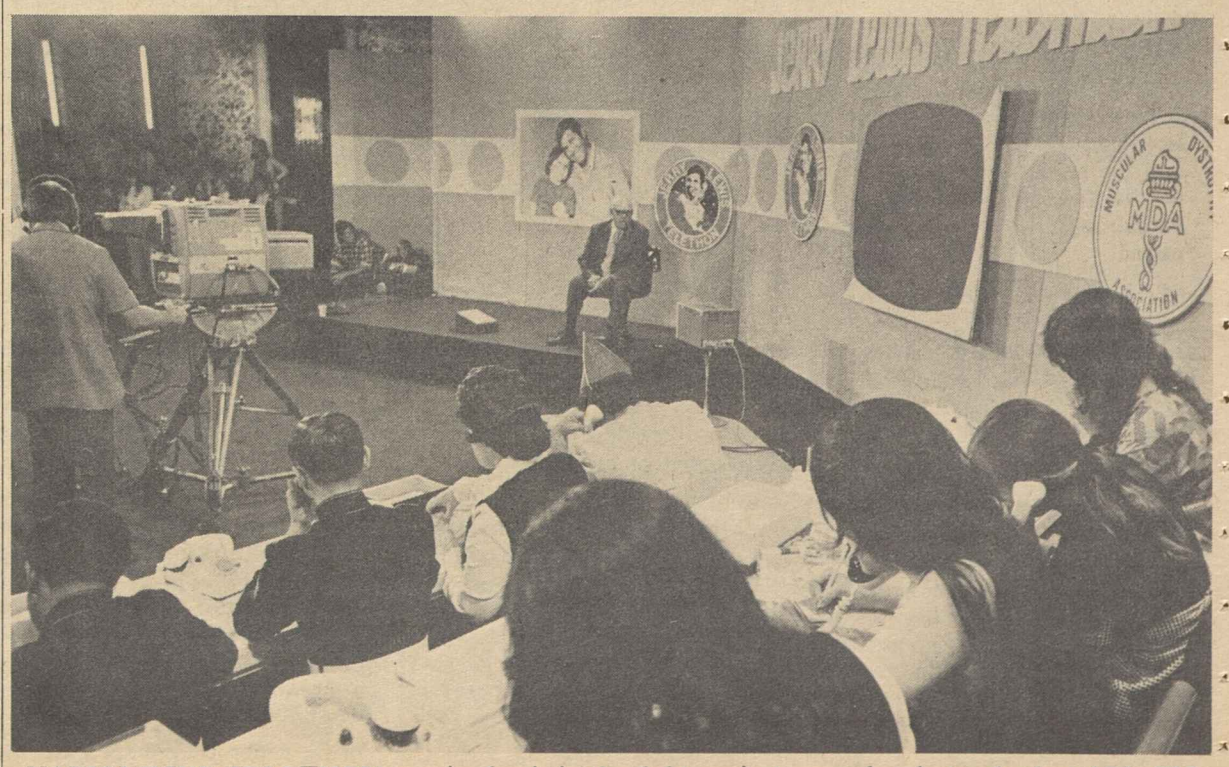
"We believe the family farmer needs protection against the onslaught of the giant conglomerates which seek to drive farmers from their lands and the marketplace. And we will continue to fight for more adequate legislation to bring the commodity speculators under truly effective government regulation."

Meany called for creation of a government agency to handle dealings with the Soviets on a government-to-government basis.

"Only government-to-government negotiations would insure that America's great agricultural resources would not be used for the private profit of grain dealers and speculators," he said.

Such a program would also assure that farmers are paid adequately for their work and consumers are not penalized, he said.

"In addition, the government would have a bargaining weapon that would force the Soviet Union to keep its promises—something it has never done."



NATIONWIDE TELETHON to raise funds in the fight against muscular dystrophy has AFL-CIO President George Meany conversing with host Jerry Lewis in split-screen hook-up. Several other labor leaders, whose unions played a major role in the fund drive, appeared on the telethon. The Fire Fighters raised more than $1 million in pledges and donations.

'Pawns' in Detente:

Seafarers Hit U.S. Policies As Aiding Soviet Ratecutting

By James M. Shevis

The Seafarers accused the Ford Administration of using the United States merchant marine and the men who crew its ships as pawns in its game of so-called detente with the Soviet Union.

By closing their eyes to widespread ratecutting by state-owned Soviet-controlled fleets in U.S. foreign commerce, White House and State Dept. officials are permitting the further deterioration of the already depressed U.S. maritime industry, SIU President Paul Hall charged at the union's 17th biennial convention in Washington.

"We have been watching with great concern the entry of state-owned fleets in the U.S. liner trades," Hall said in a report to delegates.

"These fleets, operated by the Soviet Union, Poland and other totalitarian states, are seriously undercutting U.S. liner companies through their advantage of total subsidy and state aid," Hall observed. He charged the Soviet Union and its satellites are using low-cost labor on their ships as "an extension of a global policy of dominating the seas."

Communist activity in American commerce has already put the Pacific trades in a turmoil, Hall noted, and the Soviet power bloc fleets are now moving into the U.S. Atlantic and Gulf foreign trade routes.

Calling for an American foreign policy that would force the state-owned carriers to maintain equitable freight rates or be expelled from U.S. trade, Hall declared:

"The interests of detente with the Soviet power bloc cannot be another rationale of our State Dept. to use the U.S. merchant marine as a pawn in our foreign policy."

AFL-CIO President George Meany, in an address to the delegates, joined Hall in urging a reassessment of American foreign policy—especially "this farcical policy known as 'detente' under which we give and our enemies take."

Meany said "the time has come, I believe, for a real assessment—a reassessment of what our foreign policy means, and what effect it has on the day-to-day aspects of American life."

To those critics of organized labor, such as Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.), who say the trade union movement should not "interfere" with the nation's foreign policy, Meany said he can't and won't buy that.

"The people of this country have a right to have their say about foreign affairs," Meany declared. "They have a right to say to the other countries of the world, and through their representatives, just why we want to protect the American people."

Speaking for the AFL-CIO, he stressed, "come what may we're going to continue to have our say, loudly and clearly, on American foreign policy."

Hall told convention delegates that the U.S. merchant fleet—and the American maritime workers—demand no special advantage, "but we do demand that we not be handicapped in world competition for cargo."

"If the U.S. fleet is to compete equally against state-subsidized and runaway-flag operations, then U.S. vessels must be assured that state-owned fleets do not undercut rates to the point where they drive our ships from the sea," he declared.

Hall said the union is mounting an all-out campaign in support of a bill introduced by Sen. Daniel Inouye (D-Ha.) to protect American shipping interests against predatory rate practices by non-national carriers.

He said the steady encroachment of state-owned fleets in U.S. waters, along with the perennial problem of runaway-flag ships, represent the greatest threat to the job security of thousands of workers in maritime and related industries.

Later in the convention, the 300 delegates from the union's 29 affiliated organizations in the U.S., Canada and the Caribbean approved a resolution urging the development of a new national maritime policy.

"In the face of a growing proliferation of cargo-preference laws throughout the world," Hall said, "the U.S. must develop a national cargo policy that will assure the U.S. fleet a substantial share of the carriage of our foreign commerce."

Hall said the policy could be achieved through cargo-preference requirements, bilateral shipping arrangements and other cargo-sharing procedures.

The union also took a strong position against State Dept. "apathy" over continued harassment of American fishing fleets by South American governments, and it urged Congress to break the hold of "Big Oil's" power over the economy.

The Seafarers urged the State Dept. and the White House to take the strongest possible action to release the crews of American vessels that are seized by other nations.

Hall said the union is determined that "the United States must establish a policy of swift retaliation to these seizures, much as it did in retaliating for the Mayaguez incident."

In his address to the convention, Meany ripped into the State Dept. and its secretary, Henry Kissinger, for making concessions to the USSR in the latest grain sales transaction.

"This latest Soviet wheat deal is part and parcel of this policy known as 'detente' which adds up, very simply, to conceding anything and everything to help the Soviet Union —no matter what it does to the American worker," Meany said.

"Under 'detente,' any concession that we can make to the Soviet Union, we should make. This is what the policy of detente is all about in its simplest form. In other words, it's a policy of appeasement."

Also addressing the four-day convention were Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop, Pottery Workers President Lester H. Null, Sr., Longshoremen's President Thomas W. Gleason, President Jesse L. Calhoon of the Marine Engineers, Federal Maritime Commissioner Helen Delich Bentley, President Hazel Brown of the union's Harry Lundeberg School of Seamanship in Piney Point, Md., and Robert Blackwell, Assistant Secretary of Commerce for maritime affairs.

Null told delegates the 17,000 members of the Pottery Workers look forward to fulfilling their announced intention to affiliate with the Seafarers later this year. The Potters at their convention in July approved constitutional changes paving the way for affiliation.

Null said a membership vote showed 99 percent favored the move. He said he expected the proposed merger would occur soon after the AFL-CIO's convention next month.

A NATIONAL MARITIME POLICY to assure cargo for American ships continues to be "a key goal of the U.S. merchant marine," Seafarers President Paul Hall told delegates to the union's biennial convention. Hall outlined a series of programs to stimulate the American shipping industry and protect the job security of SIU members.

Union Experience Aids Black Female Mediator

Cleveland—Julia L. Greer, former president of a Communications Workers' local and the daughter of a cleaning woman, has been assigned to Cleveland as the nation's first black female federal mediator.

Mrs. Greer, 35, the mother of three, will complete her internship year in January as a commissioner with the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Her mother, Mary Peterson, who died ten years ago, worked for many years cleaning an Auto Workers hall in Detroit.

"My mother always encouraged us to go out and do something rather than sit around and talk about it," Mrs. Greer said.

She is no stranger to the bargaining table or the ways of labor unions. She had been an active trade unionist since graduating from high school in Detroit and joining Michigan Bell Telephone Co. as a clerk. She continued her studies at Wayne State University and became a computer programmer.

For 15 years at Michigan Bell before joining the mediation service in January, she served as a union representative in CWA's 750-member Local 4010 in Detroit. She began as a steward, served five years as vice president and three years as president.

She said she raised her children in a union hall or in a stroller on a picket line. "I used to just hand them to one of the brothers or sisters at the meeting and go up and conduct the proceedings," she said.

Her husband, Donald, is a production worker with the Ford Motor Co. in Detroit, where the family makes its home. She said her husband, a UAW member, encouraged her to continue in her union and career activities.

Despite her role as a unionist, civil rights and women's rights fighter, she said her new job as an impartial mediator also fits into her religious and philosophical background. And, she observed, union and management officials have accepted her as another mediator.

JULIA L. GREER

The mediation service is considered the nation's smallest federal agency. There are only 280 mediators in the country and of those only a dozen are women, most of whom were recruited in the past year and one-half.

Mrs. Greer said FMCS Director W. J. Usery Jr. is responsible for beginning a program to bring women and minorities into the service.

Usery, a former Machinists' official, also named Richard Williams to the regional directorship in Chicago last year. He is the first black regional director in the service.

Mrs. Greer was nationally recognized in 1973 as the only trade unionist on the President's Advisory Committee on the Economic Status of Women.

Utah Convention Drafts Union Rights Legislation

Salt Lake City—A legislative program to strengthen the collective bargaining position of workers in private industry and the public sector will be a key goal of the Utah AFL-CIO in the next session of the state legislature.

The more than 200 delegates to the state federation's 19th annual convention called for the repeal of the Utah "right-to-work" law. In the 20 years that the law has been in force, the state labor organization noted that Utah's per capita income ranking among states has plunged from 26 to 42.

Nearly $1 billion in income is lost annually by Utah workers and the state's economy because of the restrictions on collective bargaining, the federation estimated.

Efforts to win collective bargaining rights for public employes will also be renewed in the state legislature. In the last session, a measure giving union rights to state and local government employes was passed by the House, but lost in the Senate by one vote.

A limited collective bargaining measure approved for fire fighters is now facing a court challenge initiated by local government officials.

Delegates re-elected the state federation's top officers. They are Frank C. Lay, president-secretary-treasurer, and E. W. Inskeep, vice president.

Nine of the 12 executive board members were also re-elected. Three new members elected to the board are L. M. Linde of the Government Employees, Delfina Pacheco of the Communications Workers and Eddie P. Mayne of the Steelworkers.

Sen. Lloyd Bentsen (D-Tex.) charged in his address to the convention that President Ford's long string of vetoes of anti-recession measures passed by Congress is detrimental to the nation's economy. He charged that Ford is engaging in "do-nothing Hoover tactics" that will not turn the nation's faltering economy around.

Other speakers at the three-day convention included Sen. Frank E. Moss and Rep. Allan T. Howe, both Utah Democrats; President A. F. Grospiron of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, President Wilbur Hobby of the North Carolina AFL-CIO and Regional AFL-CIO Director William Gilbert.

Airline Union Okays Frontier Wage Accord

Chicago—The Air Line Employees ratified a new agreement with Frontier Airlines providing salary boosts of nearly $4,000 a year for some 1,500 passenger service and office workers.

ALEA President Victor J. Herbert said the pact was approved by 95 percent of the members who voted on the agreement. The contract was hammered out on Aug. 1 in Denver with the help of a federal mediator after 10 months of bargaining.

ALEA is an affiliate of the Air Line Pilots. It is currently negotiating with Hughes Airwest and Airlift International. Besides Frontier, ALEA has already settled with Texas International, National, North Central and Northwest.

The Frontier agreement also provides improved sick leave and welfare insurance, a 10th paid holiday and a more liberalized vacation schedule.

Policies for Disaster

WE IN THE AMERICAN LABOR MOVEMENT won't accept the idea that our children have to live in a society crippled by massive unemployment, skyrocketing prices, deteriorating public services, municipal bankruptcies, rising crime—in short a collapse in the quality of life of the American people.

We believe that America can weather this storm—with the proper leadership and sound policies that put people above dollars. With such leadership and such policies, America survived the Great Depression of the 1930s.

But this Labor Day 1975, America's domestic economic problems cannot be solved in a vacuum. Those problems are tied in with a world of crisis of terrifying proportions.

There are some Americans—too many I am afraid—who would rather not pay attention to what's happening in the rest of the world. They want to return to the "good old days" of American isolationism. They want to stick their heads in the sand.

But that's just not possible any more. Drive into your local gas station—and you'll run smack into the crisis in the Middle East and Arab oil blackmail.

Walk into your grocery store—and your pocketbook will feel the consequences of the Soviet wheat deal in the name of detente.

So the American labor movement cannot afford to be isolationist. Our members can't afford it. America can't afford it. We all have too big a stake in foreign policy to leave it to the Secretary of State or any one man. We want to have a say, along with all other Americans, in our government's foreign policies.

And right now, we must say that we just don't understand the policies our government is pursuing.

We are told that the Cold War is over. It has been replaced by detente. The meaning of this detente was spelled out in an agreement signed by Nixon and Brezhnev in May of 1972. The essential ingredient was that the two superpowers, the United States and the Soviet Union, would cooperate in the interest of world peace. The relations between the two would be based on principles of mutuality and reciprocity.

Detente was supposed to be a two-way street. Neither side would try to take advantage of the other. In the era of detente, as defined and presided over by Henry Kissinger, we have witnessed an unmistakable shift in the world balance of power away from the United States and toward the Soviet Union.

It is time to ask of this policy called detente: what are its fruits? Where are its victories for peace? Where do we see that freedom is being extended in the world? Nowhere! Everywhere we see the dark shadows of communism spreading.

Trade unionism cannot survive in a Communist world. Trade unionism and totalitarianism are like oil and water—they don't mix. In a world ruled by commissars, the workers don't have a chance.

On this Labor Day 1975, the American labor union calls upon the nation's leaders to reassess, not only the disastrous economic policies which have brought misery to millions, but the equally disastrous foreign policies that would stop evil by appeasing it.

These are not two separate problems. They are two sides of the same problem. A strong America can only survive in a free world. And the freedom of the world depends on a strong America—an economically strong America, a spiritually strong America.

A Word Edgewise:

State Dept. Silences Dignify Communist Rhetoric Swindle

By John P. Roche

ONE OF THE PREREQUISITES for being a good Communist is a massive capacity for "chutzpah" (that wonderful Yiddish word that is defined as a youth who has murdered his parents asking for clemency from court because he is an orphan). A well trained apparatchik can look you blandly in the eye and tell you there is no crime under socialism because, by definition, crime is an outgrowth of a capitalist mentality. In this weird definitional universe, the use of insane asylums for dissenters is actually quite logical: only a nut could reject "the norms of socialist legality."

Thus when Angela Davis was being feted in the Soviet Union as a martyr to capitalist oppression, she was asked to protest the arrest of Czechoslovak dissenters. Utterly unfazed, she replied that they were not victims of capitalist oppression, but obvious anti-social types.

On the broader scene, Moscow has for years been demanding that everybody endorse the principle of non-intervention in the internal affairs of other states. This has a certain hilarious quality about it, until you realize it is no joke. The Brezhnev Doctrine, by definition, is not intervention in the internal affairs of other "socialist" states; it is merely fraternal assistance to the righteous elements confronted by hooligans, fascist wreckers and paid agents of imperialism.

It was wholly in character that the Soviet media accused the West of violating the Helsinki agreement by giving aid and comfort to the democratic majority in Portugal. By this definition (and other similar semantic tricks which convert freedom of information into legalized censorship), what is theirs is theirs, and what is not theirs is up for grabs.

Our characteristic response to this sort of rhetoric swindle is to play dead. Instead of turning their own weapons on the "potential adversary" (as a "senior official traveling with Secretary Kissinger" would phrase it), we respond with the solemnity of a Catholic funeral director presiding over the interment of a cardinal-archbishop. And by taking this nonsense seriously, we dignify it.

This is not only true at the governmental level: many years ago the Soviet delegates in every international scholarly organization orchestrated a demand for the various bodies to condemn American treatment of political prisoners. It was an agit-prop caper, pure and simple.

The leaders of the American Political Science Association asked my advice, and I suggested that at the next session of the International Political Science Association we introduce a resolution calling for the scrutiny of prison conditions for politicals in both the United States and the Soviet Union. However, the investigators from the U.S. must be drawn from the many political scientists (like myself) who publicly condemned the Smith Act convictions of the Communists; and, on the Soviet side, from professors who had similarly denounced the Moscow purges—a non-existent category.

This, in my perhaps immodest view, would really pass our Soviet colleagues the hot penny. But the powers that be in the APSA wrote it off as characteristic Roche frivolity and prepared a detailed reply to the preposterous gambit.

WHAT BRINGS THIS TO MIND is that for six months I have been rankling over Hanoi's suggestion that the Vietnamese Communists would be willing to resume normal relations with us if we were prepared to live up to the Paris "peace" agreement, particularly with regard to economic aid for Vietnamese rehabilitation. My six initial responses have no place in a family newspaper, and, unless my memory is distorted the State Dept. took a dive, sounding rather like a flatulent whale.

Now, at last I have found an adequate response, passed by the liberal American Veterans Committee (to which I belong) at its annual convention last June. The AVC agreed that normalization of relations would be desirable; then turned the sword around:

"We suggest," it voted, "that this . . . can be expedited by both sides living up to the Paris Peace Accords. In particular we call upon the Communist authorities . . . to live up to their signature to agreements . . . establishing democratic rights and liberties, holding free elections, and the creation of appropriate bodies to insure the rights of all citizens of Vietnam to participate in the political process. (As well as fulfilling the Paris agreement on) Americans missing in action. Genuine (Communist) efforts to show good faith rather than publicize propaganda will find an appropriate American response." Nicely done, AVC, nicely done. Send a copy to the State Dept.

New Book Can Help:

Fair, Reasonable Discussion Needed on Police Strike Issue

By Msgr. George G. Higgins

THE RECENT SAN FRANCISCO police strike was only the third or fourth such strike of any consequence in the history of the United States. The 1919 Boston strike was the first and most significant, but we had to wait until 1975 for an objective study of its causes and far-reaching social and political consequences — a fascinating book by historian Francis Russell, "A City in Terror: The Boston Police Strike" (Viking Press, New York, $10).

Russell's timing—though purely coincidental, I assume—was almost perfect. If his book had been published in the 1950s or 1960s or even as recently as two or three years ago, it would have been of interest to his fellow-historians but probably not to the general public. Coming as it did, however, in the immediate wake of the 1974 Baltimore police strike and on the eve of the recent San Francisco strike, it is required reading not merely for specialists in labor history but for the rest of us as well and, more specifically, for politicians, editorial writers, columnists, and other pundits who may feel obliged to comment publicly on the issues involved in what promises, for weal or woe, to be a continuing rash of strikes affecting public health and safety.

I get the impression, however, that many of those who are currently speaking to these issues in the light of the recent San Francisco strike have yet to read Russell's detailed study of the Boston strike or, in any event, have yet to grasp the moral of that disastrous episode in American labor history. In other words, many of those who have commented publicly on the San Francisco strike seem to be concerned exclusively with ways and means of crushing police strikes when they unfortunately occur and would appear to have little or no interest in their underlying causes.

They remember that, in the case of the Boston strike, the then Governor of Massachusetts, Calvin Coolidge, catapulted himself into the White House by holding to the absolute position that "there is no right to strike against the public safety by anybody, anywhere, anytime." They applaud the laconic Coolidge for having mercilessly broken the Boston strike by permanently firing all those who took part in it, but, with few exceptions, they completely ignore the strikers' side of the story.

Russell, by contrast, tells that side of the story very objectively and with great sympathy for the men involved in the strike. In the words of one reviewer, Russell "emphasizes the true character of the strike—an attempt by ordinary working men, working on the basis of non-ideological assumptions of human decency, to combat highly ideological conservatives who had no sense of decency but did understand the fears of many Americans."

This is not to suggest that Russell's book is a defense of the Boston strike as such or a theoretical argument in favor of the right of policemen in general to employ the weapon of the strike even as a last resort. To the contrary, insofar as I can tell from reading his objective study, Russell is probably of the opinion that policemen should forego the right to strike. I agree with him—up to a point. But to say that policemen, as a general rule, should voluntarily forego the right to strike and at the same time to ignore their side of the story (as Gov. Coolidge and the Boston Establishment did in 1919) would be to miss the point of Russell's timely book.

The point is that some way must be found to balance the public's right to uninterrupted police protection with the corresponding rights of the police themselves. Concentrating exclusively on the former to the neglect of the latter might have worked for Coolidge and the Boston Establishment in 1919, but it would almost certainly be counterproductive in the '70s.

As indicated above, many of those who have taken a public stand against the recent San Francisco strike have yet to learn this lesson. William Safire, a columnist for the New York Times and a former ghost writer for President Nixon, is a case in point. His column, "When Cops Become Robbers," in a recent issue of the Times awkwardly tries to out-Coolidge Gov. Coolidge himself. "An entire (San Francisco)," he says, "was kidnapped and held for ransom. . . . Whenever policemen put their guns to a city's head, they create a police state. If a policeman has a right to strike, then a fireman has a right to ignore an alarm, a surgeon has a right to walk away from an operating table, and a soldier has a right to desert under fire. These are all acts against the public safety. Dereliction of duty is a crime, and not a prelude to collective bargaining."

THAT'S A PATENTLY FALLACIOUS line of argument. Safire knows perfectly well that, within recent weeks, thousands of medical doctors in San Francisco itself and in many other cities have, in effect, gone on strike because they could not get satisfactory insurance coverage to protect themselves against malpractice suits. Whether they should have gone on strike for this reason is another matter. The fact is, however, that they did so (without a word of criticism from Mr. Safire) because they felt they had no other means of protecting their legitimate economic interests.

Well, policemen also have legitimate economic interests and, one would hope that, as a general rule, they might be able to defend these interests without going on strike. They are certainly entitled to as much public understanding and public sympathy as are doctors, for example, when they decide, in the end, that they have no recourse but to withhold their services temporarily.

Ford Policies Stall Recovery:

Depressed Housing Industry Lags Far Behind U.S. Goals

DESPITE CLAIMS of the Ford Administration that the recession has been curbed, there are few if any signs of significant improvement in the depression-hit housing industry before year's end, AFL-CIO Urban Affairs Director Henry B. Schechter said on Labor News Conference.

Renewal of an upward trend of mortgage interest rates and price tags on both new and existing homes that are beyond the reach of most American families will combine to keep demand weak for some time, Schechter said. He predicted that housing starts for all of 1975 won't top 1.1 million, less than half the number to keep pace with the nation's housing needs, and far short of the vigorous pace that would lead an economic recovery.

Schechter said that the five-point housing program spelled out last month by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, if adopted, would boost the number of housing starts in the next six months by some 300,000 units.

Schechter said that although there is a "good-sized backlog of completed or nearly completed housing," nearly all of it is at the "high end of the home-price distribution." He said that even the 25 percent of American families with incomes high enough to buy homes in a market where the median price is $40,000 are already well-housed. He also pointed out that those higher income families are also "quite sensitive to the fact that there are cycles in interest rates," and would defer home purchases at a time when mortgage interest rates are 9 percent and higher.

Schechter scored the Administration's refusal to relax its high interest rate, tight money supply policies, which have now been "pursued for a longer period and in a more determined manner than ever before." He charged that it is a "deliberate policy to keep the economy from recovering quickly," and that housing cannot move forward until that policy is relaxed.

Reporters questioning Schechter on Labor News Conference were Ash Gerecht of the Housing Affairs Letter and Paul Steiger of the Los Angeles Times. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE PRIMARY THRUST of the 1974 federal campaign spending law was to meet the public outcry against the corruption of the electoral system through money legally and illegally contributed and spent.

Now there is a many-sided onslaught on the law charging that it violates the Constitution, particularly the First Amendment's guarantees for fundamental freedoms.

This charge, by the strange combination of Sen. James L. Buckley (R-N.Y.) and former Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy (D-Minn.), was rejected in a 6-2 opinion by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. Buckley and McCarthy have filed an appeal to the Supreme Court so the issue remains.

The basic argument of Buckley and McCarthy is that the law's new limits on campaign contributions and expenditures curbed the freedom of contributors and candidates to express themselves in the political marketplace and that public financing discriminated against minor parties and lesser-known candidates.

In its majority decision, the court declared:

"The corrosive influence of money blights our democratic processes. . . . The excesses revealed by this record—the campaign funding, the quid pro quo for contributions—support the legislative judgment that the situation not only must not be allowed to deteriorate further but that the present situation cannot be tolerated by a government that professes to be a democracy.

"The legislative branch, with the concurrence of the executive, has decided in this legislation that the time for corrective, effective action is now. . . . These latest efforts on the part of our government to cleanse its democratic processes should at least be given a chance to prove themselves. Certainly they should not be rejected because they might have some incidental, not clearly defined, effect on the First Amendment freedoms."

The campaign law has three basic approaches:

- It requires the strict disclosure of sources and uses of campaign money to be policed by an independent six-member Federal Election Commission, which has the power to issue regulations and render advisory opinions on the meaning of the law.
- It sets strict limits on individual and organizational contributions to campaigns and on spending for House, Senate and presidential races.
- It establishes the first public financing of presidential election campaigns. The money will come from the presidential campaign fund created in 1971 to finance presidential elections through a voluntary income tax checkoff.

EVEN ITS MOST ARDENT supporters would not contend that the law is the ultimate answer. Free elections and untrammeled suffrage in the most immaculate setting may never be achieved but a healthy move in this direction has been taken.

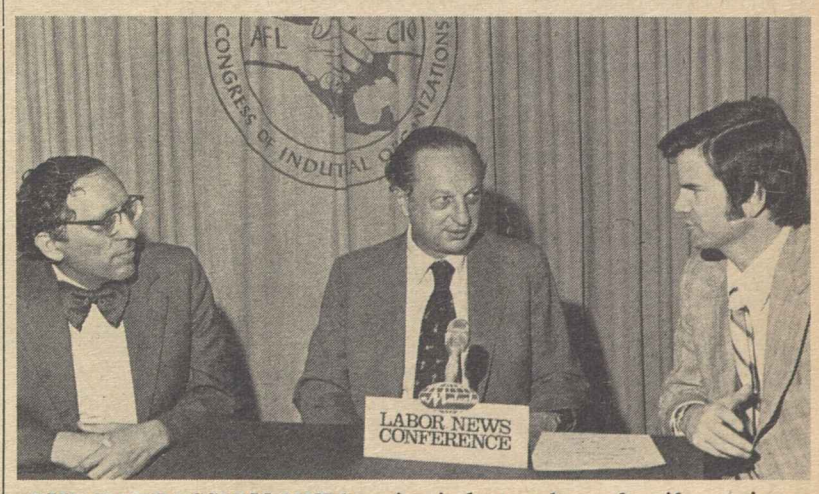
Still, there is great unhappiness in some quarters. For example, many believe that the law gives the incumbent an advantage and that minor parties receive minimal assistance. Others want to extend the public financing features of the law to other federal offices and there has been a major push in Congress for this.

Possibly the most controversial development is the effort of the corporate community, led by the Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers, in the area of corporate political funding.

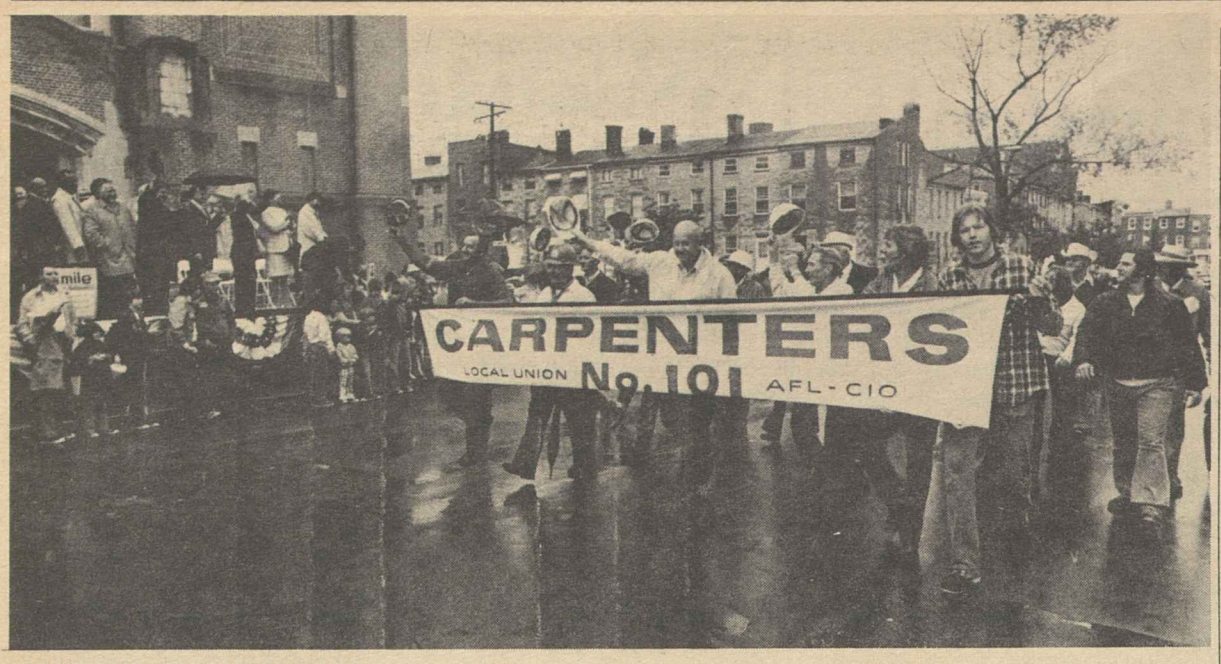
The Federal Election Commission is now reviewing a "good government" gimmick of the Sun Oil Corp., U.S. Steel and other firms. This would provide that employes could give to a corporate political fund and the money would be given to candidates selected by the companies.

How easy it would be for a corporation to increase the pay of its executives by $25,000 who would then turn the increase over to the fund.

This plan "is probably the breakthrough that most companies have been waiting for," Buck Byers, fund raiser of the Republican National Committee, has been quoted as saying. "Quite certainly, a great many corporations will establish this type of fund soon."



THE DEPRESSION-HIT housing industry shows few if any signs of significant improvement, even though the Administration claims the recession has been curbed, AFL-CIO Urban Affairs Director Henry Schechter, center, charged on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Ash Gerecht of the Housing Affairs Letter, left, and Paul Steiger of the Los Angeles Times.



MARCHING CARPENTERS in Baltimore's Labor Day parade let out a rain-drenched cheer and a salute as they pass the reviewing stand. Hundreds of Maryland trade unionists participated in the parade and a union label show that followed.

Flight Attendants Strike Over Bargaining Stall

Government mediators attempted to iron out differences in a contract dispute between National Airlines and some 1,200 members of the Flight Attendants which erupted in a Labor Day walkout.

The strike, which effectively grounded all the carrier's flight's, followed 10 hours of last-minute negotiations. The AFA, an affiliate of the Air Line Pilots, charged the company with irresponsibility in the negotiations.

While talks have been in progress since November 1973, the union observed, National did not present a single proposal on wages until 10 days ago—21 months after negotiations began and five days prior to the Sept. 1 strike deadline set under the Railway Labor Act, which governs bargaining in the airline industry.

The union said National's response to the union's wage proposals was met with a refusal to bargain further.

"Rather than continue meaningful bargaining efforts, the company has refused to present any counterproposals," the union said. "Such irresponsibility at this late date illustrates the company's lack of desire to reach an agreement."

The strike followed a 30-day cooling-off period called for by the National Mediation Board. The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service also was involved in the negotiations.

Wages, pension benefits and working conditions kept the two sides apart. The union said it stands ready to engage in "the type of meaningful, intensive negotiations which are now needed to reach agreement" and end the strike.

The walkout is the second major strike against National in less than 10 months. The Machinists struck the firm for three and one-half months over a wage dispute last year.

Army Sets Up Apprentice Training Plan

A new apprenticeship program is in operation at Fort Belvoir, Va., to provide soldiers with credits for civilian skilled trades as Operating Engineers.

The program was set up under an agreement between the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training and the Defense Dept. with the cooperation of the IUOE and contractor organizations.

Soldiers at the U.S. Army Engineer School at Fort Belvoir working as heavy equipment operators and repairmen are able to volunteer for the creditation program.

To complete their apprenticeship, they will take 6,000 hours or up to four years of on-the-job training and 432 hours of correspondence courses. If they leave the Army before completion of the program, they will get credit for the work and experience completed.

After courses are completed, the Labor Dept. will issue a certificate that will be recognized by the IUOE, the Associated General Contractors of America and the National Constructors Association.

Reese Hammond, IUOE research director, noted that the Operating Engineers have been working with the Defense Dept. on apprenticeship programs since the early 1960s. The department formally adopted the IUOE apprenticeship standards a year ago, he said.

The overall agreement signed by the Labor and Defense departments in July gives Army commanders authority to establish apprenticeship programs in a number of skilled occupations.

Prior to the agreement, it had been difficult for ex-soldiers to show proof of their service training and experience to civilian employers and joint apprenticeship committees.

other low-income families can afford to buy them.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller, in a letter to all members of the Senate urging support for the 1975 Mortgage Disclosure Act, observed:

"The presumption of lenders that property values in such neighborhoods will decline then becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy, because homes generally cannot be sold without mortgage credit availability.

"Neighborhood deterioration and abandonment of sound homes follow, to the detriment of the area and the country, as well as the individuals who are deprived of the opportunity to obtain housing."

Under the Proxmire-Stevenson bill, lending institutions would have to make available for public inspection compilations of annual mortgage lending volume in census tracts within the metropolitan area and in counties outside the area.

Savings depositors could then influence lending policies to prevent the denial of credit for home purchases in their neighborhoods.

Biemiller noted that because of the housing shortage, "the ability to purchase existing homes is critical." The proposed bill would help to "increase the supply of necessary mortgage credit for older neighborhoods and to eliminate a practical obstacle to equal opportunity in housing," Biemiller said.

CONSUMER BOYCOTT leaflets urging tennis buffs to avoid buying sporting goods manufactured by the AMF-Head Division are distributed at the U.S. Open Tennis Championships at Forest Hills, N.Y., by Clothing Workers. The ACWA has been striking the Head skis and tennis racket plant at Boulder, Colo., since May. The boycott has the support of the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

Momentum Broken:

Federal Cuts Threat To Education Gains

The quality of American education, from a child's development to an adult's continuing education, markedly increased in the 1960s, thanks in large part to valuable affirmative action programs and adequate federal funding of U.S. public schools.

But since the start of the 1970s, reports Sandra Feldman, a vice president of the American Federation of Teachers, the government has changed gears — in education and in economic policies—with the result that much of the progress of the 1960s has been reversed.

Feldman, who is New York State's representative on the Education Commission of the States, notes in the AFL-CIO magazine, the Federationist, that the federal government's commitment to public education has dropped off ominously in the past six years.

"The Nixon-Ford policies are directly responsible for the beginning of a dangerous decline in the education system after the successes of the Great Society," she charges in the magazine's August issue.

The current atmosphere of recession, federal cutbacks and high unemployment "threatens to set the schools back many years, and even decades," the author declares.

Spurred by enactment of the 1965 federal Elementary & Secondary Education Act, state and local governments greatly increased their expenditures for public education in the '60s. The overall effect was a series of dramatic gains for young people in the nation's public schools, Feldman observes.

Perhaps the most startling gains were made by minority group youth. In 1950, the median number of years of school completed by American blacks between the ages of 25 and 29 was just 8.6, or 3.5 years fewer than for white Americans in the same age group.

By 1970, Feldman notes, the median black achievement was 12.2 years of schooling, only four-tenths of 1 percent below the white average. Reading levels generally improved in the 1960s also, and dropout rates fell toward the end of the decade.

A March 1975 study by the Health, Education & Welfare Dept., however, revealed a puzzling downturn in the quality of public school education. Reading scores now are falling. Feldman traces much of the discouraging drop in education gains to "profit-motivated" programs inspired in the Nixon-Ford years.

These programs, including performance contracts, vouchers and cost-effectiveness "accountability," began to replace the solid educational programs that had produced gains in the 1960s.

Exorbitant interest rates fostered by Republican policy-makers and the Federal Reserve Board had a drastic impact on the operating funds of local school districts.

The rates caused a depression in the housing industry and mass unemployment. As a result, there was a sharp reduction in the school districts' tax base which provides money for the classroom.

Inflation drove school costs up, and the taxpayer—looking at a thinner wallet—was reluctant to spend for education. The property tax is now nearly exhausted as a source of revenue for public education. And state governments are loathe to pick up the burden.

But, Feldman notes, "federal performance has been the most miserly." Ford's proposed budget for his first year in office allocated less than 2 percent for support of the nation's public schools.

The result of all this, the author observes, is that the 45 million U.S. public school children—in urban systems as well as suburban and rural—will be jammed into overcrowded classes this fall and into still more crowded classrooms in 1977.

Another result, however, is the growing realization that the quality of public schools depends on the health of the national economy and that education cannot be considered separately from workers' overall needs.

"Teachers show a growing awareness that the livelihood and careers of teachers and the viability of the public school depend on the well-being of other workers," Feldman notes. This is manifested in the quickening pace of unionization among teachers.

A decade ago barely 100,000 teachers belonged to the AFT. They constituted about 5 percent of the nation's teaching force.

"Today the figure is climbing toward 500,000—or one in every four U.S. public school teachers," Feldman points out. "And even the independent National Education Association, long opposed to collective bargaining, is being forced to act like a union."

At the same time, the movement toward teacher unity is gaining momentum and with as many as 200,000 teachers facing layoffs over the coming year, the two big teacher organizations are realizing that "it is a waste of time for the AFT and the NEA to fight each other in jurisdictional contests."

As teachers move closer and closer to a clear and full recognition of the identity of their interests with those of other workers, Feldman concludes, "they see expanding opportunities for public education to make an even greater contribution to American society than it has in the past."

Meany Cites Need for New Priorities

Following are excerpts from an interview with AFL-CIO President George Meany conducted on Aug. 28. Reporters questioning Meany were Bob Dobkin, Associated Press; Sara Fritz, United Press International; Jim Hyatt, Wall Street Journal; Dale McFeatters, Scripps-Howard; Damon Stetson, New York Times; Fred Fraley, U.S. News & World Report; Jim Strong, Chicago Tribune, and Bob Kaiser, Washington Post. Also present was AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland; Thomas Donahue, executive assistant to Meany; and Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller.

Q: Here we are with another Labor Day coming up. How does the labor movement look to you now?

MEANY: It looks very much alive. We have a lot of problems—the problems of unemployment and inflation, the same as everybody else. But I think the labor movement is in good shape. I think that we're going to be just as active as we've always been. And I'm quite sure we're going to be politically active in the coming months to see if we can't change the general picture through a change in the political picture next November. So, all in all, I think the American labor movement is in good shape.

Q: What kind of change in the political picture do you contemplate next November?

MEANY: I'd like to see a liberal Democrat in the White House.

Q: Any particular liberal Democrat?

MEANY: No, no, no. I don't have any particular candidate. I'd like to see a change in the Executive Branch.

Q: What is your assessment of the state of the Democratic Party at this point? You used the word disarray a year ago.

MEANY: I think that it's still pretty much in disarray, but I do think there is a chance that this would straighten out because, after all, they're looking for a winner, and the lessons of 1972 can't possibly be lost on them. There is one thing politicians want and political parties want—they want to win. And if they want to win, I'm sure that they must realize that they can't go out of a convention in 1976 as a divided party.

Q: What role do you see for labor for 1976?

MEANY: Role for the AFL-CIO? None whatsoever. I mean, when you say "labor," you mean the AFL-CIO. There's no role at all. There is a role for a good many labor people who happen to be Democrats. And the role that they will play will be as Democrats first and members of trade unions second. And, naturally, if there is a large contingent of trade union members—members of the AFL-CIO—at the Democratic National Convention we will certainly try to have some influence on it.

Q: You don't have a problem with an individual—a labor union person—who is a Democrat on his own running as a delegate out there?

MEANY: None whatsoever. None whatsoever. In fact, the way I feel about it, the more trade unionists who make the race for delegates to the convention—the more they do that—the better I like that, as far as I'm concerned. But that doesn't mean that we're going to try and run the Democratic Party or let them run us.

Q: How would you label this current Congress?

MEANY: Well, I'd like to see more positive leadership there. I think they are playing games with the President, or playing games in opposition to the President. And I don't think they are doing very well, I'd like to see them fight the President on this question of putting a ceiling on the budget. Instead of fighting, they seem to be going along with him, and I just don't agree with that policy.

I think what we need in this country is jobs. And I think what we need is government expenditure to create jobs. I can't see any way we are going to get out of this present dilemma without that.

Now, the President puts a ceiling on his budget and Congress doesn't accept the same ceiling, but they go along with the idea of a ceiling of a few billion dollars over that, and that is very disappointing.

Q: Tell us your reading of this President. What kind of a guy is he?

MEANY: He's a nice guy. He's a likeable guy. A very, very straight, truthful guy. There's nothing tricky about him. And, on a personal basis, it's pretty hard to come to dislike him.

Q: How do you think he sees this country and where it's going?

MEANY: I don't think he sees it too well. I think that he's had 25 years as a conservative congressman from a conservative district. I don't think he paid too much attention to what was happening to the country during those years. I think he followed a conservative line. He followed his own party line and so forth. And I think he came to the presidency without the proper experience. I don't think his legislative experience meant a great deal over those years.

Q: What about his priorities on this economic crisis of the last year and a half?

MEANY: His priorities all point to big business. They all point to helping big business. He espouses the old "trickle-down" theory. He does it all the time. He did it the other day when he said that the thing to help employment is to cut taxes for big business, give them incentives. Now, that theory has been outmoded, as far as I'm concerned, for 40 years.

Q: What was he like in this meeting on the grain boycott?

MEANY: No problem talking to him. Very affable. We didn't meet on the grain boycott, you know. We met on the whole question of selling wheat to the Soviet Union and what it might do to the American consumers.

Q: Do you see any way of resolving this impasse, any compromise?

MEANY: The question of what to do about the wheat sales and what they are doing to the American consumers is a problem for the President of the United States. I have no proposals to make, except to him. To say: "Mr. President, you should do something about this. We got ripped of in 1972, we are about to get ripped off again, and you should see that we don't get ripped off."

Oh, I've got some ideas. Maybe we ought to do what the Canadians do. I can tell you basically what we should do. We should tell the Soviet Union, you cannot deal with private American citizens until we in the United States of America, as a government, are allowed to deal with private Soviet citizens. Even up. You know, give and take. That's what we should say to them. What right have they got to come in and deal with Cargill and these greedy, profit-hungry grain operators, to deal with them and play with our market, and get our food resources at a cheap price and then cause the American housewife to pay?

Q: Are you going to take the issue to Congress? Do you think the ultimate solution to this grain impasse is there?

MEANY: I think the issue is going to get to Congress. I don't know if we are going to take it in the form of legislation, but I'm sure that Congress is getting the same kind of mail we are getting. And I'm sure that a protest will come in there and the question is: Are we going to allow the Soviet Union to manipulate our grain market to the detriment of the American consumer? Why should we? They use their Arab friends and they use oil as a weapon against us. Well, we've got the food. All of these countries—every country in the world that has a wheat shortage—have got to come to us. We are the only supplier. We supply all the surplus needs of every country in the world, and why should we let the Soviet Union manipulate our grain market to our detriment?

Q: The recent events in New York and San Francisco suggest that the American labor movement may be moving into a new role in American life. The public employes are going to become the most visible members and your most controversial members. How do you feel about that and what do you see in the future in this field?

MEANY: Well, I don't know what you mean by the most visible and controversial members. The public employes sector is responding to organization, something they did not do many years ago. Now they are responding—cops, firefighters, everybody wants to join a union. Even the old NEA—the old, anti-union, teachers group, the National Education Association, they are starting to act and sound like a union. And, as far as I'm concerned, the more that we get in the unions, fine. I think public employes should be organized into unions. I have always felt that way.

Q: Do you think they have special responsibilities in terms of being public employes and refraining from strike action or . . . ?

MEANY: I don't think they have special responsibilities in the sense that they should not have the right to strike. If the experience over the years had indicated that they were special, then they had to be treated special. In other words, if you are going to say to a public employe, "You can't strike. Your neighbor, he's a bricklayer; he can strike. He works for a contractor. But you can't strike because you are working for the general public." Then you've got to give him something in return. You've got to give him, to show him, he can get a decent wage without striking. You've got to guarantee a decent grievance procedure, because he isn't going to have a union to take care of him. Now, if you can take care of all of these things without a union, then there's no reason to join a union.

But that was not the experience. The experience was that these people got kicked around. They were told, "Well, you can't strike because you are working for the general public and, because you can't strike, you can't get a wage increase. You can't have anything to say about your working conditions on the job. They started to give them an arbitration procedure years ago—this was the first gimmick. What the hell! The arbitration procedure was handled by the employer. In other words, guys who were the arbitrators were their bosses and, of course, that didn't work. So the net result was that they have turned to unions.

And as far as striking is concerned—that's really an academic question. If you hurt them enough, if you kick them around enough, I don't care who they are, they will strike.

Q: You touched briefly earlier on the economy. You said Mr. Ford is pro-business, but just what kind of state or direction is the economy headed right now? We just had a large increase in the CPI indicating possible return to high inflation rates.

MEANY: And the Wholesale Price Index went up and that has not been felt in the CPI yet. It will not be felt for maybe another six weeks or another 2 months. I think we're still going to have high levels of inflation, and we're certainly going to have high levels of unemployment. I don't think there can be any definition of the word "recovery" that doesn't include the question of unemployment and also inflation. Of course, maybe business profits are up, but that doesn't seem to be helping unemployment and certainly the inflation rate.

Q: I've got another philosophical question. Is labor becoming a force for protectionism in the American economy?

MEANY: The labor movement in this country, in all my time up till five or six years ago, was completely free trade. We were for free trade from the time of the Hull reciprocal trade pact. We felt we could compete and we did compete with foreign competitors, with foreign industries and foreign labor. But the world of trade today is not the world of trade of 1936. The world of trade is completely changed. We are not facing competition from French manufacturers, or German manufacturers, or Italian or Japanese manufacturers. We are facing competition from American manufacturers who are operating in those countries.

And they are operating with all sorts of tax advantages and tax gimmicks. So, as a result, we have certainly made a definite turn from our free trade position. To say we are outright protectionists—I wouldn't say that. But when you take the clothing industry and the appliance industry and the way they are losing jobs at the rate that they are losing them, it's only natural that we are going to look to our government for protection. You can't buy a radio in this country that's made in this country. You can't buy a black and white TV that's made in this country.

Q: How do you feel about the trade act payments for the unions whose members are suffering?

MEANY: I don't think that's the answer really. I think that's a panacea.

Nationwide Celebration:

U.S. Workers Open Bicentennial Year

Meany, however, continued the tradition of reviewing the immediate problems affecting the nation's workers as he explored the impact of the recession, unemployment, inflation and the Russian grain deal.

He had discussed these major areas of concern in detail in an interview conducted by several newspaper, magazine and wire service reporters before the Labor Day weekend. (Excerpts, Page 7).

Also exploring the nation's economic problems on NBC's Meet the Press program were five union leaders who strongly criticized the Ford Administration's policies as failing to effectively curb the recession.

To help revive the faltering economy, they called for a number of remedies proposed by the AFL-CIO in its jobs program, including the creation of public works projects, for the jobless, a permanent income tax reduction and subsidies for home mortgages.

Appearing on the program were Presidents I. W. Abel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., Robert A. Georgine of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employees and Leonard Woodcock of the Auto Workers, plus John Ryor, president-designate of the National Education Association.

Typical of the numerous Labor Day observances across the country was a union label show at the Baltimore Civic Center which was followed by a variety program featuring several headline performers. A rain-drenched parade of union members preceded the afternoon and evening events in Baltimore.

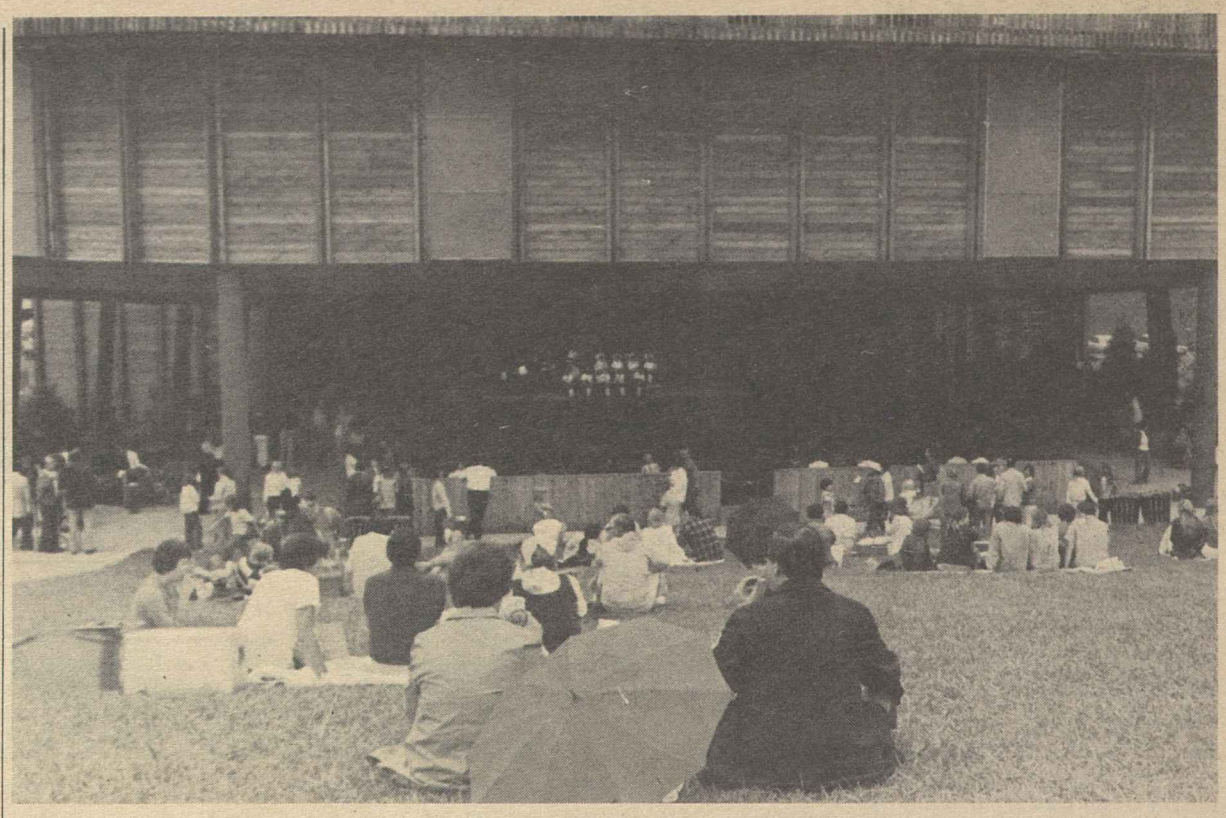
In many states labor organizations participated in state fair exhibitions highlighting the Working Americans Bicentennial Project.

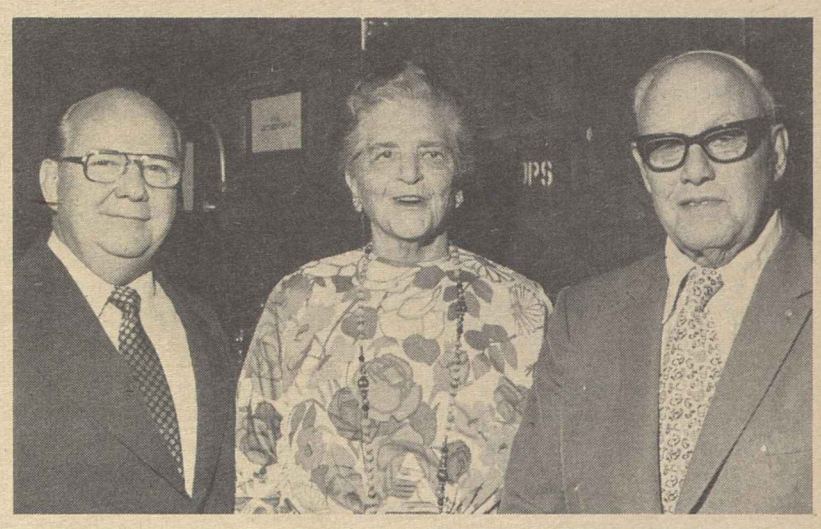
Kentucky union members, working with community groups, staged a three-day festival at Louisville's Riverfront Plaza. Demonstrations of union craft skills and musical concerts highlighted the event.

The Maine AFL-CIO sponsored what was billed as the largest public barbecue in the state's history and field day events to raise funds for a children's hospital.

Numerous musical concerts in the Labor Day observances were sponsored by the Musicians' Music Performance Trust Funds and local AFM groups.

The six-hour program launching the national labor bicentennial at Wolf Trap featured several well-known performers, including Theodore Bikel, president of Actors' Equity, folksinger Odetta, John Raitt and Oscar Brand, in addition to amateur groups such as the Folklore Society of Greater Washington.





ON-AND-OFF SHOWERS cause a bit of a problem for picnickers at the Labor Day observance at Wolf Trap Farm Park in Vienna, Va. The musical salute was sponsored by the Musicians' Music Performance Trust Funds with the cooperation of the AFL-CIO and the National Park Service. Joining in the observance, at right, are Sec.-Treas. J. Martin Emerson of the Musicians, Mrs. Jouett Shouse, donor and chairman of the Wolf Trap executive committee, and Federation President George Meany.

Rail Shopcraft Strike Blocked For 60 Days

A scheduled Sept. 4 strike by the four shopcraft unions that make up the AFL-CIO Railway Employes' Dept. was blocked by the appointment by President Ford of a special factfinding panel to study the dispute.

The move puts off any strike for at least 60 days. Ford, who took the step under the provisions of the Railway Labor Act, named Prof. Charles M. Rehmus of the University of Michigan's Institute of Labor & Industrial Relations as chairman of the three-member panel.

Under the Railway Labor Act, the emergency board must make its recommendations within 30 days. The disputants then have another 30-day, no-strike period to consider the proposals.

The four unions, which have been without a contract since their old one expired last Dec. 31, are the Boilermakers-Blacksmiths, Firemen & Oilers, Carmen and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Veto Override Pushed On Oil Price Controls

"It is absolutely essential that the Congress protect the American people from a further escalation of inflation," Meany declared.

"The President and his spokesmen talk a good line against inflation, but the plain facts are that his energy policy and the Russian grain deal are the two principal reasons for a renewal of double-digit inflation," Meany charged.

"An increase in oil prices would increase the cost of everything. The only beneficiaries of an end to oil price controls would be the giant multinational oil companies whose profits are already a national scandal and who seek a total monopoly of the energy industry."

Old oil accounts for about 60 percent of domestic production and about 40 percent of all oil consumed in the United States. Under controls its average price has been $5.25 a barrel. The six-month extension would hold prices at that ceiling until Mar. 1, 1976.

Oil from wells put into production since 1972 is not controlled and currently sells at $13 a barrel.

Ford wants to lift controls on oil in stages over 39 months, arguing that decontrol is necessary to cut consumption and to encourage oil firms to seek new energy sources.

Jackson has described this gradual elimination of oil price controls as "inflation on the installment plan."

Meany noted in his letter to Jackson that an increase in oil prices would work a special hardship on workers who must use their automobiles to commute to work. Farmers also would be hard hit because prices of fuel for farm machines and for fertilizer would increase, Meany pointed out.

Labor Day Talks Demand Action To Meet Critical Need for Jobs

policies that brought the current high levels of unemployment and inflation along with recession need a complete overhaul.

"We in the American labor movement don't think it has to be that way," Meany stressed.

"We won't accept the idea that our children have to live in a society crippled by massive unemployment, skyrocketing prices, deteriorating public services, municipal bankruptcies, rising crime —in short, a collapse in the quality of life of the American people."

Meany said that the nation could overcome that deterioration with "proper leadership and sound policies that put people above dollars"—the same combination, he said, that pulled the country out of the depression of the 1930s.

He pointed out, however, that current international conditions complicate the search for solutions.

For those Americans who would tend to ignore the international crisis, Meany warned that it is no longer possible to return to the "good old days" of American isolationism.

"Drive into your local gas station," Meany suggested, "and you'll run smack into the crisis in the Middle East and Arab oil blackmail.

"Walk into your grocery store, and your pocketbook will feel the consequences of the Soviet wheat deal in the name of detente."

He said neither the American labor movement nor the nation itself can afford to be isolationist and stressed that all citizens must have a voice in the country's foreign policies.

"On this Labor Day 1975, the American labor movement calls upon the nation's leaders to reassess not only the disastrous economic policies which have brought misery to millions, but the equally disastrous foreign policies that would seek to stop evil by appeasing it.

"These are not two separate problems. They are two sides of the same problem. A strong America can only survive in a free world," Meany stressed.

And freedom around the world, he added, depends on an America that is both economically and spiritually strong.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, speaking on the Mutual Broadcasting System, said the trade union movement is dedicated to improving the unemployment insurance program to help ease the plight of millions of jobless workers currently out of work.

Kirkland noted that although the Social Security Act has been amended numerous times since its passage 40 years ago, its unemployment insurance provisions have remained virtually unchanged.

"Unemployment insurance is and has been the nation's first line of defense against poverty and recession for 40 years," Kirkland said. "But the line has become very thin."

The current benefit average of $68 a week, Kirkland pointed out, replaces only about 20 to 30 percent of lost wages for many jobless workers.

"This is a complete distortion of the original intent of unemployment insurance to restore to jobless workers at least one-half of their former weekly wage," Kirkland observed. "And even 50 percent—a target we are a long way from reaching—is much too low.

He said immediate steps are needed to improve the benefits, extend coverage and strengthen the financing structure of the jobless benefits program.

He said the AFL-CIO is supporting measures introduced by Rep. James C. Corman (D-Calif.) and Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) that would go a long way toward meeting these goals.

President I. W. Abel of the Industrial Union Dept. said in an address on CBS radio that because of government inaction, economic conditions have failed to improve for America's workers since Labor Day 1974.

Abel said that despite optimistic White House pronouncements that things have improved, the nation is still "mired in a recession that is worse than anything we have suffered since the black days of the 1930s."

"Nearly one-third of our industrial capacity remains idle; 3 million more workers are jobless than when President Ford took office; and idle machines and idle workers are depriving America of more than $200 billion in production," he stressed.

Abel said that while the nation's economic future is shrouded with uncertainty, the Administration fails to provide the needed leadership, other than to predict that unemployment will remain higher in 1980 than when the recession began two years ago.

"These kinds of unemployment forecasts make a sham of any White House pronouncement that this recession is over, or soon will be," Abel said.

He noted that American labor has long held that with forceful government leadership the objectives of the 1946 employment act can be achieved.

"We must not and cannot go back to the 'do-nothingism' which characterized the Hoover presidency and its reactionary predecessors," Abel declared. "Today, the veto is no substitute for presidential leadership."

133 Major Areas Stricken As Jobless Impact Widens

Education Aid Wins Over Veto

By David L. Perlman

Congress easily overrode President Ford's veto of an educational appropriations bill, but failed to overturn his veto of legislation continuing price controls on a portion of oil produced in the United States.

Its override of the education funding bill averted a sharp cutback in federal aid that would have piled new financial burdens on cities and states.

Its inability to override the oil price control veto left the door open for profiteering price hikes that will further fuel the nation's inflation.

Any hope the Administration may have had of making the education veto stick was washed away by a wave of protests that members of Congress encountered from their home districts and states. The vote to override was 379-41 in the House and 88-12 in the Senate.

The President had made much of the fact that the $7.9 billion appropriation—part of which was spread over a 27-month period—exceeded his budget request by more than $1.4 billion. He was especially critical of impact funds voted for school districts in communities with heavy government and military employment. But he complained also of increased funds for such programs as elementary and secondary education, emergency school aid, higher education, vocational education and library resources.

In a letter sent to every representative and senator, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller stressed that the Administration's budget would have slashed education aid by $855 million below last year's level and would have eliminated important programs.

Earlier, the AFL-CIO Executive Council had warned that unless the veto were overriden local taxes would have to be raised sharply to maintain school programs "and parents will have to dig deeper into their savings to subsidize the increased costs of higher education."

The American Federation of Teachers and other educational groups brought delegations into Washington before the vote. And congressmen and senators who normally vote to sustain presidential vetoes were dissuaded by the strong reaction from their home communities.

But while conceding defeat on the education fund vote, the White House put heavy pressure to make the oil price bill veto stick.

8.4 Percent Rate Holds Nationwide

By James M. Shevis

Heavy unemployment spread its impact even wider in August as the number of major labor markets with jobless rates of 6 percent or more rose to an all-time high.

Of the 150 major labor areas surveyed each month by the Labor Dept., 133 were labeled centers of "substantial" unemployment by the government. The August figure broke the July record of 131 and marked the fifth month in a row in which the total surpassed the previous month.

Meanwhile, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that the nation's overall jobless rate in August hung high at 8.4 percent, unchanged from the previous month. Separately, BLS announced that wholesale prices rose over the month at a near double-digit rate, pointing to a new surge in the cost of living.

Besides the 133 major job markets, 813 other industrial communities of smaller population were classified as areas of substantial or persistent unemployment last month.

AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger, commenting on the area unemployment report, observed that "the entire country now is economically distressed." The only major areas with jobless rates below 6 percent are oil or grain centers or have concentrations of government installations, he noted.

The August total of major job markets wtih substantial unemployment was the highest since the Labor Dept.'s present classification system was set up 20 years ago. Substantial unemployment is de-

After White House Meeting:

Grain Policy Shifts, Dock Boycott Lifted

The AFL-CIO-supported boycott by the Longshoremen against shipping American grain to the Soviet Union has been "temporarily halted" under an agreement union leaders reached with President Ford at a White House meeting.

Key to the voluntary 30-day resumption of grain loading by members of the Longshoremen was the assurance by the President that any future grain deals with the USSR will be on a government-to-government basis with full consideration of the impact on U.S. consumers, farmers and the shipping industry.

AFL-CIO President George Meany, who headed the union delegation that met with Ford, said it now appears "there may be a change in the way we do business with the Soviet Union."

Discussing the agreement in a speech to the Industrial Union Dept. convention in Pittsburgh, Meany said "the important thing" is that Ford is sending representatives to Moscow to negotiate as government-to-government, instead of leaving the dealing to profit-motivated private firms.

The President's instructions are to negotiate a deal "that will protect the American consumer as well as the American farmer," Meany reported. He noted also that meanwhile the President's moratorium on new grain sales has been extended "until at least mid-October."

In addition to Meany, union participants in the White House meeting were AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland; Longshoremen's President Thomas W. Gleason; Seafarers and Maritime Trades Dept. President Paul Hall; President Jesse Calhoon of the Marine Engineers and President Shannon J. Wall of the National Maritime Union.

Clothing Pact Scores Gains For 95,000

New York—More than 95,000 members of the Clothing Workers will receive major pay and pension gains under a new one-year contract negotiated by the ACWA in nationwide bargaining with cotton garment and outerwear manufacturers.

ACWA President Murray H. Finley and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman said the "best ever" agreements were reached after the manufacturers finally abandoned their earlier insistence on a wage freeze.

ACWA affiliates across the country overwhelmingly ratified the contract settlements, the union reported.

Crowded Classrooms Spur Teacher Strikes

New York—Members of the United Federation of Teachers struck the nation's largest public school system after weeks of intensive contract negotiations failed to produce a new agreement.

"Salary is not the issue," UFT President Albert Shanker emphasized in a speech to an overflow membership meeting at Madison Square Garden prior to a strike vote. He said the real issues are the intolerable teaching and learning conditions in New York City's schools.

The walkout of the union's 80,000 members was the largest of a wave of teacher strikes across the nation, many of them sparked by protests similar to those in New York.

Crowded classrooms, along with wages, also were the key issues in a strike by Chicago Local 1 of the American Federation of Teachers, now in its second week.

AFL-CIO President George Meany pledged the federation's full support to AFT members throughout the country "who have been forced to strike to guarantee the quality of education and to protect the livelihoods of teachers."

In telegrams to Shanker and Chicago Local President Robert M. Healey, Meany said it was clear

Abel Calls for Liberal To Replace Ford in '76

By Saul Miller

Pittsburgh—America must elect "an even better Congress" and a "much better" liberal Democratic president in 1976 to break the governmental logjam and help cure a "very sick" economy, President I. W. Abel of the Industrial Union Dept. told the 20th anniversary convention of the IUD here.

In his keynote speech to the 350 delegates, Abel said "I am convinced that we can elect a liberal, forward-looking Democrat as president" next year and there is no need for a "super-candidate" but a candidate "who places the needs of the people first." That kind of candidate, he added, "will defeat President Ford."

Abel, president of the Steelworkers, reviewed the 20-year history of the IUD as well as the state of the nation under the Nixon and Ford Administrations and concluded that "after seven years of Republican rule under Nixon and Ford, the rich are getting richer — and the

Sigmund Arywitz Dies, Led Los Angeles Labor

Los Angeles—Sigmund Arywitz, executive secretary-treasurer of the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO, died after a heart attack at his home Sept. 9. He was 61.

Arywitz, long active in numerous civic, political, civil rights and labor causes throughout California, was also a vice president of the State AFL-CIO.

He was a leader in labor's campaign to defeat a state "right-to-work" referendum in 1958 while working for the election of former Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Sr. Arywitz was appointed state labor commissioner in 1959, a post he held until 1967 when he was named to the top post of the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor. He was subsequently re-elected to four two-year terms.

In a message to his wife, Barbara, AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said that Arywitz was a devoted trade unionist and a "staunch fighter for freedom and democracy. The labor movement has lost an outstanding leader, and we have lost a companion whose company we cherished and whose counsel was always wise."

A native of Buffalo, Arywitz had worked as a sportswriter for the Buffalo Evening News while attending area colleges. He became a member of the Ladies' Garment Workers in 1946 following four years of service with the Army Medical Corps. He was appointed an ILGWU organizer in 1947 and was subsequently named education director of the union's western states region.

Arywitz worked closely with the founders of the United Farm Workers from the time of the union's organizing committee days. He continued to promote organizing efforts of the UFW in California's vineyards and lettuce fields.

During the past nine years as head of the Los Angeles central body, Arywitz was instrumental in expanding the scope of the county federation's services, including programs for senior citizens, women's rights, occupational safety, ecology and energy problems and cultural activities.

Services were scheduled Sept. 12 at Mt. Sinai Memorial Park in Los Angeles. Besides his wife, survivors include two brothers. The family requested that contributions be made to the American Heart Association and AID-UGF in lieu of flowers.

House Rejects Move to Trim UNDP Funds

The House approved and sent to the Senate a foreign aid appropriations bill that includes indirect funding of two international organizations that have increasingly become political tools of the Communist-Arab bloc.

In a letter to House members, AFL-CIO President George Meany had urged Congress to insist that no U.S. funds voted for the United Nations Development Fund be channeled to programs operated by UNESCO or the International Labor Organization.

An amendment to that effect was proposed by Rep. Clement J. Zablocki (D-Wis.). Meany termed the UN Development Fund "probably the most corrupt, mismanaged, wasteful agency in the United Nations" and said both the ILO and UNESCO have seen their humanitarian ideals subordinated to political aims.

The Zablocki amendment was rejected by a voice vote.

At Department Convention:

Public Employes Map Drive To Erase Worker Inequities

By John R. Oravec

The continuing struggle for equity for employes of federal, state and local governments was reinforced in an action program drafted by the second convention of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept.

The 107 delegates reaffirmed the united efforts of the PED's affiliated unions to put public employes on par with workers of the private sector in terms of wages, collective bargaining, benefits, unemployment compensation, safety standards and other key objectives.

PED President William H. McClennan stressed in his keynote address that the best approach to achieving the department's goals for public workers is through the harmony and determination of the trade union affiliates.

"God knows the time is right for such united action," McClennan declared. "In just about every section of the country, the public employe . . . is becoming a favorite whipping boy for those who are frustrated by the problems of government — federal, state and local."

He assailed the attacks on public employes and their unions as malicious propaganda and said that "we must expose it for what it is."

While recognizing the fiscal plight of state and local governments, McClennan said that public workers must not be forced to sacrifice their moderate incomes and their standard of living in the face of double-digit inflation.

Delegates re-elected McClennan and Treasurer Clyde M. Webber to new two-year terms by acclamation. McClennan is president of the Fire Fighters and Webber heads the Government Employees, two of the 29 affiliates which represent the 2.5 million department membership.

In a major convention resolution, delegates scored the failure of the Ford Administration to assist New York City in its struggle for fiscal solvency and called on Congress to guarantee the city's municipal bonds.

Delegates warned that without adequate federal assurances, many other major cities where PED members are employed are threatened by the same fiscal problems as New York.

The convention also urged Congress to override President Ford's 5 percent limit on a comparability pay increase for federal white-collar employes and military personnel. Ford's advisers had recommended an increase of 8.66 percent to keep pace with workers in the private sector.

Thomas R. Donahue, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President George Meany, told delegates that economic problems confronting all workers, their unions and the entire nation stem from the policies "deliberately adopted and pursued" by the Nixon and Ford Administrations.

Donahue charged that in pursuing its prime objective of reducing the federal budget deficit, the Administration has provided little relief for the plight of the cities, states and the unemployed.

Donahue also stressed that the surest way to stabilize employment in the public sector is through free collective bargaining.

"This country will be better off when collective bargaining is the normal, accepted proredure in every federal department and agency, and in every state and county and city and school district," he said.

As a key part of the PED legislative program, the convention urged Congress to extend full coverage of the National Labor Relations Act to all public employes.

The convention resolution called for congressional action on a measure introduced by Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N.J.) with PED-initiated amendments "to provide public employes with federal protection and end the continuance of an unwarranted anachronism in our nation's labor laws."

Thompson told the delegates that federal legislation for public employe bargaining "is coming," but he warned that passage depends largely on their support and cooperation.

Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) observed in his address to the convention that because of the inconsistency among states on public employe collective bargaining, a uniform national law is vitally needed.

Sen. Gale McGee (D-Wyo.) expressed support for PED efforts to override Ford's 5 percent ceiling on federal comparability pay, reform of the Hatch Act to assure public employes the right to participate in political activities and federal legislation for postcard registration of voters.

Rep. Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) assailed presidential vetoes of employment programs based on Administration claims that they would ruin the federal budget. "Public works and emergency public employment would do more than anything else to get the economy going in the right direction," he stressed.

In other key resolutions, delegates called for:

- Federal legislation allowing all public employes the right to strike.
- Extending full coverage of the Occupational Safety & Health Act to federal, state and local government workers.
- Permanent unemployment insurance protection for public employes.

The convention also praised San Francisco Mayor Joseph A. Alioto for his actions in settling the recent city contract dispute with police and fire fighters.

Senate Rollcall on Veto Of Oil Price Ceilings

The Senate on Sept. 10 failed to obtain the two-thirds majority needed to override President Ford's veto of a labor-supported bill continuing for six months price ceilings on domestic oil.

The vote was 61-39. The 54 Democrats and seven Republicans who voted to override the veto supported the AFL-CIO position.

California Elections:

Farm Workers Gain Early Lead in Votes

Fresno, Calif.—The United Farm Workers have taken the lead in early representation elections under California's new law establishing union bargaining rights and procedures in the agricultural industry.

In the two weeks since the law took effect, the UFW has won 13 of 18 elections in which ballots have been counted. In the process, the AFL-CIO affiliate has won bargaining rights for five units where the rival Teamsters previously held contracts.

Thirty-four elections in all of the major farm areas of the state had been held as of Sept. 10, but because of protests by one side or the other ballots in a number of elections were impounded by the California Agricultural Labor Relations Board which is supervising the voting.

In nine head-to-head elections between the UFW and the Teamsters, the AFL-CIO union received a total of 1,883 votes to 414 for the Teamsters.

The most significant Farm Workers' victory occurred in the Salinas Valley at Interharvest, Inc., the nation's largest lettuce grower.

The ballot count showed 1,167 votes for the UFW and 28 for the Teamsters. There were also 18 votes for no union. Another 121 ballots were challenged, but would not affect the outcome.

Nearby at the second largest lettuce ranch in the country, Bud Antle, Inc., where the Teamsters have had a contract since the early 1960s, the vote count was delayed pending a state hearing on a dispute over who was eligible to vote.

The campaigning that preceded the elections in some instances was marred by differences in interpreting the CALRB rule giving union organizers access to workers in the fields.

Growers, arguing that the right of private property has precedence over the rights of union organizers, won a temporary restraining order from a U.S. district judge prohibiting the CALRB from enforcing the rule. A full hearing on the access rule was scheduled Sept. 12 before a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

The CALRB regulation allowed organizers access to the fields on a limited basis—before and after work and during lunch breaks. UFW leaders maintain that if they are denied access to the workers the state's new agricultural labor relations law will become nothing but a hoax.

UFW President Cesar Chavez declared access to the work force was essential, especially among those laboring under existing Teamster contracts that were stolen from the UFW in 1973.

Attorneys for the Farm Workers said that several of the early elections have been sufficiently clouded by the access controversy to give them cause to seek court action.

The access issue almost resulted in physical violence near Stockton in the San Joaquin Valley when a posse of vigilantes—formed to protect grower interests—attempted to block entry into the fields of the Western Tomato Ranch.

Armed with shotguns, pistols, pick handles and chains, the posse threatened both UFW organizers and law-enforcement officials.

When San Joaquin County sheriff's deputies confronted the posse, a vigilante's shotgun discharged near a deputy's head. The officer was not directly hit, but suffered a mild concussion from the blast. Several posse members were arrested on charges of assaulting peace officers.

John F. Henning, executive secretary-treasurer of the California AFL-CIO, called a meeting of all central bodies in the state to discuss the vigilante problem. The meeting was scheduled Sept. 10 in Stockton.

Henning also wired California Atty. Gen. Evelle J. Younger to assist the San Joaquin County sheriff's office in disarming the vigilantes and protecting the civil rights of UFW organizers.

Gov. Edmund Brown, in a statement attacking the growers' vigilantes, observed that "no one has the right to take the law into his own hands or brandish weapons at those lawfully and peacefully exercising their rights."

The elections have been further clouded by additional court injunctions granted to Western Growers Association to block the counting of ballots of 130 vegetable farms in the Salinas area that belong to the WGA. The association wants a single bargaining unit covering all its members while the UFW wants elections with each grower.

Also, the Farm Workers have accused the Teamsters and some growers of using U.S. Border Patrols to hamper UFW organizing.

In an unfair labor practice charge filed against the managers of West Foods, Inc., a mushroom-growing firm at Ventura, the UFW charged the Teamsters "fingered" 20 suspected illegal aliens for arrest by the Border Patrol.

The Most Rev. Roger Mahony, the Catholic bishop who is chairman of the CALRB, sent a strongly worded telegram to U.S. Atty. Gen. Edward H. Levi urging an investigation into the patrol's actions.

NEW YORK TEACHERS fill the streets around the city board of education in a mass rally to protest insufferable classroom conditions in the nation's largest school system. Nearly 40,000 members of the United Federation of Teachers took part in the rally, held four days before the union struck over contract terms. UFT President Albert Shanker stressed that the chief issue in the walkout is not money but chaotic conditions in the schools.

Intolerable Classroom Conditions Spur Wave of Teacher Walkouts

that "court injunctions and jail sentences will not educate children, make the schools better or provide the decent working conditions that teachers must have to be able to properly educate students."

Meany blamed the Ford Administration's economic policies for the recession and high unemployment that have crippled the finances of many large cities, making public employes "both the victims and the whipping boys." He said the AFL-CIO would continue to press for immediate federal aid to relieve hard-pressed communities and states.

"The future of the cities and the future of the children in schools hang in the balance," Meany said. He called upon school boards to bargain in good faith with the Teachers for, he said, "only through collective bargaining can these issues be resolved."

Despite a temporary restraining order barring the UFT from continuing its walkout, the New York teachers strike was "more than 99 percent effective" on its second day, the union said.

The walkout was called for by Shanker and approved by the union's 75-member executive committee. It followed weeks of talks between UFT negotiators and the city's board of education which were mediated by the State Public Employment Relations Board. The union's old contract expired on midnight Sept. 8, after classes reopened for the new school year.

UFT members at the Madison Square Garden meeting told of class sizes running into the 40s, 50s and even 60s, oversized classes of handicapped children, lack of security in school buildings, and no guidance counselors, paraprofessionals or school secretaries.

"These conditions we will never tolerate in the schools," said Shanker, who is also president of the UFT's parent organization, the American Federation of Teachers.

Meanwhile, the UFT and the board of education were continuing to negotiate over proposals for a compromise settlement of the dispute.

In Chicago, some 28,000 classroom teachers began their walkout Sept. 3, after voting 9 to 1 to strike. CTU's contract with the city expired the day before.

The key issue in the strike is the union's request for a cost-of-living wage increase. The teachers also want to reduce the size of their classes, aggravated by the school board's refusal to fill some 1,000 vacant teaching positions.

Local President Healey warned that failure to fill the vacancies will lead to "horribly" overworked teachers and further deterioration in the quality of instruction.

Besides New York and Chicago, AFT locals and units of the unaffiliated National Education Association led walkouts of teachers and other school employes in nearly a dozen states.

Altogether more than 100,000 AFT members were participating in the teacher strikes. Shanker, summing up the root cause of the strikes, said that teachers have become the latest victim of recession.

"That's what these strikes are all about," he said. "The cities would like the teachers to bear the burden of the economic crunch, but we can't tolerate cuts that jeopardize minimum education standards and hard-won contract benefits."

Other AFT strikes continued in Wilmington, Del.; Lynn, Mass.; Berkeley, Calif.; Joliet, Ill.; Taylor and Lake Shore, Mich.; Pawtucket, Johnston, North Providence and Woonsocket, R.I., and Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio.

Teachers in Wilmington defied a back-to-work order and threats of heavy fines for the union and its leaders if the strike kept up. The AFT local struck Sept. 4 after failing to reach agreement on a new contract.

In Pennsylvania, strikes or lockouts affected teachers in more than 20 of the state's school districts. An estimated 150 districts in the state have yet to reach agreement with teachers.

Record 133 of 150 Major Centers Stricken as Jobless Impact Widens fined as a rate of 6 percent or more (discounting seasonal factors) which is expected to continue for at least two more months.

An area with persistent joblessness is defined as one which has experienced substantial unemployment for two or more years.

A year ago, only 50 of the 150 major labor areas were classified as areas of substantial joblessness. The addition of Oklahoma City and Newport News-Hampton, Va., raised the list to the record high.

Under federal law, firms in areas of substantial unemployment may be eligible for first preference in bidding on certain federal procurement contracts, provided they agree to hire 25 percent of the new employes each month from among the disadvantaged area residents.

In its report on national employment and unemployment, BLS said the number of Americans with jobs in August rose by 275,000 to 85,352,000. But there still were 7,794,000 workers unemployed out of a total workforce of 93,146,000.

Also, BLS noted, hard-core joblessness worsened over the month as the average duration of unemployment increased from 15.4 to 15.7 weeks. The August level exceeded the year-earlier average by nearly six additional weeks.

The August statistics showed a slight improvement in the job situation for adult men and for household heads. The jobless rate for adult men fell from 7 to 6.6 percent over the month while the rate for heads of households dropped from 6 to 5.5 percent.

Unemployment rates among other labor-force categories, however, remained unchanged or increased from July to August. The rate for teenagers, for instance, jumped from 19.1 to 21.1 percent, with the rate for teen-age blacks rising from 33.5 to 37.4 percent.

Also hidden by the unchanged 8.4 percent national unemployment rate were continued high levels of joblessness among construction workers, 19.9 percent; blacks, 14 percent; blue-collar workers, 11.5 percent; manufacturing workers, 10.5 percent, and Vietnam-era veterans between the ages of 20 and 24, 17.5 percent.

BLS Commissioner Julius Shiskin, appearing before a congressional Joint Economic subcommittee, released a list of jobless rates in individual manufacturing industries:

Lumber, an increase from 12.4 percent in July to 13.7 percent in August; transportation, up from 10.4 to 11.4 percent; rubber and plastic products, from 11.6 to 14.2 percent; furniture and fixtures, from 11.5 to 13.3 percent; machinery, from 9.5 to 10.3 percent.

The August jobless rate for the nation was down from its peak of 9.2 percent in May, but still three full percentage points above the year-earlier level of 5.4 percent.

The government's report on wholesale prices indicated that higher retail prices await the unemployed worker in the near future. BLS said its wholesale price index rose at a seasonally adjusted rate of eight-tenths of 1 percent over the month, or at an annualized rate of 9.6 percent.

The rise occurred even though farm prices declined 1.5 percent. Prices of industrial commodities again emerged as the culprit, rising six-tenths of 1 percent from July to August. It was the highest rise of the year and the third consecutive month in which such prices have risen substantially.

Commodities account for 70 percent of the relative weight of the wholesale price index. Price movement in this category is considered more significant than in the more volatile food component.

Increases in wholesale prices generally signal higher consumer prices in the future. The August rise followed a jolting 1.2 percent increase in wholesale prices in July.

Labor and Farmers

THE AFL-CIO HAS NOT changed its position that the American farmer deserves and should get a reasonable price for his products. As our last convention stated: "For working farmers there must be solid guarantees that increased production will bring adequate income. Income guarantees must be made effective for them along with curbs on the speculative greed of agri-business corporations."

That is why the AFL-CIO this year supported the farm bill with its higher "target prices." While not ideal, that bill would have guaranteed farmers that a bumper crop would not depress farm prices below a reasonable level.

You will undoubtedly recall that President Ford vetoed that farm bill. He said it was "inflationary." Today his Secretary of Agriculture says the Russian grain deal is not inflationary, despite the fact that it has already raised consumer prices far more than the farm bill would have.

The AFL-CIO also supports the establishment of a national food policy that will take into account both the vital needs of consumers and farmers, as well as the world's need for food.

We believe the family farmer needs protection against the onslaught of the giant conglomerates, who seek to drive farmers from their lands and the marketplace. And we will continue to fight for more adequate legislation to bring the commodity speculators under truly effective government regulation.

WE HAVE SUGGESTED establishment of a government agency with sole marketing authority for dealing with Communist and other dictator countries. Such an agency could purchase grain from American farmers at a fair price and then bargain, on a government-to-government basis, with the Soviets. This contrasts with the present situation where the Soviets play private corporations against each other, while the private corporations are concerned only with their own profits and not with the welfare of the American people.

Only government-to-government negotiations would insure that America's great agricultural resources would not be used just for the private profit of grain dealers and speculators; that farmers would be adequately paid for their work, and that consumers would not be penalized. In addition, the government would have a bargaining weapon that would force the Soviet Union to keep its promises—something it has never done.

Other nations, including Canada, have somewhat similar arrangements and their consumers and farmers benefit jointly.

This is the second time in four years that the Russians have entered the U.S. grain markets before the harvest was complete and created chaos through large purchases. As a result, farmers are unable to adequately plan their crops to meet demand. An export authority could make longer-term contracts that would bring more stability to the grain markets, more stable prices for the consumers.

We want—and we intend to fight for—government policies that will protect American consumers, farmers and workers from a repetition of the disastrous 1972 Russian grain steal. America deserves nothing less.

'They Could Sure Fool Me!'

A Word Edgewise:

Right-Wing Oracles Fantasize Over Conservative 'Majority'

By John P. Roche

MOST OF YOU HAVE probably been too busy trying to conserve your standard of living to notice what your self-anointed leaders have been up to. Despite the fact that President Ford's reaction to the recession has made the late Herbert Hoover look like a manic radical, despite the fact that the latest authoritative explanation for renewed inflation is that it is "psychological"—that is, all in your heads—it has been determined by right-wing oracles that you are "conservatives." If you can no longer afford the movies and the TV is busted, you might find the present rain dance, as performed by William F. Buckley, William Rusher and various other tom-tom players such as Gov. Meldrim Thomson of New Hampshire, almost as entertaining as an antique western on the late late show.

First, you would probably like to know why you are conservatives. On its face this would seem a bit difficult to prove, but the gist of the argument is that in 1972 you gave the conservative ticket of Nixon and Agnew an almost unprecedented majority over the Democratic candidates McGovern and Shriver. Through a series of misfortunes, which can be glossed over quickly, Nixon and Agnew retired from conservative leadership and were replaced by Gerald Ford and Nelson Rockefeller. And here was the rub: Ford and Rockefeller were not really conservatives. They were clandestine liberals who rapidly lost the support of authentic rightwingers like yourselves.

With this major premise firmly locked in place, the rest is easy. The reason polls indicate that around 55-60 percent of the populace think Ford is doing a mediocre-to-bad job as President is that he has sold the pass to the liberal establishment and capitulated to the liberal media which, as is well known, takes its orders from that left-wing politburo, the Council on Foreign Relations. Gov. Thomson, however, is fair enough to point out in the September issue of "Conservative Digest" that for conservatives this is a self-inflicted wound: though it may come as an eye-opener to liberals in the House of Representatives, Thomson notes that Congressman Ford was always a liberal.

So far, all this strenuous rain-making has produced is a drizzle of Ronald Reagan literature. The former California governor is seen as the man who can end your alienation, who can consolidate the massive silent majority of Goldwater and Wallace supporters into a meaningful political experience. As psychodrama this is not without moving qualities—I found myself humming "Rock of Ages"—but aside from whatever contribution may be made to the gross national product, it is an exercise in transcendental political meditation. Reagan may be a potent "mantra," that is, if you say it to yourself a thousand times a day, you may achieve inner peace. But in terms of American politics the road these mystics have charted leads to Death Valley. If you don't believe me, ask Barry Goldwater—he took the trip.

AS USUAL, the problem is the premise, the notion that Nixon got elected on a tidal wave of conservative sentiment. To believe this is comparable to accepting Johnson's 1964 landslide as a triumph of liberalism. (Even he didn't believe that: in the fall of 1967 Marvin Watson, his appointments secretary and old political associate, and I were urging the President to reinvigorate the Democratic National Committee. He balked and finally, with some exasperation, I suggested that the '64 election had been a freak, that Marvin could have beaten Goldwater. LBJ gave me a flinty look, then chuckled and said, "But he'd only have gotten 51 percent.") In hard political terms, the results in 1972, like those in 1964, were not an ideological mandate but a rejection of a candidate perceived as "extremist."

Now it is hardly my business to coach the Republican Party — it has Kevin Phillips in vigorous form. (As Ben Wattenberg put it, Kevin has unerringly spotted 11 of the last three major trends in American politics.) Moreover, if the Democrats run a committee for President in '76—as now seems possible—the GOP could walk off with the prize.

But this has virtually nothing to do with "conservatism" or "liberalism" as abstractions. The American people, confronting a set of baffling foreign and domestic issues, want results not rhetoric. And anyone who thinks that a Presidential election is an examination in political theory should take refuge in a think-tank and let serious people handle the business at hand.

Conservatives Promote Division:

Black, White Workers Alike Suffer in Depressed Economy

By Bayard Rustin

THE ESCALATING DISPUTE over job seniority rights is a tragic but altogether predictable consequence of the hard times confronting American workers. Periods of intense racial competition have always emerged simultaneous with depressions, panics, and general economic instability. And while Americans are today far less likely to be motivated by blind race hatred, they nonetheless continue to perceive social phenomenon in racial terms.

Black workers, the disproportionate victims of massive layoffs, are embittered at their white colleagues, whom they see as the beneficiaries of past patterns of discrimination. White workers, rejecting in totality the presumption that they constitute a privileged elite, bristle at demands that they—the have-littles of society—should sacrifice for the discriminatory practices of their employers and the policy failures of the federal government.

There is, then, equity to both arguments. Or to put it another way, black and white workers alike stand to lose from the perpetuation of an intolerable high level of unemployment. The only winners will be the most affluent and powerful forces of society—those who, whether consciously or otherwise, have a vested stake in pitting working people at each other's throats.

The days when industrialists would import black strikebreakers by the trainload to supplant unionized whites may be well in the distant past. Likely as not, blacks are now an integral part of those unions which management once tried so determinedly to destroy. But conservatives, whether in business or in government, have devised more sophisticated means of driving workers apart. Race is still an essential part of this strategy. And we must keep this point in mind when examining the seniority debate.

Thus my principal objection to proposals that seniority clauses be abrogated in the name of affirmative action is that such a move would severely damage the entire labor movement by weakening one of its most cherished achievements. Seniority is not a mark of privilege, it is a necessary right, won at no little cost, which protects workers from the whims and prejudices of an employer.

Primary among those who benefit from seniority are middle-aged and older workers, who themselves comprise a group that suffers a high degree of discrimination. Even now substantial numbers of older workers are being furloughed in non-unionized plants by employers anxious to replace higher-paid veterans with low-salary young workers. What future does a 50 or 60 year old worker have in today's economy? A question well worth pondering.

In some instances, of course, unions have decided, through the democratic approval of members, to initiate work sharing schemes and other formulas to minimize the impact of layoffs. Some industries, garment manufacturing is one example, have employed work sharing formulas for years. Another important reform is the practice of granting to black workers who were once refused employment because of discrimination back seniority rights dating to the time of their initial rejection. Implicit in cases where black workers are protected by back seniority is the principle that white workers who had nothing to do with their employer's descrimination will not be penalized.

AT THE SAME TIME, I cannot support proposals for across-the-board wage cuts, reduction of benefits, or shortened work weeks as a basic means of dealing with the unemployment problem. Intentionally in some cases, unintentionally in others, the proponents of a general lowering of living standards have fallen victim to one of the most destructive myths about American society: the notion of an affluent secure working class. The most convincing evidence to the contrary lies in the most recent jobless statistics: 14 percent for blue collar workers; over 21 percent for construction workers. These are hardly reflections of wealth or security.

Furthermore, I am convinced that the acceptance of anti-worker and anti-union formulas signifies a weakening of resolve to achieve real economic transformation. There are already a few in the civil rights movement who are resigning themselves to another 10 years of economic deterioration.

Some misguided individuals even believe that a prolonged depression offers opportunities to advance the cause of racial equality through the institutionalization of the principle of an equitable sharing of poverty.

Such defeatism makes even more difficult the already formidable struggle for economic change. Blacks and whites can debate forever the question of who should sacrifice in an economy of scarcity. While we debate, those who have always profited from worker division will be on the sidelines, cheering us on. Their stake is not in who wins or loses, but only that the struggle pitting worker against worker continue.

Labor Helps Ease Problems On Vietnamese Resettlement

THE JOINT EFFORT of the federal government, the labor movement and the other private organizations to help smooth the resettlement of Vietnamese refugees in the United States may be wound up as early as Christmas, AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis reported.

The key job, Perlis said, has been to "create a climate of receptivity" in the local community. He credited the success of the resettlement program so far to the positive attitude of the American people and workers, just as it was when large numbers of Hungarians and Cubans sought new lives in freedom in this country. He said that about two-thirds of the 135,000 refugees have already made the transition into the "fabric of our national life."

Questioned by reporters on the AFL-CIO produced network radio interview Labor News Conference, Perlis said that the severe unemployment crisis makes it very hard, but not impossible, to place the refugees in jobs.

He pointed out that only about 35,000 are active job-seekers, since about three-fourths of the total refugee group are children, non-working spouses, and older persons beyond the working age. He said that a great many of the refugees who do need jobs do have marketable skills, and that the refugees will find jobs eventually, just as the Hungarians and Cubans did.

Perlis said the AFL-CIO is closely monitoring the job-placement phase of the resettlement program to make sure that the refugees do not replace American workers in badly needed jobs. He said the labor movement is also doing all it can to assure that those refugees who do find work don't fall victim to unscrupulous employers who would exploit the refugees' desperate situation and lack of understanding of the U.S. economy and labor-management relations in this country.

He noted that there have been several cases where employers have used the refugees as "pawns in industrial disputes—strikebreakers," and that the labor movement has been the prime force in curbing those abuses and finding decent jobs for the refugees.

Perlis was questioned by Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine and Duane Emme of Press Associates, Inc. The public affairs interview is broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

IN PASSING THE historic Occupational Safety & Health Act in 1970, Congress declared that America must have safer and healthier workplaces. Now, the lawmakers must take follow-up action to ensure that workers are "adequately and fairly" compensated for any injuries or illnesses that befall them on the job.

Chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) of the Senate Labor & Public Welfare Committee emphasizes this point in pushing for passage of a bill he has introduced with Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) to establish federal standards for workers' compensation.

A Senate Labor subcommittee is about to open hearings on the proposed legislation, with Williams, Javits and other supporters hopeful of moving it through the Senate later in the year. The House also is expected to act on standards for workers' compensation although its timetable is less definite.

A section of the 1970 safety-health law provided for the establishment of a National Commission on State Workmen's Compensation Laws to look into "serious questions" about their adequacy in the light of economic needs, a changing labor force, new hazards and risks to safety and health and "increases in the general level of wages and living costs."

The commission conducted an extensive study and reached the "inescapable conclusion that state workmen's compensation laws in general are inadequate and inequitable." It made 19 recommendations for improving state programs and urged their implementation by 1975. These included broader coverage of employes and occupational diseases; substantial replacement of income lost by workers due to injuries or diseases; a speedup in delivery of benefits, and provision for adequate medical care and rehabilitation.

The commission's recommendations were "essentially" the goals that labor has sought for many years. So what has happened since the commission delivered its final report in July 1972? State programs are, for the most part, still in the same condition in which the commission found them.

Labor contends there must be federal standards for workers' compensation just as there must be federal standards for state unemployment benefits. Many members of Congress have agreed. Williams and Javits introduced a federal standards bill for workers' compensation in 1973. Hearings were held in that year and again in 1974. Yet there was no real movement on the issue in Congress.

Federal action apparently was headed off in May 1974 by President Nixon. With considerable ballyhoo, he appointed an interdepartmental "task force" which, among other things, was going to assist state legislatures in fulfilling the commission's recommendations.

CONGRESSIONAL QUARTERLY, in an article summing up the workers' compensation issue, cited the task force's own figures to show that as recently as April 1975 only four states met the commission's recommendations on death benefits for spouses, only 22 states had a maximum death benefit equal to 100 percent of the state's average weekly wage as the commission proposed, and there are still 22 states that don't even have a compulsory-coverage compensation law.

In the words of one labor spokesman, "Nixon's task force, like the commission, has accomplished virtually nothing."

The Ford Administration has not disclosed what its position on standards will be. However, it is expected to seek a delay until at least next year on grounds the "task force" still has not completed its work, according to Congressional Quarterly. "Delay," of course, was the position of former President Nixon.

Urging Congress to wait fits like a glove with the eternal view of many employers and insurance companies that workers' compensation should be left entirely to the states. What they never mention but know is that they are consistently successful in lobbying state legislatures against improvements in compensation laws.

JOINT EFFORTS of government, unions and voluntary agencies to smooth resettlement of Vietnamese refugees should wind up by Christmas, Director Leo Perlis, center, of the AFL-CIO Community Services Dept. reported on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Duane Emme, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine. The AFL-CIO public affairs interview is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

SEAFARERS' CONVENTION strongly criticized the Ford Administration for selling out the U.S. merchant marine in a one-sided policy of detente at any price with the Soviet Union. The 300 delegates charged the State Dept. is using the merchant marine as a pawn in American foreign policy.

Seafarers Score Administration On Plan for Inland Waters Tax

The Seafarers Union wound up its 17th biennial convention with an attack on a Ford Administration campaign to impose user charges on inland water carriers.

"The most serious and immediate danger to the development of the nation's waterways is the user charge," SIU President Paul Hall told delegates to the four-day meeting.

He noted there are several Administration-backed bills now before Congress that would impose tolls of one kind or another on ships that ply the 25,000-mile inland waterways system. One proposal calls for a 1 percent tax on all property transported in the United States by rail, motor vehicle and water carrier.

But the proceeds would be used solely to rehabilitate railroad track and roadbeds, and none of the tax money would go to the improvement of the inland waterways, Hall said.

"Such legislation which taxes all transportation for the sole benefit of one mode is completely without precedent, and the Seafarers will use all of its means to insure that such legislation is defeated," the union declared in a resolution approved by the 300 convention delegates.

Other resolutions adopted by the delegates called for protection of the American fishing industry against inroads by uncontrolled foreign fleets, better medical care aboard United States-flag vessels, a national energy policy, tax reform and regulation of U.S.-based multinational corporations.

Delegates re-elected Hall, Sec.-Treas. Joseph DiGiorgio and Executive Vice-Pres. Morris Weisberger and amended the union's constitution to lengthen their terms of office from two years to three. They also voted to hold conventions every three years, instead of two.

Twenty vice presidents also were re-elected, and delegates heard reports from several top government and union leaders, including Marine Engineers President Jesse L. Calhoon, Longshoremen's President Thomas W. Gleason and Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop.

Hall renewed his attack on the State Dept., accusing it of being "the most consistent detractor and opponent of the U.S. merchant marine." Hall charged the State Dept. actively opposed two legislative proposals to help the sagging maritime industry.

One of the measures, the Energy Transportation Act of 1974, would have given U.S. ships preference on carrying oil in domestic commerce. At State Dept. urging, Hall noted, President Ford vetoed the measure "on the false grounds that it might invite reprisals by foreign nations."

The State Dept. apparently ignored the fact that cargo preference is implemented already by many seafaring nations, "and implemented without State's objections," Hall observed.

Another measure opposed by the State Dept. would require that foreign carriers of American goods charge rates commensurate with those paid to U.S.-flag ships.

Hall termed the State Dept.'s role in fighting the bill "despicable" and charged it is "perhaps the most demonstrative example of State's intensifying determination to scuttle U.S.-flag shipping in favor of other flags." The measure, introduced by Sen. Daniel Inouye (D-Ha.), is pending in Congress.

"We might well warn State and its secretary that he had better stop trying to package the U.S. merchant marine for delivery as tribute to his partners in detente," Hall declared. "We are not going to lie down and play willing hostage."

In his remarks to the convention, Labor Sec. John Dunlop proposed establishment of a tripartite board to review union-shipper problems in the maritime industry. The panel would be made up of union, management and government members at the policy-making level.

Delegates adopted a resolution paying tribute to the late Peter McGavin. McGavin, who served as executive secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. for nearly 15 years until his death this summer, was cited for his "long and dedicated service" to SIU and its affiliated organizations.

Senate Votes To Curb Bias In Home Loans

The Senate voted 45-37 approval of a labor-supported bill intended to discourage banks from refusing to finance mortgages for home purchases in "redlined" inner-city nieghborhoods.

The bill would require lending institutions in larger cities to disclose the amount of mortgage money they lend in various neighborhoods. This would bring under the scrutiny of depositors and the public the practice of many banks of denying financing for homes purchased in older or low-income neighborhoods.

As AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller noted in a letter to senators endorsing the bill, "the presumption of lenders that property values in such neighborhoods will decline then becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy, because homes generally cannot be sold without mortgage credit availability."

The Senate did modify the bill to require disclosure of mortgage funding by postal zip code districts rather than the more closely pinpointed census tract required by the original bill. But it rejected by a 41-40 vote a Republican-backed amendment that would have substituted a Federal Reserve Board study in 27 cities. The original bill applied to 265 metropolitan areas and Senate Banking Committee Chairman William Proxmire (D-Wis.) charged the amendment would have gutted the bill.

A House subcommittee has completed hearings on a companion bill.

Meany Pledges Support:

Rail Revival Pushed By UTU Delegates

Miami Beach, Fla.—Delegates to the United Transportation Union convention prepared to map a program to preserve and strengthen the nation's rail transportation system and cheered a pledge of full support from AFL-CIO President George Meany.

More than 1,200 delegates to the quadrennial convention of the UTU heard a progress report from President Al H. Chesser that stressed the success of the four-way merger that established the union in 1969. That's when the merger of the former Railroad Trainmen, Conductors & Brakemen, Firemen & Enginemen, and the Switchmen took effect.

Chesser, who was elected president at the 1971 convention after having served as legislative director, cited impressive gains in wages since the merger, successful enactment of the railroad retirement reorganization bill, and the emergence of the union as a fighting force to preserve the industry.

Internally, he said, the UTU has slimmed the number of its locals to about 1,200 following the merger, and put its finances in order.

Meany told the opening session of the convention that the AFL-CIO considers restoration of the nation's railroad system "one of the nation's top priorities, and we're not going to let Congress forget it."

He said the United States "is paying a heavy price for those years and decades of blind mismanagement and neglect" of the railroads.

Meany termed it "not surprising" that President Ford is opposing a Senate-passed bill for a large-scale program to get the nation's railbeds in shape.

Ford "is fighting all job-creating bills unless they provide a bonus for business," Meany said. Because of that philosophy, "America's whole economy is in just about as bad shape as the railroads," he charged.

Meany said President Ford is "still listening" to Nixon's economic advisers. "If there is one thing that ought to be clear by now," he said, "it is that the policies that got us into this mess have been dead wrong from start to finish, and that those policies and the men who promoted them ought to be replaced before it is too late to salvage anything from the wreckage."

The AFL-CIO president vigorously defended labor's right to take and act on foreign affairs positions — including any grain sales to Soviet Russia that "rip off the American consumer." The labor movement, he said, will continue to speak up, "loud and clear, on all of the questions that affect the American people."

The UTU had a busy three-week convention program scheduled, with a number of major speakers mingled in with consideration of resolutions.

Chesser said the union represents some 250,000 workers, including in addition to railroad workers several groups of mass transit employes.

Improved railroad safety will be one focus of the convention's deliberations, Chesser indicated. The union has been critical of the Federal Railroad Administration's enforcement of federal safety laws.

On retirement reform, Chesser noted in his report to the convention that some of the problems of financing pensions stemmed from the fact that the United States was paying only 3 percent interest on money it borrowed from the retirement fund at a time when private industry funds were drawing substantially higher returns.

Abel Stresses 1976 Election Goal As IUD Marks 20th Anniversary

The Ford Administration is burying the nation's full employment policy "under a flurry of veto messages," and no matter what the President and his advisers proclaim, the economy is sick, he said.

The standoff in Washington between Congress and the President, Abel said, indicates that "we are altogether too close to a breakdown of our democratic, representative form of government." There is a liberal majority in Congress, he said, but it lacks the strength to override most Ford vetoes and the public suffers as a result of the deadlock.

AFL-CIO President George Meany underscored Abel's analysis of the economic situation, stressing the Administration's conservative policies on jobs, interest rates, education, health insurance and a number of other issues that are critical to the nation's economy.

He struck out sharply at Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.) for lecturing unions that their only role is to worry about their members' jobs, declaring that "it would be easy for the American labor movement to adopt the narrow goals of concern only for its members. But we haven't done that because it would be morally wrong, and there is no practical guarantee of success by that sort of method."

Meany cited this overriding concern in terms of labor efforts on jobs, interest rates to spur new housing, unemployment compensation and minimum wages for union and non-union members alike, aid to education, tax reform.

Meany warned also that Federal Reserve Board Chairman Arthur Burns may undertake a new campaign for wage controls and pledged an all-out fight if the issue develops.

The IUD over the years has played an important role in supplementing the work of the federation, Meany said, and in inspiring new approaches and cooperative programs.

Abel was severe in his criticism of the Ford Administration, noting that it seems to regard some men—"those who control giant banks and mammoth corporations as 'more equal' than the rest of us." The American economic system has become lopsided, he said, and "it tilts to the rich and the fortunate."

It is the job of the labor movement, he stressed, to "get our system back once again on an even keel."

Abel reviewed the passage and the administration of the Occupational Safety & Health Act, assailing the enforcement as a "disgraceful perversion of the law" and a surrender to big business. He renewed the commitment of the IUD to the long struggle of the Textile Workers against J. P. Stevens & Co. after reviewing in detail the failure of the National Labor Relations Act and the courts to bring the company into compliance with the law.

In the department's report to the convention, Abel invoked the spirit of determination that marked the years of President Franklin D. Roosevelt "to rally this nation from the reverses of the recent past toward a future in which all our citizens will find a new dimension in the quality of their lives."

The report also made the following points:

- The U.S. Supreme Court in recent months has significantly weakened the legal protection afforded trade unions in the exercise of their legitimate collective bargaining functions.
- There are 22 affiliated international unions participating with a staff of 42 organizers assigned to campaigns in eight southern states based on a survey of unorganized plants made by the IUD.
- There are currently 59 unions affiliated with the department representing a total vote in the 11th convention of 5.6 million members.
- In the two years since the last convention the net worth of the department has increased from $5.4 million to $6.3 million.

After White House Meeting:

Grain Policy Shift Lifts Dock Boycott

lop also was a participant in the meeting.

Meany said that in mid-October the government will reassess U.S. grain production and "we are going to find out what sort of a deal the Soviet Union will make in order to guarantee to the American farmer a certain amount of sales. . . ."

He added that "I am sure that the representatives of our government realize that no longer can we trust this sort of trading to private enterprise in this country whose only desire, of course, is to protect the profit motive."

Wheat and feed grain purchases by the Soviets in past years have been highly erratic, causing a serious disruption in prices paid by American consumers and farmers.

Soviet purchases made thus far during the 1975-76 season amount to 10.2 million metric tons. This compares with 1.8 million in the previous year, 6.1 million in 1973-74 and 13.7 million in the 1972-73 season.

The massive Soviet purchases in 1972 caused prices of wheat, flour, bread and other consumer food products to soar—and in the effort to head-off a repetition of those conditions this year, the AFL-CIO gave its full support of the ILA grain embargo.

In a statement issued following the White House meeting, Ford said he was immediately dispatching representatives to the Soviet Union to negotiate a long-term agreement.

Ford also disclosed he would establish a Food Committee of the Economic Policy Board under the National Security Council to monitor developments.

The President conceded in his statement that "highly volatile and unpredictable purchases" by the Soviets have caused havoc for American farmers and contribute to price instability.

"It would contribute materially to the interests of the American farmer, workers in the transportation industries and American consumers, as well as be in the interests of our customers abroad, if we could develop a longer-term and more certain purchase understanding with the Soviet Union—providing among other features, for certain minimum purchases," the President said.

Ford also noted that the discussions with the Soviets will include the completion of negotiations over shipping rates "to assure that at least one-third of the tonnage is carried in American ships."

The current agreement with the USSR on the quota for U.S.-flag ships, which expires Dec. 31, is also under renegotiation.

Siderography Union Weighs Merger Move

Ottawa—The 34th biennial convention of the Siderographers authorized the union's officers to explore merger or affiliation discussions with other unions in the printing and graphic arts industry.

The Siderographers, with an active membership of 18, are in a declining craft of steel plate transfer engraving used in the printing of currency, postage stamps and stock certificates.

James C. Small was re-elected to a third two-year term as president by the convention, which had an attendance of 23, including delegates, members and retirees.

Harvey Henderson was elected secretary to succeed John P. Ryan, who did not seek re-election, and Anthony St. Dennis was elected first vice president to represent the Canadian membership.

The New York City area was selected as the site for the union's 1977 convention.

Maryland-D.C. Labor Votes Per Capita Rise

Four hundred delegates to the 10th biennial convention of the Maryland State and District of Columbia AFL-CIO adopted a broad-ranging legislative program and a per capita increase to help carry it out.

The convention approved a per capita raise of 7 cents a month, to take effect in three stages and bring the total to 23 cents. It is the first increase since 1969. Five cents of the increase will be earmarked for COPE, raising the political education share of the per capita to 10.5 cents.

The plan approved by the delegates adds 4 cents to the per capita as of Sept. 1, of which 3 cents is for COPE. On Jan. 1, 1976, the payment rises another 2 cents of which 1 cent goes to COPE. And on Jan. 1, 1977, COPE gets an additional 1 cent.

Of the added nickel for COPE, 3 cents will be returned to area councils and 2 cents used for the state computer program.

Convention resolutions reiterated labor's support for full employment programs, national health security and trade legislation. They also expressed opposition to monitoring of phone calls by the telephone company without a warning signal, to the use of coded packages instead of clearly understandable price markings by supermarkets and to attempts to use trespass laws as anti-union devices.

The convention urged voting representation in Congress for the District of Columbia, which now has only a non-voting delegate, and called for full collective bargaining rights for public employes.

Delegates adopted a memorial resolution of tribute to Andrew Lewis, who died after having been elected president at the previous convention. President Dominic Fornaro, who replaced him, presented awards to two past presidents of the AFL-CIO central body, Charles A. Della and Woodrow F. Strong. Other awards went to locals with the highest percentage of registered voters and contributors to the voluntary COPE fund, and to volunteer COPE workers.

Major speakers included Sol Chaikin, the new president of the Ladies' Garment Workers; COPE Director Al Barkan, Rep. Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.), and AFL-CIO Regional Director Walter Waddy.

Study Reveals How Tax Shelters Help Investors Profit from 'Losses'

Losers can be big winners in the game of tax shelters.

If you have enough money to get into the game, a congressional study demonstrates, the right kind of an investment can produce a temporary paper loss that is pure gold at tax time.

The study, prepared for the House Ways & Means Committee, is based on actual income tax returns —with names deleted to preserve the confidentiality of the tax system. It shows how persons with hundreds of thousands of dollars in annual income can end up paying a lower federal income tax than a $10,000-a-year worker.

Furthermore, it's all quite legal —at least up to now. The Ways & Means Committee, however, is looking into the entire area of tax shelters as part of its attempt to draw up a tax reform package to be sent to the House floor later this year.

The tax reform bill will seek to close some of the more flagrant tax shelter loopholes, a series of committee votes indicated. A comprehensive reform package, long urged by the AFL-CIO, could bring in billions of dollars in new revenue.

The study examined some of the most common forms of tax shelters —investments in real estate, cattle feeding, motion picture films and oil drilling. In most cases, investments were made by a small group of partners who often were doctors or other high-income professionals. Usually, the tax returns of one member of the partnership would be summarized to demonstrate the effect of the paper losses on the investor's taxes.

Often, the study showed, wealthy individuals used several tax shelters to bring down their taxable income to token amounts.

One executive with earnings for the year of $427,000 plus another $4,000 in dividend and interest income managed to end up paying only $1,200 in federal taxes—about three-tenths of 1 percent of his income.

He claimed a $385,000 loss on three real estate tax shelters and a $25,000 loss on a farm investment.

The partnership tax return on one of his real estate investments showed that he and his colleagues invested $225,000 in a real estate construction project that started up on Dec. 28, just three days before the end of the tax year.

By prepaying interest on a construction loan and other expenses, the operation managed to show a net loss of $215,000. There was of course no income during the construction stage to offset expenses. Thus, each partner was able to deduct almost the full amount of his three-day-old investment from his taxable income for the year—while still retaining valuable rights in an operation that might well turn a profit after completion of the construction.

In another example, a partnership set up to build and operate a store began with a total investment of $53,000 and borrowed nearly all of the money needed. The first year's operations produced a $203,000 net loss, which meant that each investor was able to deduct nearly four times the amount of his original investment from his taxable income. The partner whose returns were examined was able to take a $127,000 deduction from his taxable income for real estate partnership losses.

The tax study looked into the returns of a physician and a businessman who were partners in another real estate venture that owns several buildings, some completed and some still under construction. Depreciation deductions and other offsets to income resulted in technical losses sufficient to enable the doctor to avoid all taxes on an income of $105,000 and the businessman to pay no taxes on an income of $262,000.

A cattle-feeding investment by a lawyer wiped out all taxes on an income of $151,000. Another cattle-feeding tax shelter managed to give each investor $2.38 in a tax-deductible "loss" for each dollar invested.

Motion picture distribution partnerships did even better for investors, according to several examples in the tax study. One partnership—with the help of depreciation deductions on motion pictures acquired for distribution—returned a $2.96 tax loss for each dollar of investment. This helped one investor with an annual income of $181,000 to pay only $1,000 in federal income taxes.

With the help of intangible drilling costs, a partner in an oil drilling enterprise that started up shortly before the end of the tax year managed to pay only $1,000 on total income of $182,000.

In preliminary votes, the Ways & Means Committee moved to curb the use of paper losses on farm operations to offset income from other sources and then took similar action on investments in oil-drilling operations.

The Administration, which in 1973 had urged elimination of the oil tax shelter, defended it in testimony before the committee.

"This is not a time to add to the burden and the battering the oil companies have been taking," Assistant Treasury Sec. Charles M. Walker said.

Woodworkers Vote Convention Delay

Portland, Ore.—The executive board of the Woodworkers voted to postpone the union's biennial convention which was scheduled to open in Montreal Sept. 15.

The action was taken at the request of the IWA's Western Canadian Regional Council where more than 22,000 members are out of work because labor disputes have closed a major part of the British Columbia forest products industry.

IWA President Keith W. Johnson said the full resources of the union are being made available to the western Canadian membership in an effort to reach equitable contract settlements. The board also authorized the IWA officers to make arrangements for rescheduling the convention for early 1976 in Montreal, tentatively in March.

NLRB Denies Minnesota Bid On Hospitals

The National Labor Relations Board has denied a petition by the state of Minnesota that the board cede jurisdiction over labor relations in the state's private nonprofit hospitals to the Minnesota Bureau of Mediation Services.

It was the NLRB's first formal order in such circumstances since the National Labor Relations Act was amended last year to extend coverage to nonprofit hospitals. The 1974 amendments preempted an applicable Minnesota law that had been on the books since 1947.

The NLRB cited three statutory conflicts between the federal and state laws—the right to strike, lockouts and compulsory arbitration. The Minnesota law prohibits strikes and lockouts and makes binding arbitration mandatory when labor disputes between charitable hospitals and their employes reach an impasse.

Construction Unions Back Bargaining Bill

A new bill designed to improve collective bargaining in the construction industry received broad support and bipartisan endorsement at House hearings. It is expected to clear Congress and reach the President's desk in tandem with the jobsite picketing bill that has already passed the House.

Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop, who shaped the bargaining bill in consultation with construction unions and employers, termed it a means of improving the industry's record of dispute settlement "with a minimum of government interference in the collective bargaining process."

Robert A. Georgine, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., told the House Labor Committee that the legislation would promote an "orderly procedure" for lessening disputes in a unique industry without resorting to wage controls or compulsory arbitration.

Earlier, President Ford had indicated at a news conference in Milwaukee that passage of the bargaining bill will assure his signature on the construction site picketing bill.

Despite criticism of the bargaining bill by some non-union contractor groups that are trying to keep the site picketing bill from becoming law, the House Labor Committee was expected to give the measure quick endorsement with the full House following up with a decisive vote of approval.

The Senate would then take up both the site picketing bill and the bargaining legislation, so that both measures would reach the President's desk at about the same time.

National and international unions would have a greater involvement in the bargaining process under the proposed legislation. The terms of the bill apply solely to the segment of the construction industry where workers are represented by standard building trades unions.

It would establish a Construction Industry Collective Bargaining Committee of 10 union representatives, 10 management representatives and up to three neutrals, including the chairman. Both the Secretary of Labor and the director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service will be ex officio members.

Local unions would be required to give their parent national unions 60 days notice before the expiration or reopening of agreements. Contractors would be required to give similar notice to their national organizations. The national labor and management groups then would forward these notices to the Construction Industry Bargaining Committee.

The committee would have a variety of options:

- It could take jurisdiction of the matter, in which case there could be no strike or lockout for 30 days past the expiration or reopening date of the contract.
- It could refer a dispute to a national craft board or to the national machinery established by a branch of the industry on which national unions and contractor associates are represented.
- It could request the national labor organizations and the national contractor organizations whose members are involved to participate in the negotiations. In that event, any new or revised collective bargaining agreement would have to be approved by the national union in order to take effect.

The proposed legislation would run for five years. The Construction Industry Collective Bargaining Committee would submit to Congress six months before the law expires its recommendations with regard to extension of the measure.

Georgine noted in his testimony that the committee will have no authority to modify any "existing or proposed collective bargaining agreement." Furthermore, "the procedures have been carefully drafted so as to provide the necessary timetable for the mediation processes to take effect."

Noting the current heavy unemployment in the construction industry—more than double the national average—Georgine saw the bill as a practical approach to helping the industry. Any disadvantages, he testified, would be "far outweighed" by the mutual benefits of establishing an orderly procedure to resolve disputes.

Education Veto Beaten, Oil Vote Falls Short

With all 100 senators present, it would have required 67 votes to make up the two-thirds majority needed to override the veto. The actual vote was 61-39.

Ford personally lobbied hard to persuade senators that he was still open to a "compromise" on gradual decontrol of oil prices if his veto were sustained.

He said in a televised statement from the White House that the veto was intended "to protect our future economic stability." But a Library of Congress study estimated that lifting of price controls on domestic oil would cost consumers $72 billion over the next five years from the direct and ripple effect of higher pertoleum product prices.

In a letter urging Congress to override "this outrageous veto," AFL-CIO President George Meany warned that soaring oil prices "could send the economy into an even deeper recession" and add to unemployment.

There remained a possibility that a stop-gap extension of controls—perhaps for 60 days—might be enacted while Congress and the Administration made another attempt to agree on an overall energy policy. The House still has before it a comprehensive energy conservation bill that it took up before the August recess and put aside during the battle to extend controls.

Cotton garment workers will receive 20 cents an hour in two steps—10 cents retroactive to Sept. 2, 1975 and 10 cents on Jan. 5, 1975. The 25-cent raise in the outerwear industry comes in a 15-cent increase as of Sept. 2 and an additional 10 cents in January.

Both groups receive the same improvements in retirement benefits. Starting in January, minimum pension benefits for persons already retired will go to $90 a month for a worker retired at 65 or older, or on permanent disability, with reduced minimums for those on early retirement.

Future retirees will benefit from a new computation formula that is expected to raise payments for persons retiring in 1976 an average of 26 percent more than they would receive under the present formula. Workers retiring in 1977 would gain an average of 40 percent more than they would have received under the present plan.

In 1977 and after, the basic retirement formula becomes $5 per month for each year of service.

Another contract change eliminates the present ceiling of $170 on retirement benefits next Jan. 1.

The contract also provides vesting rights after 10 years and improved obstetrical and hospital benefits.

Finley and Sheinkman headed the ACWA negotiating team, which included heads of joint boards in centers with large numbers of workers affected by the contracts.

Conglomerate Takeover Fought by Steelworkers

The Steelworkers are fighting the takeover of Copperweld Corp. by a French-based multinational holding company, Societe Imetal, to protect existing labor-management relations.

About 500 of the Copperweld workers brought their appeal to Washington in seeking the support of Congress and the Administration to block Imetal's bid for the company's stock. The USWA members demonstrated at the Capitol, the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Dept. before marching to the French Embassy.

Meanwhile, Copperweld has won a temporary restraining order to freeze Imetal's tender offer for the common shares of the Copperweld.

Steelworkers President I. W. Abel said in a statement issued in Pittsburgh that the USWA and the entire American labor movement have long opposed any takeovers of firms by multinational conglomerates. He said the threatened takeover could cause severe economic hardship on USWA members, their families and in communities with Copperweld operations.

"In our current labor agreements with Copperweld," Abel noted, "we have excellent pension and job security provisions that are funded and reasonably guaranteed if present management policies continue.

"We are fearful of what may happen to these employe benefits if they are subjected to the type of manipulation normally practiced by conglomerates such as Societe Imetal," he said.

Copperweld has about 4,700 employes at plants in Warren and Shelby, Ohio, Glassport, Pa., Oswego, N.Y., and in Chicago. It also has a facility under construction at Fayettesville, Tenn. The firm makes and fabricates specialty metal products, steel alloys, tubing and bimetalics for industrial users.

In its federal district court suit, Copperweld charged that insider trading had occurred before Imetal revealed its intention to make a takeover bid of $112 million. The Securities & Exchange Commission is looking into the charges.

Abel said that "aside from the violations of law involved and the threat that such a takeover may pose for the free enterprise system, we of labor are vitally disturbed by the impact the takeover would have on our members."

Imetal is controlled by the Rothschild financial empire, headed by Baron Guy de Rothschild. The conglomerate includes operations in banking, financing, metals, transportation, real estate, hotels, food and manufacturing.

"We are mindful of the management attitudes and labor relations policies of the Rothschild empire," Abel said. "We believe their labor-management attitude to be totally unrealistic and unworkable in the United States."

He said there also is concern that Copperweld would be required to alter its source of raw materials after the takeover.

"This could have a decided impact on our members employed in steel, copper and a broad array of other metal-producing operations," Abel noted as he urged both Congress and the Administration to help keep Cooperweld under American ownership.

He also called on stockholders to reject Imetal's tender offer for common and 5 percent convertible debentures, and said that the USWA was prepared to "join in whatever court action is necessary to see that laws are not violated."

In its suit, Copperweld charged Imetal with "material" omissions in its offering which would prevent shareholders from accurately assessing Imetal and its intentions. Copperweld also claimed that should the takeover go through, the FTC would likely begin proceedings to force Imetal to divest its ownership in Copperweld and would result in irreparable harm to the U.S. firm.

Murray-Green Award Pays Tribute to Beirne

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has voted to present the 1975 Murray-Green Award posthumously to Joseph A. Beirne, the late president of the Communications Workers.

The award, named in honor of Philip Murray and William Green, late presidents of the CIO and the AFL respectively, will be presented to Mrs. Beirne at the AFL-CIO convention, which opens Oct. 2 in San Francisco.

In announcing the council's action, Federation President George Meany said the award was in recognition of Beirne's "outstanding contribution to the health and welfare not only of the American people but people around the world—as chairman for many years of the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee, as an officer of AIFLD, as president of CWA and, finally, as chairman of our International Affairs Committee."

Challenges Cloud Coast Farm Votes

Fresno, Calif. — Controversy surrounding representation elections in California's agricultural industry clouded the outcome of the United Farm Workers' battle to regain bargaining units raided from them by the giant Teamsters union.

While the UFW clearly has won 24 of the elections to the Teamsters' eight, 20 other contests remain undecided because of impounded ballots, lack of a majority or other legal disputes. Figures compiled by the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Organization & Field Services show field workers chose to have "no union" in only three elections.

Besides those elections that are being challenged by one or the other of the two unions or by the growers, there is the added confusion and uncertainty of voter eligibility, bargaining unit size and other factors involved in balloting procedures.

The California Agricultural Labor Relations Board itself, the state agency charged with supervising the elections, has come in for heavy criticism from UFW President Cesar Chavez who has called for the resignation of its general counsel, Walter Kintz.

Chavez accused Kintz of making "back-room deals" with the growers and the Teamsters that have resulted in the impoundment of thousands of ballots.

He charged that Kintz had illegally entered into an agreement with the Western Growers Association to impound ballots cast at ranches of the association's 147 member vegetable growers without consulting the UFW.

Kintz said the ballots were seized pending the outcome of CALRB hearings on whether one multiemployer election can be conducted to cover all 147 members of the WGA. The Teamsters had sought a multiemployer election, and this position was supported by the growers.

The UFW argues that separate elections should be held on each ranch. Chavez noted also that impoundment of the ballots slows the momentum the union would have had if the ballots at the WGA ranches where elections have been held were counted and the results announced. He is confident the UFW won at those places.

There is also a controversy over the symbolically important election at the E. & J. Gallo company and at other grape growers who had contracts with the UFW in 1973, then signed "sweetheart" contracts with the Teamsters.

The Sept. 10 elections at Gallo was won by the Teamsters, 223 to

Senate Upholds Ford Cut In Federal Pay Increase

4.3 Million Lose 3.66% By Action

The Senate refused to overturn President Ford's cutback of a scheduled pay raise for the federal government's 1.3 million salaried employes and more than 3 million others whose compensation is linked to changes in the federal salary schedule.

They will get only a 5 percent raise next month instead of the labor-supported 8.66 percent that a government salary survey determined was needed to comply with the law linking federal pay to "comparable" private industry jobs. The vote that reduced the pay raise was 53-39.

The President's arbitrary pay ceiling also means less money for persons in the military service, who get an automatic raise whenever the civilian salary scale is changed, and for coal miners disabled by black lung disease. Their compensation, too, is tied to the federal salary schedule.

Ironically, Ford's 5 percent ceiling would most probably have been rejected if Congress hadn't linked its own pay to the federal comparability formula less than two months ago. That meant that senators had to vote on a higher pay raise for themselves.

A simple majority vote of either the House or Senate was all that was needed to reject Ford's 5 percent plan and reinstate the 8.66 percent raise. In a similar situation last year, the Senate refused by a 64-35 vote to agree to Ford's proposal to delay the annual federal salary adjustment by three months —the equivalent of a pay cut. In 1973, a deferment by then-Presi-

Protests Halt Retreat on Meat Purity

The Agriculture Dept., apparently bowing to opposition from consumer, congressional and union forces, has shelved for the time being a quietly developed plan to downgrade the federal meat inspection program.

The USDA plan would have relied on the little-known 1962 Talmadge-Aiken Act to undermine the Wholesome Meat Act of 1967 which required states to bring their inspection programs up to federal standards or turn over the inspection responsibility to the federal government.

The 1967 law, sponsored by Rep. Neal Smith (D-Iowa), provides for payment by the United States of

In New York, Chicago:

New Pacts Settle Key School Strikes

Teachers in the nation's largest and third largest public-school systems—New York and Chicago—returned to their classrooms with new contracts.

In New York, where 80,000 members of the United Federation of Teachers walked out over overcrowded classes and other work conditions, the union agreed to a new two-year pact that represented retention of class size and a compromise on other issues.

"We've gotten the most we can possibly get, given the financial situation of the city," UFT President Albert Shanker told UFT's 1,300-member delegate assembly, which recommended acceptance of the pact.

The Chicago settlement provided a 7.1 percent average salary increase for 28,000 members of the Chicago Teachers Union, plus other improvements, over a 12-month period.

CTU's 900-member house of delegates approved the terms of the tentative contract by a 655 to 10 vote. Union members were scheduled to vote on the settlement Sept. 25, CTU President Robert M. Healey said.

Meanwhile strikers in two dozen or so other communities in 10 states kept thousands of other teachers away from their jobs.

The New York settlement, approved by a vote of 10,651 to 6,695, was reached under extremely trying conditions. Confronting negotiators were financial problems that have brought the city near bankruptcy.

The pact that was finally hammered out was approved by the union's delegate assembly by a vote of 662 to 359.

The compromise agreement provides for a 45-minute shortening of the school day twice a week in return for teachers giving up two of their 45-minute preparation periods weekly for the duration of the contract.

Class sizes, the key issue for the UFT, will remain at the max-

Speakers Set For AFL-CIO Convention

Four prominent senators, two Cabinet members and other high government officials will be among the speakers at the AFL-CIO's 11th Convention, which opens Thursday, Oct. 2, in San Francisco's Convention Center.

Scheduled to address the convention on Oct. 2 are Sec. of Labor John T. Dunlop, W. J. Usery, Jr., director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service and Betty Southard Murphy, chairman of the National Labor Relations Board.

The U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, Daniel P. Moynihan, will speak on Oct. 3.

Durkin's Senate Victory Seen Rebuff To President's Economic Policies

Democrat John A. Durkin's decisive victory in the rerun of New Hampshire's senatorial election was read by winner and loser alike as evidence that President Ford's personal popularity doesn't extend to his policies.

Big, friendly crowds had turned out to applaud the President on his 11-hour motorcade through the state with Louis C. Wyman, the Republican candidate, at his side. The voter turnout, in a state with a Republican registration edge, was even higher than it had been last November.

The first time around, the election had ended in a virtual dead heat with both candidates claiming victory.

This time, it was never in doubt. Durkin's 27,000 vote lead was a decisive majority in New Hampshire terms.

Durkin saw his victory as evidence the voters "rejected Jerry Ford's program for the economy" and wanted Congress to go to work on an alternative.

Wyman, who earlier said that Ford has "put his name on the line" by campaigning in New Hampshire, said after the election that the message of opposition to heavy federal spending "may be a little too spartan for these times."

Wyman had ripped into Durkin as the candidate of "big labor" in an apparent attempt to shift the spotlight away from his own involvement in a contribution to the Nixon campaign fund that is being investigated by the Watergate prosecutor's office.

N.Y., Chicago Teachers Get New Contracts

imum levels called for under the old contract—32 pupils in elementary school, 33 in junior high school and 34 in senior high school.

The new contract also provides all instructional employes with a year or more of service a $300 cost-of-living pay adjustment, effective Dec. 1. In addition, the pact calls for two longevity increments.

All wage adjustments, however, depend on whether all or part of the school board's $43 million allocation for collective bargaining is available. The funds were frozen in light of New York's severe financial predicament which has put the city in a near-bankrupt position.

The board and the union also agreed to rehire some of the 4,500 teachers who were laid off recently, using the salaries saved during the walkout and the penalties expected to be imposed under the state's Taylor Law forbidding public employe strikes.

The size of classes, a key issue in the New York strike, also kept Chicago teachers far apart in their talks with the city school board. The tentative agreement reduces class sizes in the primary grades from a maximum of 31 to 30 and, in the intermediate and upper grades, from 34 to 33.

The union also won retention of 1,525 teaching jobs scheduled to be eliminated and a first-time dental-care plan providing up to $1,000 a year in benefits for each eligible union member.

Under the wage provisions of the pact, the starting salary of teachers will jump from $10,400 to $11,000 a year. Top salaries for teachers with doctor's degrees will go from $20,996 to $22,600.

Classes resumed in Lynn, Mass., following settlement of an 11-day teachers strike there. Two strikes ended in Rhode Island but strikes continued in other school districts in the state. Teachers also were out in large numbers in Berkeley and in San Jose in California, as well as in Pennsylvania and New Jersey.

Clerks Ratify Airline Pact For 3,400

Los Angeles—The Railway & Airline Clerks approved a 30-month contract providing substantial wage boosts and other improvements for 3,400 clerical, office and passenger service employes of Western Airlines.

The agreement provides an average 25 percent wage increase over the life of the contract, an unlimited cost-of-living allowance, greater pension benefits, improved medical insurance coverage and greater job security.

Under the pact, workers receive a 6 percent wage increase retroactive to July 1. Other increases of 5 percent each become effective on Jan. 1, 1976, and on Jan. 1, 1977. A final 6 percent hike is applied on July 1, 1977.

In addition to the general wage increases, customer service representatives—sales personnel, reservations clerks and others—receive an 11-cent hourly wage boost at the top rate and 9 cents an hour at the 49-60 months step effective Sept. 1.

Vacation and holiday improvements, currently tops among the trunk carriers, will increase automatically if any other trunk carrier provides increases.

The Lesson for Today

Minnesota Convention Affirms Political Fund

Minneapolis—The Minnesota AFL-CIO convention emphatically rejected a committee proposal to allow union members to obtain a refund of dues money contributed to state political campaigns.

"The message is out. This is a democratic organization with the delegates setting the policy," commented President David K. Roe at the 18th convention of the state federation.

The Minnesota AFL-CIO allocates three cents from monthly per capita payments for state political contributions and three cents for voter registration, political education mailings and get-out-the-vote drives.

Delegates also called for defense of seniority clauses in union contracts and adopted a resolution seeking an amendment to the state Human Rights Act recognizing seniority systems as non-discriminatory. The resolution noted that full employment is the only solution for the problems of all workers.

The convention also voted to "recommend and encourage the endorsement of Hubert H. Humphrey for President of the United States."

In an address to the delegates, Humphrey leveled a slashing attack on the economic policies of the Ford Administration. The Minnesota senator charged that the Nixon-Ford recession had cost 15 million workers their jobs in the past two years, that people had lost $300 billion in income, that cities and states lost $42 billion in tax revenues, and that the recession cost the nation 2.5 million new homes that never were constructed.

National COPE Director Al Barkan challenged the delegates to realize their full political potential by placing COPE on the top of the agenda for their local union activities. "Voter registration, COPE dollars, education, alliances. That's the recipe for political success in November 1976," Barkan said.

In other convention action, the Minnesota AFL-CIO reaffirmed support for the state usury law's 8 percent ceiling on home mortgage interest and continued to oppose ban-the-can legislation.

The delegates also called for federal legislation to eliminate monopoly control of energy sources and demanded a crash program funded by the federal government to develop alternative energy sources with safeguards to insure the manufacture and distribution of the needed energy at low-cost without profiteering.

Re-elected without opposition to four-year terms were the executive officers of the state federation: President David K. Roe, Executive Vice President Leonard O. LaShomb, and Sec.-Treas. Neil C. Sherburne.

Veterans Day Date Restored to Nov. 11

Congress completed action on a bill changing the official date of Veterans Day back to Nov. 11 — when it had been observed before enactment of the Monday holiday bill.

Veterans organizations had opposed the designation of the fourth Monday in October for the holiday and 46 state legislatures have established Nov. 11 as the state holiday date.

The new federal law, however, does not take effect until 1978. Thus the October date will remain the legal federal holiday this year and for two years thereafter.

In Convention Action:

ITU Delegates Spur Moves for Merger

Honolulu—Merger possibilities among unions in the printing and publishing industry got added impetus at the 117th convention of the International Typographical Union.

Delegates reaffirmed past efforts of the ITU to promote closer relations and unification moves with other unions and stressed the need to continue "its policy of intensive, aggressive action that is paving the way to an early attainment of the goal of merger."

The convention's merger resolution called on local ITU units to help spur merger proposals with additional expressions of support.

ITU President A. Sandy Bevis, who has been involved in developing closer ties with the Newspaper Guild since last November, set the tone for the further exploration of merger discussions in his opening remarks to the convention.

Pro-merger addresses by President Charles A. Perlik, Jr. of the Guild and Sec.-Treas. Burton F. Riley of the Printing & Graphic Communications Union were greeted by applause.

The drive for closer relations in the industry also has involved the Graphic Arts Union, which was formed in 1972 through the unification of the Lithographers, Photoengravers and the Bookbinders.

Perlik told delegates that he was hopeful a new cooperation agreement could be achieved at a meeting next month during the AFL-CIO convention which would bring together Bevis, Perlik, and Presidents Sol Fishko of IPGCU and Kenneth J. Brown of the GAIU.

Riley stressed that new technologies in the industry make it mandatory for the unions to effect a merger.

Delegates acted on a total of 155 propositions, 33 law changes and 21 resolutions.

The key issue of the convention involved deliberations over Proposition No. 128, adopted 159 to 50, that will go to a membership referendum Nov. 19.

The "omnibus" proposition provides for a reclassification option for regular members to become associate members, a major overhaul of the ITU Old Age Pension benefits plan, and the restructuring of monthly dues and per capita payments.

If approved by the regular members who are eligible to vote in the referendum, the proposed changes would go into effect in January.

Under the proposal, regular members paying pension and mortuary dues could opt to become associate members, thereby relieving them of the additional dues payments. However, they would also waive their rights to vote on matters affecting pension and mortuary plans.

Effective Jan. 20, the pension fund would be gradually reduced from the current level of $2.3 million to $1.5 million. If this reduction causes monthly benefits to drop below $10, the remaining money will be divided equally among pensioners to phase out the fund. Current benefits average about $60 a month.

Also under bylaw changes, the new dues structure would provide for a $1 a month per capita and a 1 percent payment on earnings to the international, in addition to local dues.

Retirees earning less than $500 a month would be exempt for the 1 percent payment and retirees with 60 years of continuous membership would be exempt from all dues.

The convention's laws committee suggested that adoption of the wide-ranging proposition would help stem the current decline in the union's membership and pave the way toward stepping up organizing efforts. The convention also called for support of women's rights, ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment and a reduction in working hours.

In Convention Resolutions

Industrial Union Dept. Shapes Legislative, Organizing Goals

Pittsburgh—The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. pressed for more vigorous enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act, defended the social security system against its critics and sounded a call for renewed union organizing at its 20th anniversary convention here.

Delegates representing 5.6 million workers in 59 affiliated unions also urged speedier, less costly arbitration procedures, and served warning on J. P. Stevens & Co. that it will face the entire trade union movement if it continues to deny its workers a union contract.

Other resolutions reaffirmed labor's position on such issues as national health insurance, unemployment compensation, foreign trade and civil rights—and the convention explored also the complex issues of raw materials policy with the help of a special study commissioned by the IUD. Its conclusions were reflected in a resolution calling on the government to develop a policy and programs to assure a continuing flow of raw materials necessary to American industry and to stockpile essential ingredients.

Meeting in the midst of Administration assertions that the recession is over, the convention grimly noted that "for many millions of American workers, the recession is still a bitter fact of life." And for those whose unemployment benefits are about to run out, "the worst is yet to come."

The IUD urged a shift of priorities from military to human resources spending and called on Congress to replace the "trickle-down" economic policy of the Ford Administration by "job creation programs with a commitment to full employment."

Its job safety and health statement deplored the slow pace of developing and enforcing standards, but saw some improvement in recent months. But even that modest progress is threatened, the IUD warned, by a small business lobby that is seeking to "panic Congress" into exempting small firms or providing for "courtesy" inspections instead of penalties for violations.

The convention expressed "astonishment" that it should be necessary after all these years to affirm confidence in the social security system. But it did so because of a wave of "scare stories" that the system is going bankrupt.

A detailed convention statement proposed a series of improvements in both the financing mechanism and benefit structure, including applying the social security tax to an employer's entire payroll and supplementing the wage and payroll taxes with a government contribution out of general revenue.

Several resolutions dealt with public employe issues and the problems of state and local governments. The convention endorsed the concept of "counter-cyclical" increased federal assistance to states and cities during recessions. It also affirmed that collective bargaining agreements in the public sector should be "no less binding than their private sector counterparts" and are not to be changed unilaterally.

A political activity resolution said the 1976 elections will determine whether the nation will be governed "by a President who cares about the workers . . . or by one who will continue to turn his back" on worker concerns.

President Ford's attack on government regulatory agencies was sharply criticized in another resolution.

The real problem of regulatory agencies, the convention noted, is that too often they are controlled by the industries they are supposed to regulate.

The IUD urged an increase in the federal minimum wage to $3 an hour, called for strengthening of the National Labor Relations Act through both legislation and administrative action, and urged Congress to complete passage of the construction site picketing bill "so that our friends in the building trades may be afforded the same rights . . . as have been available over the years to workers in other industries."

President I. W. Abel and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman were re-elected by acclamation, and the salary for the full-time secretary-treasurer was raised $5,000 to $40,000 a year. Two new vice presidents joined incumbents who were returned to office—President Martin J. Ward of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters and Sec.-Treas. Alvin E. Heaps of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

Major speakers, in addition to AFL-CIO President George Meany who spoke on the opening day, were Senators Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) and Richard S. Schweiker (R-Pa.), and National Urban League Director Vernon Jordan.

Coors Called Unsuited For Broadcasting Post

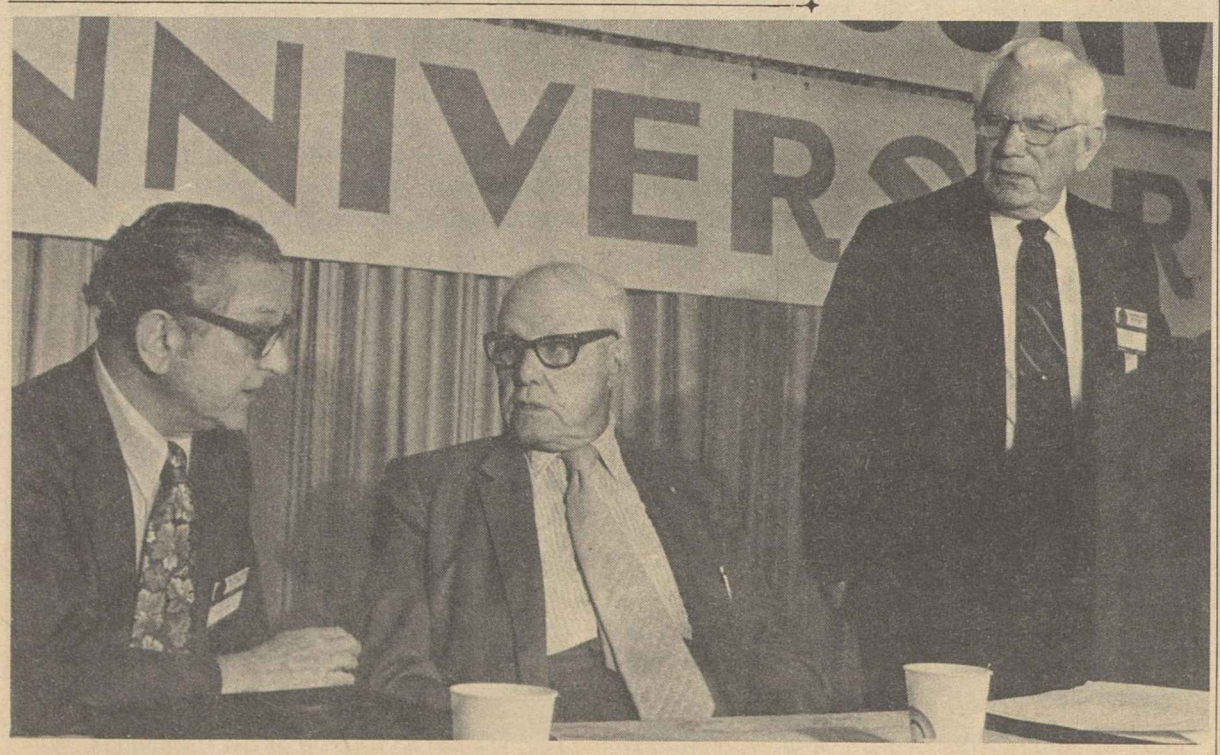
The AFL-CIO has renewed its opposition to the nomination of Joseph Coors to the board of directors of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting charging that it threatens the "integrity" of public affairs programming on public broadcasting.

In a letter to Sen. John Pastore (D-R.I.) chairman of the Subcommittee on Communications, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said confirmation of Coors "would add division, not diversity to CPB and, we believe, would portend ideological mischief with this nation's public broadcasting system, which operates on the public air waves with the public's money."

Biemiller said Coors's record "of aggressive support for his narrow, extremist political views is, of course, his constitutional right. But if these views were brought to bear in the policy-making of the CPB, they would seriously impugn the integrity of public broadcasting, particularly public affairs programming."

While the CPB board of directors "is supposed to represent the broad spectrum of American public opinion," Biemiller said, "the confirmation of persons whose ideology is either far right or far left brings neither diversity nor balance to the board."

He added: "We believe that Mr. Coors's continuing role in establishing and operating (a television news network) constitutes a real conflict of interest in fact, if not in a statutory sense. Perhaps too loose standards have been applied in the past to potential conflicts of interest in CPB, but adding yet another 'wrong' cannot ever add up to a 'right.'"



ECONOMIC PROBLEMS affecting the nation's industrial workers were reviewed at the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. convention in Pittsburgh by IUD Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman, AFL-CIO President George Meany and IUD President I. W. Abel.

Postal Subsidies Urged For Labor Publications

Pittsburgh—Labor's voice may be stifled by sharply higher mailing costs for non-profit publications, the Industrial Union Dept. warned.

An IUD convention resolution expressed concern that union periodicals will be curtailed or forced to shut down because of increased postage costs. It called on Congress to see that this doesn't happen.

The House Post Office & Civil Service Committee has approved a bill that would establish a permanent federal subsidy for the postal service in recognition of its public service obligations.

The bill should be amended, the IUD convention said, so as to allocate a specific share of this general subsidy for handling and delivery of non-profit publications.

This is necessary, the IUD said, "to enable the non-profit and labor press to continue to print their views in all the diversity that is a basic requirement of a free and vital democratic society."

IUD Study Proposes Raw Materials Policy

Pittsburgh—The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has called for a long-term federal program to safeguard the nation's sources of industrial raw material from disruption and price gouging by foreign suppliers.

The economic impact resulting from such disruptions would bring added hardships for American workers, including IUD members employed in the nation's basic industries, Department President I. W. Abel warned.

The 10-point program is detailed in an IUD-commissioned — "Raw Materials for America" — study by Stanley H. Ruttenberg and Jocelyn Gutchess, which was released at the department's convention.

Nine critical raw materials were selected for the study: bauxite, chromium, copper, iron ore, lead, manganese, nickel, tin and zinc. The authors said that while the crisis is not imminent, it is not far down the road.

"The U.S. government," Ruttenberg said, "past and present administrations, have mismanaged our resources in raw materials and minerals . . . There has been a lack of a policy going all the way back to the Truman Administration."

The study stresses that the United States should "seize the initiative and move toward the establishment of long-term raw materials stability" to protect its industrial base and the large number of jobs that metal-using industries provide."

Abel asked that if oil supplies can be cut off so easily, what about the needed raw materials? He noted that the jobs and livelihoods of millions of union members were at stake.

While no groups of nations have yet been successfully formed to control raw materials as closely as oil, the study concluded that signs are appearing that this could occur. It found that raw materials-controlling countries often act in cooperation with the multinational corporations that play a dominant role in the development and extraction of these materials.

In addition, the study found that U.S. tax policy creates incentives for overseas exploration and development of raw materials, to the detriment of the creation of jobs in this country.

The program calls for the United States to enter into bilateral agreements with supplier nations to guarantee a continuous flow of raw materials in return for capital and technical assistance, the establishment of a federal agency along the lines of NASA for research and development, and the stockpiling of critical materials.

It also recommends construction of stand-by facilities for the production and processing of materials, altering the tax base to encourage U.S. exploration, anti-trust laws to prevent the domination of the materials by a few corporations, conservation acts such as recycling, a strong U.S. merchant marine, and the establishment of a new federal Commission on Natural Resources with representation from labor, industry and consumers.

Anti-Unionism Found Hurting North Carolina

Raleigh, N.C.—A University of North Carolina professor, commissioned by the state to do a study on North Carolinians' earnings, has recommended that the state change its traditional anti-union attitude.

According to the study, workers in North Carolina average $21 per week less in wages than those engaged in similar jobs in other states, while profits of many North Carolina industries are higher than similar industries in other states.

The study was conducted by Emil Malizia, a professor from UNC's department of city and regional planning. It is expected to be one of several reports to be considered by the Office of State Planning when it drafts a new state growth policy plan.

It appears unlikely that Malizia's recommendation that the state change its anti-labor stance will appear in the final growth policy statement. Lynn Muchmore, director of the Office of State Planning, said, "There's not likely to arise any policy recommendation favoring unionization" as a result of the study.

"I never expected the policy recommendations to enter into the report," Malizia said. "I wrote the final report pretty much on my own. The reason I did it is because I would like to hear some well-reasoned discussion on the issue of earnings."

Wilbur Hobby, president of the North Carolina AFL-CIO, hailed the study as correctly focusing attention on the fact that the state's anti-labor attitude has kept wages down. North Carolina ranks last in average hourly industrial wages.

Farm Workers' Rights

CALIFORNIA FARM WORKERS finally have that most basic of rights—the right to choose which union will represent them. It means the end of the era when the growers were able to determine the workers' fate just by delivering them into the hands of an organization which offers the growers, not the workers, the best deal.

The first elections in September represented for the Farm Workers a most gratifying development. The UFW struggle to achieve a measure of economic and social respectability for agricultural workers has met formidable obstacles at every step. By a combination of organizational skill, trade union support and an unyielding dedication to their collective bargaining goals—that union has survived to see a fair set of rules of the game come into being.

Regardless of the outcome of the elections in the fall of 1975, the California law paved the way for a decent, fundamental labor relations policy toward farm workers. Such a policy is a prerequisite for farm workers to attain economic and social justice.

Cataloguing the problems that have beset the United Farm Workers would require an impressive list: bringing the Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, and the National Farm Workers Association together in organic as well as operating unity; overcoming oppressive law enforcement that resulted in unconstitutional injunctions and brutal police enforcement of those orders by officials virtually owned by the growers; continuous battles against the U.S. Immigration Service to keep the hordes of "illegals" out of the struck fields; and trying to keep the U.S. government, during the Nixon years, from frustrating the grape boycott by drastically increasing grape purchases for the military.

AIDED BY THE AFL-CIO and its allies of concerned citizens and groups, the Farm Workers overcame these early problems to gain contracts with most of the wine and table grape growing industry. These contracts brought the first taste of such basic necessities as decent wages, medical care, pensions, controls on the use of pesticides, establishment of a seniority system—and hiring halls.

The 1970 Teamsters incursion into the lettuce fields, unprincipled as it was, was pallid when contrasted with their action in 1973 as the UFW-grape growers contracts neared expiration. The Teamsters entered into a collusive agreement with the growers, usurping the rightful collective bargaining status of the United Farm Workers. There was no consultation with workers; no worker participation in the "negotiations," no ratification.

UFW leaders and members have wrought at least a minor miracle by surviving under the circumstances that have prevailed thus far. They know that winning the elections will be no simple task.

Thousands of farm workers in California are exercising their basic individual right to choose, freely, the union they want to represent them, and "the sour grapes of oppression" will "taste sweet again."

A Word Edgewise:

Compassion, Not Mockery, Key To Aiding World's Starving

By John P. Roche

IT IS HARD FOR anybody who for a quarter of a century has listened to Indian intellectuals contemptuously deriding American democracy not to get some wicked satisfaction out of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi's coup. At last (censored) count, she seemed to have put everyone who so much as criticized her cooking in the slammer. She explained in "Saturday Review/World" that this summary imprisonment without a hearing or any legal process actually improved Indian democracy considerably by taking a number of anti-social characters out of circulation. One starts to laugh derisively until he realizes what the stakes are, and recognizes that for his Indian friends this is a time of heartbreak.

Similarly, it is only human to mock the moralistic pretensions of the "Third World" spokesmen who are engaged in efforts to get the rich "North" to subsidize the poor "South." The rhetoric is appalling—if you eat a decent meal, you should feel like a monster—and it would call for saintliness to ignore the anti-American yapping of the coup-of-the-month club. However, once we have all gotten our therapy, it is vital to put the whole business in perspective and distinguish that, despite the posturing of the leaders of the less developed countries (LDCs), millions of human beings in these nations are living on the brink of starvation.

Compassion, not mockery, is in order. For an American to give the leather to the LDCs is really comparable to Muhammad Ali's boasting that he could floor John Roche and Bill Safire in 30 seconds.

The easy thing to say is, "Pull up the anchor—I'm on board," and let the Four Horsemen do their work. Indeed, I know from personal experience that sometimes callousness is a necessary defense—at least for a poor Christian like me: if I really internalized what I saw in Calcutta, I would have gone mad. And I understand the frustration that has led American missionaries, both Catholic and Protestant, in various areas of Latin America to sympathize with revolutionary movements. (Basically unsophisticated, these dedicated people rarely realize that "revolution" merely means the accession to power of a new and probably more efficient gang of exploiters.)

However, at the risk of lowering my guard and appearing to be a "bleeding heart liberal," I confess that when I see a news photo or television shot of a starving child, bloated and listless, I think of my daughter. In macrobiological terms she lucked in; statistically the odds against her being born in the United States in 1955 were astronomical. I am, of course, aware that the odds against my wife and I having an Asian or African child are equally high, but the point is that prenatal babies are not given any choice and most of those born enter, willy-nilly, a short, brutal existence (the current hard estimate is that one billion human beings are on the abyss of starvation). Thus, if I had my way, I would prefer to provide our grain surplus under PL480 (that is, virtually free) to the starving than sell it to the Soviets.

AT THIS POINT the modern acolytes of Dr. Malthus, the Doomsday druids, come panting in with the message that I have gone soft in the head, that American assistance would only constitute a drop in the bucket, that death from malnutrition and associated maladies is nature's remedy for overpopulation. In effect, we are told that the wisest policy is to blank out the LDCs: since we can't save the world from its procreative follies, forget it and enjoy a good dinner. Moreover, they add, we all know what a collection of thieves, bandits and miscellaneous rogues run the LDCs so any aid we give will be channeled to the pockets and Swiss bank accounts of the ruling elite.

I have perhaps violated the habits of a lifetime and caricatured this viewpoint unfairly. Of course we can't single-handedly make a welfare state out of the world, but why the paralysis of perfectionism? We can do our best to help.

When the critics get to the administrative level, however, they have a serious issue. There is no logic in sending aid which does not reach those who need it, but I would have no reservations about side-stepping governments and utilizing international agencies, both public and private. If the junta in an LDC refused to accept aid on this condition, that would be its problem—it would stand before the world responsible for the deprivation of its people.

Maybe this is naive and simplistic, but if forced to the choice I would prefer a bleeding heart to one of flint. Besides, in terms of the utilitarian calculus, the life you save could have been your own.

Meany at IUD Convention:

Labor's Involvement in America Stretches Beyond Plant Gates

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO President George Meany to the 11th convention of the Industrial Union Department in Pittsburgh, Sept. 10, 1975.

IT HAS BEEN the philosophy of the labor movement in America to be involved in attempting to resolve the broad problems that face the country as a whole. We have been doing that as long as there has been an American labor movement and we are not about to change.

But now this philosophy and this commitment of the American labor movement to the preservation of the American way of life and to the upbuilding of that way of life is under attack. The attack doesn't come from our old enemies of the right, the National Right-to-Work Committee or the old conservatives. No, this philosophy is under attack from a member of the United States Senate who refers to himself as a "liberal" and, of course, I'm talking about Senator McGovern.

Senator McGovern had some advice for the labor movement on Labor Day. He said the labor movement is getting bankrupt leadership—and that "the only function of a labor union is to protect the conditions of work of its members."

Well, if that is true, what are you doing here this morning? You ought to be out on the job, looking over the shoulders of the shop stewards and protecting the conditions of your members on the job. There wouldn't be any need for an IUD if we accepted that specious argument because we would stay on narrow organizational lines pursuing the narrow goals of just protecting the conditions of work of our members.

So we forget all about our resolutions on national health insurance, tax justice, education, political action—because what the senator says, in effect, is that this is none of our business.

Well, another George told workers about the same thing back in 1894. His name was George Pullman. He told the workers that he would provide for their every need so they wouldn't need unions. Well, the workers didn't listen to George Pullman and I don't think they're going to listen to George McGovern.

The members of the Industrial Union Department know that the eight hours workers are in a plant every day does not insulate them from the rest of American society. We know that after the day's work is done, your members become consumers, home owners, parents and patients.

What good would a pay increase be if it was taken away in regressive taxes? What good is safety on the job if the worker is killed in the home by a defective product? What good is a union if it isn't concerned about its members after they become unemployed or when they retire?

Well, the answer is that such a union wouldn't be much good.

In 1827 the Mechanics Union of Trade Associations—the first real central labor organization in this country—was formed with the primary goal of universal public education. For 148 years organized labor has had no peer as a champion of public education. But I guess now, according to George McGovern, that's all wrong. Well, as far as I am concerned, if we are wrong on that score, I'm damned proud that we are wrong.

AFL-CIO lobbyists and IUD lobbyists worked on Capitol Hill urging representatives and senators to override President Ford's veto of the $7 billion education appropriations bill. We didn't do this for the teachers. We did it for the children. We believe that there is something more to life than just work, and we don't think society benefits very much if workers are just mindless parts of an assembly line.

What about the minimum wage? Our members earn more than the minimum wage, but we still go to the Congress fighting, pleading, arguing for increases in the minimum wage. We could say, "Well, it doesn't affect our members." We don't look upon it from the viewpoint of our members alone because we realize that by upping the minimum wage we bring people at the lower income level into the consumer purchasing stream, and we, along with the entire community benefit.

Every time the labor movement has sought legislation to protect and benefit workers, every unorganized worker has benefitted. Workmen's compensation, Occupational safety and health, Social Security, each of these things became law because of the effort of the trade union movement.

NOW WE ARE in the midst of another battle for another piece of progressive legislation—National Health Security—and we are backing the only bill that makes quality health care a matter of right through a social insurance system.

The vast majority of union members are already covered by non-contributory health insurance programs under collective bargaining agreements. So why are we involved? Unions are disturbed about the quality of health care their members receive. We are worried about the cost.

Frankly, it would be easy for the unions to adopt the McGovern philosophy and support mandated employer-employe insurance plans. After all, most unions have the economic muscle to get their employers to pay any premium costs, plus the deductibles and co-insurance.

But we won't go that way. We believe that fundamental changes must be made in the way the nation provides health care for all of the citizens of this great nation.

Crash Program Needed:

Foot-Dragging Snags Efforts For U.S. Energy Independence

THE FAILURE of the Administration and Congress to coordinate the push for an energy-independent nation by 1985 is impeding efforts to cut U.S. reliance on foreign oil, President Martin J. Ward of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters declared.

Despite wide bipartisan support for Project Independence, Ward said little has been done to meet that goal.

He said it would take a crash program to complete the list President Ford spelled out in his State of the Union Message last winter: produce 1 million barrels of synthetic fuel and shale oil a day; construct 200 major nuclear power plants; open 250 major new mines; build 30 new major oil refineries; drill several thousand new oil wells; insulate 18 million homes, and cut drastically automobile gas consumption.

It will take something similar to the Manhattan Project of World War II to meet the goals of Project Independence, Ward declared. He was questioned by reporters on the AFL-CIO public affairs interview Labor News Conference.

Ward urged more emphasis on the use of coal and other fuels that are most readily available in the United States and less on such comparatively scarce fuels as oil. He pointed out that this country has about "30 percent of the known coal reserves in the world"—enough, some scientists say, "to last this country another 300 or 400 years." He said that a determined effort that shapes reasonable approaches can meet the serious problems of transportation and environmental safeguards.

Ward also called for stepped-up construction of nuclear power plants and other utilities. He said the United States has the capability to build the 200 nuclear power plants needed, but "unfortunately, other countries are moving ahead of us in the processing of nuclear fuel." He warned that if we don't put our technology to work on that problem, "we are going to be dependent on other countries—import nuclear fuel" for U.S. plants, and face the same kind of cartel problem that exists with the OPEC nations.

Reporters questioning Ward were Ben Rathbun of the Bureau of National Affairs and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Incorporated. The program is aired Tuesdays on the Mutual radio network.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

TAXATION IS NOT merely a means to provide revenues to the federal, state and local government but, as most economists recognize, taxation is a major instrument of social and economic policy.

Ideally, taxes should be so apportioned that they will distribute the cost of government equally among various income groups and the revenues will promote economic growth, stability and efficiency.

Ideals are rarely achieved. More often they are goals. Two developments on the Washington scene, though, show that we are rapidly moving away from these goals and the tempo may be picking up.

We have known for a long time that loopholes for the wealthy and the rich corporations have been built into our tax system. Some of these loopholes or "tax shelters" were brought out in broad daylight for public inspection by the House Ways & Means Committee the other day.

Chairman Al Ullman unveiled a detailed breakdown of 37 federal tax returns showing legally sanctioned use of the loopholes to avert most or all of their income tax bills.

The documents demonstrated dramatically how "investments" in real estate, oil-drilling, cattle-feeding and movie rentals—many involving "firms" set up only hours before the end of the taxable year—can offset huge incomes.

Here are a few:

- A $448,000-a-year executive who paid a total of $1,200 in taxes. It seems he invested in a real estate syndicate organized on Dec. 28 and the affairs of the syndicate were so set up that he had a "paper" loss of $215,000.
- A lawyer earned $111,000 in salary, dividends and interest and was sheltered by a "paper" loss from a cattle-feeding firm that was formed on Dec. 19. He paid no taxes.
- A physician, who earned $156,000 in salaries, dividends and interest, received a depreciation loss in a motion picture distribution firm that enabled him to get out of paying any taxes whatsoever.

These examples only touch the surface of the type of tax loopholes that concern most citizens. Every dollar that the wealthy individual and the rich corporation escapes from taxation places the burden on the worker, his family and other lower and middle income families.

AN EVEN MORE blatant effort to shift the tax burden is now being espoused by the Ford Administration with Treasury Sec. William E. Simon as its chief advocate.

He says that private corporations should be relieved of much of their burden because capital formation is needed for investments.

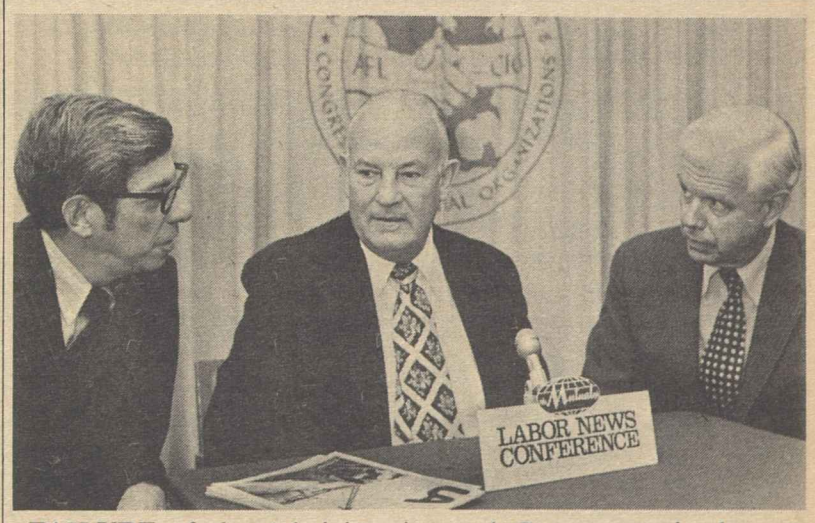
In testimony before Ways & Means, Simon said that "there is no single correct amount that we can identify." However, he said, "what is important is that we have sufficient savings and investment to permit us to continue with some reasonable rate of growth."

For many, this looks like just another tax bonus for the wealthy. Many economists say that the key to adequate capital formation is a return to vigorous economic growth. They see no need of further distorting the tax structure to achieve it.

What the Administration may well succeed in doing, is scuttle the efforts for tax reform or tax justice and efforts to return to tax laws where equity for all citizens is the prerequisite. And 1975 was thought to be the year of tax reform.

This is the concern of Rep. Charles A. Vanik (D-O.), a member of the Ways & Means Committee, who suggested that far from closing tax loopholes that make the federal tax system unjust, "we may be lucky just to hold onto the sieve we have now."

The decision is in the lap of Ways & Means. The Constitution grants Congress a broad power to levy and collect taxes, and it all begins with the House of Representatives and its Ways & Means Committee.



FAILURE of the Administration and Congress to implement Project Independence has been a setback in the effort to cut U.S. reliance on foreign oil, President Martin J. Ward of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, center, charged on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Harry Conn, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Ben Rathbun of the Bureau of National Affairs. The AFL-CIO produced program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Labor songs and folk tunes spice up the picnickers' fare.

Musical Salute to Bicentennial

A LABOR DAY MUSICAL program at Wolf Trap Farm Park near the nation's capital helped usher in the bicentennial year for the trade union movement.

The six-hour musical salute to America's workers—typical of many other Labor Day events that union organizations sponsored around the country—featured top-line performers and musicians, and several amateur groups.

The Wolf Trap picnickers and pavilion audience were treated to musical entertainment to fit every mood and pleasure. Traditional labor songs, folk singers, blue grass, Dixieland, chamber music, blues, patriotic tunes and the big band sound rounded out the rainy day program.

Featured performers included Theodore Bikel, who is president of Actors' Equity; Odetta, John Raitt, Oscar Brand and Harden & Weaver, a Washington radio announcing team. Music was provided by the Billy Taylor Trio, the Billy Roberts band, Tom Gwaltney's Dixielanders, the Ars Colonia, the Tennessee Cutups, Horan-Toperzer Lab Band and the Folklore Society of Greater Washington.

The program was sponsored by the Music Performance Trust Funds of Musicians' Local 161-710 in cooperation with the National Park Service and the AFL-CIO.

One-Sided 'Detente' Denounced at TUC

Blackpool, England—The Ford Administration's one-sided policy of detente with the Soviet Union came under attack by two AFL-CIO vice presidents in addresses before the British Trades Union Congress here.

Federation Vice President William Sidell, president of the Carpenters, told the 107th annual convention of the TUC that American labor considers "our own well-being and that of our trade-union allies in the free world threatened by a policy called 'detente.' "

Sidell, appearing as a fraternal delegate from the AFL-CIO, noted that detente has one meaning to Westerners and another, quite different meaning within the Kremlin where, in fact, "every signed agreement appears to have a double meaning."

In the same vein, Vice President Sol Stetin attributed recent farm price increases to this year's American grain sales to Russia —sales which he viewed as virtual concessions to the USSR.

"Once again, the American consumer will pay the bill for the Administration's detente with the Soviet dictatorship," Stetin observed. "And that may be only the beginning." Stetin, also a fraternal delegate, is president of the Textile Workers Union of America.

Sidell said that the Soviet Union and other Communist dictatorships never live up to any solemn agreement unless that agreement gives them an overriding advantage.

"Such violations of treaty are documented by history," Sidell said. "One need travel no farther than Czechoslovakia and Hungary to see the results of shattered hopes and promises. Dictators take all. They give nothing. They consider honesty a weakness."

Sidell charged that U.S. participation in the United Nations is a mockery of the democratic principles for which America has stood, declaring that the UN now not only tolerates but actually eulogizes "thugs," such as members of the Palestine Liberation Organization and the apparent dictatorship of India.

"The AFL-CIO will not submit, meekly, passively or otherwise," he declared. "We shall oppose any policy of detente which does not operate evenly. The United States and the free world must derive as many advantages, as many benefits as the Soviet dictatorship and its client states."

Sidell and Stetin both called for a tightening of regulations affecting U.S.-based multinational corporations which since the late 1960s have been exporting American jobs, equipment and technical know-how.

"We of the AFL-CIO believe in the importance of international trade," Stetin stressed. "But we believe it must be fair trade and that means regulation of the multinationals."

As a result of the mushrooming growth of multinational firms in recent years, Stetin noted, large segments of entire industries have been wiped out, and the United States has been faced with a rising tide of imports. This in turn has caused widespread plant closings and higher unemployment in America.

"The AFL-CIO has urged the U.S. government to regulate imports to halt the job-destroying flood tides of imports," Stetin said. "We have proposed government measures to change the tax laws to stop the unfair, special benefits given U.S.-based multinationals.

"We have urged government controls on the export of capital and technology. What we seek is fairness and balance in the area of international trade and investment," Stetin said. "What we have gotten so far is minimal."

British Labor Endorses Voluntary Wage Limit in Economic Crisis

Blackpool, England—Britain's Trades Union Congress voted to support a voluntary wage restraint policy in the face of a grave economic crisis compounded of high unemployment and a 25 percent inflation rate.

The Congress, representing 10 million members of affiliated unions, accepted the pay increase standards developed by the Labor Party government in consultation with the TUC. It calls for holding wage increases negotiated during the next 12 months to a flat 6 pounds a week (about $12.60), with no increase for the relatively small group earning above 8,500 pounds a year.

The vote on the key resolution was more than two-to-one—6,945,000 to 3,375,000 on a roll-call.

From the TUC viewpoint, a key element in the understanding was that pay limitations should be voluntary.

The Government agreed not to seek legislation unless the voluntary efforts, failed, and it looked to the annual TUC convention for support. Wage increases earlier this year had been approaching the 30 percent level as workers and their unions sought to catch up with price hikes.

The flat-increase feature of the pay formula was criticized by a number of unions concerned about compression of wage differentials, but they were outvoted on the issue.

As an important adjunct to the pay policy, the TUC called for a wide range of economic measures by the government to combat unemployment.

It proposed an expanded public works construction program, selective import controls and a curb on export of capital.

In debate during the five-day convention, the consensus was that the voluntary wage restraint could provide some help to the economy, although full recovery was not likely until the world economic picture improves.

It was made clear that, from the TUC position, the Labor Party government will be judged by its response to the trade union movement's major concern to preserve and create jobs.

New Nabisco Contract Boosts Pay 92 Cents

A new two-year contract providing wage increases totaling 92 cents an hour has been ratified by members of the Bakery & Confectionery Workers employed at 15 Nabisco plants across the country.

The agreement covers over 10,000 B&C members, and was approved by more than 95 percent of those voting. Earlier it received the unanimous endorsement of the union's negotiating committee.

Workers' pay is increased immediately by 50 cents an hour, retroactive to Sept. 1. Next Sept. 1, wages are scheduled to rise another 42 cents an hour. Other highlights of the pact:

- An increase in company contributions to welfare improvements, as well as establishment of a dental plan in the second year of the agreement.
- Classification adjustments covering over 3,500 workers.
- Pension improvements as a result of higher company contributions that will enable a worker with 40 years of service to receive $357.50.

The pact contains a number of other improvements relating to uniform allowance, vacations and leaves of absence. The company and the union also agreed to establish a joint committee to discuss job enrichment.

In addition, it was agreed to establish another joint committee to meet before Jan. 1, 1976, to discuss possible changes in the present basic contributory group life insurance cancellation provision as it relates only to workers who may be laid off.

Protests Block Retreat On Meat Inspection

half the cost of state inspectors' salaries.

The Talmadge-Aiken Act permits the USDA to enter into cooperative agreements under which a few state-inspected plants have gained federal status. Under these arrangements, state-employed inspectors work under the supervision of federal officials, and the federal government pays half the inspectors' salaries.

The department's latest proposal would have increased federal payments for the state inspectors' salaries from 50 to 80 percent, a proposal repeatedly rejected by Congress. If allowed, states would be encouraged to adopt Talmadge-Aiken agreements instead of turning their plants over to local federal inspection.

Rep. Smith said he has since been informed by Richard L. Feltner, assistant secretary of agriculture, that USDA does not plan to proceed with the plan "at the present time."

"It is not entirely clear at the moment what future action the department has in mind," he noted, "but the plan is dead for now. That is good news for consumers."

Among those who protested the USDA plan were the Meat Cutters & Butcher Workmen, which expressed its opposition in a letter to each member of the Senate Agriculture Committee. The Consumer Federation of America also registered its protest.

"The real danger in the Agriculture Dept. plan is that it will start a downward competition in meat inspection standards," CFA's executive director, Carol Tucker Foreman, warned. She noted that if the federal share under the Talmadge-Aiken Act were increased to 80 percent, it would in effect bribe the states to shift to the lower standards of the 1962 statute.

Dr. King's Birthday Urged as Holiday

The union that Martin Luther King was helping when he was slain by an assassin's bullet urged Congress to declare his birthday anniversary a national holiday.

President Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employees noted in testimony before a House subcommittee that Dr. King was in Memphis to help striking sanitation workers win union recognition when he was killed.

The last AFL-CIO convention, in 1973, endorsed the proposal to make Dr. King's birthday a holiday.

Farm Worker Votes Held Up By Challenges

131, but this tally did not include 197 challenged ballots. The challenged ballots include 129 "economic strikers," workers who went out on strike in 1973 because Gallo did not sign a contract with the UFW.

California's new law authorizing the current elections does not spell out precisely what constitutes an "economic striker." If the UFW is successful in overcoming the vote challenge, the outcome of the Gallo election could be reversed.

Another controversy centers on the UFW's protest of a CALRB regulation giving the union's organizers only limited access to field workers. Unless they can speak freely to workers, the UFW charges, the state's new agricultural labor relations law is meaningless.

Altogether, the CALRB reports, about 100 unfair labor practice charges have been filed by various parties since the elections got under way shortly after Labor Day.

1,100 Granted Aid as Imports Cut into Jobs

More than 1,100 workers in four states have been certified by the Labor Dept. as eligible to apply for trade adjustment assistance as the result of petitions by their unions charging that competition from imports were a major cause of layoffs and work reductions.

The group includes 300 members of the Allied Industrial Workers at the Sheller Globe Corp. plant in Portland, Ind., who produced steering wheels and other auto parts.

Nearly 600 workers at the Airco Electronics Division plant in Bradford, Pa., were certified for aid on the basis of a petition by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

The United Textile Workers successfully petitioned for benefits on behalf of 15 workers at the Tullahoma, Tenn., plant of Wilson Sporting Goods Co. which turns out baseballs and softballs.

Assistance to nearly 200 workers who formerly produced motorcycles and snowmobiles at three Harley-Davidson plants in Milwaukee, was granted as a result of a petition filed by the Allied Industrial Workers.

Trade adjustment assistance includes cash benefits, training, counseling, job placement and relocation allowances. Benefits amount to 70 percent of a worker's average pay, not to exceed the national average wage in manufacturing.

Senate Backs Ford:

Federal Wage Hike Limited to 5 Percent

dent Nixon was rebuffed, 72-16. But on those occasions, salaries of senators were not affected.

An attempt to overturn the 5 percent ceiling could still be made in the House, but it is unlikely.

The White House made much of the budget cost of the 8.66 percent formula—an estimated $1.6 billion over the 5 percent figure. But as the American Federation of Government Employees and the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. noted, the cost of living has gone up 18 percent since October 1973 but salaried federal workers have received only a 5.5 percent raise during that period.

Ford claimed his pay cutback plan would enable the federal government "to lead the fight against inflation by example."

AFL-CIO President George Meany retorted that it was "grossly unfair for the President to say federal employes must sacrifice while his Administration's food and energy policies are forcing up the prices of everything they must buy."

The 5 percent ceiling does not affect the government's hourly-paid blue-collar workers whose wages are adjusted on the basis of prevailing rates in the localities where they work.

The House, meanwhile, moved towards passage of a comprehensive energy conservation bill that includes a rollback of domestic oil prices.

The labor-supported measure shaped up as the principal congressional alternative to the Ford Administration approach of counting on high prices to reduce the nation's consumption of fuel and its reliance on oil imports.

Apart from its price control features, it includes tough conservation requirements including limiting gasoline consumption over the next three years to 1973 levels, and an allocation plan so that no section of the nation will be shortchanged. It also would impose a penalty on auto manufacturers who failed to bring the average gasoline consumption on their total auto production to 18.5 miles a gallon by 1978 and 28 miles per gallon by 1985.

The price section would bring the average price of domestic oil below the levels set under the now-expired oil price control legislation.

An attempt to delete the entire price control section of the bill was beaten on a key 242-151 vote. Favoring the controls were 218 Democrats and 24 Republicans; opposed were 109 Republicans and 42 Democrats.

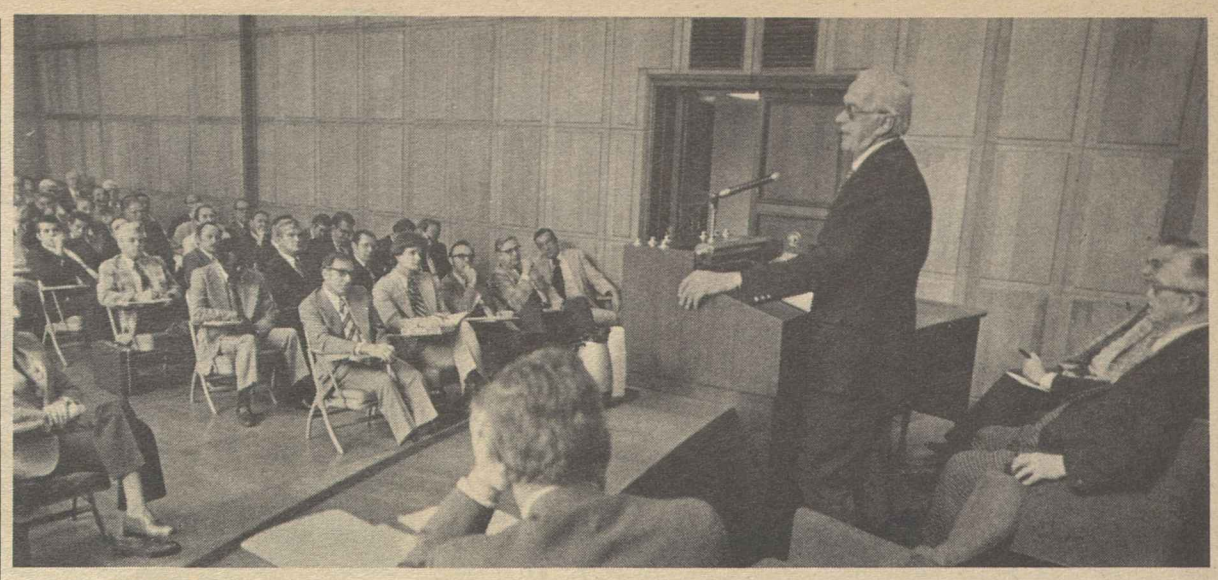
The Senate passed its own version of energy legislation earlier this year, making it possible for a House-Senate conference committee to put together a compromise bill that then would be submitted for final passage.

The Senate, after acting on the federal pay resolution, turned back to an appropriations bill carrying funds for the Labor Dept.

As in past years, small business employer groups sought to curb enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act by amending the appropriations bill.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, only one weakening amendment had been adopted—and that was more in the nature of a foot-in-the-door threat. The Senate agreed that in establishments with 15 or fewer workers, the penalty for a non-serious violation found on a first inspection could not exceed $50.

Actually, most non-serious violations do not bring a fine and the average penalty is $35. But as Sen. Edward W. Brooke (R-Mass.) noted in opposing the amendment, the technical definition of "non-serious" would cover violations involving deafening levels of noise and hazardous conditions of dust and ventilation. The Occupational Safety & Health Administration can now impose fines of up to $1,000.



LABOR'S VIEWS on the provisions and enforcement of the National Labor Relations Act are sought by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), chairman of a House subcommittee that will hold oversight hearings. Thompson discussed the scope of the hearings with union representatives who met at AFL-CIO headquarters to compare experiences and seek a consensus on problem areas.

Burns Offers Aid to Banks —Not City

The Federal Reserve Board apparently is willing to let financially troubled New York City go down the drain, but not its banks.

This is the gist of a letter from the Fed's chairman, Arthur E. Burns, to Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, chairman of the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, who asked for Burns's views on the New York City financial crisis.

Humphrey also asked the Fed what contingency plans it had prepared in the event of a full or partial default by the city. Burns replied that the board, as the nation's "lender of last resort," had developed emergency plans to assist banks that might be threatened by the city's collapse.

But Burns did not mention any plans to prevent a default by the city, an omission that obviously disheartened Sen. Humphrey who observed:

"Unfortunately, Chairman Burns stopped short of endorsing any proposals which would have averted the very crisis that the Fed's contingency plans sought to minimize."

Humphrey also noted that, despite a $2.3 billion aid package enacted by the New York state legislature to keep the city afloat for the next three months, the default crisis has not been resolved.

"It has merely been delayed for three months," he said. "In December, New York will quite probably face the same threats of default that it experienced this week and the national consequences will be the same."

Humphrey, in a statement accompanying the release of Chairman Burns's letter, said the Fed's plans to bail out banks that might be hurt by New York City's financial collapse "indicate to me that the national financial and economic consequences of a default are so significant that we should immediately explore the possibility of implementing programs to prevent a default."

Burns indicated in his letter to Humphrey that the Fed would allow unlimited emergency lending to troubled banks whether or not they are members of the Federal Reserve System.

Labor Checks Status Of Vietnam Refugees

Indiantown Gap, Pa.—Labor leaders who recently visited one of the nation's largest Vietnamese refugee centers here came away convinced that nearly all its adult residents want really only two things—a sponsor and a chance to work.

Included in the tour were President Harry Boyer of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO; John McManus, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services; Charles Sims, area representative of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute in Philadelphia, and a number of labor community-services representatives in the East.

Also visiting the center were Ambassador John Eisenhower, son of the late President and chairman of President Ford's Advisory Commission on Refugees, leaders of the Red Cross and Pennsylvania state officials.

McManus said the tour "told us a lot about the refugees themselves, as well as their hopes and problems. The visit also made it clear that no matter how generous and effective the various agencies are in providing for the refugees, a center can only be considered by them as a first step toward resettlement."

"The essential second step," McManus said, "is sponsorship for refugees and their acquisition of jobs. That will demand the sustained cooperation of government, private agencies, labor and employers."

David Oliver, an AFL-CIO Community Services representative, said he met six former South Vietnamese labor leaders in the area of the center he toured. "We had a lively exchange on labor issues," Oliver reported. "They explained South Vietnam's labor structure and expressed hope that they could be sponsored by a group from our labor movement."

A recent survey of the center, which has 11,500 refugees, showed that about 40 percent of those over 16 were considered eligible for the job market by virtue of having some "marketable skills." Of the 40 percent, the breakdown of skills in various fields is: 9.3 percent, clerical; 7.8 percent, mechanical; 7.5 percent, professional or managerial; 6.3 percent, technical; 5.3 percent, construction, and 3.8 percent, agriculture.

The 60 percent of the refugees considered without marketable skills fell into one of three groups—soldiers, students or housewives.

AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis has called upon labor leaders in areas with jobless rates of under 9 percent to join with management-government committees in seeking jobs for Vietnamese refugees. At the same time, he has emphasized labor can do only so much. "The heart of the resettlement problem is employment, and jobs are the responsibility of employers."

Speakers Schedule Set for Convention

6, will include the presentation of the AFL-CIO Murray-Green Award posthumously to Joseph A. Beirne, the late president of the Communications Workers and a federation vice president. It will be accepted by Mrs. Beirne.

Speakers that day will include Senators Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) and Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) in the morning, and Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) and Lloyd Bentsen (D-Tex.) at the afternoon session.

Sec. of Defense James R. Schlesinger has also accepted an invitation to address the convention, at a time still to be set.

The two fraternal delegates from the British Trades Union Congress will be Daniel McGarvey, president of the Boilermakers, Shipwrights, Blacksmiths & Structural Workers, and Martin Redmond of the National Union of Mineworkers. The Canadian Labor Congress delegate will be Executive Vice President Shirley G. E. Carr.

Two evenings of entertainment featuring union members in the performing arts will be presented during the convention in programs arranged by the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center. They will be shown at the AFL-CIO headquarters hotel, Hyatt-on-the-Square, at 9 p.m. on Oct. 2 and Oct. 6.

The Oct. 2 "An Evening with Actors" program will feature Theodore Bikel, president of Actors' Equity, and other noted performers. The Oct. 6 program, "An Evening with Musicians," will present a well-known area jazz group and soloists from the San Francisco Opera Company.

The programs are in cooperation with the Associated Actors & Artistes, the Musicians and the Stage Employes.

Rail Waymen Name Zeh As General Counsel

Detroit—Geoffrey N. Zeh has been named general counsel of the Maintenance of Way Employes. He also will serve as the BMWE research director.

Zeh, 32, was formerly with the Washington, D.C., law firm of Mulholland, Hickey & Lyman where he handled legal cases for a number of railroad unions.

ment did actively support Durkin on a program keyed to jobs and economic stimulus, and he carried all the cities while holding down the GOP margin in the rural areas.

The conservative wing of the state's Republican Party was most active in support of Wyman, who had served five terms in the House before running for the Senate last year. Ronald Reagan, the former California governor who is the favorite son of the GOP's right-wing, was among those who campaigned for him.

Durkin's election gave the Democrats a 62-38 majority in the Senate. In the previous Congress, the margin had been 58-42.

Last November, Wyman was initially announced as the winner but an official recount showed Durkin a 10-vote winner and he was so certified. But a Republican-controlled state ballot commission then reversed the action and declared Wyman the winner by two votes.

The Senate struggled for months to recount disputed ballots and determine the winner, but a Republican filibuster prevented the issue from being resolved. Finally, the rerun of the election sought by Republicans was agreed to as the only means of breaking the deadlock.

Meany Hits Congress' Use Of Budget to Cut Job Plans

Profit Rise Tops Early Forecasts

Corporate profits, both before and after taxes, climbed sharply during the second quarter of 1975 and substantially exceeded the Commerce Dept.'s earlier prediction.

The updated government figures show that after-tax profits of corporations rose at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $70.3 billion in the three months that ended June 30.

That was up nearly 13 percent from the $62.3 billion rate of the previous quarter. Initially the Commerce Dept. had estimated that second-quarter profits had risen only 8.2 percent to a $67.4 billion rate.

Before-tax profits for the quarter —at an annual rate of $113.3 billion—were $12.1 billion above the first-quarter rate and $4.4 billion more than last month's estimate.

Most of the increase in profits occurred in manufacturing, the Commerce Dept. said, with "substantial gains" for both domestic petroleum refiners and chemical producers. Automobile manufactures reported a smaller loss than previously, and other industries chalked up gains.

A separate report on factory profit margins, issued by the Federal Trade Commission, showed that manufacturers made 4.7 cents for each dollar of sales in the second quarter—up from 3.7 cents in the first quarter. The rate was below the 6 cents posted in the second quarter of 1974, however.

The nation's gross national product (GNP) rose at an annual rate of 1.9 percent after adjustment for inflation—the first gain since the last quarter of 1973.

AT SENATE Budget Committee hearings, AFL-CIO President George Meany warned of the danger of a new economic downturn if Congress continues to compete with the Ford Administration to hold down spending for job programs.

Warns New Slump Threatens Nation

By David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO President George Meany prodded Congress to stop playing "budget one-upmanship" with the Ford Administration and do more to get America back to work.

He warned the Senate Budget Committee that a new economic slump threatens to add to the high unemployment and idle industrial capacity that has turned most of the nation into a vast "distressed area."

The Budget Committee is updating the spending target that Congress set for itself earlier this year and Meany urged a new measuring rod for legislation.

It's "stupid," he said, to consider legislation solely in terms of cost. The only target should be "the needs of the American people."

Meany expressed labor's full agreement with a Budget Committee report earlier this year contending that "the only way to stop deficit spending is to bring the economy close to full employment."

But "the committee did not heed its own counsel," he observed. Actions such as the emergency tax cut helped, but not enough. And there are new "danger signs" in addition to an Administration forecast of an unemployment rate at a recession-level 7.9 percent during 1976 and remaining above 5 percent as far off as 1980.

Meany cited the renewed rise in interest rates, continued high inflation, the crisis of the cities typified by New York's near-bankruptcy, and the scheduled expiration of the emergency income tax cuts at the end of this year.

If the cuts aren't extended, Meany said, American consumers

Prices Up 8.6 Percent Over Year

By John R. Oravec

Retail prices for August remained 8.6 percent above the year-ago level although the consumer price index showed the smallest monthly rise in three years—two-tenths of 1 percent.

The slight upward nudge in the CPI came in the wake of an eight-tenths of 1 percent jump in June and a 1.2 percent surge in July. A number of economists reacted by warning that the August figures were more likely an aberration than a trend, and the White House agreed with the assessment.

Lower prices for some food items last month helped offset increases in other commodities and services, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

While prices declined for fresh fruits and vegetables, beef, cereals, bakery products and a few other food items, higher prices were recorded for clothing, used

In Convention Action:

Job Goals Stressed By Building Trades

By James M. Shevis

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., whose four million members have been hit harder than any other group of workers during the current economic recession, adopted a positive approach to the myriad problems besieging the industry at the department's 58th convention here.

"This is no time to wring our hands over the situation which currently exists," BCTD President Robert A. Georgine told the 500 delegates.

"Our task is to suggest ways and devise means of escape from the economic swamp in which we are expiring."

The convention responded by adopting a wide-ranging program called for steps to reduce employment in the building trades.

A major resolution demanded that the Ford Administration take immediate action to spur the depressed residential construction industry.

"The Administration claims of a recovery in housing construction are a sham," the resolution declared. "Rhetoric cannot hide the facts."

Housing starts are at their lowest levels in nearly 10 years; the unsold inventory of new homes is bulging; prices of homes are at record levels and mortgage rates are still around 9 percent for homes and 10 percent for apartment projects, the resolution pointed out.

Other major priorities spelled out by the convention included:

- Quick enactment by Congress of the bill titled Equal Treatment for Craft and Industrial Workers, commonly known as the situs picketing bill, which would assure building trades unions the same picketing right as workers in other industries.
- Strengthening the Davis-Bacon Act, which requires payment of

Burns for Public Jobs, But at Dirt-Cheap Pay

Athens, Ga.—Chairman Arthur F. Burns of the Federal Reserve Board hasn't really changed his conservative spots even though it briefly seemed that way during his speech to a University of Georgia audience.

Burns raised some eyebrows by embracing the concept that government should be "an employer of last resort" when private industry can't provide jobs for all who are looking for work.

But he quickly made clear that he wasn't really aligning himself with a view long held by the trade union movement and liberal economists.

Burns said that public jobs—"in hospitals, schools, public parks or the like"—should be available "to anyone who is willing to work at a rate of pay somewhat below the federal minimum wage."

He also suggested "certain safeguards—perhaps through a constitutional amendment—that would limit upward adjustment in the Union Teachers Face Arrests, Fines, Curfew

Wilmington, Del.—Mass arrests, heavy fines and an unprecedented daylight curfew have failed to force this city's teachers back to work without a contract.

While there are bigger school systems still out on strike, Wilmington has emerged as a case history of the pressures on teachers when a city sets out to break rather than settle a strike.

The union's contract had expired last June, negotiations had made little progress, and just after Labor Day the 800 members of the AFT local voted not to work without a contract. With few exceptions, they haven't.

Delaware, like most states, has a law prohibiting public employes from striking.

It has been used to arrest or cite for contempt nearly half the teachers, and to break up picket lines.

For more than a week, a fine levied against the local has been mounting at the rate of $1,000 a day. The president and vice president of the local are being fined $100 each for every day the refusal to work continues, and three other officers have been hit with $50-a-day fines.

On Sept. 22, after a negotiating session broke up with no progress

BURIAL SERVICES are conducted for Jesse Miller, who was struck down on a Machinists' picket line at Indiana, Pa., by a strikebreaker operating a tractor-trailer rig. Miller and fellow IAM Local 1582 members have been striking the Indiana plant of Fisher Scientific Co. since Aug. 6.

Pennsylvania Workers Mourn Striker's Death

Indiana, Pa.—Western Pennsylvania union members buried 58-year-old Machinist Jesse Miller this week, latest in a long line of labor martyrs in the state.

Miller, on strike, was run down, knocked 20 feet and injured fatally at a Machinist picket post here. A strikebreaker drove the tractor-trailer rig.

State police arrested the driver, James Berger, 30, of Creston, Ohio, and charged him with criminal homicide, failure to stop at the scene of a traffic accident and failure to stop and identify himself. He was denied bail and committed to the Indiana County jail pending a preliminary hearing set for Sept. 26.

Pennsylvania Gov. Milton Shapp headed the mourners at a memorial service for Miller at the plant gates. Hundreds of members of many unions marched from the Indiana County Fair Grounds to the scene of Miller's death. The service, sponsored by the County Central Labor Council, drew top officers of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO headed by Executive Vice President Mike Johnson.

Earlier, at burial services at Jefferson Memorial Cemetery in Pittsburgh, Machinist Vice President Sal Iaccio of New York City headed a large contingent of Machinists members. These included nearly 150 of Miller's fellow strikers.

Miller's killing occurred Sept. 17 at the gates of the Fisher Scientific Co. plant at Indiana where the company forced the 260 members of Machinists Local 1582 to strike Aug. 6.

According to the three pickets on duty at one side of the plant gate, Miller, who was not on picket duty, was walking across the plant driveway to visit them when he was struck.

They said the truck came careening down the highway, suddenly swerved right into the plant gate, struck Miller, then continued on 400 feet to a company loading dock. There the driver, Berger, backed in and slammed down the overhead doors.

The union said the truck had come from a nearby Fisher Scientific warehouse and was leased from a Cleveland firm.

Miller was a maintenance man at the plant that manufactures many kinds of scientific instruments and laboratory equipment. A past commander of his Veterans of Foreign Wars post, he is survived by his wife, Dorothy, and his son, Jesse.

North Carolina Unions Set Organizing Goals

Greensboro, N.C.—A new organizing program was drafted by delegates to the North Carolina AFL-CIO's 18th annual convention in an effort to increase union representation throughout the state, whose workers' wages rank among the lowest in the nation.

The 440 delegates called for local and central bodies to establish organizing committees for the statewide campaign. The convention's resolution also directed the state federation to conduct organizing conferences at least once a year to help coordinate the efforts of locals, national and international unions and AFL-CIO departments.

President Wilbur Hobby was re-elected to a fourth two-year term over Roger L. Bauguss, secretary-treasurer since 1971. Hobby received 35,190 votes to 19,932 for Bauguss.

Delegates elected E. A. Britt of the Paperworkers over Jim Adams of the Postal Workers to succeed Bauguss. Britt is president of the Wilmington AFL-CIO and Adams heads the APWU state council.

Elected to the state federation's executive board for the first time were Eugene Ruff of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Harry Milner of the Teachers, Larry Gregory of the Sheet Metal Workers and Richard Closs of the Glass Bottle Blowers.

The convention adopted a state legislative program that gives top priority to the repeal of the 4 percent sales tax on food, reform of the "right-to-work" law, collective bargaining rights for public employes and improved conditions for school teachers.

Major speakers at the three-day convention included Rep. Andrew Young (D-Ga.), Sec.-Treas. William DuChessi of the Textile Workers Union of America, Assistant Labor Sec. Bernard DeLury, Executive Director Norman Hill of the A. Philip Randolph Institute and Vice President William Winpisinger of the Machinists.

Courts Slap Heavy Fines On Teachers

and the school board refusing even to agree not to fire teachers participating in the strike, police pulled 209 teachers from a picket line in front of the school administration building, alleging that they had blocked the entrance of nonstriking administrative staff.

The teachers were arrested, fingerprinted and put in $500 bail each.

But the bail was granted only after they signed forms promising to comply with a curfew that amounted to a house arrest. They were ordered to remain in their homes from 8 a.m. until 4 p.m. each day and refrain from strike activities.

A union challenge to the constitutionality of the curfew order was subsequently upheld by a federal court and the teachers were freed of house arrest and allowed to participate in union activties.

Earlier that day, at the call of the State AFL-CIO, more than 500 union members in the Wilmington area left their shops and job sites to march around City Hall in the rain and demonstrate labor's support for the teachers.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the biggest of the unsettled strikes was in Boston, where nearly 5,000 AFT members had rejected a "last offer" of longer hours in exchange for a 6 percent raise.

Again, a state law against public employe strikes was invoked and a $5,000-a-day fine was levied against the union. But the state agency that had sought a $50,000-a-day fine asked the judge not to send the union's leaders to jail because, it asserted, "the jailing of union leaders only produces martyrs."

A state judge in Rhode Island took a different view, sending eight officers of the Pawtucket AFT local and six officers of the Woonsocket local to jail for leading teacher strikes. They were sent to a state maximum security prison for seven to nine days until contract settlements were negotiated.

Elsewhere in the nation, there were settlements and new walkouts involving locals of both the AFL-CIO American Federation of Teachers and the unaffiliated National Education Association.

The largest NEA strike, at Fort Lauderdale, Fla., ended when the unit voted 2,321-788 to comply with a court order, but an official said the teachers "were not happy about going back." NEA locals conducted 106 strikes this fall.

A settlement ended a three-week strike in Schenectady, N.Y., by a local of the New York State United Teachers, which is affiliated with both the AFT and the NEA.

Despite Court Ruling:

Harassment of UFW Mars Farm Voting

Fresno, Calif.—Farm Workers' organizers continued to face harassment and arrest even after the California supreme court upheld their right of access to ranches in representation election campaigns.

Several UFW representatives had been arrested for trespassing at a ranch in Earlimart when they appeared at prescribed times to meet with workers. They were taken into custody by sheriff's deputies and later released.

The arrests came despite a ruling by the state's high court staying a lower court decision that struck down the access rule of the California Agricultural Labor Relations Board, which is conducting the elections.

The CALRB rule permits limited access of organizers to workers during lunch breaks and for one hour before and after work. The growers have opposed the rule from the start, claiming that private property rights take precedence over right of access by organizers.

The UFW has filed hundreds of complaints with the farm labor board charging numerous violations by growers of the new law, which went into effect Aug. 28. The board has since issued unfair labor practice charges against two growers and several more are expected shortly.

Despite the harassment and confrontation with growers, the Teamsters and sheriff's deputies, the UFW has made a strong showing in elections conducted thus far.

Of the total ballots cast in more than 100 unit elections, the UFW got 10,802 votes, or 48 percent, to the Teamsters' 8,647 or 38.5 percent. Ballots for no union were cast by 3,035 workers, or 13.5 percent.

The Farm Workers were chosen as the bargaining representative at 57 ranches, compared to 64 for the Teamsters and eight for no union.

Farm Workers President Cesar Chavez charged that the UFW would have an even stronger showing if it were not for extensive intimidation by growers and "massive fraud" by the Teamsters to qualify for ballot appearance.

Alan Kistler, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, appealed to California Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr., to intervene personally in an effort to halt numerous abuses of the new law.

Kistler cited a report by AFL-CIO staff representatives who described election sites as "unbelievably chaotic."

In his telegram to Brown, Kistler said that the irregularities include the lack of uniformity in election procedures, on-site rulings of labor board officials, and the intimidation of inexperienced CALRB agents by growers' lawyers and Teamsters' representatives.

He said that growers have retained a team of lawyers through a Chicago management consulting firm which is overwhelming CALRB election agents with its expertise in labor law.

Kistler also said that workers must run a gauntlet of armed guards en route to voting places, and the employers remain present while workers cast their ballots.

"Your personal intervention appears necessary to avoid frustration of the intent of the legislation adopted under your leadership," Kistler said in his message to Brown.

Kistler warned that California's agricultural workers could not freely express their preference for collective bargaining representation unless the elections are properly administered.

Meanwhile, the farm labor board resolved a dispute over elections at 147 ranches of the Western Growers Association. The board ruled in the favor of UFW for separate elections at each ranch.

The Teamsters, supported by the growers group, sought to have a single multiemployer election to cover all 147 ranches.

In releasing the results of a number of elections at the Growers Association ranches, the Teamsters won 13 and the UFW won 12. Three voted for no union and four elections are undecided.

At 11 of the 12 ranches where the UFW was chosen, the workers were formerly under Teamsters contracts.

The CALRB will hold hearings Oct. 6 on the controversial election conducted at the E. & J Gallo Co. concerning the status of "economic strikers."

In the Sept. 10 election at Gallo, the Teamsters garnered 223 votes to 131 for the UFW, but the tally did not include 197 challenged ballots, including 129 of the "economic strikers."

The 129 went on strike in 1973 after the Gallo company failed to renew a UFW contract and instead signed an agreement with the Teamsters.

A ruling in favor of the economic strikers could give the Gallo election to the UFW. The ruling would also be applied to 13 other elections contested on the same basis.

Michigan Legislature Memorializes McGavin

Lansing, Mich.—The late Peter M. McGavin, for nearly 15 years executive secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., was memorialized by the Michigan legislature for his courage and determination in wroking for the rights of workers.

McGavin, a native of Grand Rapids, Mich., died of cancer at his home in Bethesda, Md., on July 6. He was 66 years old.

Robertson Is Named to Fill Top L.A. Post

Los Angeles—William R. Robertson was named interim executive secretary-treasurer of the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO following the death of Sigmund Arywitz.

Robertson, 58, was unanimously approved for the post by the federation's executive board. He had served as Arywitz's assistant for the past two years.

Nominations will be held in October, followed by elections Nov. 17, to complete the term of the federation's top post which expires next June.

Robertson had been president of Hotel & Restaurant Employees Local 694 for 10 year before joining the county federation staff in 1967. He also has been affiliated with the Mattress Workers, Auto Workers, Meat Cutters, Laborers and the Newspaper Guild.

Fights Double-Digit Unemployment:

Building Trades Convention Presses Jobs, Housing Goals

prevailing wages to workers on federally-financed construction projects.

- Congressional enactment of an accelerated public works program to provide jobs for construction workers.
- Developing the Outer Continental Shelf as a source of new domestic supplies of oil and gas. The BCTD called upon the federal government to lease offshore sites as soon as possible, a move that would create thousands of new jobs on the oil rigs and in the development and servicing of onshore facilities.
- Government action to speed the construction of coal-fired and uranium fuel power plants. The department noted that delays in the construction of such power plants have already canceled or deferred 1.2 million man-years of work and resulted in a $100 annual increase in the cost of electrical energy for the average American family.

The department also strongly urged that the Federal Reserve Board act to lower interest rates and insure growth in the nation's money supply to stimulate a vigorous economic recovery.

Also, the Administration should "tear itself away from its obsession with fighting inflation and begin to institute programs instead which will insure that our economy is rerouted onto a path of full employment," the delegates declared in a resolution.

Topping the department's actions on internal affairs was the election of Joseph F. Maloney as secretary-treasurer. The post had been vacant since June 1974 when Georgine, who previously held the position, succeeded to the presidency upon the retirement of Frank Bonadio. Bonadio is president-emeritus.

Maloney, 46, has been an assistant to Iron Workers President John H. Lyons since 1961. A native of Boston, he formerly served as president and business agent of Iron Workers Local 7 there.

Georgine was re-elected to his first full term as president, and the delegates also re-elected the department's 10 vice presidents.

The BCTD constitution was amended to provide that no two of the vice presidents may be from the same union. This restriction formerly applied to all officials, including the president and secretary-treasurer.

In his keynote address to the delegates, Georgine said that the construction industry is literally fighting for its life. It has battled double-digit unemployment for 16 consecutive months, and in a large number of communities the unemployment rates for some crafts and trades are running anywhere from 40 to 60 percent.

Yet, he said, the problems facing the construction industry are not insurmountable. He listed several possible avenues out of the economic morass.

One route is speedy enactment of key labor legislation pending in Congress, particularly passage of the common situs picketing bill and a measure that would revise the framework of collective bargaining in the building trades, Georgine said.

Two convention speakers, Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop and Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N.J.), told the delegates President Ford had assured them he supports the two bills and is prepared to sign them into law once they've moved through Congress.

The collective-bargaining legislation while not ideal from the building trades point of view, could clear up many of the complex problems facing the nation's largest industry, Georgine said.

"No one in this room, I am sure, has any doubt that our system of bargaining can stand some meaningful changes," he said. "We think that whatever the negative effect of this bill is, it is far outweighed by the establishment of an orderly procedure in meeting the obligations to this industry."

Dunlop noted that President Ford's proposed $100 billion Energy Independence Authority—unveiled here at the BCTD's opening session—will require "a renewed effort on the part of this industry to improve collective bargaining.

"In no industry in the country is it more important for management and labor to work together," he added.

Ford's national energy research and development plan generally was well received by the delegates who saw in it some hope for alleviating the 20 percent jobless rate among the building and construction tradesmen.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, addressing the convention, said organized labor welcomed Ford's program as "a distinct improvement over the strategy that the Administration has been putting forward up to now—that the solution to the oil and energy supply problem lies in higher prices in the free market. It represents at least to some extent catching up with proposals that we made to the Administration."

Under Ford's energy program, a new independent federal authority would be set up to work with private enterprise and labor to gain energy independence for the United States in 10 years or less.

"It is a program to secure our jobs, our standards of living and the national interest of the United States," Ford told delegates in his opending day address. He said he would name Americans "of great stature without regard to partisan considerations" as directors of the new government corporation.

The Energy Independence Authority would seek new technologies to support or directly produce or transport American energy; technologies to support U.S. nuclear development, and electrical power from American coal, nuclear and geothermal sources, Ford said.

The central defect of the nation's present energy system, Ford said, is that it relies most on the least plentiful domestic energy sources—oil and natural gas—and relies least on the most abundant energy resources, coal and nuclear power.

Kirkland joined Georgine in attributing many of the nation's economic woes to the mishandling of monetary policy by the Federal Reserve Board and its chairman, Arthur Burns.

He also scored "a divided Congress, without leadership of an effective nature," jurisdictional controversy and an Administration obsessed by the budget and a die-hard resistance to programs "that are not compatible with its vision of the budget in spite of the evidence of overwhelming need in vital areas of the economy."

Kirkland said that, next to energy and the necessary capital to solve the energy problem, nothing is more important to economic recovery now than positive action in the housing field. He noted there has never been an economic recovery from a recession in the United States without a strong recovery in the housing sector. Yet there is no recovery in the housing field in sight, he observed.

Georgine charged that the deplorable state of housing construction is a direct result of the Fed's tight-money, high-interest policy.

"The entire economy of the United States is in difficulty," he noted. Not only housing but also new utility starts and public works projects are grinding to a halt, he said.

Besides enactment of pending labor legislation, other way of improving the lot of building tradesmen include a self-appraisal by the BCTD and its affiliated unions and a closer working arrangement with industry and government, Georgine said.

The delegates also heard other speakers touch on a wide range of subjects related to the construction industry and prospects of its recovery. Among them were:

Executive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning of the California AFL-CIO; President James Lee of the State Building Trades Council; California Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr.; State Treas. Jesse M. Unruh; President Paul Burnsky of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept.; Edward Murphy, secretary-treasurer of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; National COPE Director Al Barkan; Director William Pollard of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights; Alan Kistler, director of the federation's Dept. of Organization & Field Services and president of the Human Resources Development Institute; Bayard Rustin, president of the A. Spirited Elections Shift Two Key Oregon Posts

Seaside, Ore.—A series of spirited election contests highlighted the five-day convention of the Oregon State AFL-CIO, and challengers unseated incumbents in two out of three top posts.

In the presidential contest, Robert G. Kennedy defeated incumbent Dean Killion by nearly 9,000 votes out of more than 98,000 cast. Kennedy is directing business representatives of Machinists District 24 in Portland. Killion, a member of the Woodworkers, had been president since 1973.

In a three-way race for executive director of legislation and political education, Nellie Fox topped incumbent Lloyd Knudsen and another challenger, Doug Dinsmore. Knudsen had held the post since 1969. Mrs. Fox, from the Retail Clerks, had headed the COPE Women's Activities Dept. of the state federation.

Incumbent Sec.-Treas. Glenn (Pat) Randall, a member of the Carpenters who has held the post since 1967, won re-election with a 21,000 vote margain over Al Thomas of the Bricklayers.

In other major contested elections, Earl Kirkland was re-elected first vice president and Inez McPherson second vice president. Eleven new members were elected to the executive board and seven members were re-elected.

The two-year terms begin on Dec. 1; delegates rejected a proposal to change the terms of office to four years.

More than 100 resolutions acted on by the convention included affirmation of the AFL-CIO's program on major issues such as health security and full funding and stronger enforcement of the occupational safety and health law.

The convention also pledged full support to the Farm Workers, urged public financing of state election campaigns, and endorsed a state lottery.

Delegates were greeted by Gov. Robert Straub, the first Democrat elected to that post in 16 years, who stressed his Administration's job-creation commitment, and Republican Sen. Bob Packwood, who pledged support both for passage of construction site picketing legislation and repeal of the "right-to-work" Section 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Other speakers included Sec.-Treas. Louis Knecht of the Communications Workers and Representatives Les AuCoin and Jim Weaver, both first-term Democrats elected with labor support.

Burns Backs Public Jobs for Cheap Wages

rate of pay" for these jobs.

Thus, "the budgetary cost of eliminating unemployment need not be burdensome" and persons hired would not be tempted to linger on the public payroll.

Burns complained that unemployment insurance is too generous and "may be blunting incentives to work." He wouldn't, however, abolish it entirely.

"To permit active searching for a regular job," Burns said, "unemployment for a brief period—perhaps 13 weeks or so—would still serve a useful function."

After that, presumably, the jobless worker would have to resort to a public service job paying less than the minimum wage.

Burns also had other noninflationary measures to reduce unemployment," including doing away with the Davis-Bacon Act that sets prevailing wage standards on government-financed construction and changing the minimum wage law so teenagers can be paid less.

He proposed less government regulation of business activity, particularly through "environmental and safety regulations."

And, Burns said, the federal tax structure should be overhauled "so as to increase incentives for business capital spending and for equity investments in American enterprise."

Congress and the Budget

THE INTENT OF THE Congressional Budget Control & Impoundment Act was to enable Congress to reassert its rightful role in setting national goals and priorities. Prior to the act, the Congress did not have the staff, structure or the administrative machinery to cope with the intricacies of the federal budget. As a result, the Congress could not set forth a comprehensive blueprint of its own priorities or effectively challenge those of the Administration.

The 1974 legislation changed all this—on paper. But in actuality, the Congress has neither challenged nor overturned the disastrous blueprint for America that the President presented to the Congress and the nation in his budget message of last February. Although Congress did reject many of the President's proposals to slash funds from existing social programs, in terms of the stimulus needed to create jobs and move the economy forward, the congressional budget represented little more than an endorsement of the Administration's priorities—five solid years of massive unemployment.

When President Ford reluctantly signed the tax cut into law, he pointed to a chart and said: "This is as far as we dare go." He was pointing to a $60 billion projected budget deficit. He did not point to an unemployment chart and say "This is as far as we will let it go."

The AFL-CIO supported the Budget Act. At the same time we had some apprehensions because we did not want the new budget process used as a political tool for the Congress to engage in budget-cutting one-upmanship with the President.

Unfortunately, this is exactly what has happened. The first budget resolution, as well as the Senate committee's reports, analyses and publications have served to rivet attention to broad dollar "targets" generally and the dollar deficit in the federal budget specifically. It has put every senator on notice that actions and votes are to be evaluated by accounting standards and not national needs.

There is, for example, a weekly "Senate Budget Scorekeeping Report" prepared by the Congressional Budget Office in cooperation with this committee. The report provides every senator with a dollar tally of major legislation that has been enacted or has some potential for enactment. The spending target fixed by the first concurrent resolution is presented in boldface type as are figures showing how closely the Congress is adhering to its expenditure targets.

This report states in the introduction that it "is designed to provide the Senate with budgetary information relevant to consideration of upcoming legislative actions." Yet, crucial legislation is cited only in terms of dollar cost and potential impact on the budget deficit—never on the basis of need or value.

The message is obvious. Anything that goes over the target—increases the fiscal 1976 deficit—is bad. Anything under is good.

As far as we are concerned, Mr. Chairman, that's stupid.

There is only one target that this committee should be aiming at and that is the needs of the American people.

If meeting those needs adds up to a FY 1976 deficit of $80 or $90 or $100 billion—so be it; and, if more is required, then more should be provided.

A Word Edgewise:

New Hampshire Vote Reflects Public's Attitude Toward Ford

By John P. Roche

THE SPECIAL SENATE ELECTION in New Hampshire last week was extremely suggestive of things to come between now and the presidential sweepstakes in November 1976. Louis Wyman, the Republican defeated by 30,000 votes by liberal Democrat John Durkin, is one of the sole surviving dinosaurs. In the 1950s, as state attorney general, he developed into a two-bit Joe McCarthy, harassing the university for having "subversive" lecturers and generally protecting the innocent people of the Granite State from sinister forces.

Indeed, there was a time when the combination of Sen. Styles Bridges (a prince of yahoos), Wyman and the Manchester Union Leader (a paper that rivals Pravda for objectivity) could ignite quite a firestorm. All that now remains of this once formidable reactionary fortress is the Union Leader and Gov. Meldrim Thomson, who recently made the funnies by attacking Gerry Ford as a liberal.

Wyman gave up his seat in the House of Representatives to run for the Senate, and after his defeat in the rerun announced that "politically New Hampshire has seen the last of Louis Wyman." Although I rarely hold a grudge for more than 20 years, may I fervently pray that we have all seen the last of Louis Wyman. He was eminently expendable.

What did the election demonstrate? Well, if you believed Wyman's rhetoric, a vote for Durkin was a blow for the tyranny of trade unions, for pampering welfare loafers, for inflation, and for janitors. (Wyman kindly observed that Durkin was not fit to be a janitor—John took this a bit personally as his father had been a janitor.) Gov. Thomson has not surfaced yet with his interpretation, but maybe he will give us another laugh by noting that Wyman lost because that liberal Ford supported him, driving masses of true right-wingers into the Durkin camp.

The Senate election in my judgment indicated that, although Watergate is a dead issue, the Ford Administration has provided the Democrats with an even more powerful appeal: the economy and the lack of leadership. Durkin's practical triumph (however you counted the votes) over Wyman in 1974 was a Watergate freak—the odds were he wouldn't come close. This time he simply walked away; Wyman conceded at 9:30 p.m. With all respect to Gov. Thomson and his rain dancers, the American people are not cheerfully waiting around for unemployment because they know it will raise the Dow-Jones.

Back in 1968 I suggested here that the odds favored Richard Nixon because there was a war on, and Republicans end wars. I also remarked that the other side of this proposition was that the populace associates the Republicans with depressions. In 1968 it seemed worth risking a depression to end a war, but in 1976 what will be the trade off? New Hampshire gives us a hint.

TAKE ANOTHER ISSUE: the Republican yowl about cutting back welfare and other public services. During prosperity this picks up some transitory charm, but there are 21 million Americans over age 65 and, far from being worshippers at the shrine of Arthur Burns and the incredible Alan Greenspan, they properly feel they have earned the right to medical and other public assistance programs. When told about the wonders of the free market, they may not say much—but do they vote? If memory serves, their level of participation is roughly twice that of the 18-30 group.

Increasingly over the past months I have sensed the growth of a new public attitude towards President Ford, and the New Hampshire results seem to verify it. Everyone likes Good Old Gerry, Mrs. Ford is sweet (I think the uproar about her remarks was silly: as the father of a daughter I'm sure I know what she was trying to say), and everything around the White House is hunky-dory—except that President Ford is vanishing like the Cheshire Cat. The American people don't want Good Old Gerry in the Oval Office; they want President Gerald Ford.

Doubtless Presidents Kennedy, Johnson and Nixon overdid the "imperial presidency" bit, but Mr. Ford—in his effort to avoid putting on a crown—has somehow projected the image of irrelevance. If the voters hate a politician, it's unfortunate. If they love him, it's pleasant. But if they chuckle at him, he's had it.

How to Buy:

Advertising Puff, Half-Truths Come Under Growing Attack

By Sidney Margolius

FOR MANY YEARS exaggeration and half-truths in advertising have been condoned by government regulators and even courts as ordinary "trade puffery."

Thus, brewers advertise "premium" beer without any documentation that it is any different. Other beers are the "finest." Geritol was long advertised for treating "tired blood," and Wonder Bread for helping children grow 12 ways. Chevron was able to claim that "additive F-310" made Chevron the "most long awaited gasoline development in history," and Ultra Brite can promise that it gives your mouth sex appeal.

Similarly, despite some short-lived challenges by the Federal Trade Commission, Hi-C fruit drink continues to call itself that, with its implications of high vitamin content. Other examples of names with controversial implications of puffery include Easy-Off oven cleaners and various "noiseless" typewriters and air conditioners.

Many advertising men and some government officials tend to defend "puffery" as harmless enthusiasm, as when an auto salesman says the model he is trying to sell you is "the best on the road." The defenders of puffery maintain that no reasonable consumer believes such exaggerations in any case.

But now from universities, Congress and even the advertising trade itself, attacks on puffery are increasing. For one reason, the development of television as a major selling medium has reinforced the emotional appeal of puffery. You see before your own eyes how white teeth, various body deodorants and now even Woolite washing powder for your clothes can attract the opposite sex.

One of the most thorough analyses of how puffery can be deceptive is provided in a new book, The Great American Blow-Up by Ivan L. Preston, a University of Wisconsin journalism professor and himself a former advertising man.

Of course, no one believes you'll have a tiger in your tank when you use Esso (now Exxon), Preston points out. But when Hot Wheels and Johnny Lightning toy racers were shown in TV commercials moving at high speeds, the FTC did find them deceptive.

The toy racers were photographed from a position so close that they zoomed past in what appeared on the screen as an exciting blur. The photography was technically accurate, Preston observes. You can approximate it by moving your hand past your eye at close range. But the FTC considered the effect to be deceptive.

Another problem type of advertising spotlighted by Preston and others, and against which the FTC recently has acted, is "half-truths." This is puffery that has some basis in fact but doesn't tell the whole story. Preston cites electric bulbs advertised as "long life" or "extended life," while other brands were promoted for "better light" and "stay brighter longer." The "long life" bulb makers failed to mention that the longer life was at the expense of brightness. The makers of "brighter" bulbs (sometimes the same manufacturers) failed to mention the shorter life of their lamps.

Rather than bar these terms, the FTC now requires that they be accompanied by facts on number of lumens and expected life. The makers "may still communicate their vague phrases but the consumer now can check the precise facts," Preston observes.

ANOTHER REVEALING expose of the potential deceptions of half-truths is by an advertising man, Paul Stevens, in his book, I Can Sell You Anything. He warns to be especially wary of ads that claim to have more of a certain ingredient but never say what it is.

The most notable example is the persistent advertising for Anacin, which claims more of the ingredient that doctors recommend without ever saying that this is merely aspirin. Stevens also cites Easy Off oven cleaner for advertising more of an active ingredient without identifying it. The gasoline industry also has become notorious for claiming various additives with mysterious numeral designations but no mention of whether other brands may have the same additive.

Even when the special ingredient is identified it may prove to be only an ordinary ingredient under an invented name. Certs is advertised as containing "a sparkling drop of retsyn." What's that—some antibacterial agent? Stevens checked and found out that retsyn is merely the Certs manufacturer's name for vegetable oil.

Stevens also warns to beware of the word "like" in ads, such as the Ivory soap ads: "It's like getting one bar free." The ads don't actually say you get one bar free or that you get 25 percent more soap. One reason, Stevens notes, may be that Ivory soap contains air, which is why it floats, thus it may be lighter than similar-size bars of other soaps.

Preston credits the FTC with making a brave new attempt to resist puffery despite some earlier setbacks in the courts. But judging from the persistence of such commercials as those for Anacin, the commission has a long way to go.

Weinberger's Parting Shot:

Seidman Scores HEW Proposal To Penalize Strikers' Children

THE GOVERNMENT'S ATTEMPT to disallow welfare aid to children whose fathers are exercising their legal right to strike was branded as unconscionable by AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman.

While it's not known whether the Administration approved the move to tie welfare eligibility to unemployment insurance eligibility, Seidman said the White House now has a chance to withdraw the proposal that Caspar Weinberger made before he stepped down as Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare.

Seidman said that Weinberger showed, throughout his service as Secretary of HEW, that his key concern was holding down costs "to be able to cut the taxes of wealthy people," and was "just not interested in meeting the needs of poor and disadvantaged people, the elderly and the sick."

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, Seidman rejected the contention of the National Association of Manufacturers and other big business groups that if welfare benefits were allowed for the children of strikers, there would be more strikes and longer strikes.

He pointed out that means and assets tests, as well as other eligibility requirements, would mean that not a great many strikers would be affected. Most of those who would be eligible for welfare payments would be low-wage workers on strike to improve sub-standard wages and working conditions.

Seidman also noted that the 30-day wait for eligibility after workers have become unemployed or have exhausted unemployment insurance payments, would also rule most strikers out of the program, since most strikes don't last 30 days.

Seidman was questioned by Ann McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Jerome Brazda of McGraw-Hill. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is aired Tuesdays, over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

By Press Associates, Inc.

CONGRESS IS MOVING on legislation to help rebuild the country's deteriorated railroads with nearly everyone in apparent agreement except the Ford Administration.

There are differences on how extensive the federal role should be and how it should be financed. But the Democratic leadership in Congress, a growing number of Republican lawmakers, unions, ecologists, consumer groups, industry leaders and shippers agree that rail transportation must be saved and revitalized.

AFL-CIO President George Meany has emphasized that the federation looks upon restoration of railroads "as one of the nation's top priorities, and we are not going to let Congress forget it."

An important aspect of rail rehabilitation, its supporters agree, is that more than 40,000 jobless railroad workers could be employed in upgrading railroad tracks and roadbeds.

President Harold C. Crotty of the Maintenance of Way Employes, in recent testimony for the Railway Labor Executives' Association, warned that layoffs (they have increased on railroads even while leveling off in other industries) will lead to increasing "derailments, property damage, deaths and injuries—all due to defects in maintenance."

In other era, federal assistance for railroads would have been considered pure, self-interest legislation. Over the years and particularly throughout the 1950s and the 1960s railroad managements discouraged passenger service. One of the keys to killing off this less-profitable-than-cargo business was to allow deterioration of tracks and roadbeds. The public came to realize what was happening. Few tears were shed for rail managements.

But in 1970 Congress realized that a transportation crisis made salvation of rail passenger service vital to the public's interest. It created a semi-public corporation, Amtrak, to take over that service.

Then came 1973. Arab sheiks shut off their oil spigots. America was caught in a drastic energy crunch. Railroads became essential to the nation's economy because of their energy-saving advantages over other modes of transportation.

Some months ago Rep. John Heinz (R-Pa.) introduced a bill that would have provided far more money for rehabilitation — $2.5 billion over two-and-a-half years—than Congress now seems likely to approve.

Initially there were reports that President Ford might favor the proposal. Now, apparently, the President has placed the legislation on his list of items that he would veto should they clear Congress. If rail rehabilitation passes, and it is vetoed, that means lawmakers will again be seeking a two-thirds margin to pass legislation as has been the case so often in the Nixon and Ford administrations.

THERE WAS ONE noteworthy development during recent congressional hearings on rail rehabilitation legislation. President Paul Reistrup of Amtrak, who took over as the passenger corporation's head earlier this year, pointed out "there hasn't been a single program of track work throughout the country" sufficient to allow Amtrak to improve time schedules in its five-year existence.

"The federal government is never going to get full value received for the investment in new, high-speed passenger trains unless track is improved," Reistrup said—and he emphasized "the whole economy is going to pay a steep price if this country's rail plant is permitted to fall into further disrepair."

However, Transportation Sec. William T. Coleman appeared in opposition. But his testimony had a strain of inconsistency. At one point, he said, "it is important that railroads be in condition to move quickly and significantly an increased amount of freight and passengers." But then he complained rehabilitation funds would add to the budget deficit, even contending that if money could be found for railroads there would be "better, more intelligent, more effective ways to spend it."

This is the "philosophy," Meany has pointed out, "that has resulted in America's economy being in just about as bad shape as the railroads."

ATTEMPTS TO DISALLOW welfare aid to children whose fathers are on strike were assailed by AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, center, on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Jerome Brazda of McGraw-Hill Publications and Ann McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

BRICKLAYERS CONVENTION delegates deliberate the adoption of a new constitution as union President Thomas F. Murphy presides over the sessions held at Atlantic City, N.J.

New Constitution Voted:

Bricklayers Adopt Structural Changes

Atlantic City, N.J.—Delegates to the 73rd convention of the Bricklayers answered a mandate to implement progressive member service programs as they adopted a new constitution, voted to change the union's name, and set in motion the machinery "to determine the course of this organization for decades to come."

President Thomas F. Murphy and Sec. John T. Joyce called on the convention for "a demonstration that our organization is willing to pay the price for continued success" and urged that it build "upon the foundation we've laid during the past three years."

That "foundation," laid down since the 1972 convention, includes an international pension fund; expanded masonry promotion; creation of headquarters departments to deal with collective bargaining services, organizing, communications and education, and data processing.

Under the name change approved by the delegates, the union will be known as the International Union of Bricklayers & Allied Craftsmen rather than the Bricklayers, Masons & Plasterers International Union.

The new constitution adopted by a 92.2 percent majority of the convention, however, embodies more than merely a new name. It provides a broader definition of overall work jurisdiction, establishes minimum dues for local unions, provides for conventions every four years rather than the present two year interval, creates a new general board, and sets up a formula for future dues and salary increases.

The general board, made up of the principal officers of all local unions, will meet midway between regular conventions. The board will have all the powers of a convention, except those of electing officers and amending bylaws.

Both the board and the convention will have the right to set the level of dues for the succeeding year. Dues of members and salary increases for officers will be determined by a percentage equal to the percentage increases in wages and fringe benefits negotiated for journeymen in all local unions the previous year.

Meanwhile the convention voted a salary increase for international officers and increased membership per capita dues by $1 a month.

In other major convention business, the Bricklayers pledged to work for broad remedial action from the federal government toward creating jobs and improving the unemployment compensation system.

The convention also urged immediate measures to resurrect the housing industry and create a stable industry for the future. This would be achieved by emergency mortgage relief measures; a stable, reasonable Federal Reserve Board interest rate policy; acceptance of the backlog of public housing applications, and approval of long-term mortgage loans for housing-for-the-elderly projects.

Speakers during the five-day convention included President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.; Plasterers & Cement Masons President Joseph T. Power and Sec.-Treas. John J. Hauck; Fred J. Driscoll, Jr., chairman of the Impartial Jurisdictional Disputes Board; Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N.J.); and contractor association representatives.

Architect and author Philip Johnson received the union's 1975 Louis Sullivan Award, presented biennially to an American or Canadian architect whose work best demonstrates the union's concern for architectural and environmental quality.

Major resolutions called for:

- Exploration of possible merger with the Plasterers & Cement Masons
- Opposition of efforts to weaken or repeal the 44-year-old Davis-Bacon Act intended to protect local wage standards from employers who would import workers from low wage areas to perform federal construction.
- Senate approval of the situs picketing bill.
- Legislation permitting labor and management representatives to share administrative responsibilities for jointly-funded promotion programs.
- Legislation to restore posthumously U.S. citizenship rights to the late labor leader, Eugene V. Debs.

Larson Boat Boycott Ends After Accord

Pittsburgh — Steelworkers President I. W. Abel has called for lifting of the union's consumer boycott against Larson Industries of Little Falls, Minn., following negotiation of an initial agreement with the company.

The boycott action was endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council last July in support of a Steelworkers strike.

Terms of the 28-month agreement include a grievance procedure, a dues checkoff system, an 8 percent across the board wage increase for the first year, cost-of-living adjustments, a pension plan, a profit-sharing plan, an insurance program, a job bidding procedure, the first plant safety committee, shift wage differential and an additional holiday.

The Steelworkers said achievement of the contract was aided substantially by the boycott. The firm builds boats for recreation.

Expanded Aid Pressed For Nation's Railroads

Miami Beach—The United Transportation Union convention approved a long-range program calling for extensive aid to the nation's railroads through a more equitable division of the transportation tax dollar.

As the 1,200 delegates wound up the convention here, they called for a $25 billion fund for maintaining and rehabilitating railroads. This fund, they said in a statement on legislative goals, would consist largely of federal grants, guaranteed loans and a possible diesel fuel tax of 5 cents a gallon over a 10 year period.

Currently, the convention noted, 85 percent of the U.S. transportation tax dollar goes to highways, 10 percent to airports, 4 percent to waterways and six-tenths of 1 percent to railroads.

The UTU, which includes 10,000 bus operators among its 250,000 members, also urged Congress to release additional monies from the highway trust fund to provide more urban mass transit aid for bus and rail service. The suggested increase would raise present aid of $11.7 billion to $20 billion over the next five years.

Delegates asked quick action by Congress to transfer jurisdiction over rail safety to the Labor Dept. Currently this jurisdiction is under the Federal Railroad Administration. Under the proposal, a new, separate agency in the Labor Dept. would handle all unsafe rail conditions.

As part of the effort to conserve energy through the greater use of rail passenger service, the UTU went on record favoring an increase of Amtrak funds for new routes, better equipment and improved roadbed. Amtrak is the federal corporation set up to run railroad passenger routes.

Among convention speakers who pledged support of the UTU program to improve transportation service were Senators Vance Hartke (D-Ind.), Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.), Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.) and Rep. Harley O. Staggers (D-W. Va.).

AFL-CIO President George Meany, who made the opening address to the convention, also gave strong backing to the UTU goals.

President Al H. Chesser was re-elected to his second four-year term. Several other top UTU officials were also re-elected to new terms.

Meany Cites Stevens As Scofflaw Example

The best way to clear up a backlog of unfair labor practice complaints against employers would be to penalize J. P. Stevens & Co. with more than a "slap on the wrist" for its union-busting activities, AFL-CIO President George Meany suggested.

Meany told a conference of union representatives that the Stevens firm is an example to other employers that it is possible to violate federal labor law "with virtual impunity" and to use delaying tactics before both the National Labor Relations Board and the courts to put off even token penalties.

"Make J. P. Stevens obey" the law "and the NLRB case load will decline," Meany predicted.

The union representatives met at AFL-CIO headquarters to explore common problems arising out of the National Labor Relations Act and its enforcement by the NLRB. A House Labor subcommittee has scheduled oversight hearings at which unions will testify.

Merely by delaying tactics, Meany noted, a hostile employer can break up a union organizing drive. The average lag between the filing of an unfair labor practice charge to the issuance of a decision by the NLRB was 316 days in 1972, Meany pointed out. And an employer could generally add another year's delay by court appeals.

Even when a union finally overcomes all these obstacles to achieve bargaining rights, Meany said, a hostile employer can launch a new round of delaying tactics by refusing to bargain in good faith—setting off further NLRB hearings and further court appeals.

He termed the Stevens textile chain "the monument to the NLRB's inability to defend the legal rights of workers to organize and bargain collectively."

Meany termed the J. P. Stevens firm "the epitome of the Watergate mentality; one that preaches disrespect of the law."

Trophies Spur COPE Activity

The Maryland State and District of Columbia AFL-CIO has awarded trophies to five locals with the best political education record in their central body areas as part of a new program to stimulate participation in COPE activities.

The trophies, which were presented during the recent Maryland-D.C. convention, went to Glass Bottle Blowers Local 200 in the Baltimore central body, Textile Workers 1874 in the Cumberland Council, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 1307 on the Eastern Shore, Ladies' Garment Workers Local 435 in the Hagerstown area, and Local 2 of the Office & Professional Employees in the Washington, D.C., area.

Locals that received the awards had the highest percentage of registered voters and the greatest number of hours volunteered in COPE and women's activities programs.

Federal Job-Injury Benefits Bill Pressed as States Miss Deadline

The AFL-CIO gave a strong endorsement to a bill that would replace the 50-state jumble of workers' compensation programs with uniform minimum standards based on the unanimous recommendations of a national commission.

The commission's report, issued three years ago, made 19 key recommendations and suggested that states be given until July 1975 to comply with them. If not, Congress should act.

"As of July 1, 1975," the AFL-CIO noted in its statement to the Senate Labor Committee, "not a single state had enacted legislation to comply with all the 19 essential recommendations."

This "failure of the states" compels enactment of federal legislation, the AFL-CIO declared.

Labor's endorsement went to a bill introduced by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), the committee chairman, and Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.), the ranking minority member, with numerous cosponsors.

It would require all employers to provide workmen's compensation protection against job-related injuries or illness for all workers at not less than the standards set forth in the bill.

For total disability or death, the payment would be at least two-thirds of the worker's lost wage, subject to a maximum that would by three years after enactment, amount to 200 percent of the statewide average weekly wage.

The minimum benefit would be the smaller of either 50 percent of the state average wage or the full amount of lost wages.

There would be no limitation on duration of benefits, or on additional rehabilitation payments, and benefits would be adjusted at least once a year to reflect increases in the state average wage and the maximum benefit schedule.

The legislation also sets out standards in many problem areas, such as waiting periods, definitions of disability, choice of physicians and attorney fees.

Urging prompt enactment of the legislation, the AFL-CIO statement noted that:

- 13 states exclude workers employed by small firms.
- 30 states deny coverage to farm workers.
- 49 states deny coverage to domestic workers and casual workers.
- 20 states do not cover public employes.
- 10 states limit medical care.
- 46 states limit the benefits payable to survivors in occupational death cases.
- 34 states have a maximum weekly benefit below the level recommended as adequate by the commission.

Allied Industrial Workers Elect New Team of Officers

Kansas City—Delegates to the 20th convention of the Allied Industrial Workers chose new top officers, elected four new members of the executive board, and set major new union policies.

More than 500 delegates attended the four-day convention of the 40-year-old union that represents some 100,000 members throughout the United States.

Dominick D'Ambrosio, 53, who had been the union's secretary-treasurer, was elected without opposition to become president, suceeding Gilbert Jewell, who retired after five years as top officer.

Elected secretary-treasurer was Raymond R. Reinhold, 61, of Decatur, Ill., who had been the director of AIW Region 8, the largest in the union.

Angelo R. Verdin of Milwaukee, president of the 8,000-member AIW Local 232, was elected board member-at-large, a fulltime position on the union's executive board. He succeeds Frank Evans of Cleveland, who retired after serving on the AIW executive board for 36 years.

Two of six regional directors, who make up the balance of the union's board, were among the newly elected officers.

The elections of both Reinhold and Verdin were contested and required run-off balloting.

After three days of discussion, the delegates voted to increase the basic dues of members by $1.50 to $7.25 a month. Of the $1.50 increase, the convention allocated 85 cents to the regional offices, 40 cents to the international and 25 cents to the local unions.

The union's executive board had recommended a graduated scale of dues, pegging each local unit's dues to the plantwide average wage with lower paid units paying a lower rate. This was narrowly voted down in a roll call, and a proposal for a flat $2 dues increase was also defeated. Finally, by standing vote, the delegates accepted the $1.50 a month flat increase.

Under the AIW's structure, local unions may vote to set dues above the $7.25 level and keep the balance. Of the $7.25, $1.65 will go to the international union, $2.35 to the regional offices, $1.00 to the strike fund with $2.25 remaining in the locals.

In his reports to delegates, Jewell said the union needed extra revenue to counteract a steady decline in membership due to the current recession which has hit the AIW with its high membership in the automotive industry. Also, he said the union needed more income to offset higher costs.

Delegates also voted to grant collective bargaining rights to the union's fulltime representatives, if they provide proof that a majority wants such procedures.

Jewell reported that the union had resumed merger talks with the Molders and that he believed it would be in the best interest of both unions to continue the discussions.

Newly elected to the board were Archie Robbins of Joplin, Mo., as Region 8 director and Robert Johnson of Milwaukee, as Region 9 director. Re-elected to the board were Nick Serraglio of Cleveland, Region 3 director; J. B. Arnold, Jr., of Cincinnati, Region 4 director; Les Enochs of Wyandotte, Mich., Region 6 director, and Robert Brenner of Battle Creek, Mich., Region 7 director.

More than 70 resolutions were considered by the delegates, many of them supporting basic positions of the AFL-CIO in national affairs.

The retirement of Jewell and Evans marks the end of an era and leaves the union without any members of the top executive board who were active during the turbulent 1930s.

Jewell, who helped to found the AIW while working in an auto plant in Kansas City in 1934, recalled his early years, citing the lack of benefits, job security and decent wages, as well as the difficulty in organizing and the high unemployment.

Noting that the current economic crisis "is the worst since the great depression of the 1930s," Jewell told the delegates:

"I don't want anyone in this room to have to relive the past that the workers of my generation had to endure. The rights that we now take for granted can be lost much more easily and quickly than they were achieved. The members of my generation are now mostly gone so it will be up to you and the workers who follow you to be sure that history does not repeat itself."

He criticized the Ford Administration for failing to comprehend the dangers of unemployment by following government policies that not only fail to reduce joblessness but keep inflation rising.

Jewell blamed the Administration for vetoing badly needed job-creating legislation while at the same time permitting the Russians to make huge purchases of American farm products.

He said: "Ford is saying it's OK to take a chance on boosting inflation as long as we are dealing with the Russians, but when it comes to putting unemployed Americans back to work, we can't take any chances. We think it is wrong."

Delegates later approved resolutions which blamed the Ford Administration for permitting the current recession to continue.

The AIW celebrated its 40th anniversary at the convention. It was formed as the United Automobile Workers and became known as the UAW-AFL after its 1939 split with UAW-CIO (now unaffiliated) and changed its name to Allied Industrial Workers in 1956.

Rollcall Vote in Senate On Federal Pay Raise

The Senate on Sept. 18 voted 53-39 to go along with President Ford's proposal to cut the 8.66 percent salary increase due federal employes to 5 percent.

The AFL-CIO opposed the cutback. So did the 25 Democrats and 14 Republicans who voted against reducing the pay raise that a government survey determined was needed to maintain comparability with private industry salaries.

Lobbying Disclosure Bill Hit as Red Tape Tangle

Legislation seeking to compel fuller disclosure of lobbying operations would defeat its avowed purpose by burying pertinent information in filing cabinets choked with "unnecessary and irrelevant" reports, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said.

He told a House Judiciary subcommittee that the record-keeping and reporting requirements in the bills under consideration — including virtually every contact made by a lobbyist and every phase of the policymaking process he sought to influence—would "leave little opportunity for the lobbyist to engage in lobbying."

Other portions of the legislation, he said, represent "a wholly unjustified intrusion" into the internal affairs of voluntary organizations. Thus, a reference in the bill to publications of voluntary membership organizations raises the question of whether the AFL-CIO News would have to drop its coverage of legislative developments to exclude itself from the cumbersome regulations.

Biemiller emphasized the open nature of the AFL-CIO's function as the "people's lobby" with a broad interest in a vast amount of legislation that comes before Congress each year—affecting workers "as consumers and citizens, as well as trade unionists."

He reminded the panel of the "vital" and fully legitimate role that lobbying plays in the legislative process through providing information and informed opinion as to the impact of legislation before Congress.

The present lobbying law has been "scrupulously observed" by labor's legislative representatives, Biemiller said. They are registered; they file quarterly reports of their salaries and expenses, and their activities on behalf of AFL-CIO policies "are well known to all on Capitol Hill."

Deficiencies in the present law, Biemiller suggested, can be met "by closing loopholes, providing for consistent and realistic enforcement and extending it to apply to lobbying of the executive branch and to so-called grass-roots lobbying."

But this can be accomplished, he stressed, without adopting remedies that would be "worse than the evils they are designed to correct."

Plan to Weaken Rules On Day Care Scored

The AFL-CIO has registered strong objections to proposals that would further weaken standards for day care centers established by the Dept. of Health, Education, & Welfare.

The HEW standards, due to become effective Oct. 1, already have been weakened as a result of public hearings several months ago. They would permit day care centers to establish child-staff ratios of one adult for four children in the age range of six weeks to three years.

However, Sen. Dewey F. Bartlett (R-Okla.) and Rep. James R. Jones (D-Okla.) have now called for legislation or an HEW waiver that could seriously alter the child-staff ratio. Their proposal would allow one adult to care for four children in the age range from birth to ten months, six children ten months to two years old, or eight children two to three years old.

In a letter to HEW Sec. David Mathews, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman urged that further attempts to weaken the standards be denied and that they be allowed to go into effect Oct. 1 as they now stand.

Seidman said "it would be a tragedy if day care operators who want to simply warehouse little children . . . are allowed to continue the practice of providing, at the taxpayer's expense, nothing more than institutionalized child neglect."

In addition, Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller wrote members of Congress to urge rejection of efforts to weaken the day care regulations by legislative means.

Biemiller said the AFL-CIO is opposed to workers' taxes being used for programs that "will damage children." He said that if there is to be a change in the HEW regulations, it should be to require more caretakers, not fewer.

will lose $9 billion in purchasing power next year. "The only thing that was keeping the workers' head above water was the tax cut and, unless Congress acts, that lifejacket will be yanked away."

He summoned Congress to "develop a program to overturn the economic policies of the Administration, turn the economy around, put America back to work and prevent the onset of another economic catastrophe."

If it requires a temporary $100 billion deficit to accomplish this, Meany said, "so be it." And "if more is required, then more should be provided."

The recession isn't over and won't be over until America is back to work, Meany testified. And "announcements heralding its end are based on statistical nonsense."

While production indexes may no longer be declining, Meany noted that they also ended their decline in March 1933, "and no one uses that date as the end of the Great Depression."

A misplaced priority on holding down the budget deficit won't create the 70,000 new jobs that must be created "each and every week over the next three years if we are to approach full employment in 1978," Meany said.

He went beyond the statistics of testimony to speak of the "tragedy" of losing a job "in America's work-oriented society." Families go deeper into debt despite the "important cushion" of unemployment insurance, and money problems add to family stress.

Then, Meany added, there are the millions of young people seeking to enter the job markets—white and black, college graduates and high school dropouts—to be told that there are no career opportunities for them and there won't be for years to come.

"This is the meaning of the Administration's vetoes of badly needed job-creating legislation," Meany said angrily. "This is the message of the Federal Reserve Board, which tightens monetary policy and increases interest rates."

The concept of independent congressional budget action was to give Congress the resources to cope with the intricacies of the federal budget and shape its own priorities, Meany noted.

"But in actuality, Congress has neither challenged nor overturned the disastrous blueprint . . . that the President presented."

While Congress did reject many of Ford's proposals to cut back existing social programs, "in terms of the stimulus needed to create jobs and move the economy forward, the congressional budget represented little more than an endorsement of the Administration's priorities—five solid years of massive unemployment."

Meany outlined the AFL-CIO's program for economic recovery and called on the committee to propose a budget resolution that supports the spending authority to finance the recovery.

Building Trades Get Safety Training Grant

The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. has been awarded a $498,890 Labor Dept. contract to expand an existing job safety and health training program.

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration said the project will be extended for 18 months, and expanded to include 200 BCTD and industry representatives.

cars, gasoline, medical services and auto insurance. Consumers were still paying 9.4 percent more for food than in August 1974.

August also marked the first time since February 1973 that workers' real spendable earnings have shown an increase over the year, BLS said in a separate report. But this was largely a result of reduced federal income tax withholdings.

Based on 1967 dollars to adjust for inflation since then, the real weekly take-home pay for a worker with three dependents amounted to $92.47 in August. This is an increase of nine-tenths of 1 percent from July and 1.1 percent from August 1974.

BLS pointed out that real average weekly earnings before payroll tax deductions were down 2.7 percent over the year. The decline resulted from the 8.6 percent rise in the CPI, coupled with a 1.1 percent drop in average weekly hours while average earnings increased 6.8 percent.

However, the decline in real weekly earnings was overcome by the reduced income tax withholding rates which went into effect May 1, BLS said.

The all-items CPI in August increased to 162.8 percent of the 1967 base level. This means that the same products and services that an urban family bought for $10 in 1967 cost $16.28 last month.

After seasonal adjustments, the food price components held steady last month while nonfood commodities rose five-tenths of 1 percent.

Beef prices declined in August for the first time in five months and fruit and vegetable prices also dropped after sharp increases in both June and July. Cereals, bakery products and oils were lower in price.

However, pork prices rose 4.6 percent, a steep increase for the fifth consecutive month. Poultry prices were up nine-tenths of 1 percent and dairy product prices were also up more than in recent months.

Sugar prices, which had declined for the first seven months of the year, rose 14.9 percent in August, and coffee prices also increased for the first time this year.

BLS said that all major categories rose in the service index, up five-tenths of 1 percent from July. Rents increased five-tenths of 1 percent, medical care six-tenths of 1 percent, transportation eight-tenths of 1 percent, and household services two-tenths of 1 percent. Auto insurance charges climbed 1.3 percent over the month while hospital rates rose nine-tenths of 1 percent.

Charles Crissey Dies, Edited Guild Reporter

Falls Church, Va. — Charles E. Crissey, retired editor of the Newspaper Guild's bi-monthly publication, the Guild Reporter, died at his home here Sept. 21 after a long illness. He was 80 years old.

Crissey retired as editor of the Guild Reporter in 1963 after serving nearly 20 years in various Guild posts. Before that he had been a reporter for more than 20 years for the Elizabeth, N.J., Daily Journal.

He served as a judge in the journalism competition conducted by the International Labor Press Association in 1971 and 1972.

AFGE Sets New Try for Full Pay Rise

The Government Employees announced a new effort to win the full 8.66 percent comparability increase for federal workers through legislation that would exclude Congress, federal judges and government "supergraders" from the same pay raise.

AFGE President Clyde M. Webber said at a press conference that the union would ask the House to consider the federal pay comparability issue without having to vote themselves a wage increase above the amount proposed by President Ford.

Ford last month rejected the recommendations of his advisers that an 8.66 percent increase is necessary to bring federal wages in line with those of the private sector, based on findings of a Bureau of Labor Statistics survey.

Instead, Ford placed a 5 percent ceiling on the raise, an action that could be overturned by either house of Congress. A move to reject the President's pay lid has already failed in the Senate, however.

Webber expressed the union's dismay at the Senate action, but noted that many senators had voted against the 8.66 percent recommendation because it would have applied to their own salaries as well as to those of rank-and-file government workers.

He said the House would be asked to remove the salaries of high government officials and legislators from the comparability plan and to vote the full 8.66 percent for federal workers while limiting their own raises to the President's recommended 5 percent.

In addition, AFGE, which represents more than 680,000 federal employes, said it will seek other legislation to limit the President's ability to reduce or delay federal cost-of-living pay adjustments to emergency situations in which private sector wages also are subject to controls.

Latin Union Group Maps Voter Drive

Miami—A nationwide voter registration and education program to spur wider participation in the electoral process was developed at a two-day meeting here of the executive board of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement.

Several states where there are large concentrations of Latino workers were designated as target areas to develop an overall strategy for the program. Additional emphasis will also be placed in states where registration-by-mail laws are in effect.

The immediate objective of the program is a stepped-up effort during the next six months to register the more than 8 million Latinos eligible to vote. The prime target states are Texas, California, Arizona, Florida, Michigan, Indiana, New York, Colorado and Illinois.

The LCLAA board also approved the establishment of a national advisory board and an administrative committee.

Serving as advisers will be the presidents of 23 unions which have an active membership in the council, in addition to AFL-CIO officials. The administrative committee is composed of 22 members from representative unions of the council.

House Again Defies Veto Threat, Passes Energy Conservation Bill

A House-Senate conference committee will make the next move in a continuing confrontation between Congress and President Ford over the nation's oil pricing and energy conservation policy.

Ford wants to deal with the problem of reducing oil imports by letting prices rise so that most people will use less energy and oil companies will have a bigger "incentive" to develop new resources. He admits that would give another big push to the cost of living.

The House bill would hold down oil prices, but impose stiff new standards of fuel efficiency and limit the use of gasoline to consumption levels of prior years, with authorization to the President to establish a rationing system if necessary.

Republicans who fought the bill warned that it would face a sure veto which Congress would not override.

The 255-148 vote by which the House passed the bill was short of the two-thirds that would be needed to override a veto. And an earlier 232-171 vote against sending the bill back to committee for rewriting was even further from the two-thirds mark.

The final form of the legislation that goes to the President won't be known until the conference committee reaches an agreement and both the House and Senate approve the provisions.

An added complication was a 204-201 vote to write an anti-busing amendment to the legislation. The excuse for injecting the school bus issue was that forbidding busing children beyond their nearest school would conserve fuel.

An anti-busing amendment also complicated an unrelated Senate bill—carrying funds for the Labor Dept. and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

As adopted by a 51-44 vote, it would prohibit HEW from requiring busing beyond neighborhood schools but would not affect court-ordered busing plans.

In other developments:

- The House Labor Committee voted 34-0 to approve the construction industry collective bargaining bill that Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop drafted in consultation with building trades unions and employers. It is expected to get quick House approval and be passed by the Senate at the same time as the jobsite picketing bill.
- The House Ways & Means Committee continued to work on tax reform legislation and also drew up a proposed change in the tax deduction now allowed for child care expenses for working mothers. Present income limitations would be lifted and a partial tax credit would replace the present deduction system.

Earlier, the committee voted to increase the minimum tax that must be paid by wealthy individuals who have substantial income from tax-exempt sources. It would raise about $700 million a year in additional revenue.

- A labor-supported bill authorizing the congressional General Accounting Office to audit the Federal Reserve System was blocked from the House floor by the House Rules Committee. Its chief sponsor is Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.), former chairman of the House Banking Committee, which approved the bill. But the Rules Committee voted 8-6 to postpone action on it indefinitely.

Ford's Nixon Script Poses Threat of Disaster—Meany

Executive Council Report:

Labor's Voice Vital In Troubled Nation

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO has continued to be an effective, clear and militant voice for workers in the past two difficult years marked by inflation, unemployment, Watergate, a bankrupt foreign policy and increased human suffering.

That theme emerges from the 438-page Report of the Executive Council to the 11th AFL-CIO convention, a document that reviews developments in the labor movement since the 1973 convention and events in the nation and the world that affect trade unions and their members.

The report of the 35-member council covers internal changes and development, Watergate, the national economy, energy and the environment, international relations, social security, urban affairs and housing, education, community services, occupational health and safety, civil rights, national and state legislation, political activities, and labor and the law.

Supporting the survey of the past two years are detailed proposals for action referred to various convention committees and then to the delegates for discussion and action.

AFL-CIO President George Meany, in his opening overview section termed the report the "gloomiest ever presented to an AFL-CIO convention in this organization's 20-year history."

He reported that "this country is in trouble at home and abroad. At every turn, grave problems must be faced, grave questions resolved—each with ominous implications for the future. America's economy is in major trouble; her social welfare programs are being undermined; her prospects for peace, prosperity and security are in doubt."

Meany called on the leadership

Senate Cuts Job Safety Coverage

A 48-45 vote in the Senate weakened job safety and health protection for America's workers, and the AFL-CIO looked to a House-Senate conference committee to plug the loophole.

The Senate, at the urging of a small business employer lobby, voted to exclude establishments and job sites with fewer than four workers from enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

While the exclusion is substantially less than the 25-worker figure perennially sought by the employer lobby, the group of workers that would be denied protection include those most in need of federal standards. Particularly vulnerable would be small construction sites and the type of shop or facility where workers are least likely to be organized.

In past years, it was the House that voted to weaken job safety enforcement through an amendment to an appropriations bill prohibiting the use of funds to inspect establishments with fewer than a specified number of workers. Generally,

Kirkland Scores Press For Shoddy Reporting

By Rex Hardesty

San Francisco—Many U.S. newspapers display malice in their coverage of organized labor, but more often it's just a matter of ignorance and poor reporting, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland declared.

"A free labor movement and a free press share much common ground," Kirkland told the convention of the International Labor Press Association. He said the common ground includes the constitutional freedoms of association and expression which make both possible.

"But the difference is we know who we are," Kirkland said, and newspapers try to deny who they are — business enterprises, with a publisher who is a businessman and which depend on the goodwill of advertisers for their success.

"Editorialists speak from a pulpit only money can buy," Kirkland said, and that's fine as long as they don't pretend to be unbiased defenders of the public interest or a moral force.

'Ominous Signs':

Congressional Panel Warns of Downturn

By David L. Perlman

Labor's warning of another economic plunge before the nation has even started its climb out of the present recession has been reinforced by the Joint Economic Committee of Congress.

The committee reported "ominous signs on the horizon that a new recession could be in the making" and called for "swift and decisive actions" to head it off.

At the same hour the report was being released, two AFL-CIO representatives were testifying along similar lines at House Budget Committee hearings.

Assistant Legislative Director Kenneth Young, joined by Legislative Rep. Ray Denison, described the nation's economy as "more vulnerable than at any time in history."

In a follow-up to AFL-CIO President George Meany's testimony the previous week before the Senate Budget Committee, they stressed labor's conviction that the number of unemployed is a much more important figure than the size of the budget deficit.

Announcements heralding the end of the recession are "statistical nonsense," Young said.

He called on the committee to update its budget targets so as to provide adequate funding for such job-creating programs as:

- Accelerated public works by providing funds to local governments for needed short-term construction and repairs.
- An expanded public service employment program and increased federal aid where unemployment is highest.
- Federal funds to restore railroad tracks and roadbeds.

The testimony urged also extension of the individual income tax cuts now in effect through 1976.

The emergency tax cut enacted last March "helped to cushion the decline," the AFL-CIO testified, but "continuing" measures are needed to achieve recovery.

The Joint Economic Committee report suggested an additional tax cut on top of continuation of the existing reduction. And it appeared to call for more wage and price "jawboning" by the President.

It did, however, recommend such direct job-creating measures as:

- An emergency program to employ 1.6 million unemployed workers on short-term projects.
- Additional aid to state and local governments so they will not have to lay off workers.
- A monetary policy designed to lower interest rates and help the housing industry—unlike the restrictive doctrine of Federal Re-

U.S. Needs New Policy, Leadership

By Saul Miller

San Francisco—President Ford is a "nice guy" who is "still playing by the old Nixon script" that set America on the wrong track at home and abroad more than six years ago, AFL-CIO President George Meany told the opening session of the federation's 11th convention.

It is not enough to have a new President, even a "decent and honorable" man like Ford, Meany told more than 1,000 delegates in his keynote address. "We need a new philosophy. We need new policies —we need new directions for America."

In today's dangerous world it is obvious, Meany emphasized, that an "economically weak America is a prescription for disaster."

The policies of the Nixon-Ford Administrations "have plunged America into the worst economic crisis since the 1930s," Meany said, "and no amount of economic gobbledygook from the White House can wipe away that fact." He spelled out in detail the wide sweep and range of unemployment and recession and asserted that it is clear that "the fault lies not in our system but in our leadership."

He added: "High interest rates and tight money policies were not written into the Constitution by our founding fathers—they were dictated by Arthur Burns," chairman

5% Ceiling Imposed on Federal Pay

Congress broke its commitment to keep federal employe salaries "comparable" to the pay for similar jobs in the private sector. It went along with the 5 percent pay raise ceiling that President Ford said would demonstrate leadership in the fight on inflation.

If either the House or the Senate had mustered a simple majority vote to disapprove the 5 percent limit, 1.3 million white-collar federal workers would have received the 8.66 percent increase that a Bureau of Labor Statistics salary survey determined was needed under the comparability formula. The pay adjustment also applies to the military services and to the compensation of black-lung disease victims.

RETIRING PRESIDENT Richard F. Walsh of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. addresses delegates to the department's convention. Walsh was succeeded by Joseph D. Keenan, secretary of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Delegates also elected Earl D. McDavid of the Retail Clerks as secretary-treasurer to succeed retiring Edward P. Murphy.

New Programs, Stronger Role Mapped by Professional Council

San Francisco—The Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Professional Employees, in existence less than eight years, has grown "from infancy to adolescence" since its last convention, delegates to this year's meeting here were told.

Reporting on the highlights of the organization's activities since 1973, Executive Sec. Jack Golodner noted three more unions have affiliated to bring the total number to 20. The 20 unions represent over one million professional and technical workers, including chemists, engineers, broadcast technicians, actors, teachers, musicians, university professors and physicians.

Teachers President Albert Shanker, elected as the council's new president, promised the organization would have an even more visible profile in the near future.

The council represents an important cutting edge in the labor movement today," Shanker declared.

"Professional and white collar employes are the fastest growing segment of the workforce, and the council's expanded influence since it was formed demonstrates that salaried professionals now realize that benefits of collective bargaining go hand in hand with individual excellence and professional dignity," he observed.

"In the coming years, we intend to bring this message to even more professional, technical and white-collar people. We also will be articulating the needs of these people before the legislatures and agencies of government, as well as the general public."

In his report to the 100 delegates to the council's fifth biennial convention, Golodner noted that the paid per-capita membership since 1973 has increased more than 20 percent, from 480,000 to 582,000. The new affiliates are the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, the Television & Radio Artistes, and the Screen Actors Guild.

As an indication of the council's increased legislative activities, Golodner pointed out that its representatives have appeared before congressional committees an average of once every three months over the past 24 months.

Shanker, a vice president of the AFL-CIO, succeeds George Gill, executive vice president of the Communications Workers, who had served as acting president for the past year and was not a candidate for election.

Musicians President Hal C. Davis, the council's treasurer, was elected its new executive vice president while Rodney Bower, president of the Professional & Technical Engineers, was chosen to succeed Davis.

The three new officers were sworn in by AFL-CIO President George Meany at a special luncheon program highlighted by remarks by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.).

One of the main goals of the council is to end the present exemption of professional employes from the overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The council passed a resolution committing the organization to continue to work for FLSA coverage of professionals.

Two other resolutions denounced the repression of artists in the Soviet Union and in Chile, Argentina, Spain and South Africa.

The council condemned the Ford Administration's policy of so-called detente with the USSR, and declared its solidarity with the artists, scientists and other professional workers of the Soviet Union who seek "the freedom to pursue their professions and participate as free men and women in the common effort to achieve peace and understanding in the world."

The Ford Administration came in for more strong criticism from O'Hara, the luncheon speaker, who noted that unemployment is still well over 8 percent, prices are too high and wages too low. He cited figures on the depressed housing industry and in other areas indicating the long-awaited economic recovery is still far off.

"The Nixon-Ford Administrations have shattered the dreams of millions of American families," O'Hara said. He is chairman of the House Education & Labor subcommittee on higher education.

"Doesn't it strike you as ironic . . . that we could have approached the realization of Phil Murray's dream of 'carpets on the floor, pictures on the wall and music in the home' and Bill Green's vision of more leisure time for workers and their families—and that the people who could help fill that leisure time —the artists, the teachers, the actors, the musicians — are among those hardest hit by unemployment?"

In other action at the one-day convention, the council:

- Passed several resolutions to facilitate the organization of female employes and to improve "the working life" of women and increase their participation in union affairs.
- Pledged support of efforts to insure that all government-funded projects in the arts and entertainment fields employ artists and related craft people in accordance with prevailing standards for wages and other working conditions.
- Established as a priority the achievement of full educational opportunities for all citizens from early childhood through retirement.
- Urged amendment of the nation's copyright laws to require payment of compensation to performers when their recorded works are used by others for profit and to provide compensation to broadcasters when their productions are picked up by cable television operators.

Pledger Elected Head Of Colorado AFL-CIO

Colorado Springs, Colo.—Norman N. Pledger was elected president of the Colorado AFL-CIO over incumbent William F. Smith at the state federation's 11th biennial convention here.

Pledger, a member of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and president of the Colorado Springs Area Labor Council, defeated Smith by a vote of 40,428 to 24,402. Sec.-Treas. Zelda Bransted was re-elected by acclamation by the 200 delegates. The terms are for two years.

Smith, a former Machinists official had been elected at a special convention in May 1974 after the state labor council was removed from trusteeship. Mrs. Bransted was appointed secretary-treasurer last November following the death of Americo Toffoli.

Delegates also expanded the executive board from 15 vice presidents. The executive board will determine the winners in three undecided contests Oct. 10.

On state legislative issues, the delegates urged collective bargaining rights for public employes, improvements in unemployment compensation, postal card registration of voters, a special tax on corporations for the extraction of oil and minerals, maternity sick leaves for women workers, stronger consumer protection and the licensing of building contractors.

Speakers at the two-day convention included Gov. Richard D. Lamm (D), Thomas R. Donahue, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President George Meany and COPE director Al Barkan.

New Program Approved:

Endorsement Given One-Label Concept

By James M. Shevis

San Francisco—A growing Union Label & Service Trades Dept. took a first step toward a "universal" union label to cover the multitude of products and services produced by its affiliates.

The 300 delegates to the department's biennial convention here approved a policy statement giving the executive board a green light to institute a program urging affiliated unions to adopt one of three different universal insignias indicating that a particular product or service was made or performed by an AFL-CIO union.

The universal label concept has been brought up at previous conventions and in discussions held as far back as the department's first convention in 1909. It has been rejected for a variety of reasons, including impracticality, lack of agreement on design, legality and wide differences in conditions and methods of granting the label to an employer.

But the department's executive board, acknowledging that its new policy is neither perfect nor foolproof, told delegates "it is time to make a new beginning step by step" toward adoption of a universally recognized union label.

Steelworkers President I. W. Abel, addressing the convention, observed "such an all-union label would almost certainly simplify and add to the effectiveness of the tremendous work that this department is already doing." At its last convention, the Steelworkers passed a resolution pledging support for the development and promotion of a universal label.

"Whatever steps are taken to make that label instantly and universally recognized is, in our view, movement in the right direction," said Abel, who is also president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

In other action, the convention elected a new president and secretary-treasurer, and voted to increase the size of the executive board from 7 to 11 members. Delegates also approved a series of resolutions designed to regulate imports and to further the department's basic objective of promoting union goods and services.

The department reported it has gained three new affiliates the Asbestos Workers, the Stone Polishers and the Elevator Constructors. Two other unions—the Chemical Workers and the Brick & Clay Workers —have reaffiliated.

Mergers of long-term affiliates with other department affiliates have reduced the total by two, but the department still numbers 87 national and international union affiliates.

The convention adopted a constitutional change to expand the size of the executive board to "provide more input to the department and also give broader knowledge and insights to the department between conventions." Four new vice presidents will be elected by the executive board after Jan. 1, 1976.

At the convention, Vice President Joseph D. Keenan was elected president; Vice Presidents Joseph P. McCurdy and Ed S. Miller resigned, and three new vice presidents were elected to fill vacancies created by the changes in officers.

Newly elected vice presidents are Howard D. Collins, president of the United Garment Workers of America; Paul P. McCastland, a vice president of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes; and Harold F. Chadwick, secretary-treasurer of the Stage Employes. Re-elected were Vice President Daniel E. Conway of the Bakery & Confectionery Workers; Wesley A. Taylor of the Graphic Arts; James T. Housewright of the Retail Clerks, and Thomas F. Murphy of the Bricklayers.

Keenan, an AFL-CIO vice president and secretary of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers succeeds Richard F. Walsh as president of the department. Walsh, president emeritus of the Stage Employes has served as president of the department since 1960.

Earl D. McDavid was chosen to replace Edward P. Murphy as secretary-treasurer. Murphy, 58, held the position the past five years. He has been partially disabled since May 1974 and has chosen to retire.

McDavid, 52 served as a vice president and organizing director for the Retail Clerks' Northwestern division, based in Seattle, Wash.

AFL-CIO Secretary-Treasurer Lane Kirkland praised Murphy as a "fine, good and strong trade unionist," and told delegates his opinion was shared by President George Meany. Murphy served as assistant secretary-treasurer of the department for 20 years before becoming secretary-treasurer in 1971.

Kirkland spoke on one of the major themes of the two-day meeting at the Holiday Inn-Union Square—the pressing need to regulate the flood of imported goods into the United States.

Just as important, he noted, is the task of instilling in American consumers a preference for union-made goods.

In this connection, Kirkland said, "the device of the consumer boycott is increasingly a vital instrument" in alerting the buying public to the torrent of non-union and foreign-made goods and services that are costing Americans their jobs.

To cope with the problem, the convention approved resolutions:

- Urging workers and their families to refuse to purchase foreign-made goods.
- Calling upon the AFL-CIO to seek a "truth in advertising" law to require that advertisers state in ads in what country a product was made.
- Mounting a general advertising campaign to let the public know the extent to which union-made goods are being squeezed out of the domestic market by foreign and non-union goods.
- Pledging to continue its fight for stronger anti-dumping laws and to press for enactment of federal legislation to allow foreign countries a fair share of U.S. markets, "but prevent them from taking over such markets, lock, stock and barrel."
- Calling on Congress to prohibit the use of temporary, non-immigrant foreign nationals as production workers in U.S. industries, particularly the printing trades.

Other resolutions asked an end to the Treasury Dept. practice of printing U.S. saving bonds at non-union plants; support for the Textile Workers Union of America against J. P. Stevens & Co., and vigorous opposition to elimination of product price marking.

At Department Convention:

Federal Bargaining Law Set As Top Metal Trades Goal

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. declared passage of a true collective bargaining bill for federal employes its number one objective.

In a resolution adopted at its 57th convention here, the department called upon Congress to enact legislation "establishing the right of federal workers to bargain collectively in a full and true manner for their hours, wages and working conditions."

Metal Trades President Paul J. Burnsky, who was re-elected to another term with additional duties, said a federal law is "the only means to achieve true collective bargaining for federal workers."

For more than a decade, the department's resolution noted, the federal government has maintained by executive order and administrative fiat, a system of collective bargaining that has failed to meet the legitimate aims of organized workers in the federal service.

Despite the fact that federal workers constitute the largest labor force in the country they "are still being treated as second-class citizens in the field of labor-management relations," the resolution charged.

Burnsky noted that "a significant amount" of the department's time and energies is devoted to the federal sector. The department's councils represent workers of all crafts and trades in United States naval shipyards and in a variety of other federal installations.

Two Administration officials who followed Burnsky's opening remarks to the 150 convention delegates indicated a more favorable outlook for a federal bargaining bill.

Chairman Robert E. Hampton of the U.S. Civil Service Commission said he thought that "eventually that is going to come about." He added "the experience that we have had under the Executive Orders is providing a pretty sound basis for that to become a factor."

In a speech delivered in behalf of W. J. Usery, Jr., director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, the Administration's chief mediator noted that at least three bills now are before Congress to establish a legislative base for collective bargaining in the federal sector.

"I hope that out of them will emerge a system that will more adequately serve the best interests of the workers, the government and the general public," he said.

Usery was unable to attend the convention. He was tied up in efforts to resolve a three-month strike against the Electric Boat Division of General Dynamics at Groton, Conn. The strike involves 10,000 workers represented by metal trades councils.

Attilio DiPasquale, the Navy's civilian labor relations director, called for further debate of proposed remedies in federal bargaining, cautioning that "somebody had better have all the answers to a model federal law before we ask the Congress to throw out what we have and give us something different."

AFL-CIO President George Meany, in a telegram to the convention, noted "these are very tough times for all workers and their unions." He added, "I have every confidence that your department and its affiliates will meet the challenges that face them, and that your convention will produce the solid, trade union programs your members need and deserve."

Delegates pledged the Metal Trades Dept. to "a vigorous dedication of total commitment to the vital task of organizational growth." The measure called upon each of the department's 22 affilates to continue to support the concept of coordinated organizing.

The convention also adopted resolutions calling for:

- A revival of U.S. shipbuilding. The U.S. merchant marine fleet is at its lowest number of units since 1939 and is in "dire need of rebuilding," the department noted.
- An end to the current Navy Dept. practice of using Defense appropriations to have ship repair work done in foreign shipyards, "possibly adding to the unemployment problems through reduction-in-force actions at naval shipyards."
- Full collective bargaining rights and better living conditions for all U.S. citizens employed by the Panama Canal Co. in the Panama Canal Zone. Another resolution urged Congress to support the suspended "third locks" construction program in the Canal Zone.
- Enactment of federal legislation that would require the major oil companies to use American-built, American-manned U.S.-flag vessels for the transportation of at least 30 percent of their imported oil.

Burnsky reported on efforts to obtain a national master agreement with the Navy Dept. in behalf of the federal metal trades councils representing workers at the eight Navy shipyards.

"We are hopeful such a venture will be accomplished soon," Burnsky said.

Under a constitutional amendment unanimously adopted by the delegates, the secretary-treasurer's office was abolished, and its duties assigned to Burnsky who was voted a $10,000 salary increase to $42,500 a year.

Clayton W. Bilderback, who held the secretary-treasurer's position for 13 years, retired at the end of the convention. Delegates gave him a standing ovation for his service and devotion to the organization.

Besides Burnsky, the convention re-elected the department's nine vice presidents and elected Machinists President Floyd E. Smith to the newly-created office of 10th vice president.

Two of the convention speakers warned of the threat to the U.S. shipbuilding industry posed by the current Soviet maritime buildup, and its effect on the nation's economy.

Arthur E. Farr, chairman of the Pacific Coast Shipbuilders Association, noted the Soviet Union is now modernizing and building naval and merchant ships at nearly twice the annual rate of the U.S.

Admiral Isaac C. Kidd, Jr., NATO Supreme Allied Commander, Atlantic, said the Russians are spending a national fortune to acquire a naval and merchant marine capability of the first magnitude. Detente notwithstanding, he added, "we better be prepared" to block this potential threat to the nation's vitals.

TOP PRIORITY was given at the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. convention to the drive for legislation providing true collective bargaining rights for federal workers on wages, hours and working conditions. Metal Trades President Paul J. Burnsky, addressing delegates, said the executive order governing labor relations fails to meet the legitimate goals of organized workers.

Fare-Free Rides Urged To Revive Mass Transit

Calgary—Innovative programs are needed to revitalize the ailing mass transportation industries in the United States and Canada, delegates to the 43rd biennial convention of the Amalgamated Transit Union were told.

No-fare urban transit and government subsidies were cited as key approaches to improving services and luring passengers back to support faltering systems.

ATU President Dan V. Maroney, Jr. stressed in his keynote address to the 500 convention delegates at this western Canadian city that the most effective and proven program to increase ridership on urban transit systems is through the union-supported no-fare concept.

Maroney said the rejuvenation of urban transit systems is particularly vital in the face of current energy shortages, as he called for effective political action at the local, state and provincial, and national levels to help achieve this goal.

By combining the no-fare concept with other programs, Maroney said, the transit industry would reverse the decline that saw transit ridership drop from a record high of 19.5 billion in 1945 to 5.5 billion in 1973.

He said no-fare transit would both improve services and double the number of jobs in the industry over the next five years.

A revitalized transit industry would be instrumental in helping the United States and Canada achieve their employment, environmental, energy and economic goals, Maroney stressed.

"We must organize politically at all levels to promote this program," he stressed. "If management is not going to do anything about the declining industry, then we have to, and we do it through political action."

Maroney's theme was reinforced by President Matthew Guinan of the Transport Workers who told the delegates that obtaining "the billions of dollars in government funds necessary to undo the long years of neglect to our transportation systems can be done only by legislation."

He said mass transit subsidies are vitally needed to develop effective systems to cope with the energy crisis.

Norman Hill, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, told the convention that the political coalition of organized labor and the minorities is essential in resolving the problems of society.

Black Leaders Hit U.N. Move To Oust Israel

New York—Seventeen prominent black Americans, headed by A. Philip Randolph, made public a letter they have sent to the African delegations to the United Nations strongly opposing any move to suspend Israel from the General Assembly.

Such action, the letter said, could "betray the noble principles that guided the African liberation movements . . . and would effectively destroy the United Nations as an instrument for aiding the development of the emerging nations."

The letter was sent as "an expression of our mutual commitment to a free Africa." The signers have all been identified with the struggles of the African people for liberation from colonialism and racism.

The signers are all members of the recently formed Black Americans to Support Israel Committee, which is chaired by Randolph.

They include AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis; Rep. Walter Fauntroy (D-D.C.); Dorothy I. Height, president National Council of Negro Women; Rep. Barbara Jordan (D-Tex.); Vernon E. Jordan, Jr., executive director, National Urban League; Benjamin E. Mays, president, Atlanta Board of Education; Frank C. Montero, chairman, Africa Defense and Aid Fund, American Committee on Africa; D. Ward Nichols, bishop, A.M.E. Church; Eleanor Holmes Norton, New York City Commissioner of Human Rights; Frederick O'Neal, president, Associated Actors & Artistes; Bayard Rustin, president, A. Philip Randolph Institute; Percy B. Sutton, borough president of Manhattan; William J. Trent, professor of urban affairs, Hunter College; Roy Wilkins, executive director, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; and Rep. Andrew Young (D-Ga.).

Connecticut Delegates Ask Fair Tax Policy

Hartford, Conn.—Responding to a severe revenue crunch facing the state and local governments, the 11th convention of the Connecticut AFL-CIO called for enactment of a progressive income tax and a cut in the regressive sales tax rate.

The resolution's goal is a more even and fair distribution of the tax burden. Although 6 percent of Connecticut families receive 40 percent of the income in the state, the tax burden falls on lower income groups. The state federation pointed out that 74 percent of revenues come from exceptionally high property and sales taxes.

The state AFL-CIO proposal would cut the sales from 7.5 percent to 3 percent while providing more state aid to local governments. The progressive tax package would actually reduce taxes for a family of four earning less than $16,000 a year, the median state income.

The more than 600 delegates to the three-day convention re-elected President John J. Driscoll by acclamation to his eighth consecutive two-year term. Justin Ostro was also re-elected without opposition as executive vice president.

Walter M. O'Connor was elected secretary-treasurer following a tight three-way race to succeed Joseph C. Bober, who did not seek re-election after 12 years service. O'Connor is president of the state Fire Fighters association.

Michael Ferrucci, Jr., of the State, County & Municipal Employees was elected executive secretary to replace George Froehlich of the Rubber Workers, who is retiring.

The convention voted support of the AFL-CIO economic action program, National Health Security, labor's position on foreign policy and the Longshoremen's embargo of Russian grain.

ILA President Thomas W. Gleason explained to delegates the union's objectives in the recent grain boycott. Gov. Ella T. Grasso in her address to the convention praised the unions involved for their efforts to protect American consumers from adverse economic impact of the grain sales to the Soviets.

Other speakers included Bishop Joseph F. Donnelly, who is involved in the Farm Workers' struggle for union rights; President Sol Stetin of the Textile Workers Union of America; Director Alan Kistler of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organizing & Field Services; Earl McDavid of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; and Walter Stein of the American Trade Union Council for Histadrut.

Historical Records Of Unions Surveyed

AFL-CIO affiliates are being asked to cooperate in a Labor Studies Center survey of any historical materials they possess that may be useful to the development of national labor archives.

One of the long-range objectives of the federation's Studies Center is the establishment of labor archives at its new campus, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland noted in his letter to the affiliates.

Kirkland pointed out that the preservation of materials is essential in the accurate portrayal of the development and growth of the American labor movement.

The Studies Center survey is a first step that seeks to determine which unions have already preserved their historical records and where they are preserved.

NEWS COVERAGE of the labor movement in the commercial press is scored by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland at the International Labor Press Association convention.

Kirkland Scores Press For Shoddy Reporting

He said this attitude reaches its most absurb form with the suggestion that news media representatives be allowed to sit in on collective bargaining negotiations "to represent the general public," between labor and management.

Kirkland delivered the ILPA's 7th lecture in the series named after A. J. Liebling, famed critic of the press. Kirkland quoted Liebling several times and said his comments were delivered in the "Joe Liebling tradition of fair comment and constructive criticism."

Kirkland cited several steps he would like to see taken to correct the more blantant misrepresentations of labor in the nation's news media:

● Some elementary training for reporters on labor, collective bargaining, and economics—"the dismal science is reported dismally." Kirkland said most of what is passed off as economic reporting is really business reporting and it's time someone analyzed a new contract in terms of what it means for increased purchasing power and better conditions in the community.

● Development of some "new cliches" so unions and union members aren't painted in any of the current stereotypes. Kirkland said that if AFL-CIO President George Meany were delivering the Liebling lecture, the general press news coverage would start:

"Cantankerous, cigar-chewing George Meany, the 81-year-old boss of the AFL-CIO gruffly criticized the news media in a speech to his union's editors."

● Admit that total objectivity is a false goal and seek fairness and balance, "which is more desirable and more attainable." He decried what he said was growing willingness to accept as fact anything that is printed—even a press handout from business.

He recounted the retraction run by conservative columnist James J. Kilpatrick after he had printed a quote of George Meany on public employes. Kilpatrick traced it to Sen. Paul Fannin (R-Ariz.), who got it from a southern business group who got it from the National Right to Work Committee, "which made it up out of whole cloth."

Similarly, Kirkland traced news coverage of the Longshoremen's boycott of Soviet grain purchases to two inaccuracies that became "fact" once published. He said the astounding thing about the grain boycott was that it took a job action just to get attention to the problem, which shouldn't have been necessary after the 1972 experience "with the other great grain robbery."

What it added up to, Kirkland said, was that "the editorialists wouldn't take us at our word. Fortunately, someone in government was willing to take us at our word."

● Occasionally identify some of those "unnamed sources," or at least identify whether they have a grudge, a vested interest or some other interest in the topic.

Kirkland said many of the misrepresentations of labor can be traced to "disillusioned old friends" and a new wave of the "more progressive than thou" school. Both are off base, he said. In the first place, the "romantic days of fervor" of a mutual cause between reporters and labor never existed and you have only to look at the savagery of how the media covered labor 30 years ago to prove it.

One of the best of summations of the way labor is treated, in the news media, Kirkland said, was in Liebling's 1961 comment that: "a fortune cookie is not worth buying if the paper inside always carries the same legend."

Panel Warns Of New Slump In Economy

serve Chairman Arthur Burns.

Within the Ford Administration, Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop appears to have been more influential than Treasury Sec. William E. Simon on the issue of extending the tax cut.

When Simon appeared before the House Budget Committee, he allied himself with Burns in opposition to extension of the tax cut. While he stopped short of openly opposing it at the hearing, he later told reporters, "You don't have to be clairvoyant to know where I stand."

A day later, Dunlop told the Senate Budget Committee directly that his "personal view" is for "continuation of the business and personal tax cuts, without limit of time, as recommended by the President's Labor-Management Committee last January."

President Ford, the following day, said he hopes to propose tax cut legislation "in a week or so" but did not spell out its ingredients.

At ILPA Sessions:

Labor Editors Report Cutbacks As Costs Rise, Economy Slumps

San Francisco—The same economic problems labor editors have been writing about for the past two years are having a sharp impact on their publications, delegates to the International Labor Press Association convention were told.

The convention's 175 delegates from 135 publications heard Nat Goldfinger, AFL-CIO research director, outline a distressed economy of combined recession and inflation for which he predicted no relief until major policies of the Ford Administration are jettisoned.

And delegates also heard the results of a survey of ILPA publications showing that in the last two years, an alarming percentage of member publications have been hit by reductions in frequency, size and staff—or all three.

Delegates elected Albert K. Herling of the Bakery & Confectionery Workers' publication, the B&C News, as the new ILPA president, a post vacant since the death earlier in 1975 of Max Steinbock of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union. The memory of Steinbock was honored on opening day of four-day convention.

Herling was elected by an 83-29 margin over Burt Beck of the Clothing Workers' Advance. Allen Y. Zack, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Public Relations, was elected without opposition as secretary-treasurer. He succeeds John M. Barry, managing editor of the AFL-CIO News, who did not seek re-election.

The convention also made minor adjustments in its constitution, set up a joint committee with the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. to promote union-made products, and questioned Sec. of Labor John T. Dunlop in a press conference format.

The report on cost-related cutbacks said that response to a questionnaire sent to all ILPA publications determined that reductions had been made in publication size by 31 percent of the members, in staff size by 21 percent, and in frequency of publication by 45 percent of national and international union publications. For regional and local papers, the cutbacks were even more severe in some categories.

The survey found postal rate and paper price increases to be the most inflationary forces. It gave a dim projection for the immediate future, with more than 50 percent of labor editors either predicting further entrenchment or expressing uncertainty.

Other convention elections saw four new vice presidents chosen and 11 re-elected. The new vice presidents are Diane Curry of the Railway Clerks Interchange, Charles Borsari of the Ohio AFL-CIO Focus, Russ Gibbons of Steel Labor and Jerry Archuleta of OCAW News, who won in a runoff over incumbent William Moody of Graphic Arts Unionist.

Neville S. Hamilton of the Canadian Paperworkers Journal was unopposed as Canadian vice president.

The 11 vice presidents returned to office were James M. Cesnik, the Guild Reporter; Gene Klare, Oregon Labor Press; Sal Perrotta, Los Angeles Citizen; Mel Stack, Retail Clerks Advocate; Bernard Stephens, Public Employee Press of AFSCME District Council 37; Patricia Strandt, Cement, Lime & Gypsum Voice; Allen R. Williams, Aero Facts, Machinists, St. Louis; Stan Williams, Pennsylvania AFL-CIO News; R. J. Williamson, Maintenance of Way Employes Railway Journal; and Patrick J. Ziska, the Laborer.

Diane Curry, who topped all vice presidential candidates on the first ballot with 97 votes, also addressed the convention on the expanding role of women in the labor press.

In addition to the union label committee, the convention heard from the newly elected secretary-treasurer of ULSTD, Earl McDavid, who said he was picking up the due bill on a pledge of "you give us the material and we'll run it," made at the previous convention.

That pledge had been made by Steelworkers Public Relations Director Ray Pasnick, who proceded Steinbock as ILPA president. Pasnick chaired the convention and will serve as president until the swearing-in of the new officers in January 1975.

In response to questioning about job safety, Dunlop said he had already appointed new people to most of the highest positions of OSHA, but said he was shopping for "more innovative thinking or education" on how to get compliance with the law rather than expanding the number of OSHA inspectors. He claimed 75,000 would be needed for on-site inspections under the law.

Shirley Carr, an executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress, stressed a theme which the delegates also heard about the United States—biased press coverage.

She said she hoped that a growing and strong labor press could help overcome the troubles with the commercial news media, which in Canada "is grossly unfair until it's very hard to get the truth printed."

Labor history was the topic for both California AFL-CIO Executive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning and a special presentation to the convention on the bicentennial. Henning traced the history of California labor, and the AFL-CIO's cooperation in the 200th anniversary observance was described by Carolyn Jacobson of the Working Americans Bicentennial Project as an ideal forum for getting labor's story told.

Among the convention's panels on editing and related skills was a discussion of trade union public relations. Panelists were AFL-CIO Public Relations Director Albert J. Zack, Montana AFL-CIO Exec. Sec. James W. Murray, Service Employees Vice Pres. Elinor Glenn, and Henry Fleisher, whose firm represents several major unions.

Top ILPA Awards Cite Coverage of Nixon's Fall

San Francisco—The decline and fall of Richard Nixon was the premier news story of 1974 for trade union publications as well as the general press.

Judges in the International Labor Press Association's 1975 journalism awards competition noted that more than a third of the 96 prize-winning entries dealt with the scandal that engulfed the Nixon Administration and ultimately led to congressional moves for impeachment and Nixon's resignation.

"Nixon's prime target, the press, was the agency that brought him down—and the labor press played an active role in contributing to public enlightment on the perjurious conduct of the President's hard-nosed cabal," the judges said in a report to the ILPA convention here.

"News stories by the score, columns, cartoons, photographs and editorials in ILPA member publications shouted to the housetops the story of the Nixon Administration and the economic ills its policies created or aggravated. . . .

"Together the entries constitute a magnificent service by a press that capably fulfilled its responsibility for keeping the record straight—and interpreting its meaning for union members bombarded by conflicting opinions and competing versions. . . ."

This year's ILPA contest drew a record 630 entries in 16 categories of competition. The judges were Eugene A. Kelly, retired assistant editor of the AFL-CIO News; Archie W. Robinson, retired labor editor of U.S. News & World Report, and Samuel F. Marshall, former union editor now with the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

The top award winners in terms of general editorial excellence were:

International Publications — Circulation of 100,000 or more, newspaper format, the Machinist; magazine format, Retail Clerks Advocate; less than 100,000 circulation, newspaper format, the Seafarers Log; magazine format, the Screen Actor.

State and Local Central Bodies—Circulation of 20,000 or more, Northern California Labor; circulation of less than 20,000, Pennsylvania AFL-CIO News.

District or Regional Publications—Circulation of 20,000 or more, 1199 News national edition, (Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, New York), circulation of less than 20,000, Midwest News, (Clothing Workers, Chicago).

Local Union Publications—Circulation of 15,000 or more, the Provincial (British Columbia Government Employees); circulation of 7,500-15,000, Stand By (New York Local, Television & Radio Artists); circulation of 2,500-7,500, TELIPO (Fur, Leather & Machine Joint Board, New York); circulation of less than 2,500, College Union Voice (Teachers Local 1600, Chicago).

Special Performance Awards — Best original cartoon, Bernie Seaman in the IUE News; best original photograph, The Advance (Clothing Workers); best editorial, St. Paul Union Advocate; best signed column, William C. Marshall in the Michigan AFL-CIO News; best feature (unique performance), St. Louis Labor Tribune; best front page, newspaper format, TEMPO; best cover, magazine format, the Butcher Workman.

Ford Veto Scored:

Maritime Dept. Convention Presses Oil Cargo Issue

San Francisco—Union action to correct the injustices of the Russian grain deal is but the latest installment of the "long, tough fight" to reshape conditions for U.S. maritime workers, delegates to the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. convention were told.

MTD President Paul Hall told the two-day biennial convention that he saw no quick resolution to the multiple problems stemming from the world's energy supply, trade patterns and growing influences of multinational corporations.

The convention vowed to continue the fight Hall outlined, adopting a program which called for an overhaul of the tax structure favoring U.S. investment abroad; adoption of a coordinated energy policy and requirement that a percentage of all U.S. oil imports be carried in U.S. flag ships; a continued fight for the transportation law which President Ford vetoed in 1974 and a package of economic reforms designed to bring the U.S. economy out of "the worst recession since the 1930s."

Despite the veto, the convention described the ability to get the 1974 Energy Transportation Security Act through Congress "a great victory over the multinational oil companies" and said the maritime unions "will not relent until a share of oil cargoes are reserved for U.S. tankers."

Other parts of the program adopted by the convention include:

- Measures to stop the "vicious rate cutting practiced by Russian shippers ever since they got a foot in the door through the great grain robbery of 1972."
- Stronger enforcement of the Jones Act which bars foreign ships from handling trade within the United States particularly between the U.S. and the Virgin Islands, scene of extensive development in oil refineries in recent years.
- Restoration of the budget of the U.S. Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to prevent loss of 393 medical positions at the Public Health Service hospitals on which seagoing workers depend for adequate health care.

"The idea is to cut out services until the number of patients drops, then close the hospitals for lack of patient demand," MTD administrator O. William Moody, Jr., told delegates. The convention endorsed an amendment by Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.) to restore the 393 positions and provide the $12.9 million necessary for them.

The convention empowered the MTD executive board to choose a new secretary-treasurer to replace Peter M. McGavin, who served for 15 years before his death July 6. The convention amended its constitution to provide for the selection before the 1977 convention and named Moody in an acting capacity.

Hall, president of the Seafarers, was re-elected department president by the convention. Jack McDonald of the Operating Engineers also was re-elected to a new four-year term as vice president. The 44 unions affiliated with the department each designate one representative to serve on the MTD executive board.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told the convention that the crisis that has gripped the entire U.S. economy in the recession of 1974-75 is similar to what the maritime trades have been undergoing for the last decade.

Yet, Kirkland said, any form of assistance for the beleagured industry is attacked by the nation's news media, one of the many U.S. industries that regularly receives federal subsidies through tax breaks, reduced mail rates and contracts. In refutation of what he termed gross misrepresentation of the recent boycott of grain shipments to Russia by the Longshoremen. Kirkland stressed that "at no time in the lengthy negotiations" with the Ford Administration was the issue of seafaring jobs put forward.

He praised the role of Sec. of Labor John T. Dunlop in the negotiations over the boycott, which Kirkland said were necessitated by the United States' being the only nation in the world that would allow a monopolistic force like the Soviet government to deal in secret with U.S. grain companies and lock up future shipments at its own price.

Sen. J. Bennett Johnston (D-La.), author of a Senate amendment that would close the waiver loophole in the Jones Act, told the convention that the recent election of Sen. John Durkin in New Hampshire displayed the most effective use of labor political action the nation has ever seen.

As chairman of the Senate Democratic Campaign Committee, Johnston urged a similar role for labor in future elections and told delegates he felt the Democratic Party "had learned its lesson" in not heeding labor's advice and retaining its support.

Johnston quoted a recent poll by the campaign committee which showed overwhelming support for national health insurance and 47 percent to 29 percent majority in favor of a "massive overhaul of the U.S. economy such as the New Deal."

Several convention resolutions expressed concern about the worsening posture of the U.S. merchant marine fleet in relation to the Russian fleet, noting that U.S. ships have never gotten more than 11 percent of the cargo instead of the one-third promised with the 1972 Russian grain purchases.

"Any large-scale grain purchase deals with Soviet bloc nations should be stopped until adequate safeguards for the Free World, the American people and the U.S. merchant marine are firmly established on the basis of complete reciprocity, in the spirit of true detente, not the Administration's calamitous one-way detente with the Communist superpowers," MTD said.

Other convention resolutions called for a $3 minimum wage law; compilation of a labor list on available arbitrators; a national fisheries policy; full collective bargaining rights for federal workers and a single federal authority on maritime affairs.

GOVERNMENT POLICIES keyed to a strong U.S. merchant fleet are proposed at the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. convention by MTD President Paul Hall. O. William Moody, Jr., MTD administrator and acting secretary-treasurer is at right.

Inadequate GI Benefits Held 'National Disgrace'

San Francisco—The treatment of the Vietnam veteran has been "a national disgrace," the Executive Council told the AFL-CIO convention here.

The nation is not living up to its commitment to do all it can to help Vietnam veterans readjust and take their rightful places as productive members of American society, the council declared.

The council attributed public and governmental indifference to veterans of the Vietnam conflict to a hastiness to forget an unpopular war. It also laid much of the blame to financial roadblocks put up by fiscally conservative Republican administrations.

"In health care, the needs of the crippled and maimed veterans have been cruelly victimized by the budget-slashing policies of consecutive Republican administrations who have done little else but pay lip service to veterans," the council said in its report.

In education, inadequate benefits have forced thousands of veterans into the already long lines of the unemployed, the council noted. Veterans' unemployment in August was 9.7 percent. For college-aged veterans, 20 to 24 years of age, who might be taking advantage of the GI educational bill if benefits were greater, the jobless rate in August was 17.5 percent.

"This contemporary educational program has never reached parity with its World War II predecessor," the council noted. "While participation rates have increased in the past, they have yet to reach the levels following World War II."

The council scored President Ford for vetoing AFL-CIO-endorsed legislation modernizing the GI educational program last year. The veto eventually was overridden by Congress but "inflation and skyrocketing education costs of the past years have already sharply eroded these gains."

Rollcall Vote in Senate On Job Safety Cutback

On Sept. 24, the Senate weakened the Occupational Safety & Health Act by prohibiting inspection of any job site or establishment with fewer than four employes.

The labor-opposed amendment to an appropriations bill was passed by a 48-45 vote.

Mortgage Trust Yields Security, Spurs Jobs

San Francisco — Massive new financial resources — both public and private — are needed for housing construction and mortgage loans for all income groups, the Executive Council declared.

It noted in its report to the convention that the volume of available credit must be increased because of the dismal economic condition of the housing industry.

Pension funds and union general treasury funds are a vital source of investment credit being channeled into the nation's savings, the council observed.

But it expressed concern that the managers of these funds may be overemphasizing stock market investments rather than government-insured residential construction financing and permanent mortgage loans.

Funds invested in housing construction, the council pointed out, provide an exceptional return, in addition to creating jobs throughout various sectors of the economy.

In reaffirming its support of essential social investment, the council stressed that organized labor continues to lead in the effort to provide decent housing and decent jobs for all Americans.

The AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust was created in 1964 to help achieve this goal, it pointed out. In addition to its secure investment return, the trust helps spur employment for the hard pressed construction trades and industrial sector.

The trust, which operates much like a mutual fund, pays earnings semi-annually. Investments in the trust grew over the past four years from $10.4 mililon to more than $60 million, the council reported.

Court Backs Union On Bargaining Data

St. Paul — The Minnesota Supreme Court has ruled that a public employer must provide a union representing its employes with all necessary information to carry on bargaining. The decision upheld a protest by Operating Engineers Local 49 over refusal of the state's Public Works Dept. to furnish it with information on a test given employes.

STRIKING TEACHERS in Wilmington, Del., are supported by union members throughout the state in the City Hall demonstration protesting mass arrests and fines imposed in an effort to break the "no-contract, no-work" policy of the AFT local.

High Unemployment Threatening To Rip America's Social Fabric

San Francisco—The Ford Administration's projections of intolerable levels of unemployment for the next five years are "an insult to America's capacity to achieve full employment," the Executive Council reported to the AFL-CIO convention.

Earlier this year, the Administration projected jobless rates of 7.9 percent next year, 7.2 percent in 1977, 6.5 percent in 1978, 5.8 percent in 1979 and 5.1 percent in 1980.

"Such high jobless rates can tear apart the fabric of American society," the council said.

"With each one percent of unemployment representing about one million workers, these projections mean the American economy and American society will suffer human hardship beyond measure and irreparable waste of human resources."

Sustained full employment is necessary to establish the economic environment for management to support and maintain adequate apprenticeship, training and upgrading efforts, the council noted.

Reporting on activities of the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute, which was given new responsibility under the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act of 1972, the council noted HRDI has become the federation's manpower arm.

The 1973 convention recommended that "HRDI continue to involve state and local leaders of organized labor in manpower programs and planning." In carrying out this responsibility, HRDI maintains a directory identifying over 700 individuals from organized labor who are serving on state or local manpower planning councils.

"HRDI staff members have been instrumental in supporting state and local central bodies in initiating and increasing labor representation on local planning councils," the council said.

Recognizing its responsibility to assure organized labor's knowledge of CETA and its effects, HRDI has increased its technical assistance and education efforts, the council added.

It noted that in cooperation with the Labor Studies Center, HRDI conducted manpower seminars in five cities in 1974 designed specifically for the leadership of state and local central labor councils.

It also conducted 40 manpower education conferences in cooperation with local labor councils, and developed 57 manpower education programs. It worker closely with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, international union education programs and state and local central body programs, and with local representatives of the AFL-CIO Community Services Dept.

To carry out its responsibility of assisting disadvantaged persons such as prisoners, welfare recipients, veterans and young people to enter the labor force, HRDI developed 48,333 job opportunities and placed 20,416 individuals in those jobs from October 1973 through June 1975—far exceeding its contractual commitment to the Labor Dept.

Over the same period, HRDI gave personal interviews and job counseling to 13,720 individuals and provided special counseling to another 7,816 service men and women under the Veterans' Assistance Program, initiated in 1970.

HRDI also worked to implement the federation's Action Program to Put America Back to Work, developing jobs and providing adequate counseling.

It also has cooperated with government and voluntary programs to help the Vietnamese refugee program, administered the Apprenticeship Outreach Programs sponsored by local building trades councils, and served as a clearinghouse on behalf of the U.S. Employment Service and a number of AFL-CIO international unions in assuring that employer applications to import alien workers possessing specific job skills receive an adequate review by the unions concerned.

Job, Production Losses Linked to Trade Policy

San Francisco—America's foreign trade policy has added to unemployment and retarded economic recovery, the Executive Council charged.

During the past two years, the council said, the unrealistic approach to foreign trade has continued to erode production, living standards and the nation's industrial base.

Both the Administration's policymakers and Congress failed to heed the warnings that domestic conditions would worsen unless tax, trade and investment laws were changed.

The result was a sharp increase in the outrush of U.S. capital, production facilities and jobs in the past two years.

Foreign investments by U.S.-based multinational corporations rose 20 percent in 1973, 24 percent in 1974, and are expected to rise an additional 17 percent this year to more than $29 billion.

The council said that banks and the multinationals continued to use U.S. trade, tax and investment laws to export the nation's vital commodities and jobs, while juggling prices, currencies and credit to add to their profits.

They have licensed the newest technology for use abroad and combined in joint ventures with foreign governments and foreign companies regardless of the impact on the U.S. economy.

The sharp increase in petroleum prices imposed by the oil-producing Arab nations hit the U.S. economy when it was already in serious trouble, partly as a result of misguided foreign trade and investment policies, the council said.

While the AFL-CIO opposed the 1974 Trade Act, labor has sought to get the International Trade Commission to enforce sections of the law that could minimize loses in jobs and production.

Union witnesses testified that further tariff cutting would threaten the survival of many U.S. industries and cause additional production cutbacks.

The AFL-CIO has also opposed the extension of import preferences to low-wage countries and expanding imports from Communist countries while the nation suffered from high unemployment.

But the council noted that President Ford has granted favored-nation status to Romania and announced his intention to grant preferential zero tariffs on imports from low-wage countries.

The council said lack of regulation of multinationals and tax laws that make it profitable for business firms to operate abroad have contributed heavily, along with tariff policies, to America's economic crisis.

Subversion, Aggression:

New Assaults Levied On Free Institutions

San Francisco—The political manipulations that "ended the usefulness of the International Labor Organization" typified the Communist tactics of subverting free institutions, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in its report to the convention.

And worse, the council said, the Soviet undermining of freedom around the world is largely going unchallenged.

"The strong political, economic and social alliances between nations of the Free World have been weakened by a lack of leadership and necessary popular resolution to confront the Soviet government's growing number of client nations," the council declared.

The impact of the fear and chaos can go far beyond the significance of the military conquest of Vietnam and Cambodia, the council pointed out.

The Executive Council report covered these developments also:

• In Chile, the "cruel and inhuman suppression of human rights which has been publicly exhibited is not foreign to other lands in this hemisphere." The council reported that throughout Latin America, "the free trade union movements which once flourished are pale and nervous partners of their military companions" who have made government by decree, without popular consent, more the rule than the exception.

• The Middle East would have "peace and prosperity within the grasp of all nations in that region if it were not for the incitement to war and the greed of the Soviet Union." The combination of material wealth in the Arab states and the economic genius of Israel could be united to the benefit of the whole world, the council said, if it were not for a "corrosive and debilitating war being pursued for the obvious objectives of the USSR."

• In Europe, for the first time, "a representative of the labor front organization of the Soviet Union has addressed a convention of a free trade union national center—the West German DGB." The council reiterated that it "viewed with disgust the fraternization of democratic Western European labor centers with Communist Party labor fronts."

• Free labor around the world should "protest and condemn the new Communist-military alliance that threatens freedom, democracy and peace in Portugal," the council said.

In view of all this, the council noted with alarm a decline in U.S. military strength in relation to Russia and said "Americans are subjected to the calls of isolationist voices at home and fearful national leaders abroad to further curtail U.S. military forces."

The council also detailed the cooperative efforts between the AFL-CIO and its Japanese counterpart, DOMEI, and said the deep human misery in Northern Ireland will continue as long as "political repression, religious and economic discrimination, press censorship and detention without trial are practiced in the name of justice."

U.S. labor's efforts to contribute to a strong and free trade unions continue through the three institutes that serve Africa, Latin America and Asia, the council reported.

The council said the African-American Labor Center faced three major issues "which have dominated the political and economic life of the African continent during the past two years—the devastating drought, which has extended 4,000 miles across the continent from Senegal to Ethiopia; the pressures of worldwide inflation and of exorbitant administered oil prices which are hitting the Black African nations harder than most; and, perhaps most importantly, the trend toward a one-party state or direct military rule in the southern third of the continent."

The council described the activities of the Asian-American Free Labor Institute "as diverse as the countries in which they are developed."

The council noted that the American Institute of Free Labor Development, the oldest of the three institutes, has passed the quarter million mark in total number of Latin American labor leaders receiving training during AIFLD's 14 years.

Ford Policies Called Disastrous to Poor

San Francisco—America's poor have suffered most from the Ford Administration's "policies of disaster," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

They have been the hardest hit by the combination of high unemployment and double-digit inflation. And the Ford Administration policies, the council charged, "increase the number of people in need while cutting back on the programs to help them."

The report cited such "callous" Administration policies as "an all-out attempt to cut back on food stamps for the hungry, preventing large numbers of the working poor and welfare recipients from obtaining badly-needed social services, eliminating longstanding civil rights and protections of individuals applying for or receiving public assistance, and prohibiting welfare payments to needy children if the family breadwinner is out of work due to a labor dispute."

In another area, the council reiterated labor's concern at the vast unmet need for child care programs for children whose mothers are working.

Currently, the report noted, there are 26 million children of working mothers of whom 6 million are under the age of six.

With quality child care so difficult to obtain, most working mothers "face the never-ending nightmare of making arrangements with a changing group of sitters or relatives, or leaving their children in custodial parking lots or, worst of all, leaving children alone in 'self-care.'"

In the face of this need, the council asserted, "the Administration response has been to cut back on day care provided under the social services program and to restrict needed funds, thus lowering the quality of care provided in the few remaining programs."

The AFL-CIO, it declared, continues to oppose cutbacks in child care programs or reduction in the quality of care.

NLRB Delays Pose Problem:

Organizing Gains Achieved Despite Employer Resistance

San Francisco—The necessity of unions becomes more obvious to workers when their buying power is dramatically eroded, the Executive Council reported to the convention, but high unemployment also breeds fears that non-union employers can exploit.

These are among the intangibles the council found in its report on the first two years of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services since it was expanded and substantially revised in 1973.

Some other aspects of the federation's organizing operations are not so intangible:

- A massive backlog in cases and other problems with the National Labor Relations Board have become a barrier to organizing.
- Coordinated organizing attempts have been expanded, with good results, to drives without geographic limits.
- Bargaining rights and union protections are being won steadily by hospital employes, fram workers, federal workers and other segments of the workforce previously without labor law protections.
- The trend in cutting back on directly affiliated local unions is continuing, with more of these locals affiliating with international unions.
- Campaigns in support of legislation on foreign trade and transportation in late 1974 got the federation's field services organization prepared for the 41 conferences staged in support of the Action Program launched by the AFL-CIO General Board in January 1975.
- Boycott campaigns continue to be an integral part of organizing, as demonstrated by the Farah effort on behalf of clothing workers and the grape and lettuce boycotts on behalf of farm workers.

The council reported that employer intransigience shows clearly in congressional testimony by NLRB Chairman Betty Murphy on the increased filing of unfair labor practice charges in recent months. Charges against employers make up 80 percent of such filings, the council noted.

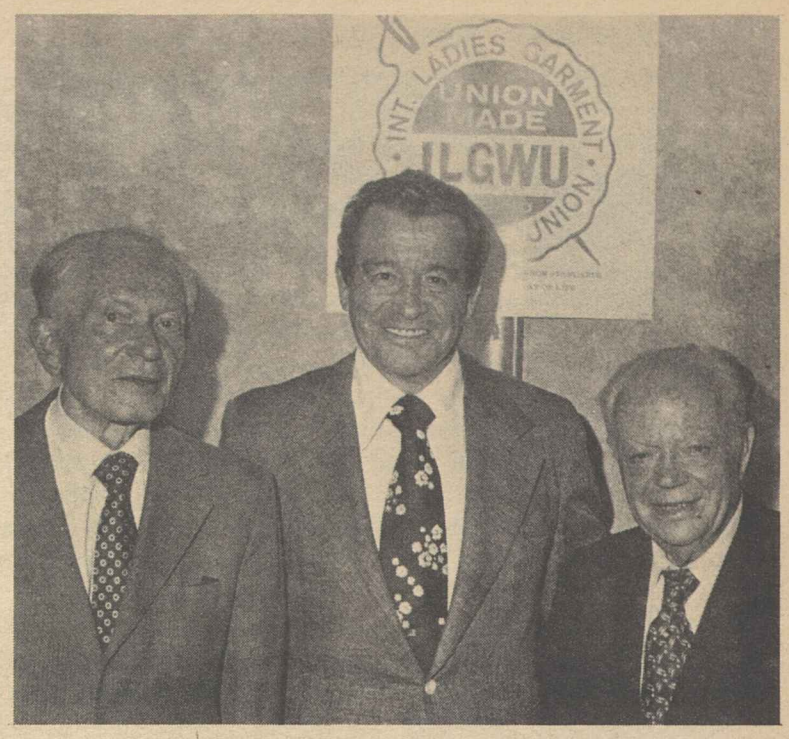
The council also expressed concern over NLRB decisions to narrow union access to employe lists and the status of representation elections among hospital employes, newly covered by the board. To date, AFL-CIO unions have won 101 elections at nonprofit hospitals. But 253 unfair labor practice cases are outstanding among the 404 election petitions submitted.

Figures aren't available on all representation elections in the two years since the last convention, the council said, but AFL-CIO data show federation affiliates have won 6,000 new units covering 152,000 employes.

The council noted that coordinated organizing efforts are continuing in California, Florida, New Orleans and Puerto Rico. When the Steelworkers, Machinists and IBEW joined the federation in helping a successful Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers' organizing drive in Madisonville, Ky., recently the council said it represented a breakthrough in the concept of coordinated organizing begun by 10 GE unions several years ago.

The council pointed out that several steps have been taken in refining the Dept. of Organizing & Field Services' role as coordinator of federation activities, ranging from local level legislative work to the bicentennial and encompassing apprenticeship training, manpower and political activities.

"The field staff is becoming a regular channel of information to headquarters as to the needs of the central bodies while informing them of priorities of the federation," the council said, noting that this replaced the situation in the past when close involvement central bodies was "only on a sporadic or ad hoc basis."



NEW PRESIDENT of the Ladies' Garment Workers, Sol C. Chaikin, is flanked by two predecessors, Louis Stulberg, left, and David Dubinsky. Chaikin, secretary-treasurer of the ILGWU since 1973, was installed Sept. 4 to succeed Stulberg.

Top Priority Assigned To Needs of Jobless

San Francisco—Widespread unemployment during the past two years has made meeting the immediate needs of the jobless the first priority of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services.

In a report to the federation's 11th biennial convention here, the Executive Council noted:

"While the nation was debating economic theories and legislative responses, the department went to work, nationally and locally, to review the problems of the unemployed, determine their immediate needs, pinpoint available social services, establish referral and follow-up procedures, train union counsellors and foster the improvement of programs and services when necessary."

The creation of local task forces was one major way in which the department moved to promote and coordinate efforts to provide for the special needs of the jobless.

Another was the allocation by the several agencies directly concerned, including the United Way, of special funds for emergency assistance.

Among the department's special programs were:

- Aid to the 130,000 Vietnamese refugees who entered the United States following the fall of South Vietnam. In this connection, the council noted that the employment and integration of Vietnamese refugees will not contribute to America's unemployment problem since their number is only "a drop in the bucket" in a country with a labor force of more than 92 million.
- The American Blood Commission, an organization brought about largely through the federation's efforts. Its purpose is to make available, free of charge, low-risk blood to all who need it, rather than commercially-bought blood which has more often transmitted disease.
- The National Resource Center for Legal Services, which the AFL-CIO helped to bring into being. The organization is designed to develop, guide and evaluate prepaid legal aid plans, which are increasingly a subject of collective bargaining.
- Programs of strike assistance.

Community services embraces a variety of human needs and problems, the council noted. Alcoholism, drug abuse and crime are major problems facing workers and their families, and the Dept. of Community Services is engaged in cooperative programs with voluntary and public agencies in these areas.

Since the last AFL-CIO convention, the department also has worked on an experimental project on labor involvement in the arts in Pennsylvania; establishment of the George Meany Award for distinguished union scouting activities; continuing development of consumer, health and welfare counseling programs, and disaster relief services and first aid programs in cooperation with the American National Red Cross.

Tax Structure Termed Loaded with Loopholes

San Francisco—Despite the labor movement's long crusade for tax justice, the AFL-CIO Executive Council report described the federal tax structure as still "overloaded with inequities."

Through an assortment of loopholes and special privileges, corporations and the wealthy can still avoid a large share of their tax obligation while those with lesser incomes continue to pay in full.

Thus, the council report noted, "corporations are bearing less and less of the nation's tax burden." While a decade ago, corporations accounted for about one-third of the nation's revenue income from income taxes, the corporate share has slipped in recent years to about 25 percent.

"If corporations presently were bearing the same share of the income tax load as in the 1960s, federal revenues for fiscal 1975 would be some $20 billion higher," the report said.

The emergency tax cut enacted early this year was "a first step toward ending the economic downslide," the council said. But "if the loopholes of special privilege to wealthy individuals and corporations had been closed—thus taxing billions of dollars that now escape the tax structure—a larger tax cut could have been enacted."

In addition, the council declared, "more money would have been available to fund the programs necessary to create jobs, protect the jobless, and help state and local governments provide essential facilities and services."

On the temporary tax cut, the council report noted that the program enacted by Congress early this year was far superior to the original Ford Administration proposal with its "lopsided rebate" giving the largest refunds to the wealthiest taxpayers.

The public got a glimpse of the manner in which tax loopholes can be used by the wealthy when former President Nixon's tax returns were brought under scrutiny, the council noted.

Likewise, the energy crisis pointed up the loopholes used by oil companies and other multinational corporations to avoid taxes.

In 1973, the Executive Council noted, "10 corporations with profits totaling almost $1 billion paid no federal income taxes at all, and the nation's largest oil companies paid U.S. income taxes at effective rates of about 6 percent of their worldwide profits."

J. P. Stevens Cited For NLRA Abuses

Wallace, N.C. — The National Labor Relations Board has issued a new order to J. P. Stevens & Co. directing the firm to post notices on its plant bulletin board that it will not interfere with the right of employes to engage in union activities.

The latest order stems from an NLRB ruling that found Stevens guilty of questioning a plant worker about her union activities, the Textile Union Workers of America reported.

Review of Watergate, Nixon Ouster Finds American System Met Test

San Francisco—Midway through the AFL-CIO's last convention, President Nixon shocked the nation by firing his attorney general and deputy attorney general because they had refused to dismiss a special prosecutor whose investigation of the Watergate coverup was moving perilously close to the Oval Office of the White House.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council report to the current convention examines labor's role in the turbulent 10 months that followed, culminating in Nixon's resignation "in shame and disgrace."

Delegates to the 1973 convention adopted without dissent a quickly drafted resolution that made the AFL-CIO, as the council report noted, "the first responsible national organization to call for the resignation or impeachment of the President."

When Nixon made it clear that he didn't intend to resign, the AFL-CIO pressed for impeachment as the only way to bring the facts before the American people and give the President due process of law.

As the council report stressed, the AFL-CIO campaign was keyed to getting the impeachment process under way so that the truth would emerge and not to influence the Senate which would sit as a jury if the House voted impeachment.

As part of the AFL-CIO educational campaign, the AFL-CIO News printed a series of full-page statements, each distributed as a pamphlet at plant gates and union meetings, on "Why Richard Nixon Must Be Impeached—Now." Nearly 200 other labor newspapers reprinted one or more of the statements.

The White House and its allies sought to discredit the AFL-CIO, charging that labor was using its "political muscle" to impeach a President for political reasons.

At its February 1974 meeting, the Executive Council reiterated that the purpose of the impeachment procedure is to bring out the truth and once the House Judiciary Committee began its impeachment inquiry, the council adopted a policy of "restraint" in public statements on Watergate "out of respect for the judicial process."

When the Judiciary Committee, after open and televised deliberations, voted three articles of impeachment, the council said it could take "no satisfaction" in contemplating the removal of a President, but "the nation cannot shirk from this distasteful task."

The Executive Council did, however, voice the nation's admiration for the manner in which the Judiciary Committee faced up to its responsibilities, proving anew "that this is a government of law."

The final revelation of the long-concealed transcript exposing Nixon's direct involvement in the criminal coverup forced his resignation in the face of certain impeachment by the House and conviction by the Senate.

In its report to the current convention, the AFL-CIO Executive Council notes that the Watergate scandals left public confidence in government "severely shaken."

But, the council stressed, "in the final test, this system of government did work, and we in the labor movement can be proud that our faith in America stood that test."

Job Placements Drop As Applications Rise

Some 3.1 million persons were placed in jobs by the Public Employment Service during the fiscal year that ended June 30, 1975, the Labor Dept. reported. This was 5.9 percent below the previous year.

During the same period, more than 15 million persons filed or renewed applications for jobs through the federal-state employment service, a 13 percent increase over the number seeking jobs in the previous year.

Labor and the Press

A NEWSPAPER PUBLISHER is nothing more than a businessman whose business happens to be publishing a newspaper. There is nothing wrong in that, but somehow it seems to embarrass publishers and editors.

For some reason, they try to hide this fact with a cloak of newsprint. Admitting their natural and inherent prejudice as businessmen would, in my opinion, lend some credence to their criticisms of the labor movement. After all, a person who is honest enough to admit where he comes from—a person who is frank enough to state his viewpoint candidly merits a hearing.

That is one reason for the success of the labor press. There is no mistaking your point of departure—you are advocates. The labor press is a tool workers need and must use in their struggle for social and economic justice.

Commercial newspaper editors do not seem to suffer from vertigo. Up their pedestals they climb—so high they can't see ground.

From such a lofty perch, they proclaim the commandments of labor relations. Thou shalt not strike. Thou shalt not be greedy. Thou shalt not injure the public interest. Thou shalt honor thy employer.

They anoint themselves with printer's ink and stand as the guardians of the public interest against the onslaught of the greedy board. As their competition dwindles and disappears, in city after city, they succumb to the most acute delusions of adequacy—leading even to hallucinations of infallibility. There is a danger, in my opinion, of an imperial anything—be it president, publisher or unionist.

What we seek is fairness, balance, accuracy. Those three words—fairness, balance, accuracy—are what the newspaper business proclaims for itself. It is what the labor movement has been too often denied by the press.

THE JOURNALISTIC TRESPASSES committed against the labor movement are both sins of omission and sins of commission. They are both flagrant and unwitting.

I have to believe that much of it is just plain ignorance. Few American reporters know much about the labor movement. Part of this ignorance, of course, is attributable to the utter failure of education to include trade union history and development in school texts. But the schools should not suffer all the blame. There is an unwillingness to learn, to be confused by the facts.

Simple factual errors are the most irritating and, it would seem to me, the most grievous for a journalist. I do not begrudge a person a differing opinion, just so we both have our facts straight.

The next time an editor composes an editorial about the First Amendment, and freedom of the press, I urge him to remember that unions are an expression of freedom of association and the strike is an expression of freedom of speech.

And if but one of the fragile components of the First Amendment is permitted to be destroyed, that grouping of freedoms is destroyed.

Freedom is precious to all of us, and whether editors like it or not, that includes the freedom for people to make what editors believe to be the "wrong" as well as the "right" decision.

A Word Edgewise:

Watchdog Institution Sought To Police Intelligence Agencies

By John P. Roche

WHEN A SEPTIC TANK hasn't been pumped for more than a quarter of a century, you are likely to discover all sorts of detritus. Thus the question that should be asked about various extraordinary, if not criminal activities of the Central Intelligence Agency is not, "Why did they do it?" but, "How could they get away with it?" To this there is a flat, simple answer: the President and Congress did not exercise control.

You would think that an agency which works in secret should have been given far closer scrutiny: secret operations are notoriously corrupting. But, historically, Presidents have been positively deferential to directors of intelligence. I was stunned in 1960 when President-elect John Kennedy solemnly announced to the American people that J. Edgar Hoover of the FBI and Allen Dulles of the CIA would stay in office. They were his first announced appointments. Maybe you all slept better that night, but I tossed in bed wondering about Kennedy's sense of priorities.

When I was in the White House, I spent a good deal of time musing on Juvenal's classic query: "Who guards the guardians?" Interestingly enough, in the light of Sam Adams's recent testimony to the House investigating committee, I became convinced that much of the data on the Vietnam war that came to the President from Saigon was cooked to order; that is, designed to disguise what to me appeared to be an increasingly ominous situation.

Adams said that Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker and General Creighton Abrams deliberately underestimated the enemy order of battle to make it appear we were mopping up. He had access to back-channel military cables unseen by me, but independently I reached the conclusion that no figures out of Saigon could be trusted (and so informed the President).

Now how do you put a handle on this billiard ball? I had contacts with people in State and the CIA who were equally unhappy, but only once was I able to demonstrate conclusively that the Saigon mission was engaged in numerology. Confronted with a choice between my dour views and those of George Carver, the CIA's resident optimist on Vietnam, it is hardly surprising that the President, any President, would listen to Carver, the professional. And then there were those captured enemy documents which invariably indicated the Communists were going down for the count—Hanoi's disinformation division must have had a jolly time preparing and getting them captured. LBJ had a special supply of those in his desk to cheer me up.

So what about Congress? Ever since the agency was established, the legislators have deferentially tucked the CIA's billions into budgetary hideyholes and asked no embarrassing questions. You can't blame the CIA for this. After all, when the Comptroller General of the United States, who is Congress's financial watchdog, tried to audit the CIA, and was politely but firmly told to toodle off to Health, Education & Welfare, Congress took no remedial action. In other words, the present Senate and House investigations were necessitated by the persistent failure of Congress to do its constitutional job; that is, find out how the people's money was spent.

There is, in short, plenty of blame to go around, but the important thing is that this nonsense of an unpoliced intelligence agency must be stopped. Not by abolishing it. That would be absurd, and besides most of the CIA's work in gathering and analyzing data is first-rate. Probably 90 percent of the top agency executives learned about the poisons, dart guns and other random horrors from the newspapers. On the other hand, it will not be sufficient simply to hose down the squalid areas and revert to normalcy.

AN INSTITUTIONAL SOLUTION must be found based on two propositions. First, no executive branch, Democratic or Republican, can be trusted to police itself; and, second, by its nature a congressional committee can not maintain the requisite day-to-day oversight.

Enter what I call the vice squad, an agency patterned on the General Accounting Office, responsible to Congress and equipped with plenary authority to inspect any aspect of intelligence work. A comptroller general of intelligence with a skilled staff could literally raid, say, the covert operations section, freeze all hands in place, and find out precisely what the United States of America is up to this week. Investigations make headlines—what we need is an institution.

Meany's Report:

Strong Labor Movement Is Key To Struggle for Social Justice

The following is excerpted from AFL-CIO President George Meany's report, the opening section of the Report of the Executive Council to the Eleventh Convention.

THIS COUNTRY IS IN TROUBLE at home and abroad. At every turn, grave problems must be faced, grave questions resolved—each with ominous implications for the future. America's economy is in major trouble; her social welfare programs are being undermined; her relations with other nations are in disrepair; her prospects for peace, prosperity and security are in doubt.

Indeed, this report is the gloomiest ever presented to an AFL-CIO convention in this organization's 20-year history.

That gloom must, of course, be tempered by the labor movement's abiding faith in this country, its institutions and, most importantly, its people. We know America is equal to any challenge and can meet and best any foe, because of the strength and the resolve of her people.

We in the labor movement have unshakable faith that the American people will chart a progressive, and responsible and responsive course for their nation, provided that the serious questions confronting them are presented to them factually and honestly.

The alternative courses are clearly marked.

For economic policy, one path leads to a return to 19th Century economics—the classic "trickle-down" theory which is based on more wealth for the few and hardship and even poverty for the many. It is easily identified by its benchmarks—low wages, recurring recessions, broad gaps between the haves and the havenots and the simplistic view that every person determines his or her own economic destiny.

The other path—the one the labor movement has traditionally chosen—is general prosperity, built on mass purchasing power, with workers able to buy the products they produce. Its benchmarks are full employment, full production, a balanced economy, and a government with a social conscience.

THE LABOR MOVEMENT IS in good shape. There is a new strength and unity of purpose that does not express itself in figures on a chart.

In terms of political action, the labor movement is stronger than it has ever been. Increasingly, individual unions are developing their own political action machinery. In conjuction with our own political arm, COPE, the labor movement has the single most effective political organization in the country. As a result, compared with the rest of the population, a higher percentage of union members are registered and vote. And they are better informed voters as a result of labor's political education programs.

The labor movement has not lost its will to fight for those in society who can not defend themselves. We have led the fight for important legislation, for jobs, for housing and for protections for all workers.

While our members have suffered greatly as a result of the recession and inflation, their union contracts provided them a basic protection unavailable to the unorganized worker. The massive wage cuts of the 1930s did not recur. And when workers were unemployed, their unemployment insurance, which the labor movement has fought so hard to improve, helped keep body and soul together.

And, then, there are the visible signs of a stronger movement. Our membership has increased, despite the recession. The AFL-CIO has reorganized its structure in the field and the progress in that area has been good. The Public Employee Department has been established providing government workers with a unified voice for their interests. The Labor Studies Center has opened its new campus and expanded its courses for the education of trade union leadership. Several unions are discussing mergers, which is a healthy sign. Minorities and women are increasing their participation within the movement, which augurs well for the future.

BUT IT IS NOT altogether rosy. Old alliances of workers, the civil rights movement and various progressive groups have been strained by economic conditions and weakened by demagogic attacks. But these alliances have endured and will endure, because there are certain basic underpinnings in them that transcend instant disagreements.

The employer who would discriminate against black workers would discriminate against all workers. The employer who pollutes the air would also foul the lungs of those who work for him. The companies that would conspire against consumers would also conspire against workers.

Those traditional foes of a strong labor movement who continue to oppose legislation the labor movement believes is vital—improved unemployment insurance and workers' compensation, stronger enforcement of job safety laws, higher minimum wage and the like—are also the foes of full civil rights, a healthy environment and protection for consumers.

So this convention must resolve to stand by the tested principles of the labor movement as it develops the policies of the AFL-CIO for the next two years.

We approach the future with confidence in our abilities, the courage of our convictions and the knowledge that the labor movement is one institution in society that will never abandon the fight for social justice. We hope that our traditional allies will stand with us.

It is our obligation to help our country build for its tricentennial a nation of justice, compassion and strength—a nation that mirrors its people. It is an obligation we must not shirk.

Job Losses Mount:

Curbs on Imports Held Vital To Future of Clothing Industry

THE DEEP PENETRATION of products from low-wage countries into U.S. markets has brought depression conditions to the men's apparel industry, President Murray H. Finley of the Clothing Workers said in renewing the call for fair and reasonable regulation of imports.

Finley said that some 50,000 men's apparel industry workers have suffered either layoff or severe cuts of working hours as U.S. production plummeted while the tide of imports rose. He warned that another 50,000 men's clothing industry workers soon will be permanently laid off, if the present trade situation is allowed to continue unchecked.

The affected workers, a large proportion of them women whose families have to depend on a second income to maintain decent living standards, have little protection when imports wipe out their jobs, Finley stressed. The AFL-CIO vice president appeared on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, aired Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Finley said that the union's pending petition for trade adjustment assistance for 20,000 unemployed or underemployed workers because of imports covers only those affected in the tailored clothing portion of the industry, and that, in the near future, similar petitions will be filed for as many as 30,000 more who work in shirts, pants, sportswear, underwear and other segments of the industry.

He said that while Congress did liberalize trade adjustment assistance last year to provide protection to a greater number of affected workers, that help is, at best, only a stop-gap supplement to unemployment insurance. Temporary aid is no answer—the long-range solution is jobs in a healthy U.S. apparel industry, he asserted.

Those jobs and the health of that industry, Finley declared, hinge on updating U.S. trade laws and policies to achieve fair, reasonable and effective regulation of products and other commerce, as well as technology and investment capital in the U.S. and overseas.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE WALL STREET JOURNAL dismisses as "wishful thinking" by liberals the idea that John Durkin's landslide election to the U.S. Senate from New Hampshire represents any rejection of President Ford's policies.

On the other hand, columnist Hobart Rowen of the Washington Post emphasizes if President Ford correctly reads the results of the election he will find "that a majority of voters has little patience with an economic game plan that seems to promise high jobless rates and no relief from inflation."

Who is right?

All of the logic and evidence most certainly supports Rowen's thesis and rejects the WSP's theme that Republican Louis Wyman's defeat was an example of candidates no longer being able to ride a President's "coattails" and partly attributable to Wyman "waffling" on some of Ford's programs.

Granted, there were issues aside from Ford's program or lack of it. Wyman is under investigation for being an "intermediary" in handling a $300,000 campaign contribution to Nixon's 1972 campaign that allegedly obtained an ambassador's post for the doner. He did waffle on a few issues, most notably opposing oil decontrol.

But the Wyman involvement in Watergate, if it could be called that, was in the air when he ran his dead-heat race with Durkin last year. As for Wyman's stand for continued regulation of oil prices, a contrary position would be tantamount to political suicide in New England, an area almost totally dependent on oil and natural gas for its utilities.

Durkin campaigned heavily on economic issues, laying the blame squarely on the President for creating a situation in which the country is agonized by both inflation and heavy unemployment. He charged Ford with stubborn adherence to the selfish philosophy of big corporations.

Ford came into New Hampshire and put his prestige and program on the line in a 120-mile motorcade across the state. He sermonized the conservative's gospel: the economy is recovering, it will be just fine if left alone, there's too much regulation of business, and "don't rock the boat." California's former governor Ronald Reagan appeared in New Hampshire, even outdoing Ford as a conservative political evangelist.

Durkin said his overwhelming victory clearly demonstrated that "the people of New Hampshire have rejected Jerry Ford's program for the economy." Wyman, himself, conceded that opposition to federal programs to bolster the economy might be "a little too spartan for these times."

And that is precisely a summary of an election held in a state where registered Republicans outnumber registered Democrats by a three-to-two margin.

FURTHERMORE, A NATIONWIDE economic survey completed in recent weeks by Caddell's Cambridge Reports, Inc., indicates that 6 percent of the people don't believe the Administration's promises that a recovery is starting. A poll conducted by Louis Harris produced an almost identical result.

There are signs of an overdue awakening in Congress to the realization that there must be more stimulation for the economy. Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.) and Rep. Augustus Hawkins (D-Minn.) have introduced a bill to require the President to present a budget to bring unemployment down to at least 3 percent over 18 months. Humphrey, chairman of the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, plans a series of hearings throughout the country on the need for a "true full employment program."

Meanwhile, Ford inexorably continues his campaign against government spending, vowing to use his veto "again and again and again" against job programs. He also insists on a halt to expansion of social programs that benefit the poor, the aged, the disabled—and the unemployed. He either hasn't read the results from New Hampshire or refuses to accept them.

Anti-Poverty Goals Linked To Economy

San Francisco — The AFL-CIO remains fully committed to the eradication of poverty, the Executive Council stressed in its report to the convention.

The council statement noted that the chief hope for ending poverty is "an expanding economy which offers everyone, without discrimination, the opportunity to obtain decent jobs at decent pay, housing, quality education, adequate health and social services."

But while striving for these broader goals, the AFL-CIO has given its "wholehearted endorsement" to the programs developed under the Economic Opportunity Act and the Office of Economic Opportunity.

The council noted continuing trade union participation on OEO community action agencies, on manpower planning committees, as sponsors of Job Corps training programs and in the operation of Neighborhood Youth Corps programs.

Because of the recession, the report noted, many union members who have lost their jobs have become direct beneficiaries of community action services for the poor.

The council report pointed up labor's belief that "a cohesive attack on poverty must be national in scope" and federal policy direction is needed to assure that funds earmarked for programs to help the poor are used properly.

It expressed concern that the federal share of funds of community action programs is decreasing "at a time when local and state revenues are dropping."

Report Shows Central Body Affiliations Up

San Francisco — Affiliations of local unions with state and city central bodies continued to increase since the last convention.

While the increased affiliation is "highly significant," the Executive Council said, "the need for improvement remains."

Since mid-1973, the number of locals affiliated with AFL-CIO state central bodies rose 1,751 to 26,418 and the number of members affiliated increased 803,668 to 8,014,390.

During the same period, the number of local central bodies increased from 739 to 748 and total affiliations were also up.

"In this period of high unemployment, the need for strong and effective central labor councils becomes more urgent than ever," the council said.

It noted that central bodies have been assigned key roles in pushing the AFL-CIO's Action Program to Put America Back to Work, in furthering both national and state legislation, in implementing manpower programs and in speeding delivery of social services to the unemployed.

With the average affiliation rate throughout the country still under 60 percent, the council stressed the importance of additional affiliation in increasing the effectiveness and resources of the central bodies.

Illinois Wage Law Expands Coverage

Springfield, Ill.—While delegates to the Illinois State AFL-CIO convention looked on, Gov. Daniel Walker signed a bill requiring payment of prevailing wages rates to state blue-collar workers who previously had been excluded.

NEW SECRETARY-TREASURER of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., Joseph F. Maloney, right, of the Iron Workers, is congratulated by BCTD President Robert A. Georgine. Georgine was elected to a new two-year term.

HEW Urged to Rescind Harsh Rule on Welfare

An attempt by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to force states to deny welfare assistance to needy children whose fathers are on strike "makes no sense," AFL-CIO President George Meany told the government department.

Meany's formal letter of protest followed up an earlier telegram calling on HEW Sec. F. David Mathews to withdraw the punitive anti-striker welfare regulation that has been initiated by his predecessor, Caspar Weinberger.

A federal court, recently sustained by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, threw out HEW's regulation that left it up to the states to decide whether or not to disqualify a striker's family from the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program.

The court decisions appear to lend support to labor's contention that neither a state nor a federal agency may ignore the intent of Congress to provide welfare assistance solely on the basis of need. But a new round of litigation would presumably be needed if HEW went ahead with its even harsher proposed new regulations which it drew up after the state option plan failed its initial court test.

Under the new proposal, where a father's unemployment was the result of a labor dispute, his children could receive benefits only if the state law allowed unemployment compensation under such circumstances.

Since only New York and Rhode Island allow jobless payments to strikers—and then only after a two-month waiting period—the effect is to penalize children because their fathers won't cross a picket line.

"Need is the fundamental basis of the entire public welfare program," Meany said. "Workers are taxed to pay the cost of welfare. When they and their families are in need, for whatever reason, they should have the same rights as all other citizens to obtain welfare assistance." He added:

"The regulations will affect very few strikers but would seriously hurt the needy. Because of waiting periods, income and asset tests, few strikers will ever be eligible for such assistance. Those that are eligible will be in dire need and it is their families who would suffer.

"Discrimination against strikers who would otherwise be eligible for benefits would punish workers' children for the action of their parents—actions, by the way, which are entirely lawful. Families of convicted persons receive welfare if they are in need, as is right and just. Denying welfare to the eligible families of strikers exercising a legal right to strike would mean better treatment for families of persons who break the law than for families of persons engaged in lawful actions. Such an action by HEW would be patently vicious.

"This kind of discrimination against needy strikers places the government on the side of the employer. In contrast, the government does not deny to employers engaged in strikes federal subsidies, contracts and other types of aid."

Congress and the Presidency:

1976 Elections Seen Crucial Political Test

San Francisco—Labor's political arm had its best year ever in 1974 and that makes it tough for 1976.

Protecting the gains of 1974 will be the No. 1 priority for 1976, aside from the presidential election, the Executive Council reported to the convention.

"Virtually every newcomer will be vulnerable in 1976 because many of the elements that converged to help make their election possible in 1974 will be missing, principally the voter turnoff that resulted from Watergate," the council said.

Those elements—plus added sophistication in labor's own political activities—came together to give the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education a 70 percent winning record on 321 victories in 455 endorsements in 1974, the council reported.

That's the best year COPE has ever had, surpassing the overall 67.8 percent winning mark in races for the Senate, House and governor in 1964. And the 1974 record was consistent, as labor-endorsed candidates won 69 percent of 380 House races, 75 percent of 33 Senate races and 78 percent of 33 governors' races.

"Obviously, circumstances played a major role in the 1974 elections," the council said, including "widespread citizen disgust over Watergate, deep anxiety over jobs, inflation and the health of economy."

But the council said it's also true that "never before did the COPE operation work so effectively among our own members and voting-age members of their families in every phase of the program—funding, special manpower, volunteers, registration and get-out-the-vote, communications, materials and the involvement of Executive Council members and allied organizations."

Much of the success was built on turnout, the council noted, citing surveys of districts in Indiana, Colorado, Connecticut, Oregon and Utah where union members turned out in percentages far higher than the national figure of 38 percent among all voters. In the New Jersey district where Rep. Charles Sandman was defeated, 69 percent of eligible union members and their families voted.

But the labor-endorsed candidates who won in normally conservative districts will be vulnerable in 1976, the council said. As an example, 1974 brought the defeat of four congressmen in Indiana who had a combined 40 "right" and 292 "wrong" votes on labor's scorecard.

Specifically, the council reported that the COPE computer now has nearly 11 million names of union members in 36 states, up dramatically from 7.7 million members recorded in 23 states in 1972. This capability, together with COPE's critical path method of matching activities to deadlines, meant that more than 30 million printouts were run by the computer in 1974.

Funding also set a record, the council said, with COPE spending $3.3 million for all programs, including direct contributions to candidates, exceeding the $2.7 million of 1972.

And more than 110,000 volunteers turned in millions of hours, the council noted. Allied groups like the Women's Activity Departments, the A. Philip Randolph Institute, Frontlash, Labor Council for Latin American Advancement and Concerned Seniors for Better Government also reached high-water marks in participation.

In a separate report, the council noted that in the widespread election law changes of the last two years, the new federal law left labor's activities intact. But the 38 new state laws included some "punitive legislation that attempted to unjustly restrict or destroy organized labor's role in the political process."

Nixon-Ford Tight Money Policies Still Clamping Down on Housing

San Francisco—Housing and mortgage credit policies initiated by the Nixon Administration and espoused by President Ford continue to plague residential construction, the Executive Council said in its report to the convention.

As a result, home building during the past 33 months went through the worst decline in three decades.

The impact was felt throughout the economy, the council noted, in increased unemployment, a greater shortage of available housing and higher home prices and rents.

New housing starts declined from 2.4 million in 1972 to 2.1 million in 1973 and to 1.35 million in 1974. Based on the first six months of 1975, the council said that housing starts are likely to drop to 1.1 million for all of 1975.

The drastic reduction in residential construction is largely the result of tight money and high interest rate policies of the Federal Reserve Board and the Administration's deliberate phaseout of low- and moderate-income housing programs.

Accompanying the decreased levels of construction has been soaring joblessness among building trades craftsmen, climbing to 21.8 percent nationwide in May. The rippling effect of unemployment also hit workers in the production, distribution and transportation of building materials.

Mortgage interest rates climbed close to 10 percent last year, and continue to remain near 9 percent, with the median price tag on new homes at about $40,000.

The council noted that the unsold inventory of new homes of about 380,000 discourages builders from new housing starts.

Subsidized construction of low- and moderate-income housing has been deliberately cut back since a moritorium was placed on new approvals in January 1973, the council reported.

It said that Dept. of Housing & Urban Development programs for homeownership and rental housing assistance have not been reactivated to meet the nation's housing needs. The result is that total subsidized housing starts, which had exceeded 425,000 in 1970-71, dropped to 329,000 in 1972, 180,000 in 1973 and to 119,000 last year. A further decline is expected this year.

Despite congressional prodding, the Administration has refused to use available authorized funds for homeownership assistance and conventional public housing. It also has ignored the intent of Congress to use other available funds for senior citizens housing projects.

The council termed the HUD program under the Housing & Community Development Act of 1974 inadequate. Through mid-1975, fund reservations under the program had been made for assistance of 96,000 units, including only 35,000 for new starts.

President Ford vetoed an emergency housing bill Congress passed earlier this year, the council noted.

The vetoed bill would have provided assistance for 400,000 home purchases at reduced mortgage rates or incentive payments. It also would have spurred construction of 75,000 public housing units and protected 100,000 unemployed homeowners against foreclosure.

Ford subsequently signed a weaker housing bill that provides a limited program for home purchases and mortgage foreclosure protection.

AFL-CIO Program Pressed:

Major Legislative Battles Center on Recession, Jobs

San Francisco—The biggest legislative battles over the past two years have been fought over job-related economic issues.

A 96-page section of the AFL-CIO Executive Council report gives a detailed account of the second session of the 93rd Congress in 1974 and the progress to date of the 94th Congress that took office last January.

During this period, the recession that the last AFL-CIO convention had warned of became a grim reality, and labor put its highest priority on a legislative program to put America back to work and stimulate the economy into recovery.

A start was made in late 1974 with a $2.5 billion emergency public service jobs bill and the temporary extension of unemployment compensation benefits to workers not eligible under state programs.

Early in the new Congress, with unemployment over 7 percent and rising, the AFL-CIO General Board drew up labor's Action Program and the Executive Council report gives a detailed account of how it has fared in the 94th Congress.

Perhaps the clearest congressional response, the Executive Council report indicates, came to the Action Program's call for an immediate tax cut, "primarily for low-and middle-income taxpayers, to stimulate the economy through added purchasing power."

The final version of the tax bill enacted last March was substantially closer to the AFL-CIO's detailed proposals than to President Ford's plan which the federation charged "would not stimulate the economy, because it gives the bulk of its benefits to those income groups who don't need it." The tax cut enacted pumped $22.8 billion into the depressed economy.

The AFL-CIO also urged Congress "to promptly begin work on closing the loopholes of special tax privilege for the wealthy and corporations"—an area in which the House Ways & Means Committee is currently starting to move. Last spring's tax bill included a repeal of the oil depletion allowance for major oil companies.

Labor's call for "immediate government measures to reduce America's dependence on imported oil" and an "equitable system of allocation and rationing" remains unanswered.

The Executive Council report recites in detail the still unsuccessful effort by Congress to reach agreement on an energy program, vetoes and veto threats by President Ford, and the battle over price controls on domestic oil.

On lowered interest rates and housing, the council recounts passage by Congress of legislation that pointed significantly—although not completely—in the direction of the AFL-CIO program. But as in many other areas, a presidential veto that couldn't be overridden was followed by passage of compromise legislation that was less than needed.

Likewise, the council report notes, the major job-creating bill that Congress passed this year was killed by a presidential veto. Again, the substitute measures enacted after the veto were far short of the need and did not significantly diminish the unemployment rolls.

As for labor's call for quotas on imported industrial goods where needed "to protect existing jobs from unfair foreign competition," the Executive Council report was blunt:

". . . Despite the declining U.S. position in world trade and ever-expanding deficits in the balance of payments, no significant action has been taken by the Executive or Legislative branches."

There was more action on the AFL-CIO demand for "immediate government assistance to the unemployed," although not to the extent that labor had urged. Legislation was enacted in late June that will continue the emergency program of up to 65 weeks of unemployment compensation until 1977, if the jobless rate stays high. And persons whose previous jobs had not been covered by state programs became entitled to up to 39 weeks of federal benefits — up from 26 weeks. But Congress has not yet acted on a needed permanent improvement of the unemployment compensation system.

A Senate-passed bill for quicker food stamp eligibility is pending in the House, but the council noted that the issue of health insurance coverage for the unemployed "has become the victim of a four-way jurisdictional battle" among congressional committees.

Another section of the legislative report expressed concern that budget targets established by congressional resolutions are "far short of the funding levels necessary to stimulate a strong economic recovery."

There is an account of the landmark 1974 legislation setting federal standards for funding and vesting of private pension plans. Two other important labor bills were enacted in that final year of the 93rd Congress. One extended collective bargaining rights under the National Labor Relations Act to workers in non-profit hospitals and nursing homes. The other made it legal for unions and management to negotiate prepaid group legal services plans.

The council report takes note of the enactment in April 1974 of a minimum wage bill identical to the one that then-President Nixon had vetoed in 1973. The council noted also that the delay cost America's lowest-paid workers about $250 each.

Extension of the Voting Rights Act is cited as a major accomplishment of the present Congress; the enactment of campaign financing reform with public financing of presidential campaigns was a landmark of the 1974 Congress.

The effort to strengthen enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act and combat employer efforts to weaken the law and exempt small firms occupied the AFL-CIO's attention in both the 1974 and 1975 sessions.

Other portions of the Executive Council report on national legislation deal with bills of interest to railroad workers, construction workers, public employes, maritime workers and many other groups of union members.

There are discussions of consumer bills, mass transit funds, strip mining controls, social security benefits, health legislation, aid to education and other issues reflecting the broad concerns of the American labor movement in its congressional role as the people's lobby.

Gains for Labor Cited In State Legislatures

San Francisco—Substantial gains in enactment of state legislation benefiting workers and their families have been chalked up in the past two years, the Executive Council reported to the AFL-CIO convention here.

High on the list of priorities of state labor councils was legislation to improve jobless benefit levels and coverage to ease the plight of the large numbers of unemployed. The council cited these other developments:

- Minimum wage boosts in several states indicated a trend toward gradual matching of federal minimum wage levels.
- Workers' compensation improvements in nearly every state legislature were reported by state bodies in the past two years.
- Efforts continued to get the necessary number of states to ratify the labor-backed Equal Rights Amendment. Three more states ratified the ERA in 1974. North Dakota joined the list this year.
- So-called "right-to-work" legislation was defeated in all instances where it was proposed.
- A number of states enacted laws regulating campaign practices. Many of these new laws, labeled "campaign reform" legislation, are "overly restrictive or discriminate against unions," the council noted.

"In practically every state, hard lobbying was needed to head off proposals that would have curtailed labor's right to participate in political activities," the council observed.

- Efforts by state bodies to defeat so-called ban-the-can or ban-the-bottle bills continue because of the adverse effect of such legislation on employment.
- Four more states — Georgia, Kentucky, Minnesota and Pennsylvania — passed effective no-fault auto insurance laws in 1975 and another — North Dakota—enacted similar legislation this year, bringing the total number of states with effective no-fault laws to 16.
- A clear trend toward postcard voter registration, with five states enacting legislation in 1974 and at least six additional states anticipating enactment of some form of postcard registration later this year.

In other areas, the council noted that practically every state body was involved during the 1974-75 period in efforts to obtain collective bargaining laws for public employes.

Regarding the new collective bargaining law giving California's farm workers the right to pick the union of their choice, the council said it may be some time before a clear picture emerges as to the degree of unionization of the state's 250,000 agricultural workers.

Membership up 659,000 Over Two-Year Period

San Francisco—Membership of AFL-CIO unions increased 659,000 in the two years since the federation's last convention, the Executive Council reported.

A two-year average of per capita payments to the federation showed a total membership in the United States of 14,066,000. For unions currently affiliated, it is the highest total since the formation of the AFL-CIO in 1955. Affiliates do not pay per capita tax to the AFL-CIO on Canadian membership and they are not included in the membership tally.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland reported that income over the two-year period totaled $35,274,034 as against expenses of $33,892,464.

The federation's net worth—the excess of assets over liabilities—was $15,202,646 as of June 30, 1975. This was a gain of $1,381,570 over the 1973 figure.

The financial report completes the accounting of payments to the United Farm Workers Defense Fund from a special three-month assessment voted by the Executive Council in May 1973. The total collected and used to assist the striking farm workers was $1,662,421.

Kirkland reported also that contributions from AFL-CIO affiliates in support of Histadrut, the labor federation of Israel, totaled $584,640. That amount, plus a $50,000 contribution from the AFL-CIO Special Purposes Fund, was sent to Histadrut for humanitarian purposes in the aftermath of the 1973 Mideast war.

Tilt to Anti-Unionism Seen in Nixon Court

San Francisco—Labor's fears of a Supreme Court transformed by former President Nixon's four conservative appointments have been borne out by the experience of the past two years, the AFL-CIO Executive Council concluded.

The tilt toward hostility to unions, to the point of disregarding past court decisions and the clear intent of Congress, was predicted by the council in its report to the last AFL-CIO convention.

"This prediction has proved painfully accurate," the council concluded in its current convention report on Labor and the Law. "The last two years have produced few important decisions favorable to the labor movement and many whose effect will be seriously detrimental."

Thus, the council report examines in detail a 5-4 Supreme Court decision holding that a local of the Plumbers had violated the antitrust laws by picketing a general contractor in order to obtain an agreement that the plumbing subcontract at the job site would not be given to a subcontractor who did not employ union craftsmen.

Both a federal district court and the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals had ruled against the contractor's antitrust suit, in accord with what appeared to be the clear language of the National Labor Relations Act allowing "an agreement between a labor organization and an employer in the construction industry relating to the contracting or subcontracting of work. . . ."

Further, the council report notes, legislative history provides "abundant evidence" that Congress did not intend that the antitrust laws be used against unions in any such circumstances.

"Between every line" of the decision written by Justice Lewis F. Powell, Jr., the council asserted, "is the unspoken premise that it is a judicial obligation to assure that unions are subjected to the antitrust laws to the maximum extent possible."

Other cases discussed in the report lend further credence to that view of the anti-labor bias of the Supreme Court today. Some anti-labor decisions "so clearly required an opposite result," the council said, that they can be explained only by the court's "unprincipled hostility" to unions.

In general, a solid court majority of both old and new justices has leaned in support of individual rights — in most cases with constructive results but in some instances treading on thin legal ground.

One important case, in which the union position was upheld, rejected the assertion that a group of minority group store employes were entitled, without risking disciplinary action, to picket their employer charging racial discrimination.

Justice Thurgood Marshall wrote the decision warning that the principle of exclusive representation, which lies at the root of U.S. labor law, would be endangered if one group of workers could ignore a non-discriminatory grievance procedure to apply economic pressure on their own.

Repudiation of that principle would weaken the ability of minority employes to secure economic justice, according to the opinion by Marshall, a noted civil rights attorney before he was appointed to the court.

"This reminder that unions can be and are, a positive force for the betterment of all their members may be the most positive note struck by the court in the past two years," the Executive Council suggested.

But on balance, the Executive Council concluded that the Supreme Court, except in the fair employment area, "is not the place to look for vindication of the rights of employes and of unions."

It expressed concern also that the Supreme Court's decisions will have a chilling effect on the lower courts since "judges and administrators do not relish, whatever their personal predilections, being overruled time and again in the Supreme Court."

Solution to Energy Crisis Keyed To Conservation, New Resources

San Francisco—The United States still has an energy crisis even though the long lines at the gasoline pumps are gone, the AFL-CIO Executive Council warned.

The Arab oil embargo, launched during the AFL-CIO's last convention with the avowed aim of changing America's Mideast policy, brought hardships and inconveniences as well as touching off a price rise that was a major factor in the recession.

"Too many people view the energy crisis as a thing of the past," the council report said. But until the United States can develop reliable energy sources "free from the blackmail threat of a renewed Arab oil embargo," the crisis is not over.

The council expressed labor's disagreement with the Ford Administration view that the way to cut down on oil imports is to allow prices to rise and its hope that reduced consumption will then bring about a reduction in prices.

"The oil cartel, despite enormous oil surpluses, continues raising prices," the council noted.

Its report warned also of the "extraordinarily harsh" inflationary impact of the Administration's proposal to deregulate the price of natural gas.

Congress also came in for its share of criticism in the council's assessment of government response to the energy crisis. The legislative branch has "floundered" without enacting any significant program.

"The President and the Congress have placed partisan political considerations above the national interest," the Executive Council charged. "Almost two years after the Arab oil embargo, this nation still has no energy policy."

Meanwhile, it noted, "America is more dependent on Arab oil than ever before" and imports substantially more oil from Arab countries than it did in the months preceding the embargo.

The council noted also that the coal mining industry used the energy crisis as an excuse to attack "reasonable legislation to protect the land from being ravaged by strip mining operators." The bill passed by Congress this spring "unfortunately" was vetoed by the President.

"This nation can have environmental protection and economic growth at the same time," the council affirmed. It saw the triple need as "conservation; substitution of plentiful energy materials for scarce energy materials, and increasing energy supplies."

The council termed it "urgent that tough mandatory measures be enacted to reduce energy consumption."

It warned that the apparent sufficiency of oil and gas supplies is to a large extent due to reduced consumption resulting from the recession.

"Should the economy start moving upward, the nation may well experience energy shortages which would halt or slow down the upturn. When that time comes, it may well be too late to institute the kind of conservation measures needed now," the council warned.

Oil and gas fueled power plants should be converted as much as possible to other fuels, the report suggested. It urged "every effort to accelerate the development of nuclear energy." And while acknowledging "legitimate concern" regarding the hazards of nuclear energy, the report said "the record to this point has been good" and should continue to be so with continued utilization of the safest methods for handling nuclear energy.

The Executive Council reaffirmed labor's belief that "America can and must have a clean environment and jobs, too."

It said that environmental problems can be solved without sacrificing economic growth or the goal of full employment. And it rejected the position of "no-growth advocates who want to clean up every form of pollution except the human pollution of unemployment."

Low Priority Cited:

Funds, Enforcement Limit Job Safety Act

San Francisco—A strong commitment is needed from the Ford Administration if the full potential of the federal job safety and health law is to be achieved, the Executive Council said.

Although some progress has been made since the law was enacted in 1970, the council noted that it has been a frustrating five years in labor's crusade for a safe and healthful workplace for all American workers.

During the Nixon presidency, the council observed, the effectiveness of the law was weakened by starvation budgets, low priorities, the unloading of enforcement on states and political fund trade-offs for campaign contributions.

When Nixon signed the law he had pledged to give higher priority to its implementation. Instead, he held down its budget. And even during the waning days of his Administration, Nixon undercut the law to protect workers by ordering economic impact statements on occupational safety and health standards.

The council said it was "the final bow to those who had supported him and made crystal clear the priorities of his discredited Administration: dollars first; human lives last."

In reviewing a council report issued earlier this year on the first four years of OSHA, the council described Ford's Fiscal 1976 budget for OSHA as grossly inadequate since it merely allows for inflation costs but does not provide for expansion or strenghtening of programs.

OSHA budgets must be greatly increased and the indefensible policy for funding state programs should cease, the council declared.

It noted that during 1975 state plans were withdrawn by New York, New Jersey and Illinois and that the Wisconsin and Colorado legislatures refused to appropriate funds for their state plans.

Among the 20 remaining state programs only three key industrial state are included, Michigan, California and Indiana.

Thirteen other state plans that have been under a long review by the Secretary of Labor are being opposed by organized labor and are unlikely to get approval.

The council also cited a severe shortage in the number of compliance officers for the federal enforcement program. In April 1975 there were only 869 field inspectors, one for every 67,900 workers covered by the law.

But even with increased appropriations for 1976, and the reprogramming of funds from abandoned state plans, the number would be raised to an inadequate 1,495 inspectors and industrial hygienists, the council said.

The council commended Congress for rejecting President Ford's attempts to impound funds appropriated for the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health.

NIOSH needs even more funds to carry out its responsibilities for research, development of health standards, hazards evaluation and training, the report stressed.

It noted that NIOSH lags far behind on developing standards for hazardous substances that workers are exposed to on the job. No standards presently exist for 1,300 known cancer-causing chemicals.

Weak federal enforcement continues as a major problem for workers, the council said, as OSHA is slow to respond to complaints.

Even though one of every four workplaces are found to be in compliance with the law, only about one-tenth of 1 percent of the employers are cited for serious violations.

Although the recommended fines for inspection violations have been averaging less than $71, the OSHA Review Commission has modified citations in the favor of employers in 90 percent of the contested cases.

It charged that the commission has built "an astounding pro-industry record" and is torn by dissent because of a chairman who was hostile to the act.

Further attempts by the Office of Management & Budget to impose "inflationary impact" statements impedes the development of effective standards, he council said.

"Dollar costs to employers are given greater importance than saving lives and preventing injuries and illness on the job," the council charged.

Little has been done to assist small employers to comply with safety and health standards, the report noted. This failure has added fuel to attacks on OSHA and has seriously threatened the program.

Social Insurance Programs Termed Still Far Short of Meeting Needs

San Francisco—The Executive Council renewed its call for correction of glaring deficiencies in the nation's unemployment insurance and workers' compensation programs.

Outmoded and fragmented, the jobless insurance program falls far short of meeting the country's need—a fact never more apparent than in the economic recession, the council said in a report to the AFL-CIO convention here.

At the height of the downturn, with 8 million workers out of jobs, half of the jobless received no benefits from the basic unemployment insurance system, the council said. And for those who do get benefits, an average of only 40 percent of lost wages are replaced under unemployment insurance.

The Emergency Jobs & Unemployment Assistance Act of 1974 provided for a one-year, federally-financed stop-gap coverage for some 12 million workers who were excluded from unemployment insurance protection, but only for benefits up to 26 weeks, the council noted.

A series of emergency measures temporarily extended the maximum duration for regularly covered workers, most recently to 65 weeks, "but these too are just stop-gap measures." Further, new entrants and re-entrants into the labor force are entirely unprotected.

The council said benefits of at least two-thirds of former weekly wages are essential for jobless workers to meet essential nondeferrable expenses, but most workers do not get even 50 percent of their previous earnings.

"Unemployment insurance benefits are so low in most states that the maximum weekly benefit payable in 39 states is below the poverty level," the council reported.

Furthermore, qualifying requirements are so restrictive that many jobless workers are denied any benefits, the council added. Extended benefits under the system have been so restrictive that Congress has had to tinker with this part of the program more than 10 times in the past five years.

"The nation can no longer tolerate the piecemeal, inadequate state-by-state efforts to modernize unemployment insurance of the past 37 years," the council said.

"AFL-CIO state bodies have labored tirelessly to improve the state laws, but only effective and vigorous federal action will make unemployment insurance what it was meant to be—the nation's first line of defense against poverty and recession."

Benefits and coverage under the various state workers' compensation programs are no better than those of jobless insurance, the council noted. A majority of states have maximum weekly benefits below poverty levels for a worker with a family.

Other serious defects in state workers' compensation laws are:

- 5 lack compulsory coverage for wage and salary workers.
- 15 exempt small employers.
- 35 do not cover farm workers to the same extent as other workers.
- 5 fail to provide full coverage of occupational diseases.
- 8 do not require full medical care.
- 25 lack an adequate time limit for filing occupational disease claims.
- 24 do not provide death benefits to widows for the full period of widowhood.
- 14 fail to provide benefits to permanently and totally disabled workers for the full duration of their disability.

"Favorable prospects for federal legislation have enabled a number of states to improve their laws to a greater degree than in the past because many carriers and employers, fearing federal legislation, have lessened their opposition to improvements in state laws," it said.

"But the AFL-CIO will not be deterred in its efforts to secure federal standards by exaggerated claims regarding the progress states are making."

TV Residuals Top $200 Million Mark

Hollywood—Residual payments collected by the Screen Actors Guild for television productions, motion pictures released for TV and foreign telecasts topped the $200 million mark in August, SAG reported.

The fund, which is paid out to participating SAG members, totaled $208 million. The Guild began the collections in 1953.

Worst in 40 Years:

Decisive Measures Pressed To Solve Economic 'Mess'

San Francisco—The national economy is in "the most dangerous mess in 40 years," and unless the government adopts decisive measures to create jobs, high levels of unemployment will persist for the rest of this decade, the Executive Council declared at the AFL-CIO's 11th biennial convention here.

"In the face of the dangerous economic deterioration of 1969-1975, the deepest recessionary decline since the 1930s and an unemployment rate of close to 9 percent in 1975, a series of large-scale job-creating and income-generating programs is required to move the economy rapidly to full employment and strengthen the fabric of American society," the council said.

Because of the Ford Administration's adamant opposition to programs that would put the country back to work, America faces an "anemic" recovery accompanied by persistent high joblessness, idle plants and machines, sluggish productivity and continuing, large deficits in the federal budget, the council charged in its report to the delegates.

The council attacked Ford and his economic advisers for opposing measures to generate a vigorous economic pickup with full employment, and it did not spare its criticism of Congress for going along with the Administration.

"The anemic economic pickup from the 1973-75 recession, officially presented by the Administration and implied in the budget ceiling adopted by Congress in the spring of 1975, means more than a painfully slow reduction of unemployment," the council said.

"It means persistent idle productive capacity as well as productivity increases and levels of business investment considerably lower than they would be if the economy moved rapidly to full employment.

"It also means that the American economy will remain particularly vulnerable to the adverse effects of domestic or international events, such as another OPEC (Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries) oil-price rise or international monetary disarray," the council noted.

Since mid-1975, the council observed, several factors have emerged that raise the possibility of an aborted recovery from the recession that has left 8 million workers still officially unemployed today.

The Federal Reserve Board, under chairman Arthur Burns, has moved to counteract the stimulus of the emergency tax cut adopted earlier this year by shrinking bank reserves and raising interest rates.

The Arab-dominated oil cartel announced that it would raise crude-oil prices, and at home the Administration plans to decontrol prices of "old" oil and natural gas. Large sales of grain to the Russians boosted farm-product prices immediately and threaten to drive up food prices even more in the months ahead.

In addition, almost all of the emergency tax cuts are scheduled to end at the end of 1975, resulting in an automatic tax increase on Jan. 1, 1976, if the tax cuts are not extended.

"The combination of such events, or a major part of them, could reverse any upward momentum that may have developed by the end of 1975," the council warned.

Even in the absence of such events, current Administration policies mean that unemployment — expected to average 8.7 percent this year — will be reduced only with painful slowness in the years ahead, the council pointed out.

Besides continuing hardships for many workers and their families, persistent high unemployment will result in large budget deficits, the council said, noting:

"The accumulated budget deficit of the six years from fiscal year 1970 through 1975 — $109.4 billion — was almost twice as great as the accumulated net deficit of the previous 23 years, from 1947 through 1969. The major reason was the two back-to-back recessions of those six years, with huge losses of potential federal revenue and increased unemployment and welfare benefits."

A rapid economic upturn to achieve full employment simply is not the Administration's objective, nor has it been the goal of the majority of the members in the current session of Congress, the council charged.

The Administration's mid-year budget review, published last May 30, forecast about 8 million jobless workers for 1975. The council said that would mean depression-level unemployment among teenagers, construction workers, blacks in general and black teenagers in particular, 20-to-24-year-old men and factory workers.

"Moreover, on the basis of the Labor Dept.'s reports on the population's work-experience in previous years, an average of 8 million jobless workers for each of the year's 12 months means that about 20 million workers will be unemployed at some time during 1975.

"It means about 12 million will be jobless for five or more weeks in the course of the year and approximately 8 million workers will be unemployed for 15 weeks or more during 1975. That is one dimension of the human aspect of a monthly average of 8 million unemployed," the council observed.

The economic situation in the second quarter of 1975—the latest quarter for which complete figures are available—showed the number of unemployed at 8.2 million, or 8.9 percent of the labor force, in sharp contrast to the 2.7 million, or 3.4 percent jobless rate, in the first six months of 1969 when the Nixon-Burns policies were installed.

In addition, some 1.2 million workers were so discouraged by the employment outlook in the April-June period they gave up looking for jobs. Another 3.7 million were on part-time schedules because full-time work was not available.

Thus there were, in effect, 13.1 million unemployed and underemployed workers in the second quarter of the year, the council observed.

Depression-level jobless rates struck major groups of workers. Unemployment rates were 20.5 percent among teenagers, 20.7 percent among construction workers, 14.3 percent among blacks and 12.2 percent among factory workers. Black teenagers had an unemployment rate 37.8 percent.

While some slight degree of improvement in consumer confidence occurred in the spring as a result of a reduced inflation rate, most key parts of the economy—auto, steel and home-building — remained weak or declining, the council noted.

Instead of acting to establish job-creating programs, the Administration tried to focus the attention of the country and the Congress on the size of the budget deficit which resulted from the recession, the council said. Meanwhile unemployment continued to climb.

"The historical record shows that it takes many job-creating and income-generating programs to reduce unemployment, after unemployment and idle production are permitted to rise," the council observed. It called for adoption by the government of the AFL-CIO's Action Program to Put America Back to Work, a set of economic recommendations drawn up by the General Board last January.

Civil Rights Progress Linked to Job Gains

San Francisco—"Full employment is as essential to fulfillment of civil rights as it is to a healthy economy," the Executive Council declared in its report on civil rights to the convention.

An economy in which blacks are 14.6 percent unemployed makes it impossible for minority groups to enjoy the rights guaranteed by law, the council said.

"There can be no denial that some slippage has occurred in civil rights," the council said. "A number of important social programs enacted during the Kennedy-Johnson years were dismantled by the Nixon Administration through callous vetoes and heartless impoundments of congressional appropriations."

While widespread discrimination is hopefully now "a relic of America's past," the council said today's problems have little to do with racial attitudes and prejudices. All races are against crime; unemployment cuts across racial lines and the exodus of the affluent to suburbia means that everyone left behind is equally shortchanged.

The Administration's attitude toward these problems is typified by the veto of adequate public service employment, the report said.

One action such as that veto can undercut years of federation work on apprenticeship and manpower programs, it was noted, since a shrinking job market hits hardest at the low-paid workers who have suffered past discrimination — like blacks and women.

The poor quality and non-union tradition of the jobs women hold has left this major segment of the workforce highly unorganized, the report noted. There are about 4.4 million women union members.

Noting that women still earn only 60 percent of the average salary of their male counterparts, the council said a major cause was the lack of enforcement of the Equal Pay Act of 1963 and the 1972 amendments to the Civil Rights Act.

Despite years of attempts at cooperation, labor is still frustrated in trying to get the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to give proper notice to the federation and its affiliates of charges filed against local unions. Cooperative efforts to achieve voluntary compliance could greatly reduce the EEOC caseload, the council pointed out.

The work of the federation's civil rights staff, the report noted, is augmented by the A. Philip Randolph Institute's local chapters of black trade unionists, which now total 150 in 35 states, and the Labor Council for Latin American advancement.

Opportunity for Higher Education Held Endangered by Cost Rises

San Francisco—The principle of free or low-tuition higher education is endangered by the combination of inflation and recession, the Executive Council warned.

Labor's alarm stems from an overall 12 percent rise in college tuition costs in the last year, the council said. And some states have actually been considering charging tuition for students in public vocational high schools—the most basic free education needed to guarantee equality of opportunity, the council said.

"An educated citizenry is a national asset and the costs of that education should be paid by society rather than by the student and his family," the council said in restating labor's position as the staunchest defender of free public education.

"The AFL-CIO has argued over the years that low or free tuition is the best form of student aid," the council stressed.

And labor won't buy the suggestions of such groups as the Carnegie Foundation to hike up tuition payments to meet costs, then trying to ease the burden with aid for low-income students.

The Elementary & Secondary Education Act of 1964 provided the impetus for quality education, the council noted, but the Nixon Administration attempts to dismantle that progress are being continued.

One aspect is the attempt to "consolidate" all federal education funds into a bloc grant to the states and local school boards, the council said, emphasizing that it was state and local failure that necessitated a federal response in the first place. The council expressed relief that Congress shows little interest in reviving this Nixon idea.

The nation could be achieving real breakthroughs in quality education because of the drop in the birth rate from the accelerated pace after World War II, the council noted. This could mean more facilities for fewer school-aged children and better education for everyone, the council said.

But instead of seizing the opportunity, school boards use that population trend as an excuse to take hard stances in bargaining that leave teachers without jobs and classrooms without quality.

The council said labor's stake is most critical in vocational education, where problems are compounded by the new "career" approaches that disquise attempts to turn the schools into low-cost training grounds for industry.

The council expressed concern over the tendency of local vocational education councils to include business but exclude union representatives and the inclination of federal departments to abandon child labor and minimum wage protections for teenagers.

The labor-supported growth of community colleges offers a unique opportunity for labor-oriented classes and improved adult education, the council noted. It said the federation's Labor Studies Center expresses its concern for education as a life-long exercise.

The Labor Studies Center has now conducted 90 programs for 2,000 full-time union staff and elected officials in its one year at its new 47-acre campus.

NLRB Publishes Procedure Manual

The first section of a new three-part case-handling manual prepared by the National Labor Relations Board has been completed and released to the public, the board announced.

Part I contains operational guidelines on unfair labor practice proeeedings issued by NLRB's general counsel for regional office staffs in processing cases.

Parts II and III, covering representation election proceedings and the handling of issues concerning compliance with NLRB orders and settlement agreements, will be ready by late fall.

Titled the National Labor Relations Board Case Handling Manual, it will be sold by the Supt. of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C.

A UNIQUE DONATION to the Veterans Hospital at Woods, Wis., was made by the Milwaukee Brewery Workers Local 9, a direct affiliate of the AFL-CIO. The union sponsored a scholarship for Donald Schaning, right, a physical therapy student at the university of Wisconsin-LaCrosse, to help in the care of spinal cord patients, amputees, and stroke victims. He is shown assisting Charlie Thomas, a physical therapy patient.

Veto Threat, Fund Cuts Block Health Progress

San Francisco—Opposition by the Nixon and Ford Administrations has been a major barrier to comprehensive health care for all Americans, the Executive Council declared.

Existing health care programs would be even worse off, the council said, had not Congress at the urging of the AFL-CIO resisted Administration efforts to cripple them through presidential vetoes, budget cuts and impoundment of appropriated funds.

When the Administration failed in its attempt in the 93rd Congress to abolish many government health services, it resorted to the 1975-76 budget to drastically cut back funds for health care, the council noted in its convention report.

Even the Health Maintenance Organization Act that the Administration supported with rhetoric received only $19 million for HMO development in the fiscal '76 budget—about half the amount obligated the year before, the council said.

Both institutional and non-institutional care for the elderly, the handicapped and those with long-term illness are woefully inadequate, the council said.

A program to provide long-term institutional care in intermediate and skilled nursing homes for the incapacitated would be one approach, the council observed. But for the handicapped who don't need or want institutional care, the council said that comprehensive home care would be a less expensive alternative.

The best approach to meeting America's needs is National Health Security, the council stressed, which has the support of organized labor and other concerned groups.

The alternative proposal supported by the American Medical Association and the Health Insurance Association provides no effective cost or quality controls while relying on large deductibles and coinsurance payments, council observed. It termed the improved Kennedy-Corman Health Security bill which calls for a program based on social insurance the best proposal before Congress.

Although President Ford has endorsed the AMA-insurance industry proposal, the council noted that he has threatened to veto any national health insurance legislation in 1975 as too costly.

A major problem confronting health care services is the skyrocketing premiums of medical malpractice insurance for physicians and hospitals. In recent years the rates have climbed as much as 1000 percent.

Even so, claimants receive less than 20 percent of the premium dollar in settlements, the council observed. More than 80 percent covers court costs, lawyers' fees, and the administrative cost of selling the insurance. Furthermore, the insurance cost is passed on to patients in higher doctors' fees and hospital charges.

Earlier this year, the council called on Congress to correct the injustices by enacting a federal program to provide impartial arbitration of malpractice claims combined with no-fault awards.

The convention report also explored problems dealing with collective bargaining of unions on health plans, health insurance for the unemployed and employment of the handicapped.

Council Asks 3-Cent Rise In Per Capita

San Francisco—A constitutional amendment to raise the per capita tax to the AFL-CIO from the current 10 cents per member a month to 13 cents will be proposed to the federation's convention.

It carries the unanimous endorsement of the AFL-CIO Executive Council. The amount was based on the recommendation of a subcommittee which reviewed income and expenses over the past five years and compared the data with a five-years projection that had been made in 1969.

While an anticipated fourth-year deficit didn't occur because of the federation's membership gain, the council said expenses will start to outrun income this year and the deficit will grow unless the convention acts.

If approved by the delegates, the new rate would be effective Nov. 1, 1975.

The subcommittee making the study was composed of Vice Presidents I. W. Abel, Al H. Chesser, John H. Lyons and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland.

More Living Cost Escalators:

Collective Bargaining Gains Achieved Despite Recession

San Francisco — Collective bargaining enabled workers and their unions to make substantial advances since the last AFL-CIO convention despite the economic downturn, the Executive Council reported.

In addition to improvements in wages and traditional fringe benefits, the council noted, unions negotiated significant gains in cost-of-living protection, supplementary unemployment benefits and job security provisions.

Wage increases in major collective bargaining pacts negotiated in 1974 increased markedly over the previous year when bargaining took place under rigid controls imposed by the Nixon Administration.

The average first-year increase negotiated in 1974 under the contracts covering 1,000 or more workers was 9.8 percent, up from 5.8 percent in 1973. Over the life of the contract, the average wage increase was 7.3 percent a year, up from 5.1 percent in 1973.

Early trends for 1975 saw first-year wage rates increasing by 12.5 percent, slightly faster than the rate of inflation. Over the life of the contract, wage rates increased at a 7.7 percent rate.

"Despite these gains, inflation and the economic downturn continued to squeeze working families," the council observed.

"Workers and their families need catch-up wage and salary increases to maintain and improve their real incomes. The national economy needs increased workers' buying power to maintain the expansion in consumer spending necessary for balanced economic growth and stability."

The council reported an increased use of escalator clauses since the last convention as workers tried to protect their buying power in the face of soaring, double-digit inflation.

Escalator clauses provide workers a partial catch-up with the rise in living costs after it has occurred. Other trends in collective bargaining:

● Pension plan improvements are resulting in increased and earlier retirement benefits, reduced service requirements and more coverage for survivors.

"A major breakthrough helping retirees keep pace with inflation was achieved in several contracts through the provision of cost-of-living adjustments for those already retired," the council noted.

● Strengthened job security provisions have been negotiated in many contracts in response to massive increases in unemployment in 1974 and 1975.

● Supplementary unemployment benefit plans were increased in number and benefits.

● Large-scale layoffs resulted in some discussion of forced worksharing. A council statement last May termed this "nothing more than poverty sharing" which would violate the principle that "the longer-service employe has priority in job allocation," and "inevitably would tear apart the solidarity necessary to achieve real economic gains for all workers."

● Improvements in health plans in the last two years continued to respond to soaring medical costs. From 1967 to 1974, for example, the cost of a semi-private hospital room more than doubled.

● Employes of private, nonprofit hospitals and nursing homes finally achieved first-class citizenship in 1974, with enactment of legislation bringing them under the National Labor Relations Act.

In a concluding note, the council observed that union workers have achieved higher living standards, better working conditions and more job and income security than non-union workers.

"Collective bargaining remains as it has been from its beginning—a flexible and adaptable system of union-employer relations that is an integral part of this free society," the council said.

Internal Disputes Plan Assisted by Mediation

San Francisco—Mediation has continued to be an effective means of settling disputes between AFL-CIO affiliates, the Executive Council reported.

Mediation is the first step in the federation's machinery for resolving disputes, and the panel of mediators available to help achieve a voluntary settlement is made up of officers of international unions.

Since the dispute plan's inception in 1962, 906 of the 1,616 complaints filed have been settled through mediation, with 29 cases pending as of the close of the reporting period last June.

Cases not resolved in mediation go to one of the two impartial umpires for the program, David L. Cole and Howard W. Kleeb.

In determinations issued through June 30, violations were found in 409 complaints and not found in 249.

Appeals from an umpire's decision are considered by a rotating three-member subcommittee of the Executive Council. The cumulative total is 154 umpire determinations upheld, 33 appeals withdrawn and 19 sent to the full Executive Council for decision. In three cases to date, the umpire's determination has either been set aside or modified.

On complaints of non-compliance heard by council subcommittees since the program started, compliance was achieved in 58 cases and non-compliance was found in 20 cases. Twenty-one complaints were withdrawn and 12 were pending as of July.

From Jan. 1, 1962 to June 30, 1975, 12 affiliates were found to have failed to comply with decisions of the impartial umpire or of council subcommittees.

In most cases, compliance was later achieved. The council said the following unions are currently in non-compliance and remain under sanctions required by the AFL-CIO Constitution: the Air Line Pilots Association and the International Typographical Union.

Federal Aid Essential To City, State Budgets

San Francisco—The pressing problems of America are national in scope and consequently the federal government must expand its role in helping the nation's hard-pressed state and local governments, the Executive Council said in its report to the convention.

The council's report on state and local government reiterated labor's longstanding support of public investment programs and said "much that is needed can and should be administered and financed at the state and local level."

"But we remain firm in our conviction that the federal government —which represents all of the American people and all the nation's resources—must substantially expand its role," the council said.

The urgency was revealed in statistics on the financial crisis of state and local governments which the council traced directly to the recession of 1974-75 and the reduced tax revenues from high unemployment and production cutbacks.

The council noted that to hold down budget costs, the federal government had also cut back its assistance—at exactly the wrong time. Federal assistance made up 25.2 percent of state and local expenditures in 1973, but that dropped to 23.6 percent in 1974 and is estimated at 22.2 percent for 1975, it was pointed out.

Consequently, state and local governments are cutting back vital services and conducting layoffs that take a severe toll of public employes.

But they're also increasing taxes at an accelerated rate — and the council said that contradicted what the federal government was trying to do with its tax cuts for 1975.

In sum, the local governments have taken $7.5 to $8 billion out of the economy, about $4 billion of it in capital improvements projects that were cancelled.

The council pointed out that "significantly, cutbacks in employment, services, new facilities, construction and planned increases in taxes were concentrated in areas where unemployment was highest." This managed only to heap more jobless on an already bleak employment picture.

"America's most pressing problems—unemployment, housing, energy conservation and development, poverty, pollution, health care, education, public transportation and the like—are nationwide in scope and impact," the council said. "They require national leadership, federal programs and federal financial support."

Textile Workers Win Essex Blanket Vote

Belton, S.C.—Workers at Essex International's blanket division here have chosen the Textile Workers Union of America as their bargaining representative in a National Labor Relations Board election.

The tally was 148 for TWUA, 126 for no union.

Economic Woes Top Convention Issues

of the free labor movement to play a "vital role" as the country plots its course. He called on the convention to "vigorously pursue our role as the workers' advocate . . . our members and their fellow countrymen are looking for leadership . . . and they will not find it wanting in the labor movement."

The federation president reported that the labor movement is in good shape, citing increased political education programs, the leadership in the fight for social legislation and the protection union contracts provide workers during recession and inflation.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland presented a detailed financial report that showed an increase of $1,381,570 in the federation's net worth and a rise in average per capita membership over the past two years of nearly 660,000 to 14,066,000 — the largest increase in membership since 1967.

He noted that since 1973 the AFL-CIO has completed construction of the expansion of the headquarters building and expanded the facilities at the Labor Studies Center.

On developments in the labor movement the report notes two mergers of affiliates since the last convention and the chartering of the Public Employee Dept. as well as three changes on the council. The reorganization of the Dept. of Organization & Field Services is detailed including the net gain of 803,688 new affiliations with state and local central bodies and developments in cooperative organizing programs and boycott activities, including the Farm Workers.

The report notes that the department has set up a clearinghouse operation to oversee the operations of the National Labor Relations Board both in Washington and the field and to help bring about necessary changes in the law.

On Watergate the council said that as a result of the pardon of former President Richard M. Nixon "the American people were denied the final truth—the conviction or admission of guilt. But they had already made their decision. The evidence was in, and Richard Nixon was guilty." Watergate has left the nation scarred "but hopefully a better nation" in view of the exposure of political corruption, illegality and immorality at the highest levels of government.

The report presented a detailed analysis of the economic situation and concluded it constituted the "most dangerous mess in 40 years." The report warned that Administration policies would result in an "anemic pickup, resulting in persistent unemployment, large amounts of idle plants and machines, a sluggish pace of productivity improvements and continuing, large deficits in the federal budget."

The economic analysis was sharply critical of Congress also for failing "to adopt a decisively expansionary budget policy or to override President Ford's vetoes of job-creating measures to supplement the tax cut and extended unemployment benefits that had been enacted."

The council noted that collective bargaining continues to be a major force for improving wages, living standards and working conditions despite the economic mess. It pointed out the need to overhaul the tax system "overloaded with inequities" that limits the government's ability to provide vital services.

The report noted the continuing problem of protecting consumers by fair dealing in the marketplace and in a new section on energy and the environment emphasized that that the country can have "environmental protection and economic growth at the same time."

It charged that two years after the Arab oil boycott the country still has no energy policy and said the President's program was "based on a prayer and a hope."

The report reviews developments in world affairs and international relations noting that the "world balance of power has significantly changed" since the last convention as democracy has come under increasing attack. The policy of detente has weakened the alliance of the free world and is creating a new isolationism, the council stressed.

The council decried the fraternization of democratic labor centers in Western Europe with Communist labor fronts and said "the American labor movement must not compromise its organizational freedom by paying homage to the so-called labor movements of totalitarian regimes through programs of exchange and cooperation."

On social security, the report noted that the beneficiaries were running a losing race with inflation and that rising unemployment was bringing new discrimination against older workers. It strongly assailed phony welfare reforms of a system that is "grossly inadequate."

It noted also the inadequacy of the unemployment compensation system and the lag in workers' compensation standards and payments, stressed the continuing need for national health insurance and called for vigilance in the administration of the new pension law.

A review of the recession-stricken housing industry and the Administration's failures in the area, the activities of the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust and the Human Resources Development Institute mark the section on urban affairs and housing.

The report calls for expanded cooperation with HRDI and stepped-up participation by state and local central bodies on local manpower councils. The council called also for broad changes in national policy in fulfilling the country's obligations to its veterans.

The Administration views on expenditure for education came under council attack as did the frustrations of the occupational health and safety law. The broad range of community service activities in a period of unemployment is stressed.

The slippage in civil rights progress is pointed up in the report in terms of the recession, the dismantling of social programs through vetoes and impoundments and discriminatory allocation of revenue-sharing funds.

The problems of women workers are singled out in this section and the need stressed to eliminate discrimination based on sex.

In a section on labor and the law, the council said "the last two years have produced few important decisions favorable to the labor movement and many whose effect will be seriously detrimental." It said the four Nixon appointees are "judicial activists dedicated to establishing their own views of desirable policy" despite the clear meaning of statutes and prior decisions.

A comprehensive report on the legislative activities of the AFL-CIO includes an extensive analysis of congressional action on the program adopted in 1975 by the AFL-CIO General Board. There is a review also of state legislative developments.

On political activities the council reported that 1976 will present a challenge to retain the scores of seats won in the 1974 elections by friendly representatives from traditionally conservative districts. The council said the 1974 effort was more effective than any previous election effort and called for bettering that record next year.

This section carried also explanations of federal and state campaign reform efforts, noting that the AFL-CIO will support honest and legitimate campaign reform measures but will oppose regressive legislation that seeks to restrict vital political activities.

The council report includes also sections on the activities of headquarters departments and the trade and industrial union departments of the federation.

Caught in the Whirlpool

Report Notes Completion of Two Mergers

San Francisco—Two mergers of AFL-CIO affiliates were consummated since the federation's last convention and a new AFL-CIO department was formed.

The Executive Council report noted the merger of the Cigar Makers into the Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Union last year, and the merger of the Window Glass Cutters into the Glass Bottle Blowers two months ago.

The Cigar Makers brought to the RWDSU a 110-year trade union tradition. Its early members included Samuel Gompers, the first president of the American Federation of Labor.

Last November, the Executive Council reported, the Public Employee Dept. of the AFL-CIO was chartered with an initial membership of 29 unions with approximately 2.5 million members in the public service.

The 1973 convention had referred to the Executive Council a resolution calling for the formation of such a department and subsequent meetings found broad-based support for the concept.

Transport Workers Ratify Pan Am Pact

Members of the Transport Workers at Pan American World Airways have overwhelmingly ratified new contracts providing gains in wages and benefits for nearly 20,000 employes.

TWU President Matthew Guinan said the two-year contracts, approved in a mail ballot, cover maintenance, ground service, commissary, port stewards, flight dispatchers and flight service employes.

They provide a four-step, 15-percent compounded pay increase, improved pensions, health and welfare benefits and improved working conditions, the union said. In addition, maintenance, ground service, port stewards and commissary employes receive two cost-of-living adjustments. The contract takes effect Nov. 1.

Social Security's Deficit Termed 'Manageable'

San Francisco—Rapid inflation has caused some legitimate concern over the financing formula for social security, but the problem isn't nearly as grave as some alarmist critics picture it, the AFL-CIO Executive Council reported.

Social security's financial problems are "manageable," the council said. "They do not jeopardize the fundamental soundness of the system or its ability to pay benefits when due."

The council report expressed concern over "a tidal wave of groundless charges in the media that the social security system is in danger of collapse."

These "distorted and alarmist charges," the council suggested, "may be part of a campaign to discredit the program in order to prevent essential improvements and to forestall enactment of Health Security, which is based on social insurance principles."

The council noted that five former Secretaries of Health, Education & Welfare and all three surviving former Commissioners of the Social Security Administration joined in branding these attacks on the system a "disservice to the nation."

The council report expressed concern at the added burdens on Medicare patients of higher premiums and deductible amounts, continued exclusion of important health services and charges by some doctors of fees in excess of the amount payable under Medicare.

While Medicare "does substantially reduce the cost burden of medical care for older people," the council report noted that the elderly also have been hard hit by the higher premiums and deductibles and by the rise in the cost of uncovered health services and prescription drugs.

Even though Congress has refused to go along with Administration proposals to cut back yet further on Medicare services, the Executive Council noted that the program now covers "less than half the health cost burden on the older population."

The council report includes a description of the pension reform law enacted last year, which included requirements for vesting of pension rights and insurance that earned benefits will not be lost if an employer goes out of business.

Another section of the report discussed the problems of aging and of living on greatly reduced incomes.

High unemployment has been a particular burden on workers too young to retire but too old to compete efficiently in a "youth-oriented business world," the council said.

While the "real solution" is full employment, the nation's social insurance programs must be improved to more effectively cope with "this growing social problem," the report declared.

Local Unions Affiliate With Internationals

San Francisco—Thirty union locals directly affiliated with the AFL-CIO chose to join national and international unions in the two years since the last convention.

As of June 30, there were 144 directly affiliated locals with a membership of 51,821.

Over the past two years, nine locals with a combined membership of 407 disbanded, one local disaffiliated and two locals merged. But 29 new charters were issued to locals that had been affiliated with the Brewery Workers before the parent union merged with the Teamsters and lost its AFL-CIO affiliation.

Under action taken by the Executive Council on July 30, 1975, the minimum membership dues for directly affiliated local unions was set at $6 a month.

The total membership in directly affiliated locals was down 3,140 over the two years and more than 10,000 below four years ago. The council report noted that "the desire of the local union membership for active participation in the affairs of a national or international union having activities and industry jurisdiction similar to theirs" was the motivation for the shift in affiliation.

Currently there are 50 state central bodies, one commonwealth central body and 749 local central bodies. The number of local AFL-CIO councils was 14 higher than two years ago.

Meany Scores Ford's Policy Failures

Warns U.S. Economic Weakness Poses 'Prescription for Disaster'

of the Federal Reserve Board.

Citing Burns's present proposals at the University of Georgia that would wipe out the unemployment insurance system and put people to work at below minimum wage levels, Meany charged that he "wants to destroy all the social gains of the past 40 years" to move the country back to the days of McKinley.

Given Burns's approach and the policies of the Administration, Meany said "there is no indication that Mr. Ford will take any action designed to put America back to work—real work—real production that could mean recovery."

Meany noted that in two months the AFL-CIO will "reach the end of its 20th year" and said that American labor has played a major role in the progress the nation has made over those decades.

He stressed to the applauding delegates that "everything in this world that affects the life, liberty and happiness is the business of the American trade union movement," and that the "AFL-CIO will continue to be heard speaking for the ordinary, everyday American on all matters that directly or indirectly affect the character and quality of American life."

The federation president pointed out that the "world in which we live has changed drastically in the last 20 years," with the emergence of new independent countries who unfortunately in too many cases have come under the control of petty dictators and assorted strongmen who have "turned their backs on the democratic process—on the democratic values they had proclaimed in their struggle for independence."

Chairmen Listed for 11th Convention

San Francisco — The following is a list of committee chairmen for the AFL-CIO's 11th convention here:

Credentials — Vice President Frederick O'Neal, Actors & Artistes.

Rules — Vice President Richard F. Walsh, Stage Employes.

Resolutions — Vice President I. W. Abel, Steelworkers.

Constitution — Vice President Al H. Chesser, United Transportation Union.

Executive Council Report — Vice President S. Frank Raftery, Painters.

Education—Vice President Martin J. Ward, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters.

Labels — Vice President Joseph D. Keenan, IBEW.

State & Local Bodies—Vice President Lee W. Minton, Glass Bottle Blowers.

Appeals—Walter J. Burke, Steelworkers.

But the major problem in the world is the rise of the military power of the Communist world, so that it is no longer possible to speak confidently of the United States as the "world's strongest military power."

"I would feel a lot safer," Meany declared, "if we were number one—and not the Soviet Union. American military weakness does not make any contribution to peace," he said.

The shift in the balance of power to the Soviets stems from the Nixon-Ford policy of detente, Meany stressed, spelling out in detail the "fruits of detente" in North Vietnam, Cambodia, Egypt and Syria, the Arab States, Portugal, India, North Korea, Thailand and the United Nations, all areas in which the Soviets have increased their control and neither honored nor even recognized their agreement with the United States in 1972 on detente.

The fruits of detente "have been so bitter" Meany said, that a growing number of Americans are beginning to wonder "whether we have been on the right track. More and more of our citizens are raising questions about the efficacy of a foreign policy based on unilateral concessions to the Soviet Union."

Meany opened his address recalling that two years ago the AFL-CIO convened during the constitutional crisis that culminated in the resignation of President Nixon and that during the convention the AFL-CIO called on Nixon to resign or be impeached.

No one at that convention relished the idea of forcing an American President to leave office by impeachment or resignation, Meany said, but the AFL-CIO accepted the responsibility in face of the need to remove a President "who had betrayed the nation's trust."

On Ford, he said "it is not enough to have a nice guy in the White House. It is not enough to get a new leading man—if the play is no good. You have got to write a new script—and you have to get a whole new cast of characters."

And dealing with the economic policies of the Administration and the claim that the economy is coming out of the recession, Meany said: "Well, maybe recovery is on the way for the corporations and the banks—but it is certainly not on the way for the millions of unemployed. You know, there is something cockeyed about this whole picture. They are telling the workers of this nation that they must tolerate high unemployment for the next five years in order to fight inflation and—at the same time—they are proposing actions that will undoubtedly raise prices even higher than they are today.

"Practically everything the Administration does—in the name of fighting inflation — makes inflation worse. Then, they turn around and use inflation as an argument in favor of continuing high unemployment."

CONVENTION OF Union Label & Service Trades Dept. marked the retirement of Edward P. Murphy, left, as the department's secretary-treasurer. Earl D. McDavid succeeds him.

Drive Pushed to Block Cutoff of Food Stamps

The AFL-CIO called on its state and local leaders to help counter a "concerted, coordinated attack" being waged against the food stamp program by a number of Ford Administration officials and congressional conservatives.

"The attack uses half-truths and outright lies to picture food stamps as a runaway program replete with abuses and cheating," AFL-CIO President George Meany warned in a letter to the heads of state and city AFL-CIO central labor bodies.

"This campaign's real target is to cut unemployed, striking and low-wage workers from food stamp benefits," he said.

A bill introduced by New York's conservative Sen. James L. Buckley would cut at least half of the present food stamp recipients from the program, Meany said.

"Workers who went on strike, quit a job without good cause or refused to scab when sent to a struck plant would be ineligible for food stamps and so would their families. Many unemployed or retired workers would have to dispose of their homes and cars before they could qualify. The value of their furniture and their families' clothing would be assessed and some of these belongings might have to be sold," Meany said.

He termed the attack on food stamps "part and parcel of the campaign which the Ford Administration and other rightwingers are waging against workers. First, they prevent the enactment of job-creation legislation. Second, they promote policies which sharply increase food and energy costs. Third, they seek to starve the jobless and the working poor by knocking them off food stamps."

Meany urged letters to congressmen and senators in opposition to the Buckley bill and similar bills in the House. And he asked expressions of support for H.R. 7887, a bill reported by the House Agriculture Committee, which would prevent "the long delays for food stamp certification to which unemployed workers in many areas are forced to endure."

Consumer Safeguards Remain Short of Needs

San Francisco—Some progress toward protecting American consumers and improving their position in the market place has been made in recent years, but much remains to be done, the AFL-CIO Executive Council reported to the federation's 11th convention.

"With worker purchasing power severely cut back by high unemployment and large-scale price inflation, the need for fair dealing in the market place is more acute than ever," the council declared.

"Workers' families cannot afford the costs associated with such practices as non-competitive pricing, inadequate labeling, unsafe or defective products, credit gouging, fraudulent or deceptive sales tactics and exorbitant insurance charges."

The insurance industry collects more than $100 billion in premiums annually, the council noted, and has a major impact on consumers; yet it is not regulated by the federal government and state regulation has proved totally inadequate.

Since the last convention, progress has been made in the areas of product warranties and credit, the council observed. It cited the Moss-Magnuson law that provides minimum federal standards on consumer product warranties and strengthens the powers of the Federal Trade Commission in consumer protection.

The Federal Depository Institutions Act amendments of 1974 set up rules for fair billing practices and established new rights for credit-card holders. The amendments also prohibit credit discrimination on the basis of marital status or sex.

The council drew attention to areas where special consumer problems exist: computerized checkout stands at supermarkets and the removal of price labels from consumer products; so-called fair trade laws in states that allow manufacturers to set minimum prices for resale of brand-name products.

Senate Cuts Coverage Under Job Safety Law

25 was the target sought by the employer groups. The Senate has refused to go along, and no curtailment ever became law.

This year, the House voted decisively against weakening enforcement in establishments with 25 or fewer workers, and pro-employer senators did not even try for the higher exemption.

Their first move, proposed by Sen. Carl Curtis (R-Neb.) was to exclude establishments with five or fewer workers. This motion, which would have affected an estimated 6.5 million workers, lost in a 44-44 tie vote.

Curtis picked up his needed votes when he dropped the exclusion to three or fewer workers, denying protection to about 4 million persons. (Rollcall on Page 5)

Another Senate-added amendment that the AFL-CIO is seeking to defeat in the final version of the bill would place a $50 limit on fines that could be levied on an employer if, on a first visit, an inspector finds safety violations that do not pose a risk of death or serious injury.

Price controls on about two-thirds of oil produced in the United States were temporarily reinstated under a truce worked out between Congress and the White House. A bill passed by one-sided votes of both the House and Senate and signed by President Ford reinstates controls until Nov. 15. The intent is to allow more time for Congress and the President to seek agreement on long-range energy policy.

The House voted 278-123 not to take up a resolution disapproving the 5 percent curb. Earlier, the Senate had refused by a 53-39 vote to block Ford's pay-cutting action.

A major factor in the votes was the action of Congress earlier this year in tying its own pay raises to the federal employee formula. A member of Congress voting to give federal employes their full raise was in effect taking the political risk of also voting himself a larger pay raise.

In an effort to overcome this political handicap, the American Federation of Government Employees urged that the House first be allowed to vote on a bill that would hold congressional and judicial pay raises to the 5 percent limit without prejudicing the increases for rank-and-file federal workers. But the bill failed to get out of the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee, and Ford's pay raise ceiling prevailed.

Federal Tax Services Rated Best in Poll

The federal government provides the more services for the tax dollar than state and local governments, according to a public opinion survey conducted last May for the U.S. Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations.

Attacks Job Crisis, Weakness Abroad

By Saul Miller

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO has turned its full energy and resources to the job of "recreating a viable, progressive America" based on new policies and leadership.

The federation's 11th convention here looked back briefly at the 20 years of the existence of the AFL-CIO and plunged into the task of working out solutions to the immediate problems facing the nation and the world.

The nearly 900 delegates spelled out the programs and policies in adopting 133 resolutions, making clear their positive reactions to a handful of speeches sharply critical of the Ford Administration, re-electing the federation's leaders, adding four new vice presidents, and strengthening its financial base.

AFL-CIO President George Meany, elected to his 11th term and hailed in a special resolution for his forceful and courageous leadership, told the delegates that the labor movement will play a major role in putting "this specter of unemployment behind us and that once again we will be producing for the benefit of all America and that by producing, by recreating a viable, progressive America, we will again play our part as a leading nation of the free world."

Meany said "I would be less than human if I did not look back after 20 years of merger . . . with some little degree of satisfaction." There were difficult times and difficult decisions to make but all the decisions were "based on the sound, solid trade union philosophy that we would do what we thought was best for the great mass of American workers that we represent."

From the opening keynote address by Meany assailing Ford as a "nice guy" who is "still playing by the old Nixon script" that has brought America to the brink of disaster at home and weakness abroad, the convention's four days were filled with attacks on Administration policies in scores of resolutions, by floor speakers and by four Democratic senators.

Most of the resolutions reaffirmed AFL-CIO policies designed to create full employment, improve the standard of living of American workers, initiate new and badly needed programs for health care, safety, welfare, child care and social services and to protect workers from unemployment and as consumers and citizens. They reaffirmed also the federation's concern with freedom in the world and the fate of workers and free unions in the face of rising totalitarianism and a decline in democratic governments.

In all, the delegates disposed of a total of 266 resolutions plus additional supplemental reports from the Executive Council. In addition to the 133 resolutions adopted, they referred 41 to the new Executive Council for further consideration, nonconcurred in four, took no action on one and covered 87 in the ones adopted.

The convention gave special emphasis to immediate problems of a fair deal for farm workers, renewing the AFL-CIO commitment to the UFW and pledging whatever assistance is necessary to enable the union to regain its role as bargaining agent for the nation's agricultural workers.

It spelled out its concern for an end to all discrimination against women in the work place and stressed the need for passage of the Equal Rights Amendment, moving also to strengthen AFL-CIO

Teamsters Role Condemned:

All Possible Support Sought For Cause of Farm Workers

By James M. Shevis

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO renewed its commitment to the United Farm Workers, pledging whatever assistance is necessary to enable the UFW to regain its rightful place as bargaining agent for the nation's agricultural workers.

In a special resolution adopted at the federation's 11th convention here, the AFL-CIO held up the Farm Workers' struggle as a priority concern of the entire labor movement and urged its affiliates to lend all possible aid to the union in the current phase of its fight for survival.

"I ask that everybody do everything they possibly can to assist the Farm Workers in this struggle," President George Meany said.

"The fight that the Farm Workers are engaged in is a fight against the organized financial structure that is backed by the agricultural industry in this state—the very wealthiest, perhaps, in the nation—combined with the organization that calls itself a union, the International Brotherhood of Teamsters."

Approved unanimously by the 900 convention delegates, the resolution pointedly called upon state officials to live up to their legal and moral obligations to assure that the intent of California's new representation elections law "is honored in fact and in practice."

The law, which took effect Aug. 28, is the first of its kind in the nation. It spells out the rights of California's 250,000 agricultural workers to bargain collectively through a union of their choice.

UFW President Cesar Chavez, appearing before the convention, accused the California Agricultural Labor Relations Board of lax and questionable actions that have served to frustrate the law's purpose. The CALRB administers the law and supervises the elections now being held throughout the state.

The UFW had great expectations about the new farm labor law, Chavez noted, "but in recent days things have gone not so well." He charged that CALRB General Counsel Walter Kintz has been unwilling to move against a conspiracy of the growers and the Teamsters to thwart the statute's intent.

"There has been a lot of incompetence on the part of the staff of that board," Chavez declared.

Major Areas Swamped With High Joblessness

By John R. Oravec

Ninety percent of the nation's 150 major job centers were swamped last month by jobless rates ranging from 6 percent to more than 21 percent, the highest area count of "substantial" joblessness since the Labor Dept. began collecting such data in 1955.

The addition of Washington, D.C., and Norfolk-Virginia Beach-Portsmouth, Va., increased the list of key labor areas with "substantial" unemployment to 135. There were only 51 major areas on the list in September 1974.

The Labor Dept. figures showed 57 major areas with unemployment rates of 10 percent or higher, and nine others with jobless rates exceeding 15 percent.

There also were 906 smaller areas affected by either "substantial" or "persistent" unemployment last month for a total of 1,041 on the list of hard-hit job centers.

Meanwhile, the Labor Dept. reported that the nation's overall jobless rate edged down in September one-tenth of 1 percent to 8.3 percent, although the number of workers with jobs and the number of

Full Union Rights Asked For All Public Employes

By David L. Perlman

San Francisco—Public employes should have the same collective bargaining rights as all other workers, including the right to strike, the AFL-CIO said.

The convention unanimously backed legislation sponsored by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.) to extend the protections of the National Labor Relations Act to public employes.

It also specifically affirmed the right of all workers to strike—in the public as in the private sector.

Delegates rejected by a big margin an amendment that sought to substitute "binding arbitration for public safety personnel" as an alternative to giving fire fighters and police the right to strike.

The amendment, proposed by President Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employees, led to the sharpest debate of the convention. Other unions—including the Fire Fighters, who would be most directly affected—vigorously objected. They warned against putting the AFL-CIO on record as advocating compulsory arbitration for WORN-OUT POLICIES of the Nixon Administration that President Ford continues to espouse are assailed by AFL-CIO President George Meany in his keynote address to the federation's 11th biennial convention in San Francisco.

Delegates Re-Elect Top Officers, Name Four New Vice Presidents

San Francisco—Four new members were elected to the AFL-CIO Executive Council to replace vice presidents who retired. The 11th convention also unanimously re-elected AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and 27 council members to new two-year terms.

The four new members of the council are Sol C. Chaikin, president of the Ladies' Garment Workers; Hal C. Davis, president of the Musicians; Edward T. Hanley, president of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees; Clyde M. Webber, president of the Government Employees.

Leaving the council were Richard F. Walsh of the Stage Employes, Lee W. Minton of the Glass Bottle Blowers, Louis Stulberg of the ILGWU and Alexander J. Rohan of the Printing & Graphic Communications Union. They were all presidents emeritus of their unions.

Chaikin, 57, born in New York City, succeeded Stulberg as president of the ILGWU earlier this year. He joined the union as an organizer in 1940 after graduating from law school and served in New England, Texas, Oklahoma and Louisiana. In 1959 he became associate director of the Northeast Dept., was elected a vice president in 1965 and secretary-treasurer of the union in 1973.

Davis, 61, was born in Pittsburgh and began his professional career there in 1930 as a percussionist and staff musician on KDKA, the nation's first radio station. He served for 22 years as president of the Pittsburgh AFM local and seven years on the international executive board. He was elected president of the AFM in 1970. He serves also as president of the Inter-American Federation of Entertainment Workers and vice president of the AFL-CIO Council of Professional Employees.

Hanley, 43, is a native of Chicago who became a professional bartender in 1955 and an officer of Local 278 in 1961 and president of the Chicago Joint Executive Board. He was elected a vice president of the international union in 1968 and in 1973 succeeded Ed S. Miller as president of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees. In 1974 he was named co-chairman of the International Union of Food Services.

Webber, 56, a native of Odgen, Utah, was elected a national vice president of the Government Employees while working for the U.S. Dept. of Labor in the western district and was named executive vice president in 1966 serving fulltime in Washington. He succeeded John Griner as president in 1972 and was elected to a full two-year term in 1974. Webber serves on the Federal Pay Council and the Prevailing Wage Advisory Committee.

Re-elected to the council as vice presidents of the AFL-CIO were Joseph D. Keenan, Paul Hall, I. W. Abel, Hunter P. Wharton, Paul Jennings, Max Greenberg, John H. Lyons, A. F. Grospiron, Matthew Guinan, C. L. Dennis, Peter Bommarito, Peter Fosco, Thomas W. Gleason, Frederick O'Neal, Floyd E. Smith, Jerry Wurf, S. Frank Raftery, James T. Housewright, George Hardy, Al H. Chesser, Martin J. Ward, William Sidell, Murray H. Finley, Joseph P. Tonelli, Albert Shanker, Sol Stetin, C. L. Dellums, Francis S. Filbey, Glenn E. Watts.

Vice Presidents elected for their first full terms are Dellums, Filbey and Watts.

The convention referred to the incoming Executive Council two resolutions dealing with racial and sex composition of the council. One of the resolutions called for appointment of minority groups and women representatives. The resolutions committee report recommending referral said it believes that all members of the council represent all members of federation affiliates and that no single member or group of members represents any minority or class of members, but that the issues raised by the resolutions deserve careful consideration and review by the council.

Labor Opposes Plan To Dismantle GI Bill

San Francisco—The nation's obligations to its veterans must be fulfilled, the AFL-CIO declared as it called on Congress to enact programs "to help veterans help themselves and to assist those who cannot."

The federation's convention stressed its opposition to proposals for the termination of the GI Bill as a readjustment program for veterans. Such proposals began to blossom with the end of the Vietnam war.

"The readjustment format may be no longer viable with the implementation of the all-volunteer military service," the AFL-CIO resolution noted, "but we are hesitant to endorse the perfunctory dismantling of this, the longest standing and one of the nation's most successful, federal aid to education programs.

"To do this would be to summarily disregard the vast social benefits achieved as a result of this landmark educational effort."

The resolution recommended a congressionally-authorized study by the Office of Education to examine current veterans programs in light of today's realities.

To reverse the "unconscionable" high jobless rate among Vietnam era veterans, the AFL-CIO will seek enactment by Congress of job-creating legislation and full funding of all federal manpower programs, the resolution said.

The federation also pledged to seek improvements in educational benefits for veterans, including a system of variable tuition assistance to end the geographical discrimination against veterans in states with high-cost educational systems.

In addition, the AFL-CIO urged Congress to increase the medical care budget of the Veterans Administration so as to adequately assure the best health care for all veterans.

New Efforts Pledged For Women's Rights

By Rex Hardesty

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO convention pledged a continued fight for women's rights in the workplace, including passage of the Equal Rights Amendment and an end to wage differentials based on sex.

The convention adopted a six-part program calling for full participation of women in union activity, equal opportunity in the workplace, and fully adequate child care legislation in addition to passage of ERA and further bargaining gains.

Besides abolition of wage differentials, the bargaining section also called for continued emphasis on sickness and accident benefits for pregnancy and maternity leave paid on the same basis as any other disability; job posting and upgrading and expansion to include men under state laws that now protect only women.

In other actions related to women's rights, the convention amended the AFL-CIO constitution to make clear that women's rights fall within the jurisdiction of the Dept. of Civil Rights in the federation.

It declined formal endorsement of the Coalition of Labor Union Women because of its large number of members from non-affiliated unions and referred to the Executive Council the question of making ratification of ERA a condition for any states considered as sites of future AFL-CIO conventions.

The constitutional change came on a committee recommendation that the change was "to make explicit in the constitution what is now implicit." Thus it added the phrase "because of race, creed, color, sex, national origin or ancestry" to the end of the section outlining the responsibilities of the AFL-CIO Committee on Civil Rights.

The action came in response to a proposal that the AFL-CIO institute a separate standing committee on women's affairs. "It would represent duplication to establish a separate committee on women," the report said.

But in keeping women's rights within civil rights structurally, the committee recommended "that the President of the AFL-CIO expand the Civil Rights Committee by adding persons who are knowledgeable about the problems of women workers."

It also recommended that efforts be continued to encourage full and active participation by women and minorities at all levels of union activities.

The constitution committee recommendation on a stepped-up women's rights program was supported by Vice President Glenn E. Watts, president of the Communications Workers, which sponsored the original resolution on a separate women's department.

Watts told the convention that a moral force for the advancement of women should be added to the structural force and that appeal could more properly be directed to affiliated unions than to the federation itself.

"I think perhaps one ought to be speaking to the individual international unions such as my own rather than to the AFL-CIO itself in this regard," Watts said. "When I say 'us,' I'm talking about those of us who are men in this convention because, to some extent, it is a sad commentary on us that only 22 or 23 delegates to this great convention are women."

Delegate Myra Wolfgang, a vice president of Hotel & Restaurant Employees, termed the convention action a "half a loaf," and pledged that women will continue to be heard from in organizing and other efforts. She urged full participation in the Coalition of Labor Union Women's convention to be held in Detroit Dec. 6-7.

Vice President Frederick O'Neal, chairman of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee, called on the convention delegates to take full advantage of expanded staff planned for the Dept. of Civil Rights and urged them "to bring us your problems."

The decision to non-concur in formal endorsement of the Coalition of Labor Union Women "in no way should be construed as critical of CLUW," the committee recommendation said, and noted that "CLUW is clearly in the trade union tradition that people with common problems and common goals should work together in a common organization."

At all levels, the AFL-CIO and its affiliates will continue to cooperate with CLUW, the committee said, but noted that CLUW itself had not sought endorsement because it includes many members of non-affiliated organizations, like the Auto Workers.

The convention resolution on women workers cited their continuing growth and influence in the workplace and said "a good union contract is not only the most effective guarantee against economic exploitation, but is also the basis upon which true equality can be built."

The convention recommended ideas for pursuing women's rights, including stepped-up publicity of the AFL-CIO position on the ERA to help gain ratification in the four states still needed for the required total of 38.

Role of Unions Cited in Shift To Metric Rule

San Francisco—Full labor participation is going to be needed to protect workers' rights on the various boards overseeing conversion to the metric system, the AFL-CIO convention pointed out.

A resolution on metrics described as imminent legislation that would set up conversion under a U.S. Metric Board, and it urged labor cooperation with the board at all levels.

The convention noted that the recommendation "to let costs lie where they fall," which labor considers unfair to workers who would have to provide their own tools, has been removed in the new legislation. And the process of conversion would have a timetable only on the research and recommendations of the board, not on fixed deadlines for complete U.S. conversion to the metric system.

Consequently, the resolution said, it is doubly important that labor stay in touch with the various federal and state agencies so that apprenticeship programs and similar work-related groups have a full voice and are amply protected in the transition period.

machinery to give it new emphasis for combating discrimination based on sex.

It remembered and paid homage to the man who helped make community services an integral part of the labor movement by presenting the Murray-Green Award to the late Joseph A. Beirne who chaired the federation's Community Services Committee for many years and was the first trade union leader to head the United Way.

Five members of the Administration addressed the convention: Defense Sec. James Schlesinger, Labor Sec. John Dunlop, UN Ambassador Daniel P. Moynihan, Chairman Betty Southard Murphy of the National Labor Relations Board and Mediation Director W. J. Usery. They dealt with the various problems of their agencies—Schlesinger on the need for a fully funded national defense program; Dunlop on the need to preserve free collective bargaining; Moynihan on the decline of democracy around the world; Murphy on speeding NLRB procedures and Usery on the critical role of mediation in settling disputes.

Three fraternal delegates led by Shirley G. E. Carr of the Canadian Labor Congress brought reports from the trade union movements in Canada and Great Britain, with Mrs. Carr stressing the need for international free trade union cooperation in terms of the growth and spread of multinational corporations.

The multinational and international trade problems received detailed attention from the convention with a warning that the job loss due to trade policies that have occurred in manufacturing and maritime industries is now spreading to service industries as well. It pointed out as well the inroads that the multinationals are making in taking over American firms.

The problems of the maritime and construction industries were dealt with in a series of specific resolutions along with policies developed to deal with the railroads and public employes.

The convention strongly supported full collective bargaining rights for public employes, including the right to strike.

The delegates expressed their concern with the need for a comprehensive energy program based on elimination of American dependence on imported oil and conservation and conversion of domestic resources and adopted a policy statement on the need to assure a reliable supply of raw materials to prevent possible future embargoes of other nations.

In the political field, the convention called for an all-out effort to hold the gains of 1974 and to help build a COPE organization in every local union to help achieve the needed change in policies and leadership.

To strengthen and improve the federation's operations, the delegates unanimously voted to increase per capita payments from 10 to 13 cents per member per month effective Nov. 1, 1975, gave a high priority to increasing local union affiliation with state and local bodies, and backed the concept of a voluntary uniform union label to provide easy recognition of union-made goods and services.

The convention reaffirmed labor's dedication to the "compelling task" of organizing the unorganized and the necessity of dealing with the problems of operating under the National Labor Relations Act as currently constituted. It called for changes in the NLRA to prevent the frustration of the legitimate rights of workers by hardcore anti-union firms such as J. P. Stevens. And it pledged full support of Stevens workers in their fight for a first contract in Roanoke Rapids, N.C.

The convention singled out for attention the use of the Landrum-Griffin Act to harass unions and called for congressional overhaul of the law to prevent unnecessary intrusion into democratic union elections and internal union affairs.

In terms of a recently fought issue, the convention called on Congress to take away the President's power to reduce or delay comparability salary increases for federal workers.

It renewed the AFL-CIO determination to wipe out all forms of discrimination, praised the extension of the voting rights act and warned that seniority is a basic right that should be waived or set aside only on a voluntary basis and with the consent of the workers involved.

The delegates reaffirmed also the nation's obligation to its veterans and opposed proposals to dismantle the GI Bill. It renewed its call for a militarily strong America and, while opposing waste, warned of attempts to cut military spending without reference to the adequacy of the forces needed to meet the real threats to peace.

Labor's special interest in vocational and community college education was underscored in a series of resolutions as was its determination to stand by the AFL-CIO's position on busing to help improve educational opportunity for children as one of a number of methods of achieving that objective.

In a series of resolutions on international affairs the convention assailed the false policy of detente which serves as an inspiration for continued aggression and terrorism. The resolutions singled out troubled spots such as Portugal, the Middle East, India, Chile, Indochina and South Africa and Ireland.

Continued American aid to Israel is critical if the truce between Israel and Egypt is to be meaningful, the convention noted. It urged free elections among all the Irish to resolve the conflict in that country, with British withdrawal before the elections are held.

885 Delegates Set Convention Policies

San Francisco—The decisions of the AFL-CIO's 11th convention were made by 885 delegates representing 105 national and international unions, seven departments, 43 state central bodies, 196 city bodies and 11 directly affiliated local unions.

A large number of alternates attended the sessions along with 173 foreign trade union representatives and visitors from foreign countries. Three fraternal delegates addressed the convention.

The proceedings were covered by 410 representatives of the general and labor press, radio and television, including nine TV crews who filmed and taped the sessions. Reporters filed over 35,000 words as well as phoning or recording stories for radio broadcasts.

ACTION PROPOSALS to the AFL-CIO convention are reviewed by Resolutions Committee Chairman I. W. Abel, left, and Secretary John H. Lyons.

Massive COPE Effort Spurred for '76 Election

San Francisco—Every time labor does well in an election, it puts on more pressure to hold those gains in the next election, the AFL-CIO convention declared in calling for an all-out political effort for 1976.

The convention urged creation of a COPE committee in every local, a minimum goal of at least $2 from every member and immediate enactment of the mail registration law in order to have the maximum number of voters registered for the 1976 election.

"The successes in 1974 elections created problems," the convention said in a resolution on political activities. "Chief among them is the need to retain the many congressional districts that switched from conservative to progressive in the last election."

It was reported to the convention that labor-endorsed candidates had the highest winning percentage ever in the 1974 elections, with 321 victories out of 455 endorsements. That's a 70 percent overall mark, surpassing labor's previous high of 67.8 percent in 1964.

But it was also noted that the conditions of 1974 were extraordinary—"widespread citizen disgust over Watergate, deep anxiety over jobs, inflation and the health of the economy."

Without all those factors future elections will be tougher, the convention warned, and it urged further refinement in labor's political efforts, including cooperation with the voter registration efforts of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, the A. Philip Randolph Institute and the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement.

A separate resolution on those allied groups had high praise for their efforts and credited them with a major role in the 1974 election successes.

"The result of their activity was evident the day after the 1974 elections when labor's endorsed candidates enjoyed a high percentage of victories at the polls," the resolution said. "Truly, civil rights can best be fulfilled through the ballot box and the union card."

Similarly, the resolution on mail registration pointed out that in the last presidential election in 1972, fully 37 percent of eligible Americans did not vote.

Voter participation would be greatly increased by a system where those qualified to vote could register by filling out a simple form and mailing it in, the convention said.

It termed U.S. voter turnouts "shocking" compared with other western democracies and pointed out that those who did not vote in previous elections are numerous enough to provide the margin of victory in any election.

UN Measures Asked to Solve Irish Conflict

San Francisco—Final resolution of the conflict in Northern Ireland should come through free elections among all the Irish, not just the six northern counties, the AFL-CIO convention said.

Before those elections are held, the British ought to get out, delegates said, and afterward the United Nations ought to conduct a constitutional convention to provide for laws assuring the civil and religious liberty of all the people of the nation.

That's presuming the Irish would vote for an independent republic again, as they did in 1918, it was noted.

The convention resolution noted seven years of tragic warfare in the north of Ireland and continued infringement of civil liberties while British troops are present.

"The presence of British troops in Northern Ireland has not only failed to secure the peace but has widened the areas of bloodshed," the resolution said in calling for their replacement by a UN peacekeeping force.

Delegates Vote 3¢ Hike In AFL-CIO Per Capita

San Francisco—An increase in the per capita tax paid by unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO from 10 to 13 cents per member per month was adopted unanimously by the 11th convention.

The convention acted on the recommendation of the Executive Council and a report by the Committee on Constitution. The committee pointed out the council's projection that the federation will run a deficit of the last six months of 1975 and that the deficit will increase in succeeding years because of higher operating costs and repayment of funds used for construction.

The new per capita will become effective Nov. 1, 1975.

The council's recommendation was based on a detailed review of the federation's finances by a committee of Vice Presidents I. W. Abel, Al H. Chesser, John L. Lyons and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland.

The convention also adopted unanimously a committee recommendation to correct an inequity in vested pension protection for the federation's executive officers. The two officers, alone among those in an elected or staff position are without such protection, the committee said in suggesting a change in the language in the first sentence of Article V Section 9 to read:

"The president and secretary-treasurer of the federation or either of them may retire after having served five years as an executive officer of the federation, and either having rached age 65 or having served a total of 20 years."

Job Protection, Funds Urged for Handicapped

San Francisco — Full protection of the physically handicapped in both getting a job and holding it was urged by the AFL-CIO convention.

The convention called on all affiliates to include protection for handicapped workers in their collective bargaining contracts and to continue the fight to get full funding and effectiveness from existing legislation to protect the handicapped.

Federal Weight Law Sought on Big Trucks

San Francisco—A federal law on weight limits for trucks on U.S. highways was called for by the AFL-CIO convention to stop damage to the nation's highways, remove a serious safety hazard and stop the loss of jobs from illegal overloading.

Independent trucking contractors have been overloading oil and gasoline trucks, the resolution said, and the various legal weight limits in the 50 states make it virtually impossible for state police to stop the illegal practice.

Labor's Role In Bicentennial Spelled Out

San Francisco—A program to make the bicentennial year a "memorable one for American workers and their families" was outlined by the AFL-CIO convention.

The convention urged all affiliates and state and local central bodies to participate in bicentennial projects around the country to help tell labor's story during the celebrations.

At the convention, AFL-CIO President George Meany was presented with a replica of the Liberty Bell, cast in the same London foundry as the original and scaled to one-fifth the original size. AFL-CIO Vice President Glenn E. Watts, head of the Communications Workers, made the presentation to Meany, who said the replica will be displayed in the lobby of the AFL-CIO building.

The bicentennial resolution noted that labor's participation began on Labor Day 1975 with a "Salute to Labor" show by performing arts unions in Washington, D.C., and will close in Philadelphia on Labor Day 1976 with a live exhibit of workers' skills.

The live, working displays will also be part of labor's celebration across the country, including a 12-week long show in Washington, D.C., next summer.

Other activities cited by the convention include:

- Promotion of a labor history exhibit depicting the history of American working people by making copies of it available for regional festivals.
- Sponsorship of the American Issues Forum as part of national discussion on a variety of topics.
- Participation in the Bicentennial Youth Debates program built around the same topics as the issues forum.

REPLICA OF THE LIBERTY BELL in Philadelphia is presented to President George Meany in recognition of labor's bicentennial year activities. Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts, an AFL-CIO vice president, made the presentation at the federation's convention in San Francisco. Commissioned by CWA, the bell was cast at London's White Chapel Foundry where the original Liberty Bell was made in 1753.

Changes Pressed to End Labor Law Weaknesses

San Francisco—Organized labor must devote all of its resources to achieving changes in the National Labor Relations Act that protect and advance the right of workers to form and join unions and bargain collectively, the AFL-CIO declared.

In a convention resolution the federation charged that today both the NLRA and its administration frustrate the legitimate rights of workers.

"Some employers, exemplified particularly by companies like J. P. Stevens and Florida Steel, still engage in massive violations of our labor laws as a matter of company policy and as a way of life," the resolution declared.

"These hard-core employers flout the national labor policy by firing, intimidating, coercing and discriminating against their employes who seek to exercise their rights guaranteed by federal law."

The AFL-CIO charged that excessive delays between the time a complaint is filed and a decision is issued by the National Labor Relations Board constitute one major stumbling block for workers.

"Delay is the basic weapon of the employers who oppose organization by any and every means," the resolution noted. "These employers know that representation delayed is representation denied."

Another major obstacle is that the NLRB's remedies for employer unfair labor practices are "totally inadequate," the resolution charged.

After more than 40 years of purported protection under the NLRA, "there is not presently any effective and timely remedy to counter an employer who discriminatorily discharges an employe to discourage membership in a union, or who engages in an unlawful refusal to bargain," the convention observed.

Noting that legislation is being considered to overcome the problems of delay and broaden remedies, the resolution urged all affiliated unions of the AFL-CIO to provide it with documented information of maladministration of the federal labor law. In turn, it noted, the AFL-CIO would file its report with the House Labor subcommittee headed by Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N.J.) which has announced oversight and legislative hearings.

NLRB Chairman Cites Delays as Key Problem

San Francisco—Speedy resolution of disputes between labor and management continues to be the number one problem of the National Labor Relations Board, its chairman told the 11th convention of the AFL-CIO here.

But Betty Southard Murphy, head of the NLRB since last February, told delegates the board is trying to do something about this "distressful" problem. She said the problem is being attacked from several different directions:

- A high-level committee within the agency is seeking ways to reduce case-handling time without sacrificing due process or quality.

"Due to budget constraints, new jurisdictions and an increase in caseload, the processing time all along the pipeline has increased," she reported.

- A "crash" program to recruit qualified administrative law judges is under way.
- The board is looking at its own rules and regulations to update and streamline them "to keep abreast of the times."

Mrs. Murphy said she will appoint a task force composed of lawyers from labor, management, academia and the public who are experienced in the complexities of collective bargaining and the need for the swift resolution of disputes.

Despite the board's tremendous problems, she said its overall record still is outstanding for a federal agency. Over 80 percent of the unfair labor charges filed in the field are resolved within two months, she noted, and in 1974 the various appeals courts affirmed NLRB decisions in 86 percent of the cases.

Only 1.4 percent of all cases filed with the NLRB ever get to the courts, Mrs. Murphy said.

Noting the board was marking its 40th anniversary, she observed that it has handled more than 840,000 cases of all types during its history.

But, she noted, the legislative base for its operations — the National Labor Relations Act — "will only work if it gets results" and if disputes are resolved reasonably quickly.

Workmen's Circle Saluted on 75th Year

San Francisco — The AFL-CIO convention saluted the Workmen's Circle's 75th anniversary and voted continued support of the mutual aid society.

The resolution cited Workmen's Circle's record since 1900 in standing "consistently with the American labor movement in its social, economic and political efforts."

$20 Billion Potential:

Loopholes Assailed In Tax Justice Plank

San Francisco—A comprehensive program of tax justice would help finance needed government programs and restore fairness to a system that is now rigged against wage earners, the AFL-CIO said.

A convention resolution outlined a loophole-closing program that could raise up to $20 billion a year. It would have an important byproduct, the convention said, by serving to "rebuild public confidence in government and the economy."

The AFL-CIO firmly rejected "the spurious notions being fostered by the Administration . . . that a severe capital shortage is developing and that tax measures should be enacted to reduce personal consumption and increase the funds available for business investment in plants and machines."

Such a "trickle-down" economic theory would "further hamstring the federal government's ability to meet the nation's essential public investment needs," the federation said.

While the AFL-CIO has shown its willingness to support tax incentives for a specific industry based on "a documented demonstration of need," the resolution stressed that there should be no "across-the-board" business investment tax breaks.

The tax justice resolution reiterated the labor movement's program to take the "special privileges" out of the tax system and "help restore the balance needed to permit the nation to recover from the present economic crisis in a suitable fashion."

Its principal features include:

- Taxing profits from sales of stocks or property at the same rate as earned income, instead of the half-rate for capital gains.
- Ending the tax subsidies for the overseas operations of U.S.-based multinational corporations. Specifics include elimination of the tax credit allowed for payments to foreign countries, an end to the deferral privilege which allows multinationals to postpone indefinitely payment of taxes on earnings of foreign subsidiaries, and elimination of the Domestic International Sales Corp. (DISC), which the resolution termed a revenue-losing "gimmick."
- Winding down "as soon as the present emergency situation is over" the investment tax credit for business which currently cuts revenue more than $8 billion a year. The convention also asked repeal of the depreciation speed-up enacted in 1971, which costs about $1.5 billion a year in lost taxes.
- Reforming the federal estate and gift-tax system.
- Dropping all special tax privileges, such as depriciation allowance and intangible drilling costs, for oil, gas and mineral industries.
- Ending the corporate surtax exemption that taxes the first $50,000 of business profits at a low rate.
- Taxing interest income from state and local bonds in full. By providing a federal subsidy on interest rates, there would be no loss to cities and states. But the extra federal tax revenue would be greater than the cost of the subsidies.
- Eliminating the maximum tax provision that provides a special benefit to the highest-paid executives.
- Ending the assortment of tax shelters that give wealthy individuals a tax-deductible paper loss to conceal real profits.

Central Body Affiliations Get High Priority

San Francisco — The AFL-CIO convention put a high priority on increasing local union affiliation with the federation's state and local central bodies.

Increasingly, the resolution noted, translating AFL-CIO policy into action depends on the effectiveness of the federation's central bodies. And affiliation with central bodies "remains at far too low a level" despite improvement in recent years.

An AFL-CIO Executive Council subcommittee is giving major attention to this perennial problem, and the convention called on national and international unions to cooperate with that effort.

The resolution noted approvingly that the new structure of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services has enabled regional directors and their staffs to work more closely with state and local central bodies.

A report by the convention's Committee on State & Local Central Bodies, adopted by the delegates, expressed appreciation to the central bodies for both carrying out national policies and "especially noteworthy" accomplishments in the important area of state legislation.

The committee also recommended reactivation of the Advisory Committee on State & Local Central Bodies by the Dept. of Organization & Field Services.

Dangers to Labor Press Cited as Postal Rates Soar

San Francisco—A projected new round of postage increases for non-profit publications threatens the survival of the labor press, the AFL-CIO warned.

The trade union movement needs the labor press to present its views "in undiluted form," the convention affirmed.

It endorsed the concept of a federal public service subsidy as provided in a bill cleared by the House Post Office Committee. But it said the legislation should specify a share of that subsidy to be used to hold down mailing costs for publications of non-profit organizations.

Some trade union publications have already had to curtail operations because of past postage hikes and other cost increases.

Unless Congress acts to relieve the burden on non-profit publications, the convention said, many more will go under.

Convention Spells Out Plan:

New Full Employment Policy Pressed to Revive Economy

San Francisco—A call for a new national full employment policy highlighted an AFL-CIO convention resolution spelling out a wide-ranging set of proposals to get the economy out of "the most dangerous mess in 40 years" and to head off the threat of another recession.

The recession of 1973-75—"the deepest and most prolonged since the 1930s"—has resulted in the highest unemployment in the post-World War II period, the federation noted. The national economy remains weak and vulnerable to adverse effects of events at home and abroad, it added.

A renewed economic decline could occur because of the tight-money, high-interest rate policies of the Federal Reserve Board, continuing inflation caused by rising fuel and food prices, and termination of the emergency cuts in individual income taxes at the end of 1975, the AFL-CIO warned.

"We need legislation which provides that the President and Congress spell out specific programs to create jobs for every American willing and able to work," the federation declared in one of its proposals for economic recovery.

"At long last we must recognize that in our modern society a worker is entitled to a job as a matter of right and the total society, including government, must assume this responsibility and must guarantee its fulfillment."

In other major proposals, the AFL-CIO urged:

- Extension of the individual income tax cuts through 1976 to prevent a sudden tax increase which would have a depressing effect on the economy.
- Expansion of public-service jobs to help solve the problem of joblessness and meet public needs for improved and enlarged services.
- Revision of the entire structure of the Federal Reserve System.
- Congressional pressure on the Fed to lower interest rates on both long-term and short-term loans and to provide an expanded supply of money and credit to encourage balanced economic growth.
- Appropriation of federal funds for a program of restoring railroad track and roadbeds, using American-made materials.
- Federal aid to cities and states that are hard pressed by high unemployment.
- Elimination of loopholes in the federal tax structure which could raise as much as $20 million a year.
- A national policy to reduce dependence on imported oil and to establish U.S. energy independence.
- A federal program to assure continuation of health insurance for the unemployed who lose their coverage when they lose their jobs.
- Long overdue improvements in the nation's outmoded unemployment insurance system.
- Elimination of tax and other incentives to stop the export of American jobs and undermining of the nation's industrial base.

The resolution also called for a full-scale congressional study of the structure of the American economy. Specifically, the AFL-CIO urged Congress to examine closely such economic developments as business mergers, interlocking relationships among the giant corporations and banks, their domination of key parts of the national economy, their effect on prices and America's position in the world economy, and their impact on American communities and democratic institutions.

The current economic situation is the result of two back-to-back recessions, accompanied by inflationary pressures, that resulted largely from the economic policies of former President Richard Nixon and Chairman Arthur Burns of the Federal Reserve Board, the federation charged.

"These policies remained essentially the same after President Gerald Ford took office," it noted in the resolution.

The resulting outlook is for an "anemic" recovery, with continued high unemployment, large amounts of idle plant capacity, a sluggish pace of productivity improvements and continuing deficits in the federal budget unless the measures advocated by the AFL-CIO are adopted, the resolution said.

The Administration's focus on the budget deficit, rather than on the need to create jobs and stimulate the economy, was sharply criticized by the federation. In a discussion of the resolution, President George Meany accused the Administration of putting dollars ahead of the needs of people.

If budget limitation is to be the policy of the Administration and Congress, Meany warned, "then we are going to have a continuation of these vetoes of job-creating legislation . . . However, I am very hopeful that there is going to be a change in the situation over this Congress, and I think that they are going to turn around to the point where they are going to put people ahead of money."

Noting remarks attributed to President Ford that he would not go for an extension of the income tax cut unless Congress made compensating reductions in the federal budget, Meany said his response to Ford would be: 'Thanks for nothing,' because in the final analysis that means nothing.

"Unless he is willing to temporarily accept a higher budget deficit," Meany declared, "we are not going to solve this unemployment problem."

Full Union Rights Sought for Guards

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO urged Congress to amend the National Labor Relations Act to permit plant guards and watchmen to join unions affiliated with the federation. They have been prohibited from doing so since enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947, a convention resolution noted.

The restriction has hampered the organization of guards, weakened the strength of their unions and kept their wages down, the AFL-CIO charged.

The resolution expressed full support for legislation to correct the injustice sponsored by Sen. Walter Mondale (D-Minn.) and Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N.J.).

Uniform Label Concept Backed by Convention

San Francisco—The 11th AFL-CIO convention here pledged to "work actively toward the achievement of a voluntary uniform union label."

Purpose of the single insignia would be to provide "easy recognition and remembering of the stamp of AFL-CIO approval on goods and services."

A uniform union label has been an objective of many AFL-CIO unions for years. Impetus for adoption of the label has come with the increased flow of imports from low-wage countries which has wiped out American jobs.

"The reversal of this imports flood is vital now to the lives of American workers whose jobs vanish under the burden of imports," the resolution noted.

In a related action, the convention approved a resolution urging AFL-CIO unions to write into their contracts provisions under which employers would supply union-label footwear to those union members whose jobs require them to wear safety or work-type shoes.

The convention also renewed its recommendation that all AFL-CIO affiliated unions encourage their locals to make every possible effort to have goods manufactured and services rendered by their members identified by the union label.

Resolutions also were approved urging all affiliates to participate in the Union-Industries Shows in 1976 and 1977, and officially designating the periods of Sept. 6-12, 1976, and Sept. 5-11, 1977, as Union Label Weeks.

ELEVENTH BIENNIAL CONVENTION of the AFL-CIO held at the San Francisco Civic Auditorium drew 885 delegates, representing national and international unions, federation departments, state and local central bodies, and directly affiliated locals.

Convention Hails Meany As Strong Labor Voice

San Francisco—"George Meany has been the most consistant and the most forceful voice demanding policies and programs that will make America a better place for all its citizens," the 11th AFL-CIO convention declared in a resolution expressing labor's profound appreciation and support for his leadership.

Meany's name "has become a symbol in every part of the world," the resolution said, "for the basic philosophy and constructive power of America's free trade union movement."

The statement noted that the past two years has been a period that exacted heavy burdens on trade union members and working people generally. "Day by day week by week, the voice of George Meany has been heard in the land, demanding governmental policies that would end unemployment and curb inflation," the resolution stressed.

California Leaders Cite Labor Progress in State

San Francisco—"You've come to a labor town in a labor state and under the leadership of the AFL-CIO you've come in a labor year."

With these words, California Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr., welcomed the 900 delegates to the 11th biennial convention of the AFL-CIO. The Civic Auditorium rang with applause as Brown, in office only nine months, ticked off a list of labor bills he has signed into law this year.

Just three days before the convention opened, the governor signed a bill that, starting in January, makes it a crime to import strikebreakers into the state to put down a walkout.

"We also got a bill to stop anti-labor injunctions for the first time in the history of California, to allow peaceful picketing," he noted.

Other labor legislation under Brown's administration includes the state's new farm labor relations law, a collective-bargaining statute for teachers, extension of unemployment insurance and tax reform. But more needs to be done, the governor told the convention.

"We need the economic and political muscle of this great labor organization to face up to the challenges of this country," he said. And he stressed, the first task is to get more jobs for the unemployed.

California has a jobless rate of 10.3 percent of its workforce while the nation's rate has been over 8 percent for nine months in a row.

Also welcoming delegates were San Francisco Mayor Joseph Alioto, Rep. Philip Burton (D-Calif.), Sec.-Treas. John F. Crowley of the San Francisco Labor Council and Executive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning of the California State AFL-CIO.

"I welcome you to a city that pays its street sweepers $16,000 a year and is damned proud of it." Alioto said. He described San Francisco as a city that "operates on the simple proposition that the prosperity of working men and working women is absolutely indispensable to the prosperity of the full community."

Burton, who represents the San Francisco area in Congress, said that if his colleagues on Capitol Hill paid more attention to the economic policies of the AFL-CIO, "we wouldn't have this incredible deficit that's now confronting the American people."

Burton, who is chairman of the Democratic congressional caucus, stressed the need for the Democratic Party and its 1976 candidates to keep lines of communication open and to consult with the labor movement.

Restoration of Citizen Rights Asked for Debs

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO alled on Congress to restore full itizenship rights to trade union eader and American Socialist Eugene V. Debs to honor his memory nd the forward-looking principles for which he stood.

Debs, a railway labor leader in the late 19th Century, was convicted of violating a wartime espionage statute during World War I and sentenced to 10 years at hard labor. The resolution adopted by the convention pointed out that at the time there was no suspicion "that he acted for any motive except his belief in our American democracy."

President Harding commuted Debs's sentence after he served almost three years of the term, but did not restore his former rights as a citizen.

The resolution said that Debs employed his "great talents as an organizer and an orator to fight for the eradication of poverty in America, for an end to discrimination, for the eight-hour day and the 40-hour week, for workman's compensation, for social security and for other programs that have since become an essential part of our governmental structure."

Debs has come to symbolize the American tradition "of speaking out for one's beliefs and working to improve our economic and social system so that it will provide equality and justice under law," the resolution said, and therefore urged Congress to honor Debs memory by taking appropriate legislative action to restore full citizenship rights.

Speakers Blister Ford:

4 Senators Link Recovery To Presidential Shift in '76

San Francisco—Only the removal of Gerald Ford from the White House can get America back on the track of economic progress and high employment, four Democratic senators told the AFL-CIO convention.

The four, three of them candidates for the presidency, combined in a blistering attack on the Administration as the father of the faltering economy and the planner of high unemployment.

Two of the senators, Henry M. Jackson of Washington and Lloyd Bentsen of Texas, are announced candidates while Birch Bayh of Indiana is on an "exploratory candidacy."

And the spirited address of the fourth, 1968 Democratic nominee Hubert H. Humphrey, who is on record as "available" to a deadlocked 1976 convention, prompted AFL-CIO President Meany's laughing comment that "it's really too bad that Hubert's not running."

Jackson set the tone for the other three later in the same day when he said officials of the present Administration "don't give a damn about working people. They certainly don't give a damn about the labor movement—they never have."

Jackson said "the twin evils of unemployment and inflation are tearing apart the very fabric of our economic system" and said "we have a do-nothing White House" of government by veto.

He called for a strong program of economic recovery that would provide job creating efforts in housing, developing energy resources, rebuilding the U.S. merchant marine and railroad roadbeds, and making U.S. neighborhoods "safe, clean places to live."

Bentsen said two of the most beguiling lies around today are that America can't have economic growth because it's inflationary or it hurts the environment. "Funny isn't it that people who argue against economic growth are always people who have enough for themselves?" Bensten asked.

Bentsen contrasted GOP attitudes with those of Franklin Roosevelt, who he said "was not wedded to any dogma, but was looking for one thing—programs that worked." He quoted FDR in saying that "men who lack basic necessities are not free men."

He said Ford's veto of the public service employment bill amounted to shortchanging the U.S. Treasury as well as killing 900,000 new jobs. In addition to reinstating that bill, he proposed a program including:

- Extension of the individual income tax cut.
- Investment tax credits, including an employment tax credit to pay employers for creating new jobs.
- Creation of an Educational Savings Plan, through which families could get a tax write-off for investing for their children's education, with the money also available for home mortgages.

Bentsen combined slogans from Samuel Gompers and Lyndon Johnson and said "more—a step up" was what Americans needed.

Bayh attacked the Ford Administration for its negativism and said "we need a President who stops telling us what we can't do, starts telling us what we can do and then provides the leadership." He referred to Vietnam, Watergate, the Nixon pardon and planned recession as sharing a common chord which has produced a spirit of resignation in America.

"Today's loss of confidence does not come from a failure of our political institutions or the weakness of our people—that loss of faith is a direct result of the failure of political leadership," Bayh said.

Mismanagement of the nation in the energy crisis, Bayh said, is typcial of a Ford Administration that must be judged "guilty of being content to merely preside over a nation of nearly 215 million people instead of leading."

Noting that "realistically the days of cheap energy may be gone," Bayh said that was no excuse to accept a policy designed to push energy prices even higher. He proposed a package of energy actions that would counteract the damage done by the Ford Administration.

Humphrey said that under Ford Administration policies, everything that should go up is going down and vice versa. "The problem is President Ford, when he was at Michigan playing football, was a center. And when you play center, you lean over the ball and see the whole world upside down," Humhprey said.

He also tore into Republicans as big defenders of law and order, "yet when they had a grain scandal right under their nose, they couldn't see it." And "they don't see corporate payoffs and the oil company ripoffs," Humphrey said.

To those who say the "old programs don't work anymore" Humphrey countered that "if it weren't for the programs of Roosevelt and Truman, of Kennedy and Johnson, this country would be flat on its back today in a massive depression."

He asserted that not a single Republican voted for social security 40 years ago when the act was passed. "If it wasn't for some of the old stuff like social security, unemployment compensation, aid to dependent children, and yes, even food stamps, some of those stuffed shirts would be out of business today," Humphrey said.

Noting that people call him a "big spender," Humphrey said he is an "investor" who knows better than to let one-third of U.S. industrial capacity lie idle and 8 million Americans remain jobless. He said that's the equivalent of throwing $1.5 trillion in potential tax money down the toilet.

He said there are no longer three branches of government, but four, with the Federal Reserve Board constituting the fourth.

As chairman of the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, Humphrey vowed an attempt to remake the board so consumers, labor and small businessmen would be represented instead of having the seven-member board dominated by five bankers.

Broad Programs Pushed To Protect Consumers

San Francisco—A resolution calling for prompt enactment of a bill in Congress to establish an Agency for Consumer Advocacy was approved by delegates to the AFL-CIO convention here.

In addition, Congress was urged to take other steps to protect consumers, including passage of a true no-fault auto insurance measure, repeal of state "fair trade" laws and enactment of a broad range of legislation in the area of consumer credit.

"The sharp erosion in purchasing power and living standards due to recession, unemployment and inflation points directly to the need for substantive action to protect consumers," the AFL-CIO resolution noted.

Because "buyers are largely at the mercy of virtually unregulated insurance companies," the federation urged Congress to remove state prohibitions that inhibit the marketing of group casualty insurance, and it called for a full-scale congressional investigation of the structure of the insurance industry.

The resolution also called for legislation to improve federal powers and procedures to inspect food processing plants and for the establishment of a comprehensive fish inspection program.

The AFL-CIO also declared its support at all levels of government of legislation to require price marking on consumer commodities sold at retail.

"Plans being made to discontinue price marking on individual products, as part of a program for installing computerized checkout stands, threaten serious problems for workers and consumers," the federation observed.

In another resolution approved by the convention, the AFL-CIO called for legislation requiring full disclosure of all types of materials used in the construction of a home, along with a complete itemization of building and construction costs.

The resolution also called for enforcement of building standard codes to the fullest extent "to further insure the consumer of the full value of his investment."

Anti-Union Bias Seen Under Landrum-Griffin

San Francisco—The Landrum-Griffin Act has been used to harass unions, not to protect the legitimate rights of union members, the AFL-CIO charged.

A convention resolution called on Congress "to overhaul the Landrum-Griffin Act in such a way as to prevent unnecessary intrusion into democratic union elections and internal union affairs."

And it demanded a change in the "hostile administration" of the law by the Dept. of Labor.

The members of Congress who wrote such costly and cumbersome requirements for union elections "would never dream" of applying such procedures to their own elections, the resolution noted.

It cited costly mail notification requirements that eat up dues income while other means of informing members of elections would be fully adequate.

But even where the language of the law appears "fair and reasonable," the resolution noted, rigid interpretations by the Labor Dept. have resulted in elections being set aside on "Mickey Mouse grounds, which have no real bearing on whether the election was democratic or not."

National Theater Network Urged

San Francisco — Establishment of a national theater, consisting of a network of theaters across the United States, was called for at the AFL-CIO's 11th convention here.

Besides alleviating the high rate of joblessness in the theatrical unions, creation of a national theater would benefit millions of American working people who have never been to the theater, the federation noted in a resolution.

The U.S. is the only advanced industrial country in the world without a national theater. A recent study noted that the federal government annually contributes 7.5 cents per person to the arts, compared with $2 per person in Austria, $1.40 in Canada, $2.42 in West Germany, $2 in Sweden, $1.34 in Israel and $1.33 in Great Britain.

Unemployment among members of Actors' Equity presently stands at approximately 80 percent—"no less than a national disgrace," the AFL-CIO resolution noted.

Non-Union Printing Hit In Federal Subcontracts

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO condemned the practice of the Government Printing Office in penalizing union printing shops by subcontracting millions of dollars worth of work to non-union plants in violation of the purpose and intent of the Walsh-Healey Act.

The Walsh-Healey Act, like the Davis-Bacon Act and other protective labor laws, was enacted to establish minimum standards for employe wages and hours, as well as certain other working conditions, of private contractors who bid on federal jobs.

In recent years, however, the GPO has been free to ignore the prevailing wage requirements of Walsh-Healey because of a court injunction prohibiting the Secretary of Labor from determining the prevailing rate by relying solely upon union negotiated wages.

The injunction invited the Secretary of Labor to propose other procedures for determining the prevailing rate, but no new formula has been proposed in the 12 years since the order was issued, the AFL-CIO noted.

Meanwhile, the GPO continues to award its contracts exclusively on the basis of the lowest bid, a practice which in effect subsidizes cheap, non-union shops with tax dollars from union members.

Last year the GPO contracted out and purchased over $301 million in typesetting, platemaking, press work and binding. Frequently the work went to non-union plants whose employes are paid far less than the industry's prevailing rates, the resolution noted.

In addition, the resolution provided that the AFL-CIO determine whether remedial legislation is needed or whether the Secretary of Labor should be urged to determine the prevailing rate "by a formula which gives due regard to the wages negotiated by unions in the graphic arts industry."

Federal Aid Sought For Troubled Cities

San Francisco — A broad range of proposals to ease the severe budget pressures on America's cities and states emerged from the AFL-CIO convention.

The solution does not lie in cutting back vital services, laying off needed public workers and canceling scheduled projects, the AFL-CIO stressed.

While states often can do more to share tax revenues with local governments, the resolutions adopted by the convention saw an urgent, immediate need for increased federal assistance. But the Administration is obsessed by the budget deficit and "Congress has shirked its responsibilities," delegates said.

It endorsed the concept of "countercyclical assistance" in which additional federal funds are pumped into state and local programs during periods of high unemployment. The resolution said any labor market with at least 6 percent unemployment should continue to receive such funds, regardless of the national jobless rate.

The convention asked for "substantial increases" in federal grants to states and localities "for specific programs in the nation's interest, such as education, manpower training, health services and facilities, metropolitan transportation, air and water pollution control, urban renewal, public service jobs and energy conservation and development."

Congress was asked to extend the general revenue-sharing program, but to improve it by measures which:

- Assure that funds are targeted to areas with the greatest need for facilities and services, especially the urban centers.
- Encourage states to raise revenue through fairer and more progressive income taxes.
- Provide enforceable federal standards to assure that funds are used for programs that reflect national priorities and comply with federal civil rights and labor standards requirements.

If Congress finds in a review of the program that abuses can't be corrected, the AFL-CIO would then ask that the general revenue-sharing program be abolished and that Congress "redirect an equal amount of funds into appropriate categorical grant-in-aid programs."

Adoption of other measures the AFL-CIO has long advocated, such as full federal payment of welfare and a national health security program would also "relieve the states and localities of a huge financial burden" while meeting urgent public service needs.

One method of increasing state revenue while reforming the tax structure, the convention suggested, would be to allow a federal tax credit for state income tax payments. A tax credit is a subtraction from the amount of federal tax owed—a substantially bigger advantage than the present allowance of a deduction from taxable income.

A pair of resolutions focusing on New York City's grave financial crisis urged the federal government to provide emergency aid to New York and other hard-pressed central cities, and also defended the right of New York's workers to refuse to be the scapegoats and abandon hard-won union gains. Sacrifices must be made by all, and not just public workers, the resolution said.

WARM EMBRACE and the Murray-Green Award for outstanding public service tell Anne Beirne of the AFL-CIO's high regard for her late husband. As president of the Communications Workers and a vice president of the AFL-CIO, Joseph A. Beirne helped make community service an integral part of the labor movement. AFL-CIO Vice President Peter Bommarito, chairman of the federation's Community Service Committee, and AFL-CIO President George Meany present the award.

Murray-Green Award Pays Tribute to Beirne

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO's Murray-Green Award this year honored a trade union leader who helped make community services an integral part of the labor movement and had a big part in expanding the horizons of free trade unionism throughout the world.

When Joseph A. Beirne died on Labor Day of 1974, he was only 63 but he had been president of the Communications Workers and its predecessor union for 31 years.

At the AFL-CIO merger, he was named chairman of the federation's Community Services Committee—a post he had also held in the CIO. He was the first person from the trade union movement to head the United Way.

AFL-CIO President George Meany noted that the Murray-Green Award has honored outstanding Americans for their public service.

With this year's award, Meany told the delegates, labor is honoring "one of our own."

AFL-CIO Vice President Peter Bommarito, chairman of the Community Services Committee, made the formal presentation to Anne Beirne, who was present to accept the honor to her late husband.

Mrs. Beirne, accompanied by her three daughters, spoke movingly of "Joe, as I knew him best," of his love for people and his dedication to "do the most for the people who needed help."

The $5,000 check that goes with the Murray-Green Award, she announced, "will be given to the Joseph Anthony Beirne Memorial Foundation, founded by the CWA for the advancement of education . . . and to develop programs in the fields of humanities, social interest and labor problems."

Bommarito spoke of Beirne's belief in the labor movement as the most effective private institution dedicated "to the best interests of all the American people."

He reminded the delegates of Beirne's close involvement with the workers of Latin America, as secretary-treasurer of the American Institute for Free Labor Development. Beirne's worldwide concept of trade union solidarity was reflected in his service as president of the Postal, Telegraph & Telephone International, and his later assignment as chairman of the AFL-CIO's International Affairs Committee.

Bommarito noted that such people as President Truman, Eleanor Roosevelt, Dr. Jonas Salk and, from the labor movement, A. Philip Randolph, have been Murray-Green award winners in past years.

Beirne, he said, fully belongs in such company. "It is our way of saying thanks to Joe."

Site Picketing Bill Receives Solid Support

San Francisco—The labor movement stood united behind its construction unions in support of a job site picketing bill that has passed the House and may have to overcome a filibuster to win Senate approval.

Robert Georgine, president of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., told the convention that the 85-year effort to give construction workers the same picketing rights that industrial unions can exercise had succeeded in the House "through the help of all of the organizations represented in this hall."

The anti-union groups that are trying to drum up opposition to the legislation may seek to enlist senators in a filibuster to prevent a vote, Georgine warned.

AFL-CIO President George Meany called on the federation's affiliates to work actively for passage of the bill, which would allow a union with a dispute with one contractor or subcontractor at a multiemployer construction site to picket the job site.

"We must demonstrate," Meany said, "that this federation is completely united in its effort to assure equal treatment for craft and industrial workers under the law."

The resolution noted that the injustice of the picketing restriction had been recognized by the last five presidents of the United States and urged no further delays.

In another resolution, the convention endorsed the Construction Industry Collective Bargaining legislation now before Congress.

It noted that it represents "a careful and conscientious attempt by individuals who know the construction industry" to develop new procedures that further the institution of free collective bargaining.

Delegates Warn Against Tampering With Seniority Rights of Workers

San Francisco—Seniority is a basic right of workers that should not be tampered with by compulsion, the AFL-CIO convention declared.

Workers must not be forced to accept alternatives to seniority unless the decision is a voluntary one, arrived at through free collective bargaining," the convention said in a resolution on civil rights.

The resolution also praised extension of the voting rights act and outlined both labor's successes with affirmative action programs and its problems in getting cooperation from the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Delegates reaffirmed a "total, emphatic commitment to the support of seniority systems that grant each member of the workforce his or her rightful place." Seniority was called a cornerstone of organized labor and a contractual right, in which workers "must not be compelled by government to surrender a portion of the work to junior employes."

Labor's commitment to seniority includes "unflagging opposition to any effort to dilute the rights of any employe by granting others preferential treatment," the resolution said.

Labor's success with outreach programs has come through three primary vehicles, the convention noted. They are the RTP, founded by the A. Philip Randolph Institute and the Workers Defense League, the LEAP program of the National Urban League and the programs run by the AFL-CIO Human Resource Development Institute.

These programs passed a distinctive milestone in 1974 when women began to be recruited for the skilled construction trades, the resolution noted.

But it warned that "the success of these programs depends largely on the amount of construction work going on in the community," and noted that the recent unemployment rates in excess of 20 percent amounted to "a depression in construction that has adversely affected these work-related programs."

Declaring that "America's twin problems of unemployment and discrimination are not resolved by pitting worker against worker for the right to be unemployed," the convention pledged full support for continuing outreach programs.

"Despite the present gloom, we must think in terms of a healthy economy that will create additional employment opportunities for young people desiring to become skilled in the building trades," the convention declared.

"It is essential, then, that we reaffirm our commitment to provide opportunities for young people to enter the trades, regardless of race or sex."

The resolution both noted past successes and called for continued vigilance in removing discrimination from the workplace.

Labor played a vital role in winning expansion and extension of the 1965 Voting Rights Act for another seven years, with new coverage of the Spanish-speaking, Asian Americans, American Indians and Alaskan natives, the convention noted.

Noting labor's previous contribution in getting the act passed in 1965 and extended in 1970, the resolution called the current extension through August 1982 "another victory for the longstanding alliance between labor and the civil rights movement."

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission is missing an opportunity to ease its caseload through voluntary compliance, the convention noted in another resolution.

By supplying unions and the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dept. with the information needed to develop a speedy procedure for investigation and voluntary compliance, the EEOC could avoid litigation in many cases, the resolution suggested.

But the EEOC continues to "bombard the unions with litigation," a state of affairs which the convention said amounted to "a lack of sensitivity toward unions on the part of the EEOC."

Safeguards Proposed for Davis-Bacon

San Francisco—The Davis-Bacon Act should be strengthened, not weakened, the AFL-CIO declared.

The law, which requires payment of prevailing wages on federally-financed construction, assures that low bids by contractors won't be based on substandard wages and benefits.

A convention resolution endorsed legislation barring the President from suspending Davis-Bacon protections or the comparable safeguards in the Walsh-Healey Act dealing with government purchases.

It also asked that the negotiated rate of wages in an area be the prevailing wage base.

A separate resolution asked that the prevailing wage rates and benefits in effect at the time work is performed be the Davis-Bacon rate.

Such a system, the AFL-CIO noted, would assure that workers on a long-term government construction project wouldn't be tied to an outdated pay scale.

Senior Citizens Cited As Progressive Force

San Francisco—The talent and energy of retired workers is an important force for social progress and programs that benefit Americans of all ages, the convention said.

It praised the work of the National Council of Senior Citizens, and urged AFL-CIO unions and central bodies to sponsor retired member clubs affiliated with the NCSC.

Labor and the Nation

WE ARE NOW LIVING in a perilous time in our nation's history, and while we have a new President who is without doubt a decent and honorable man, we are still in trouble.

Given our present circumstances, it is not enough to have a new President—we need a new philosophy. We need new policies—we need new directions for America.

It is not enough to have a nice guy in the White House. It is not enough to get a new leading man—if the play is no good. You have got to write a new script—and you have got to get a whole new cast of characters.

The sad fact is that, when it comes to economic and foreign policies, President Ford is still playing by the old Nixon script. And, by and large, he has retained the same cast of characters who first set American policies on the wrong track—domestically and internationally—six and a half years ago.

THERE WAS A TIME, not so long ago, when the United States of America did stand for something—not imperialism, as the Communists said. Not monopoly capitalism. Not fascism. We stood for the defense of freedom. We stood for the promotion and extension of human rights. We stood for the protection of democracy through collective security.

Not only did we stand for the containment of communism—but we stood—at least in spirit—with those behind the Iron Curtain who yearned for the day when the yoke of tyranny would be lifted from their backs.

Today—under the Nixon, Ford, Kissinger policy—we have detente. I think the fruits of detente have been so bitter that a growing number of Americans are beginning to wonder whether we have been on the right track. More and more of our citizens are raising questions about the efficacy of a foreign policy based on unilateral concessions to the Soviet Union.

AS THIS RECESSION continues to take its toll in terms of human misery—what is the attitude of the Ford Administration? They tell us that recovery is on the way—everything is going to be A-Okay. Well, maybe recovery is on the way for the corporations and the banks—but it is certainly not on the way for the millions of unemployed.

There is something cockeyed about this whole picture. They are telling the workers of this nation that they must tolerate high unemployment for the next five years in order to fight inflation and at the same time they are proposing actions that will undoubtedly raise prices even higher than they are today.

Up to the present, there is no indication that Mr. Ford will take any action designed to put America back to work—real work—real production that could mean real recovery.

EVERYTHING in this world that affects life, liberty and happiness is the business of the American trade union movement. And, as America faces great difficulties at home and abroad—the AFL-CIO will continue to be heard speaking for the ordinary, everyday American on all matters that directly or indirectly affect the character and quality of American life.

Special Convention Resolution On Support of Farm Workers

The following is excerpted from a resolution adopted as a special order of business on the opening day of the AFL-CIO Convention, Oct. 2, 1975, at San Francisco:

TEN YEARS AGO last month the now historic grape workers strike began in Delano, Calif. That strike opened a new chapter in the years-long struggle to bring economic justice and a measure of democracy, through collective bargaining, to agricultural workers.

It has been a drama-filled decade of struggle—of strikes and nationwide boycotts, of contracts won and unprecedented gains made. Substantial benefits were obtained in the first contracts between the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Union and California growers. For the first time, farm workers were able to enjoy decent wages, medical benefits, pensions, controls on the use of pesticides, seniority, grievance machinery and hiring halls to eliminate the hated labor contractor system.

As those first contracts were nearing termination, collusion between the Teamsters Union and the growers destroyed established collective bargaining relationships. A flagrant violation of trade union principles, that raid, accompanied by wide-spread violence against farm worker union representatives and members and AFL-CIO staff members, accomplished what the growers, alone, had been unable to do—stop the forward move of farm workers into the mainstream of organized labor; into clean, democratic, militant trade unionism.

With passage earlier this year of the California Agricultural Labor Relations Act, a vehicle for orderly demonstration of workers' bargaining desires was made available. Over 150 collective bargaining elections have already been conducted by the Agricultural Labor Relations Board.

In the short period of time the act has been operative, there has already developed a pattern of grower-Teamster efforts to frustrate the clear and stated purpose of the act. Coercive tactics by growers and Teamsters have disrupted or impaired election procedures, created chaotic conditions surrounding voting, and seriously tainted the election process.

Despite a California State Supreme Court ruling upholding the right of organizers to talk to workers in the field during certain specified times, the sheriff of ranch-rich Tulare County continues to arrest UFW and AFL-CIO organizers for attempting to exercise that right. In this manner the ability of workers to have access to the facts that would enable them to cast an informed vote is impaired.

The United Farm Workers reports that few complaints have been issued by the ALRB despite many unfair labor practice charges filed with the board. The union also reports that bargaining is being delayed by failure of the board to move promptly on frivolous objections filed by growers in obvious moves to obtain further delays.

During this current period, a number of AFL-CIO unions have provided assistance to the UFW; central bodies of California have readily provided specific help requested by the union. AFL-CIO field staff members have been working with UFW representatives in the fields and taking part in all phases of the organizing and voting procedures.

This AFL-CIO convention hereby goes on record in full and complete support of the United Farm Workers in the current phase of their campaign. We appreciate the resolution of thanks to the AFL-CIO Executive Council, adopted by the United Farm Workers convention, which noted our clearcut and continuing identification of the farm workers' struggle as a priority goal for the entire labor movement. We express appreciation to AFL-CIO national and international affiliates and central bodies for their support and we call upon all AFL-CIO affiliates to provide whatever assistance is necessary to enable the Farm Workers Union to regain its rightful place as the bargaining representative of agricultural workers in the United States. We call particularly upon all national and international affiliates with locals and membership in California to urge them to lend all possible assistance to UFW at this time.

Finally, we call upon all appropriate public officials to meet their legal and moral obligation to assure that the intent of the legislation that formalizes collective bargaining for farm workers in California is honored in fact and in practice.

We remain convinced that in truly free elections, farm workers will clearly demonstrate their preference for a union of their own choosing, a union free of employer domination, a union that is honest, democratic and uncorruptible—the United Farm Workers Union, AFL-CIO.

Less Than Two Dozen Left:

Moynihan Sees Growing Peril As Democracies Dwindle at UN

San Francisco—Less than two dozen of the United Nations' 141 member states can still be called democracies, and the number is dwindling at an alarming rate, UN Ambassador Daniel Patrick Moynihan told the AFL-CIO convention.

Moynihan said that preserving an open process in a world body like the UN makes it much easier for totalitarian states to subvert the process, until "all the talk of freedom gets frighteningly close to the Orwellian inversion, war is peace, slavery is liberty, injustice is justice."

He cited the call by Uganda President Amin for destruction of the state of Israel as proof that "despotism will seek whatever opportunities come to hand to destroy that which threatens them most, which is democracy." Moynihan referred to Amin as a "racist murderer, as one of our leading newspapers called him this morning."

Similarly, Moynihan admonished those who say that the U.S. brought on its own troubles with the third world. "We are not assailed because of what is wrong with us but because of what is right about us. We are assailed because we are a democracy," Moynihan said.

And the solution to the threats to freedom around the world, Moynihan said, "is to get for ourselves the agenda which the American labor movement has got at home and abroad, and not least to see the connection between those two things."

In fact, Moynihan said free trade unions have proven more durable than free governments around the world. And just as it is the union structure that comes under attack first in a totalitarian takeover, so have free trade unions been a vital force in preserving democracy.

Moynihan picked the date of 25 years ago in pointing out how free governments have fallen. Then, he said, the change to democracy in such old nations as Japan and the emergence of democracy in the newest nations of Africa and Asia produced a bright picture.

That has changed, he noted, and a recent analysis of UN member nations shows that the median time since the last overthrow of a government is only 11 years. He noted that America has gone 199 years, Belgium 144, France 127 and the like, yet the median comes out 11.

"There is blood in the water and the sharks grow frenzied," Moynihan said in recounting the latest attack on Israel in the UN in which he said Amin's attempt to translate Zionism into racism fits the mold of the Orwellian inversion. He said Amin's attack came only days after more stable heads "broke the gathering force of the movement to suspend Israel from the General Assembly."

Moynihan said he would not agree with AFL-CIO President George Meany on all the world events to be regarded as defeats, but would see "some indeed as victories, some as standoffs and some as opening rather than concluding events." But he said he agreed on more of the list than he disagreed with and noted particularly that Meany was right to include India among the free governments falling recently. Moynihan was U.S. ambassador to India before his UN appointment.

In confronting threats to democracy, Moynihan said the United States should not react out of either guilt or fear. "We are prosperous because we are, or were, an energetic and productive people who have lived under a system which has encouraged the development of our productive capacities and energies," he said. "We also consider that we have been reasonably helpful and generous in our dealings with other countries."

And the reason not to react out of fear, is that "we do not believe that the countries of the third and fourth world have the power to damage, let alone destroy the United States," he noted.

"OPEC to the contrary, 'poor power' is a romantic illusion," Moynihan said. He also said schemes to increase the flow of wealth "must insist that it be channeled into the pockets of individuals and not into Swiss bank accounts, and we will insist the necessary precautions be taken in that respect."

The United States, he continued, must also insist on one other point: "We will insist on broadening the definition of welfare to include not only the economic condition of the individual, but his political condition as well.

"There is no country so poor that it cannot afford free speech."

Moynihan said he also saw it as a sign of strength that the U.S. did not immediately retaliate for the Arab oil boycott. "When America and its allies speak about respecting the territorial integrity and independence of other countries we mean it," Moynihan said.

Tracing the retreat on how much employment is "acceptable" in the United States from Kennedy's Administration to the present, Moynihan said the biggest problem was a crisis in confidence. "No one wants to do anything about it because no one is confident that what would be done would make things any better."

The situation is similar in foreign affairs, he said, where those who erroneously "believe that our assailants are motivated by what is wrong with us" contribute to "the trouble we have in trusting ourselves" on a proper foreign policy response.

The AFL-CIO and Meany have no such problem, Moynihan said, and the stability and endurance of trade unions around the world are models governments would do well to emulate.

JAMES R. SCHLESINGER

Schlesinger Praises Stand on U.S. Defense

San Francisco—The United States is "inescapably" the leader of the free world, Defense Sec. James R. Schlesinger said in a sober warning of the dangers of military weakness.

"In a world that is dominated by two superpowers," he told the convention delegates, "if the United States were to drop that torch, there is no one else to pick it up."

Schlesinger had warm words of thanks for the resolution adopted by the AFL-CIO convention a day earlier opposing attempts to cut military spending without regard to the adequacy of the nation's defense.

"Organized labor well knows from its experiences with bargaining power in collective bargaining relationships how important the balance of power is," he observed. "Weakness does not serve as a prelude to success."

Schlesinger expressed grave concern that Congress may be about to inflict deep and dangerous cuts in the President's defense budget request—in the mistaken belief that this is what the public wants.

But by big majorities, Schlesinger contended, the American public rejects "the novel doctrine that a position of weakness for the United States will somehow substitute for all that was found wrong in a position of strength."

He told the convention that there has been a steady erosion of U.S. military power in recent years, with cuts continuing despite the "lip service" given to the need for a strong defense.

While the Soviet Union has, "in the spirit of detente, as in the spirit of Camp David, the spirit of Glassboro, the spirit of Geneva," continued to expand its military power each year, the United States is spending about 20 percent less in real dollars and has about 700,000 fewer men in uniform than it did prior to Vietnam.

Not since the Great Depression, Schlesinger said, has so small a portion of public spending gone to defense.

Schlesinger expressed hope that the AFL-CIO's resolution on defense will have an impact on members of Congress who have enjoyed labor's political support.

And he expressed confidence that the labor movement "will continue to state unequivocally that the security of the free world should not depend upon the good will, the generosity, the forebearance of the Soviet Union. Rather should it depend upon the maintenance of an equilibrium of power that continues to deter aggression."

Dunlop Reaffirms Need For Free Bargaining

San Francisco—A firm commitment to free collective bargaining without controls or forms of compulsory arbitration was pledged to the AFL-CIO convention by Sec. of Labor John T. Dunlop.

Dunlop told the delegates "we need a renewed dedication to collective bargaining" because there are many people, some in high places, who "do not admire the process" and would seek to restrict it, impose controls or "impose a form of compulsory arbitration."

Dunlop said that anyone who would advocate such a position was playing with fire, because "unless free men and women have the opportunity to say something about the conditions under which they labor, they will not work well, they will be in revolt and the processes of restraint imposed from the outside will not operate."

Dunlop, a Harvard economics professor and a specialist in industrial relations, became secretary in March 1975. He told the convention that he would seek an era of "real, two-way communications" as long as he is secretary.

To that end, he said he brought experts from various Dept. of Labor offices to be available to convention delegates "to learn a good deal more than we now know of your specific and practical concerns which it is our duty to try to serve." Labor Dept. technicians were available for the duration of the convention on such topics as OSHA, pension, Landrum-Griffin, trade adjustments, equal employment opportunity and other issues, Dunlop said.

Dunlop said his department would also recognize that labor-management relations include such diverse industries as maritime, public service, steel and construction and "is always interested in trying to bring labor and management people together to work on their special problems."

He told the delegates that it was no accident that free trade unions were the first to be attacked when democracy is under challenge around the world. Consequently American labor has a responsibility to serve as "the conscience of the continuation of this democratic process," Dunlop said.

In the mutual defense of collective bargaining, Dunlop said its value has never been expressed any better than in 1955 in a Fortune magazine article by AFL-CIO President George Meany which said that philosophically, collective bargaining was a means of assuring justice and fair treatment.

"In the economic realm, it is a means of prodding management to increase efficiency and output, and of placing trade unions under great responsibility to limit their demands to practical realities," the article said.

Dunlop said that is still "one of the best and most suitable" definitions of what collective bargaining is and why it should be defended.

Delegates Honor Slain IAM Striker

San Francisco—Delegates to the AFL-CIO convention honored the memory of Jesse Miller, a 58-year-old Machinist, who died last month in labor's cause.

Miller was killed Sept. 17 when a tractor-trailer driven by a strike breaker careened through the plant gate at Fisher Scientific Co. in Indiana, Pa., hitting and crushing him to death.

The driver has since been charged with criminal homicide.

A resolution saluting Miller's memory and expressing sympathy to his widow and son was adopted at the convention.

A maintenance machinist, Miller was a 10-year member of IAM Local 1582 whose 260 members have been on strike against Fisher since Aug. 6. Fisher manufactures laboratory equipment.

The resolution noted Miller wasn't even on picket duty the morning he was killed. He had stopped at the main gate of the plant to talk to three pickets who were on duty.

U.S. Military Strength Termed Vital to Peace

San Francisco—America must remain militarily strong, the AFL-CIO declared in a convention resolution. It warned that a shift in the military balance of power to the Soviet Union would endanger the cause of world peace and weaken democratic values throughout the world.

It opposed attempts to cut military spending by fixed dollar or percentage amounts "without reference to the adequacy of our military forces to meet the real threats to peace."

Labor opposes "waste" in any government operation, but the convention urged that charges of waste be carefully examined by Congress lest vital programs be weakened "by false claims of waste."

It said the United States and its allies must have the military means "not only to deter aggressive Soviet adventures, but to sustain the credibility of American leadership in the pursuit of world peace."

Unity of Free World Unions Urged by Fraternal Delegates

San Francisco—Fraternal delegates from Canada and Great Britain to the AFL-CIO's 11th convention stressed the need for unity on the part of the world's free labor organizations, noting their problems are much the same.

"A divided labor movement, whether it be regionally, nationally or internationally, has always worked in favor of labor's enemies," observed Shirley G. E. Carr, executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress.

International unions in Canada have come under criticism lately, Mrs. Carr noted. But the critics of international unions forget that there are sound historical reasons behind their growth, she said.

International corporations demand an international union structure—just as multinational corporations now demand a multinational union structure, she declared. "The one necessarily calls for the other."

Noting that the trade-union movements of Canada and the United States pioneered international unionism, Mrs. Carr said "the challenge for the future is for us now to go forward and to pioneer in the field of multinational trade unionism together."

"It is not the time for either of us to retreat into a narrow and parochial nationalism which, in the end, will spell the doom of our past efforts at cooperation," she added.

Daniel McGarvey and Martin Redmond, the two representatives from the British Trades Union Congress, noted the threat of the growing number of multinational corporations requires even greater cooperation of all the world's free trade unions.

McGarvey noted the TUC's General Council has tried to make a contribution to international understanding through bilateral contacts with labor movements in other countries.

"We have been ready to talk to workers' representatives from any country and have established contact with trade-union centers in many countries with different outlooks," he said. He noted the council has tried to alleviate the suffering of trade unionists who have been oppressed in Chile, Spain, Ethiopia and in other nations where basic trade-union freedoms are denied.

Redmond noted that Britons, like their American brothers, have learned from bitter experience the role and power of the giant multinational firms that dominate almost every facet of economic, political and social life.

Mrs. Carr, outlining the common problems which face Canada and the U.S., stressed unemployment, inflation, lack of housing and the influence of multinational firms on their respective economies.

"The solutions to these shared problems must not be of the kind that will destroy another feature which we also share in common—international unionism," she said, adding that economic interdependence of the two countries is just as great today as it was decades ago.

Because of this close interdependence, she urged the trade union movements—not only of the U.S. and Canada but also those throughout the free world—to mobilize their collective strength to protect the jobs of their members.

U.S. Manpower Policy Keyed to Job Creation

San Francisco—Full employment is the basic prerequisite for an effective and comprehensive national manpower policy, the AFL-CIO affirmed in a convention resolution.

Job creation is an essential part of that policy, the resolution observed, calling for large-scale housing and public works programs, aid to the cities and railroad trackbed repair.

If the private sector of the economy is unable to provide enough jobs for the expanding labor force, the federal government should step in with a massive public-service employment program, the resolution noted.

"At least one million public service jobs are needed for Americans who cannot find jobs," the resolution observed.

Workers hired under the public-service employment program should be accorded the same general employment conditions as regular state and local government employes, the convention declared.

"The AFL-CIO insists on adequate wages and working standards in all manpower programs in both the private and public sectors," the resolution said, "Wages under these programs should be at least at the level of the federal minimum wage or the prevailing rate of pay for the occupation, whichever is higher."

The resolution also said that national manpower policy must assure continued support for labor union-sponsored programs such as the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute, Apprenticeship Outreach and on-the-job training.

Continuing labor representation and labor participation in manpower planning at the state and local levels also was stressed.

Action Urged to Ban Airline Strike Pact

San Francisco—Prompt passage of legislation to ban the airline industry's anti-union Mutual Aid Pact and restore equity to members of airline labor organizations was called for at the AFL-CIO's 11th convention here.

MAP is an agreement among the nation's major airlines under which they move enormous cash payments to a struck airline from the first day of a union walkout.

The airline unions argue that the agreement destroys management incentive to negotiate and has served to prolong strikes.

"MAP is adverse to the public interest," the AFL-CIO declared, in a resolution. "The airline industry is the first that has implemented such a plan on a national level and if the airline industry succeeds others will follow."

To Fulfill Promise:

Convention Pushes Safety Act Reforms

San Francisco—Administrative delays and lack of funds must no longer be allowed to jeopardize workers' lives and health on the job, the convention declared.

The AFL-CIO called for fulfillment of the Occupational Safety & Health Act's goal of a safe and healthy workplace for every American worker with a 12-point program of needed reforms.

In a separate resolution, delegates urged congressional enactment of a toxic substance control act to stop employers from using workers as guinea pigs in testing new substances.

A complete federal takeover of the promulgation of standards was called for in the OSHA resolution, along with more inspectors with more authority, transfer of the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health (NIOSH) out of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, and an appeal procedure on inspections that gives workers the same rights as employers.

The resolution commended Sec. of Labor John T. Dunlop for undertaking an OSHA review and expressed hope "this review will result in constructive policy and program changes fully responsive to the goals of the act."

In departmental convention appearances earlier, Dunlop had said his first contribution to OSHA enforcement was to replace all of the top officers in that division of the Labor Dept.

Labor's long-standing complaints about enforcement of OSHA were reiterated in the call for a compliance force of 2,500 federal inspectors and industrial hygienists as an interim goal by the end of the fiscal year 1977.

In addition to transferring NIOSH to the Dept. of Labor, the convention said the research arm "must have adequate funds to recruit qualified personnel, extend its scientific research, construct a modern laboratory" and step up its programs.

The Executive Council's report to the convention conveyed the shortcomings of NIOSH by noting that nearly 100,000 chemicals have some kind of health effect, yet NIOSH has listed only 13,000, recommended standards on only 46 and promulgated standards on only three.

Getting the states out of the promulgation of standards and turning it all over to the federal government is particularly urgent, the AFL-CIO said because it was the sorry record of the states that made the federal OSHA law necessary in the first place.

The report noted that industry's sway over federal standards was bad enough, citing the attempt to use OSHA to line up business support for Nixon's reelection, and its control over state actions was even more complete.

AFL-CIO also called for:

- Coverage under OSHA of all workers, including those employed by state, county and municipal governments.
- Authority for compliance officers to issue on-the-spot citations stopping employers from illegal acts.
- No loss of pay for workers' representatives accompanying the inspectors on their tour.
- Enactment of a single mine safety law which empowers one agency to cover all miners.
- A stimulation of educational programs on job safety for both business and labor.
- Steps to bring railroad workers' safety enforcement under the Dept. of Labor.
- Enactment of the Toxic Substances Control Act with the amendments proposed by labor.
- Continued oversight of the enforcement of OSHA by both the House and Senate labor committees "with particularly close scrutiny to be given the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission."

The resolution on toxic substances added calls for closer coordination between OSHA and the Environmental Protection Agency, an expanded NIOSH research program and continued labor participation in decisions made under the proposed new toxic substances act.

Overhaul of Maritime Laws Sought To Upgrade U.S. Merchant Fleet

San Francisco—U.S. maritime policies amount to sending a bunch of rust buckets to compete with modern merchant fleets, the AFL-CIO convention said in a series of resolutions calling for a wholesale overhaul of maritime laws.

The convention also condemned "predatory and competition-destroying" intrusions by the Communist states, especially Russia and Poland. Allowing such ships into U.S. ports makes no sense, the convention said, since their rates are "unknown and irrelevant in the western, private enterprise sense."

Consequently, the convention called on Congress and the Federal Maritime Commission to act to combat the rate-cutting of "these modern-day commerce raiders."

Instead of tax laws that encourage U.S.-owned multinationals to use foreign flag vessels, it was urged that federal action be taken for cargo preference or bilateral cargo reservation arrangements with our trading nations.

This is particularly necessary in the case of oil, the convention pointed out, because of the precarious U.S. position of depending on foreign energy sources.

And end was also urged to the World War II emergency measure which encouraged "effective control" of foreign flag vessels. Still on the books 30 years later, that measure is now being used to allow U.S. oil companies and other multinationals to dodge U.S. taxes and union wages by using foreign flag ships.

U.S. maritime unions make no apology for the higher standard of living their members enjoy, the convention said, and the industry welcomes competition—but under a system that enables it to compete fairly, with treatment from its government similar to that enjoyed by other nations.

The convention also called for a government subsidy, if necessary, to revive U.S. shipbuilding, in which the U.S. now ranks 11th.

And it was urged that the Navy Dept. be blocked from spending U.S. tax money to have shipbuilding and repair done in foreign ports.

The AFL-CIO called for:

- Development of a national cargo policy that will assure the U.S. fleet "a substantial share" of U.S. cargoes.
- Repeal of all tax laws that allow U.S. firms to benefit from using foreign flag vessels.
- Consolidation of maritime affairs under one federal agency.
- Parity between U.S. and foreign flag fleets.
- Placing the Virgin Islands under the requirements of the Jones Act, which reserves intra-U.S. trade to U.S. vessels.
- Stopping the U.S. military from "its wasteful and non-military vessel construction program."

Unilateral Concessions Opposed:

Illusion of Detente Assailed As Undermining Freedom

San Francisco—The United States is pursuing a false policy of detente that is inspiring totalitarian powers to continue aggression and terrorism, the AFL-CIO convention declared.

The convention said it put "more trust in the balance and stability of the American people than in the poor leadership this country has endured" in recent years. "We reject the notion that a supine America will appease a Brezhnev or an Arafat," the convention declared.

In reiterating the trade union movement's commitment to freedom around the world, a series of resolutions singled out such troubled spots as Portugal, the Middle East, India, Chile, Indochina and South Africa.

But the call to stop this undermining of freedom falls on deaf ears because of the illusion of detente, it was noted.

"The AFL-CIO convention expresses its opposition to continuing unilateral concessions to the Soviet Union in the name of detente," a resolution said. "We stand prepared to support any policies that will lead to genuine detente, sharing with the rest of mankind the fear of nuclear war, but the cause of peace cannot be realized by strengthening the Soviet Union at the expense of the West."

In the name of detente, the convention said, the United States has made a growing list of mistakes in foreign policy:

- Confused the American public's attitude on the need for a strong defense posture.
- Created uncertainty among our allies as to our commitment to their defense.
- Sown illusions about the intentions and character of totalitarian regimes.
- Helped save the Soviet leaders from the consequences of the USSR's reactionary economic system through the transfer of American technology, the sale of grain and the provision of low-interest loans to the Soviet Union through the Export-Import Bank.

In short, the convention noted, the present policy is anything but the relaxing of tensions and the two-way street of true detente.

Among the results of this policy is that the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is threatened with becoming a "paper bureaucracy or Maginot Line." To rescue it requires "greater U.S. and other member contributions to its forces and leadership" so that NATO can fulfill its role as a protector that has made possible the economic and social resurrection of its member nations from the devastation of World War II.

In addition to bolstering NATO, the United States has some fence-mending to do in its own defenses, the convention declared in calling for "the United States to provide for the common defense of this nation and its allies—which means not only sufficient to deter aggressive Soviet adventures, but to sustain the credibility of American leadership in the pursuit of world peace."

The convention pointed out that thanks to detente, the Soviet Union is fishing aggressively and fruitfully in political trouble spots around the world—the Middle East, Portugal, India and Indochina.

In Portugal, the convention condemned Soviet intervention and called on both the United States and NATO to aid and encourage the democratic majority.

U.S. assistance to India should be reviewed in the wake of "the grab for autocratic power in the most populous democracy in the world," the convention noted.

As for Indochina, the convention said it "rejects any policy of isolationism emerging from the defeat of U.S. forces." Instead, delegates pledged to the people of Asia "the determination of the workers of the United States to cooperate in every way for the preservation and strengthening of human freedom, economic development and free trade unionism throughout the Asian region."

In other convention resolutions, the federation decried the undermining of the tripartite tradition of the International Labor Organization by admission of the terrorist Palestine Liberation Organization which it said was neither government, business nor labor.

"We call upon our government to reassess United States membership in the ILO and to take action consistent with our national interests and principles," the convention said in the wake of the undermining of the ILO by its acceptance of the double standard inherent in granting observer status to the PLO.

"Under the pressure of its Communist members and the Arab bloc, which employs oil blackmail against the Third World countries, the ILO has been transformed from a technical assistance organization into a political-ideological playground," the convention said.

An out-of-frying-pan-into-the-fire syndrome was observed in Chile—where the leftist dictatorship of Salvatore Allende has been replaced by an equally oppressive fascist regime. The convention saw some hope in developing human rights in South Africa, but restated the AFL-CIO opposition on principle to racist oppression of any minority group.

In sum, the convention said the labor movement of this country "must lead the effort lest our freedoms and those of free labor everywhere perish beneath dictators' boots." And that means commitment from every branch of government and domestic institution in the United States "to seek the leadership and the policies requisite for human progress at home and abroad."

U.S. Aid to Israel Called Critical to Mideast Peace

San Francisco—The truce between Israel and Egypt may be the road to peace, the AFL-CIO said in a convention resolution, but the strength Israel needs to bargain a final peace can't be assured without continued aid from the United States.

Consequently, the convention called on the United States to continue the economic and military aid Israel needs to negotiate "face to face" with her enemies, with both sides realizing "no peace can be guaranteed by outside forces."

The resolution condemned one of those forces, the Soviet Union, as a "straw party" which has kept the Middle East in turmoil to serve its own ends.

A report to the convention cited the riches peace could bring to the Middle East if the material wealth could be married to the technology and moral force evident in Israel's determined fight to survive as the only true democracy in that troubled part of the world.

But instead, the report noted, "a corrosive and debilitating war is being pursued for the obvious objectives of the USSR."

"No free trade union movement anywhere in the world, either in terms of self-interest or morality, should do any less than reassert, not reassess, the commitment to democracy in the Middle East," it stated.

Moves Opposed to Cut Food Stamp Program

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO renewed its support of the food-stamp program and pledged to oppose any attempts by the Administration or Congress to weaken it.

In a resolution adopted at its 11th biennial convention here, the federation branded the campaign of the Ford Administration "and other right-wingers" against alleged food-stamp "chiselers and rip-off artists" as a smokescreen for the real purpose of waging economic warfare against American workers.

"The charges that the program abounds with cheating are answered by U.S. Dept. of Agriculture statistics showing fraud to have been committed by only eight-tenths of 1 percent of participating households," the resolution noted.

If a reduction in the cost of the food-stamp program is the Administration's goal, the AFL-CIO said this could be done by creating jobs and cutting food prices.

"But with its vetos of job-creation bills and other actions, the Ford Administration has opted for high unemployment and high food prices," the federation charged. "It seeks to reduce food-stamp costs by preventing jobless workers from using the program to feed their families."

In discussion on the convention floor, Mary Ellen Riordan of the Teachers noted that in her home city of Detroit, where joblessness is among the highest in the nation, denial of food stamps means hunger, suffering and, for children especially, the lasting effects of malnutrition.

In a related resolution, delegates called upon the Ford Administration and Congress to enlarge the federal stamp program to include U.S.-made clothing at discount prices to help alleviate the hardship of the jobless and the working poor.

"Clothing is also a major necessity of life," the resolution observed.

Funds Asked to Spur Waste Recovery Plants

San Francisco — Maximum resource recovery and energy conservation offer the only meaningful solutions to the nation's solid waste disposal problem, the AFL-CIO declared at its convention here.

It urged Congress to adopt legislation promoting the construction and use of resource recovery and energy conservation systems that preserve and enhance the quality of air, water and land resources.

In addition, the AFL-CIO called for federal financial assistance to state, local and interstate agencies in planning such systems. It also urged Congress to enact legislation promoting a national research and development program.

Fight Pledged Against Care Cut And for National Health Security

San Francisco—"Early enactment of the Health Security bill would largely take care of America's health problems," the AFL-CIO convention declared, "but until Health Security is enacted, the AFL-CIO will oppose all efforts to abolish or curtail necessary existing health programs."

Similarly, it was urged that collective bargaining continue to be used "to expand health and welfare coverages until a comprehensive Health Security program is enacted."

Wherever possible, contracts should give workers an option of prepaid group practices health plans, the convention said.

And the federation vowed to continue the quest for emergency health insurance for the unemployed, to be financed from federal general revenues.

Also, it was noted that further amendments are needed in the Health Maintenance Organizations Act to make the law more workable.

"The hope that the HMO Act of 1973 would provide the needed leverage to reform the fee-for-service health care system is hampered by defects in the law and inadequate funding," the convention charged.

The budget slashing actions of the Ford Administration threaten to cut some vital links in the nation's present health care system, the convention said in urging full funding and adequate administration of health service programs for the poor.

"Additionally, we will actively support legislation to provide long-term care for the elderly as well as for handicapped persons no longer able to work," the delegates declared.

Ancillary federal programs also needed until Health Security can be enacted were listed as:

- Improved medical manpower, to bring about a better geographic and specialty distribution of physicians.
- Higher quality health care services through a more rational organization of medical care services.
- Effective controls on the cost of medical care with the cost distributed more equitably through the entire population.

All of those objectives are the same as the goals of Health Security, which the convention termed the only proposed national health insurance program "which is based on social insurance principles and provides comprehensive care for all Americans."

Health Security played a major role in the 1974 elections, it was noted, with a majority of the members of Congress promising their constituents they would seek early action on it. "We expect they will keep their pledge," the resolution said.

National 'Day' Proposed To Honor Fire Fighters

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO convention went on record as supporting establishment of Oct. 9 as National Fire Fighters Day.

Delegates voted for a resolution citing the dangers fire fighters face in safeguarding lives and property and said a day for them should take place alongside such national "days" as those for mothers, secretaries, fathers and police officers.

No-Fault Plan Endorsed For Malpractice Claims

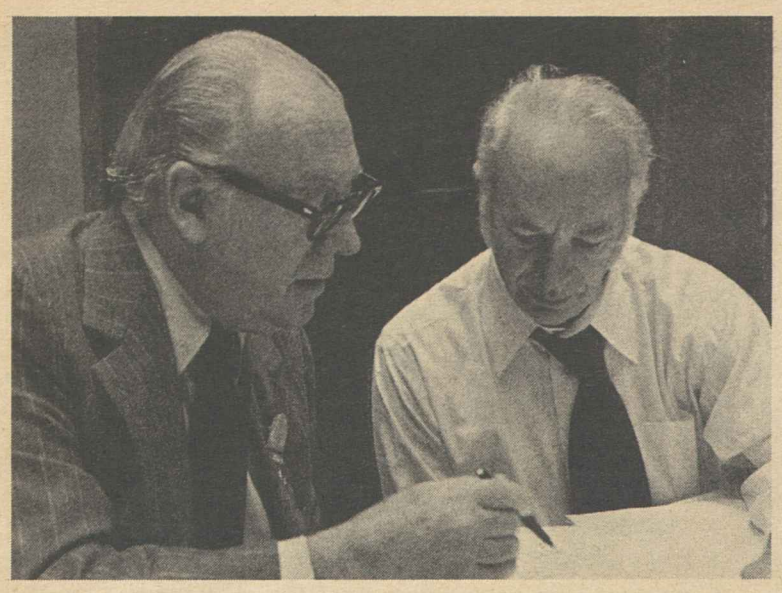
San Francisco—The crisis in medical malpractice insurance costs can be cured by applying arbitration under a no-fault system, the AFL-CIO convention declared.

Delegates voted support of two Senate bills, sponsored by Sen. Daniel K. Inouye (D-Hawaii) and by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.). One provides for a federal-state system of arbitration of malpractice claims—a system previously left to the states—and the other applying the no-fault concept to get a decision without costly litigation.

The convention resolution pointed out that consumers lose both ways under the present system, paying for the increased cost of the malpractice insurance premiums while patients receive only 16 to 17 percent of malpractice awards; "the rest goes for court costs, legal fees and administrative costs associated with selling malpractice insurance."

The resolution also noted that the malpractice insurance crisis could not occur under a comprehensive program of national health insurance. The arbitration and no-fault systems would thus be a stop-gap measure until national health insurance is adopted, it was noted.

Under the expedited arbitration system, patients who did not like the award would still have access to the courts.



BIENNIAL REPORT of the AFL-CIO Executive Council draws the attention of Committee Chairman S. Frank Raftery, left, and Secretary Paul Jennings of the convention committee on the council's report.

Bargaining Gains Laid To Improved Mediation

San Francisco—Continued improvement in mediation methods will help collective bargaining substantially, even if it doesn't show for a long time, the nation's top federal mediator told the convention.

W. J. Usery, Jr., director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, said the agency is trying to move on from the major postal and railroad disputes to "the school boards, supermarkets, small factories and local construction disputes that, by comparison, affect only a small number of employes."

But that develops slowly, Usery said, and in the meantime mediators are still like fire fighters dealing in crisis situations. He said his agency is making every effort "not only to increase the number of mediators and to upgrade our facilities but also to improve the quality of mediation services we offer by developing a cadre of truly professional mediators."

What has improved, Usery said, is the climate of collective bargaining, because with the exception of "a handful of die-hard managements" the benefits of union contracts are now widely recognized.

"Most enlightened industrial leaders of today realize that dealing in good faith with a good union isn't just good law and good morals—it's also good business," he noted.

Usery said he always tells management audiences that there is a rock bottom price that any labor force deserves.

"That includes a good living wage, protected against inflation; the best job security provisions within the power of the enterprise; insurance against illness and accident and an adequate pension when one grows old," he said.

And from the union side, Usery said, is acknowledgment "that a fair day's pay has an obligation to do a fair day's work to earn it."

Usery said he understood the inclination to "stick it to the boss" on the job, but that America could no longer afford such an attitude any more than it could afford to go on dumping raw sewage into rivers.

Usery, a former officer of the Machinists, noted that the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. has recently been quite blunt about this obligation. Usery said it involves some "rules and practices that may have had an understandable basis when started, but are simply irrelevant in this new and changing technological world."

In return for these changes, Usery said, labor should expect a growing recognition from management that "a well-administered union contract, with terms clearly spelled out, and with grievance procedures and arbitration to settle disputes, is the easiest and best way ever devised for labor and management to live together and avoid personnel problems."

Tighter Laws Asked to Curb Illegal Aliens

San Francisco—New laws and better enforcement of old ones are needed to curb the loss of jobs to aliens who are illegally in the country, the AFL-CIO convention declared.

Delegates backed proposals for criminal penalties for employers who knowingly hire illegal immigrants and to stop foreign companies operating in this country from bringing in "temporary" aliens, often under the guise of training programs.

Employers exploit both the alien and the U.S. craftsman who is denied a job, the convention declared.

Tighter enforcement, including enough funding to patrol U.S. borders, was called for from the Immigration & Naturalization Service as well as the Departments of State and Labor.

The resolution called for remedial legislation "to limit the discretion" of federal agencies on such topics as the phony training programs.

The resolution stressed that America is a nation of immigrants, and called for the curbing of illegals to free them of blackmail and exploitation under which they now live.

Other Nations Do More:

'Far-Reaching Reforms' Sought For Social Security Programs

San Francisco—The United States should be a world leader in social insurance protection for its people, the AFL-CIO said in a resolution proposing "far reaching reforms" to bring that about.

While the convention affirmed labor's confidence in the soundness of the social security system, it also noted that some "less affluent" nations do relatively more for their aged, sick and poor.

Major AFL-CIO proposals included:

• A quicker-reacting cost-of-living escalator. It should be adjusted at six-month intervals when the index has risen by 3 percent or more. And a special index should be devised to more accurately measure the price changes in goods and services most used by the elderly.

• An end to all sex differences in benefits paid under the Social Security Act, "thereby improving the benefit protection for married women who work and the treatment of couples where both work."

• Changes to ease the problem of older workers who are forced out of the labor market before the normal retirement age or who have a partial disability.

One of the proposals was that workers who are unemployed for two full years after age 55 should be entitled to social security benefits "as if they had reached the minimum age of eligibility for retirement benefits."

• A temporary total disability provision that would pay benefits after one month, rather than the present six months, and without regard to the anticipated duration. Under present law, the expectation must be that the disability will either last at least one year or result in death. The one-month change, the resolution said, should also "apply equally to working women who must cease work temporarily before and after pregnancy."

• Significant improvements in Medicare protection "pending enactment of National Health Security."

On financing, the convention asked that future improvements in social security benefits be paid for by increases in the ceiling on earnings that are subject to the payroll tax and by a gradually increasing contribution from general revenue.

While workers get "an economic bargain" in terms of benefits received for contributions paid, the tax rate should not go any higher. It should, however, be applied to the total payroll of employers, the resolution urged.

It called for improvements in the supplemental security income (SSI) program and urged that the Social Security Administration be made an independent agency with its trust fund separate from the government's unified budget.

Another resolution welcomed the recent improvements in the Railroad Retirement Act and urged Congress to act on proposals for updating the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act.

In another convention action, the AFL-CIO urged that the Labor Dept. and the Treasury Dept. administer the pension reform law "with flexibility in order not to disrupt legitimate, collectively-bargained pension arrangements . . . to the detriment of participants."

The convention also asked Congress to extend pension protection to workers in the public sector.

Concern that state and county institutions that serve the mentally ill and retarded are being replaced by inferior profit-making facilities was expressed in another resolution. To help curb abuses, it asked that social security, medicare and medicaid laws be amended to allow funding for care and services at public psychiatric and retardation facilities.

Financing Plan Pressed To Spur Home Building

San Francisco—An emergency home financing program carrying a below-market 6 percent interest rate was proposed by the AFL-CIO as a key ingredient of a program to reverse a prolonged decline in housing and community development.

As outlined in the convention resolution, the mortgage financing program would continue "until housing starts reach a seasonally adjusted rate of at least two million units for three consecutive months."

Further, the convention said, Congress should require allocation of credit to housing "when tight money and high interest rate conditions are developing."

The resolution also called for measures to expand housing for low-income families and senior citizens.

Funds for needed housing assistance programs have been authorized, the resolution noted, and the Administration should make use of its authority.

It asked also that Congress appropriate the full amount of funds authorized for the Community Development program.

The resolution expressed strong support for a mortgage loan disclosure law intended to combat "redlining"—a practice followed by some lending institutions to deny credit for home purchases in supposedly undesirable neighborhoods.

This denies many moderate-income families an opportunity to buy homes at prices they can afford, the resolution said.

The convention also called on the AFL-CIO to expand its technical information services and to assist affiliates and central bodies on programs aimed at providing "affordable homes and rental housing in locations near employment."

Union Family Survey Buttresses Labor's Fight for Better Housing

San Francisco—A housing survey that stemmed from a resolution adopted by the AFL-CIO's 10th convention two years ago has helped shape a strategy to better meet America's housing needs.

The survey, developed by the AFL-CIO Housing Committee and the federation's Dept. of Urban Affairs, produced as a byproduct a useful profile of union households.

It found that nearly everyone would prefer home ownership to renting, and that union households—aided by incomes higher than the national average— are more likely to have achieved this goal.

But the survey found a big gulf between union members who had bought their homes some years back and a mostly younger group of members who would like to become homeowners but aren't likely to have the opportunity unless new federal programs are developed and funded.

The renters are already paying a higher percentage of their incomes for less adequate housing than are homeowners. And about 35 percent of homeowner households have already paid off their mortgages, assuring relatively low housing costs in retirement years.

But, the survey analysis notes, large numbers of younger union members will be less likely than an earlier generation to purchase homes, "given the current high level of mortgage interest rates, a short supply of moderate-priced homes and unavoidable high energy costs." Further, as they approach the retirement period of reduced income, they will be forced to earmark a still bigger percentage of their assets for housing.

The survey pinpointed other problems, such as the impact of higher gasoline prices on families that have to drive long distances to work.

To a large extent, the recommendations of the survey analysis were incorporated into the housing resolution adopted by the AFL-CIO convention.

The report, completed in time for the 1975 convention, called for expanded federal programs to help both low- and middle-income families become homeowners. It urged also federally-assisted rental housing, citing "a particularly urgent need for assisted rental housing for the elderly." And it pressed for more mass transit facilities as well as community development that would enable more people to live closer to where they work.

The survey found that the median income of the AFL-CIO households in 1974 was $14,552, compared with $11,101 for all U.S. households.

"This difference reflects the benefits of union organization and bargaining," the report noted.

The survey itself was carried out under professional sampling techniques, based on a random selection from 48 cooperating unions with more than 10 million members.

The mail survey was returned by more than 7,600 of 21,581 persons selected in the sample—an unusually high percentage.

Strike Right Backed For Public Workers

any group of workers.

Wurf and other members of the AFSCME delegation countered that the political realities dictated that Congress would never pass a collective bargaining law that would legalize police and fire fighter strikes.

Therefore, he contended, to insist that public safety officers have the right to strike "is in effect saying we don't want a federal collective bargaining law."

But delegates from the Postal Workers, the Teachers, the Service Employees as well as private-sector unions, warned against opening the door to compulsory arbitration.

Fire Fighters President William McClennan said his union certainly didn't want its hands tied by a resolution that mayors could use to justify drastic efforts to break a strike.

"We must always have the right to strike," Service Employees President George Hardy said. Looking around the convention hall at the delegations from the various unions, he asked: "Will all of you accept compulsory arbitration? Will you, you, you?"

John F. Henning of the California AFL-CIO told the convention that a multi-million dollar lawsuit was pending against the Fire Fighters in San Mateo County because of a labor-supported strike. He said a no-strike resolution, despite the "fine philosophic distinctions" of its sponsor, would be viewed as "a stab in the back."

Postal Workers President Francis S. Filbey said his members have lost out at the bargaining table because they do not have the right to strike.

AFSCME Vice President Gilbert Strickert retorted that if postal workers can't get Congress to give them the right to strike, how can a right-to-strike bill covering police and fire fighters be passed?

AFL-CIO President George Meany voiced his view at the close of the debate, telling the delegates: "I hope I never see the day that the AFL-CIO, sitting in convention, will ask Congress to impose compulsory arbitration on anybody anywhere at any time."

Another convention resolution noted—and protested—the growing attempt by local and state governments to make their employes the scapegoats for budget problems. Some public officials have sought to discredit public workers as a prelude to cutbacks of service and unilateral contract violations, the resolution charged.

It rejected the concept that public employes should subsidize government, condemned public officials seeking to shift responsibility to workers, and strongly affirmed "the right of public employes to enforce their bilateral agreements without interference or intimidation."

In a separate action, the convention protested layoffs of public employes, stressing that it is both "counterproductive" to the national effort to combat unemployment and forcing retrenchment of services when the need for public services is rising.

The convention pledged the AFL-CIO to continue to fight such layoffs, to continue efforts to wipe out hiring and promotion bias in public employment, and "to press for an infusion of money that will protect both the current level of public service and the jobs of recently-hired women and minorities."

By a decisive vote, the convention upheld the action of its Resolutions Committee in deleting from the resolution two paragraphs dealing with layoff procedures that it felt could be interpreted as undermining basic trade union seniority principles. Sec.-Treas. William Lucy of AFSCME had sought to restore the paragraphs.

A convention resolution asked that the Intergovernmental Personnel Act, which helps train public sector managers in fields that include contract negotiation and administration, be given additional financing so that grants can be made to public sector unions for labor relations training courses parallel to those given on the management side.

Worker, Community Needs Cited In Call for Full Education Funds

San Francisco—Organized labor drew attention to its special interest in vocational and community college education in a series of AFL-CIO convention resolutions reiterating a call for the full funding needed for quality education.

The convention pledged "to press for adequate federal, state and local funds to insure a healthy system in American education." And it called attention to the threats posed by a raid on funds for vocational education and the constant increase in college tuition.

The convention reaffirmed the AFL-CIO position that busing is one of a number of approaches to the goal of quality, integrated education, and rejected a resolution calling for re-evaluation of that position. It referred to the Executive Council part of another resolution dealing with bilingual education.

Other resolutions called for state and local labor bodies to work in their legislatures for the creation of labor colleges in their state universities, where feasible, and to stay in touch with state and local school boards to continue to fight for fair treatment of organized labor in textbooks.

On vocational education, the convention expressed concern that some of the advocates of "career education" are attempting to turn the program into a cheap training school for unscrupulous employers. And it pledged to oppose any attempt to "consolidate" education funds into block grants.

The community college concept offers not only more education for more workers' families, it was noted, but also gives the trade unionists a chance to introduce labor topics into the curriculum and serve as instructors.

On busing, the convention reiterated the AFL-CIO position that "we wholeheartedly support busing of children when it will improve the educational opportunities of the children; we deplore the actions of those individuals or groups who are creating a divisive political issue out of America's vital need for quality, integrated education; and we will oppose the constitutional amendment approach because it will do a disservice to the quality integrated education which we support."

That position, adopted by the Executive Council in 1972 and reiterated by the 1973 convention, also noted that "the AFL-CIO has consistently supported both quality education and integrated education. We have just as staunchly supported mass investment of federal funds to improve substandard schools. We have fought for legislation to achieve open housing as the most effective way to achieve integrated education."

AFL-CIO President George Meany read the 1973 text to the convention after floor debate on a resolution from the Kentucky AFL-CIO proposing that the federation "re-evaluate its position on busing where it does not improve educational opportunities or quality education." The convention's education committee recommended non-concurrence because the proposal did not alter existing federation policy.

Leonard S. Smith, executive secretary-treasurer of the Kentucky AFL-CIO, spoke against the committee position and described conditions in Louisville since school opened this fall. The committee position was upheld by Frederick O'Neal, chairman of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee and president of the Actors & Artistes; Detroit AFL-CIO President Tom Turner, and Edward L. McMahan of the Glass Bottle Blowers in Mississippi.

After Meany read the 1973 text, delegates voted to uphold the committee recommendation of non-concurrence with the Kentucky resolution.

The convention call for full funding of education said the dismantling and underfunding proposed by Presidents Nixon and Ford threatened to undermine the progress since enactment of the Elementary & Secondary Education Act in 1964.

The convention urged the nation to seize the opportunity to provide better education for fewer students now that the declining U.S. birth rate is showing up in reduced school enrollment.

The convention also said that lower tuition cost was a better guarantee of equal access to higher education than aid to individuals and called for expansion of adult education programs.

Federal Pay Cutbacks Draw Vigorous Protest

San Francisco—Congress should take away the President's power to reduce or delay comparability salary increases for federal employes, the AFL-CIO said.

It protested repeated presidential attempts to thwart the intent of the law linking federal pay raises to rates for comparable jobs in private industry. The most recent presidential action resulted in cutting back an 8.66 percent raise that was due Oct. 1 to 5 percent.

The resolution also proposed that in case of a disagreement over the translation of the Bureau of Labor Statistics salary survey into a formula for a salary increase, the impasse should be resolved by an advisory committee of recognized arbitrators and pay authorities. Their determination would stand "unless set aside by Congress."

The convention also reiterated the AFL-CIO's support for a collective bargaining law for federal workers, whose bargaining rights now rest on an inadequate framework of presidential executive orders.

Another resolution noted that federal workers have fallen behind both the private sector and the semi-autonomous postal service in many areas of fringe benefits.

It expressed the AFL-CIO's support for a list of needed improvements through legislation or collective bargaining. The list included full employer payment of life insurance and health insurance premiums.

The convention backed legislation that would ensure federal workers the right to take their vacations at a time of their choice, not for the convenience of the agency. The resolution noted that some naval establishments have required workers to take leave during the Christmas season.

It also called for compensation to employes who are required to travel outside of normal working hours to report at a temporary duty station.

Delegates Call for Boost In Minimum Wage to $3

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO called for legislation to raise the federal minimum wage to $3 an hour and to require payment of double-time rates after eight hours in any day and after 40 hours in a week.

Under the current timetable of the Fair Labor Standards Act, the minimum wage will rise to $2.30 for most workers next January but some recently-covered groups aren't scheduled to reach that level until 1978.

The overtime requirement of the FLSA has been time and one-half after 40 hours a week since the wage-hour law was enacted in the New Deal era.

Inflation has made the present minimum wage schedule "obsolete," the convention resolution noted. And even though the $2.30 level hasn't yet been reached, "the annual income provided by this wage is already about $500 a year below the U.S. poverty level."

A minimum wage increase of the extent contemplated by the legislation would stimulate the economy and create "badly-needed" additional jobs for unemployed workers.

The convention's call for imposing a double-time pay requirement also would tend to create more jobs by reinforcing the intent of the Fair Labor Standards Act to discourage employers from requiring overtime work.

Another convention resolution reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's position in favor of "a decrease in hours worked, whether on a daily, weekly or annual basis, with no reduction in wages or benefits."

It endorsed "the principle of a 35-hour workweek achievable in the shortest possible time."

Lifting of Hatch Act Restrictions Urged

San Francisco—Hatch Act restrictions on the political rights of federal employes should be lifted, the AFL-CIO urged.

It endorsed a bill before Congress that includes a number of recommendations for changes in the law that were made by a bipartisan commission in 1966.

The convention also urged repeal of similar restrictions on public employes that have been imposed by some states and cities.

RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE considered a total of 266 resolutions during the convention. Of this number, the convention delegates passed 133. Forty-one were referred to the Executive Council for further study. Most of the remaining resolutions were covered by those that were adopted. President I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers chaired the committee, which was composed of four subcommittees.

Broad Program Urged to Curb Destruction of Jobs from Imports

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO spelled out immediate actions the federal government should take to relieve U.S. workers already hurt by massive imports—and additional measures necessary for a long-range cure that removes the cause.

The convention noted that what was once a job loss primarily in maritime and manufacturing is now increasingly affecting other U.S. service trades as well. Foreign-based and multinational companies in such services as airline travel enjoy tremendous advantages over their U.S. counterparts, the convention observed.

Perhaps worst of all, delegates judged the Trade Act of 1974 as likely to "cause more unemployment and more production losses." More than a million jobs have already been lost, it was noted, "and remedial action by Congress in the form of new trade legislation is necessary to revive the badly stricken American standard of living."

Trade patterns were bad enough before the onslaught of recent events led by the massive unemployment at home, the convention noted. The emergency measures are necessitated by "the rising tide of restrictions abroad, the ever-increasing impact of the multinational corporations, and the staggering balance of payments deficits," the resolution said.

"The AFL-CIO supports, strong, vigorous, fair international trade," the convention said, but trade is anything but fair when the U.S. tax laws make it more advantageous for the U.S.-based firms to export jobs overseas.

The emergency measures which the convention called for just to relieve the short-term damage included:

- Presidential action to curb imports under the new trade act.
- Special restrictions against countries whose trade practices place unfair burdens on U.S. commerce.
- Enforcement of anti-dumping rules and imposition of a special tariff called a countervailing duty, both provided for under present law.
- A limiting of exports of the raw materials, technology and products which affect the national interest.
- A presidential reassessment of foreign economic policy in terms of the U.S. economy.
- No new concessions that allow increased imports from Communist countries while U.S. joblessness is so high.
- Implementation by Congress of its new authority to oversee trade agreements.

And all that, the convention declared, would only minimize the damage that U.S. workers and America's industrial base are suffering, while doing nothing to reverse the oppressive economic impact foreign trade has been having on America.

For the long haul, the convention urged nine other measures, several of them related to tax advantages for multinational companies which the AFL-CIO has long opposed.

In addition, the convention called for a permanent mechanism to regulate imports, the reporting of all international flows of trade and restrictions on the export of capital and technology.

The convention also called on the President "to exercise his authority to establish effective means of regulating the export of agricultural products, particularly to state-controlled economies."

That resolution came as a new pact with the Russians was awaited under the agreement labor made with President Ford in suspending the Longshoremen's boycott of loading grain to Russia.

Pending new legislation by Congress on foreign trade, the convention noted that vigorous participation by import-injured unions can help laid-off workers obtain benefits under the present law.

Welfare Reform Keyed To Jobs, 'Decent Life'

San Francisco—America's unions called for genuine welfare reform keyed to providing jobs at adequate wages for persons who cannot find work and the "right to a decent life" for "those who cannot or should not be expected to work."

The convention expressed the AFL-CIO's opposition to a "phony reform" proposed by congressional conservatives that would cut federal welfare assistance and compel persons on welfare to "earn" their payments "at make-work jobs paying substandard wages."

The resolution advocated a permanent public service employment policy. It said an improved unemployment insurance system, "including new entrants as well as workers reentering the workforce," should be an alternative to welfare.

Just as the federal government now has assumed responsibility for payments to the needy, elderly, blind and disabled, it should become the prime provider for "all the rest of the needy," the convention said.

The resolution called for a national minimum payment, not less than the poverty level and containing cost-of-living protection. It also asked job safeguards for employes of state and local welfare agencies affected by federal takeovers.

The convention went on record opposing rigid restrictions on the use of federal funds by states for social services to those who need them.

The working poor and near-poor should not be penalized because they are not on welfare, the AFL-CIO said.

It said there should continue to be an agency within the Executive Branch to monitor proverty programs and bring the problems of the poor before other government agencies.

The AFL-CIO sees "no need" to shift the Office of Economic Opportunity from independent agency status to an arm of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare. But if the President submits such a reorganization plan, the federation will examine it closely to determine if it will in any way weaken the effort to eliminate poverty.

A resolution on child care reiterated the AFL-CIO's call "for a massive federal commitment" to provide comprehensive child day care services for all children who need them with a gradually rising federal level of funding as the program gets under way.

It included a detailed list of safeguards and requirements that should be part of such a program.

The convention also backed the AFL-CIO's strong protest against a proposed Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare regulation that would deny aid to needy children of fathers unemployed because of a strike.

It called on the HEW to withdraw the regulation and said strikers and their families should have "the same right as all other Americans" for welfare aid based solely on need.

Comprehensive Program:

Energy Plan Based On Self-Sufficiency

San Francisco—A comprehensive energy program based on elimination of American dependence on imported oil, conservation and conversion to substitute fuels was adopted by the AFL-CIO at its 11th convention here.

The federation also reaffirmed its commitment to protecting, restoring and improving the nation's environment. At the same time, it reiterated its conviction that "environmental policies and programs can and must be reconciled with energy needs and economic progress."

In a resolution on the environment, the AFL-CIO urged federal legislation to deal with the problem of suits for injunctions to halt construction projects after they've begun.

"The delays and uncertainties caused by such suits, many of which are frivolous, are among the factors contributing to intolerable unemployment"—over 20 percent—in the construction industry, the resolution observed.

The heart of the federation's energy program lies in the nation's current reliance on foreign oil. A resolution on the energy program warned:

"So long as the United States is dependent on the importation of oil, shipped in foreign vessels from insecure sources, the energy crisis will haunt this country."

To eliminate that dependence, the resolution called for taking the importation of oil out of private hands and putting it in the hands of government. It also called for enactment of a quota on oil imports, establishing a fair and equitable system of allocation and rationing, and economic sanctions against any country that would impose a ban against the U.S.

The resolution also called for energy conservation measures, including enforcement of the national 55-mile speed limit, higher tax rates on energy-wasting equipment, developing and expanding mass-transit systems, subsidizing low fares and requiring all new and existing structures to conform to energy efficiency standards.

In addition, the AFL-CIO called for a concerted drive to convert oil and gas-fueled plants to coal and nuclear energy. Government should act to promote the public acceptance of nuclear power, it said.

A massive program to increase domestic energy supplies is needed, the federation declared. It noted that despite enormous coal reserves in the United States significant moves have not been taken to make more effective use of them.

Among its recommendations, the AFL-CIO urged that a five-year, $20-billion government-funded crash program be launched to mobilize the country's scientific and technological resources to develop alternative sources of energy, increase the efficiency of consumption and expand existing sources.

It also called for intensified production from U.S. military reserves and revocation of the lease of any oil or natural gas producer who refused to pump supplies on land leased from the U.S. government.

In other resolutions on energy, the convention approved a recommendation of President Ford's Labor - Management Committee to establish a labor-management task force to help speed completion of electric power plants.

Another resolution called upon Congress to "begin, once and for all, the serious task of legislating the restructuring of the American oil industry" to break the monopoly hold of big oil corporations on the public.

Union Role Sought In Promotion Funds

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO called on Congress to amend the National Labor Relations Act to permit labor to become a co-trustee with management on all industry and promotion funds.

A convention resolution noted that in recent years such funds have grown tremendously and "are being solely used by employers for their purposes without the voice of labor whose efforts are responsible for the contributions to the funds."

Takeover Bid Spotlights Multinationals' Abuses

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO reiterated its concern at the job-destroying role of U.S.-based multinational corporations—and spotlighted a newly-recognized threat of similar job losses when a foreign-based multinational takes over a thriving American firm.

Federation Vice President I. W. Abel, head of the Steelworkers, told the delegates of the attempt of a French-based conglomerate, Imetal, to acquire control of the Copperweld Corp. "solely to milk away the profits."

The takeover attempt, opposed by the Copperweld management as well as the union, threatens the jobs of most of the 5,000 Copperweld workers in Ohio and Pennsylvania, Abel said. After siphoning off the profits, he warned, the next step would be to "export to other countries the technical know-how and processes of this specialty steel corporation."

The convention resolution condemned "the unregulated takeover of United States firms by foreign interests." It said labor will fight this threat to jobs "in the courts, before administrative agencies, by public information programs and through unstinting support of necessary corrective legislation."

In a separate resolution, the AFL-CIO asked increased cooperation by trade unionists from different countries to combat disregard for workers' interests by multinational corporations. It called also for "an effective international code of fair labor standards" assuring the right to organize and bargain through a union.

It asked an end to preferential tax treatment that encourages U.S. firms to shift production and jobs abroad and called for regulation of the export of American capital and technology.

The resolution asked also for "regulation of imports into the United States economy, to help build American jobs and to assure America's future as an economy with a strong industrial base."

3-Part Program Set:

Organizing Called 'Compelling' Task

San Francisco—"The most compelling task we face" is to organize the unorganized, AFL-CIO convention delegates declared.

The convention voted a three-part program which included coping with problems under the National Labor Relations Act and its administration in addition to a mandate for the AFL-CIO's revamped Dept. of Organization & Field Services to continue its assistance in organizing tasks of all types.

"As trade unionists, we cannot ignore our obligations to help unorganized workers organize," the resolution declared, noting: "If our standards are higher today it is only because others, in turn, have helped us to organize."

The convention action also called on the federation to continue technical assistance, including specialized training programs at the Labor Studies Center.

It was noted that the "intimidation, reprisals, discharges and blacklists" that workers face in trying to form unions, especially in the South, are but one part of a package that includes other obstructions after a representation election has been won.

"If an anti-union employer fails to destroy an organizing effort and the workers do win NLRB recognition, the employer simply falls back on his second line of attack and refuses to agree to a contract," it was pointed out.

It is the federation's role to provide "service as a focal point for addressing problems affecting organizing that arise out of federal and state legislation, principally the National Labor Relations Act and its administration," the resolution said.

And it emphasized that organizing grows more critical as unions are confronted with the need to build mechanisms "capable of dealing on an equal basis with the power corporations."

The resolution noted that recent Bureau of Labor Statistics studies show "that millions of American workers are paid substandard wages and suffer endless injustices from heartless employers" as a result of the gap between union and non-union wages and conditions.

It said the AFL-CIO department "should continue to place emphasis on cooperative organizing programs under AFL-CIO coordination and to pay special attention to those groups of employes for whom collective bargaining is essential for raising above even the minimum standards of decent family living; the whole range of white-collar occupations, professional technical and clerical; and employes in the many service trades."

A report to the convention on organizing noted that multi-union, coordinated organizing efforts have been expanded, with good results. The report noted that several such drives were tried in limited areas, then grew to state-wide efforts and recently have become comprehensive campaigns without geographic limits.

That report also noted that workers are more aware of the necessity of unions in time of economic decline, but such decline also breeds fear which curtails organizing efforts.

He is Donald Olson, business manager of Office & Professional Employees Local 8 in Seattle. In the background is Fred Hoehler, director of the Labor Studies Center.

Support Pledged Drive For J. P. Stevens Pact

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO threw its full weight behind the Textile Workers Union of America's attempt to get a contract at J. P. Stevens & Co., pledging whatever aid may be necessary—including "a massive boycott" of products made by the notoriously anti-union firm.

In a resolution approved at the federation's 11th convention here, J. P. Stevens was accused of flagrant violations of the National Labor Relations Act.

"The entire nation is shocked by the vicious, unremitting coercion with which J. P. Stevens & Co. has opposed the efforts of its employes to organize and build a union of their own," the resolution said.

"Hundreds of pro-union employes have been discharged and the number of acts of coercion and intimidation runs into the thousands."

After 12 years of organizing campaigns, TWU gained representation rights at the company's seven plants in Roanoke Rapids, N.C. But the firm has adamantly refused to bargain in good faith, with the result that for over a year some 3,600 Stevens workers in Roanoke Rapids have been without a contract.

Textile Workers President Sol Stetin, addressing convention delegates, described J. P. Stevens as "a Dracula, sucking the life blood out of its workers—working them for substandard wages, dominating their lives in the plants and in the 89 communities in which they operate."

He further characterized the firm as the leader of an anti-union conspiracy in the South aimed at keeping unions out of that part of the country.

"Let no one be blinded," Stetin said. "This is a conspiracy that is not confined to textiles in the American labor movement. The proof lies in the fact that very few unions are making any significant headway in the South."

Martin Ward, president of the Plumbers & Pipefitters, said that J.P. Stevens and the textile industry really are the key to organizational activities in the South.

"In the building trades, as an example, when we are successful in organizing a non-union building construction contractor, he is automatically taken off the bidding list for the textile industry.

"In other words, once he signs a contract to do his work with the union trades, he is no longer given any work by the textile industry."

Increased Aid Urged as Vital For ConRail

San Francisco — The AFL-CIO convention urged Congress to enact pending legislation creating the proposed Consolidated Railroad Corp. as "a viable and effective" rail carrier.

The United States Railway Association has given Congress its final system plan for a reorganized rail network in the northeastern part of the country, the federation noted in a resolution. But, it said, the plan contains serious deficiencies that can be corrected only by amendments to the Regional Rail Reorganization Act such as those now pending before Congress.

"Absent such amendments and this nation will be stripped of more than 5,000 miles of railroad lines virtually overnight, and the Consolidated Railroad Corp. will not be provided financing sufficient to enable it to succeed as a viable rail carrier," the resolution noted.

It called for increased federal financing for ConRail, coupled with approval of the final system plan.

The federation also pressed for legislation that would postpone the abandonment of all lines in the Northeast until local communities can "consider their position with regard to specific lines" and take appropriate action.

Delegates also approved resolutions calling for the transfer of railroad safety enforcement from the Transportation Dept. to the Labor Dept. and the establishment within the Interstate Commerce Commission of a permanent, independent office of public counsel responsible for representing the interests of the public in agency proceedings.

Ford Hit on Bid to Weaken Agency Rules

San Francisco—The Ford Administration's effort to weaken federal regulation of business threatens the health and pocketbooks of workers and their families, the AFL-CIO charged.

The convention demanded that the Administration "tighten—not loosen—control over industry, especially in the administration of laws which provide public access to information, break up monopolies, prosecute dishonesty and protect health and life."

It urged the need to separate regulatory functions of government from promotion-type activities "as a means of reducing the undue influence of those to be regulated."

While there is some truth in complaints of inefficiency in some regulatory agencies, the AFL-CIO suggested that the solution is to appoint abler administrators with an interest in protecting the public.

Raw Materials Supply Policy Urged on U.S.

San Francisco—A reliable supply of raw materials is essential to the survival and growth of the American economy, the AFL-CIO said.

A convention resolution called on the federal government to "move quickly" to develop a comprehensive policy and program to assure "the steady flow, present and future, of the raw ingredients necessary to the American industrial process."

Such a program, the convention said, should include:

- Stockpiling of raw materials.
- Bilateral commodities agreements between the U.S. and countries that are suppliers of raw materials.
- Development of new domestic sources of such materials and support for research.
- Improved recycling and other conservation methods.
- Strong antitrust supervision of firms that supply the United States with basic raw materials.

The resolution looked to creation of a Commission on Rational Resources as a government corporation "with direct responsibility for the development of materials policy as well as the oversight and management of much of the policy program."

Ban on Strikebreakers Asked on Federal Work

San Francisco—Federal action is needed to stop the use of strikebreakers on government service contracts, the AFL-CIO convention declared.

The convention voted endorsement for a House bill that would amend the Service Contract Act of 1965 to prohibit employers with defense contracts from replacing workers participating in a strike.

The case of scabs crossing Machinist picket lines against Dalmo Victory Company, a division of the Textron Corp. conglomerate, was cited by the convention as an example of the kind of activity the new legislation would stop.

Labor Renews Call to Federalize Jobless Aid, Injury Benefit Systems

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO renewed its call for federalization of workers' compensation and unemployment insurance programs.

Until that goal is achieved, minimum federal standards in all essential features of the programs should be enacted immediately, it declared in a convention resolution.

The resolution pledged the AFL-CIO's continued support of bills sponsored by Senators Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) and Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) and by Representatives Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) and Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.). The bills would require substantial improvements in state workers' compensation laws long sought by labor, including:

- Compulsory coverage of all wage and salary workers, including public employes, without numerical, occupational or industry exemptions.
- Weekly benefits of not less than two-thirds of the injured workers average weekly wage.
- Coverage of farm workers.
- Full statutory coverage of all occupational diseases.

Glaring defects in the present inadequate and fragmented system of unemployment insurance must be corrected immediately, the AFL-CIO declared, "with permanent improvements in the program so that employment insurance can truly meet the needs of all jobless workers and thus contribute to the welfare of the entire nation."

The convention's resolution called on Congress to enact jobless insurance legislation to:

- Extend coverage to all wage and salary workers on a permanent basis.
- Establish minimum federal benefit standards of at least two thirds of the worker's weekly wage up to no less than 75 percent of the state average weekly wage.
- Require not more than 20 weeks of work for at least 26 weeks of benefits.
- Establish a maximum disqualification period of six weeks.
- Prohibit any reduction or cancellation of a worker's benefit rights or base-period wages.
- Restore the system's financial solvency.
- Abolish the existing trigger formula for extended unemployment compensation programs.

Until economic prosperity is restored, all jobless workers including those temporarily covered under Special Unemployment Assistance, should be eligible for at least 65 weeks of benefits, the AFL-CIO said.

In permanent legislation, it added, federally-financed extended benefits of at least 26 weeks should be available to all workers who exhaust their regular benefits.

Legislation Backed To Protect Privacy

San Francisco — A convention resolution gave the AFL-CIO's support to legislation intended to strengthen individual rights and outlaw invasions of privacy.

A proposed Bill of Rights Procedures Act has been introduced with more than 60 bipartisan sponsors in Congress, the resolution noted. It would require court warrants under tightened procedure in all cases involving interception of communications, obtaining records or conducting searches.

The resolution expressed labor's support "to the extent that this legislation will increase protection of individual rights."

Teamsters Role Condemned:

All Possible Support Sought For Cause of Farm Workers

"As a result, our union has been hurt tremendously."

A day before the convention action, the Executive Council named a panel of three of its members to go into the farm fields for a first-hand investigation of unfair acts against UFW organizers and members in the election campaigns.

The committee consists of Paul Hall, president of the Seafarers; Joseph Keenan, secretary of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and Paul Jennings, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

The UFW has filed numerous unfair labor practice charges against the growers and the Teamsters but the CALRB has issued few complaints. In addition, the union says the board has failed to move promptly on frivolous objections filed by the growers in obvious moves to obtain delays in the elections.

"Firings, dismissals, loss of pay, captive audience meetings held a few minutes before the election takes place, sudden wage increases two hours before the election takes place—these are the guns used by labor contractors and supervisors to intimidate the workers to vote right," Chavez charged. "All of this has been permitted by Walter Kintz."

The federation's resolution noted that the accumulated effect of all these circumstances is producing an increasing sense of frustration on the part of workers and growing disillusionment with the new farm labor law and its administration.

"Coercive tactics by growers and Teamsters have disrupted or impaired election procedures, created chaotic conditions surrounding voting, and seriously tainted the election process," the resolution charged.

The Farm Workers' strongest criticism against the CALRB has been in connection with the so-called access rule governing the rights of union organizers to visit workers in the fields during representation election campaigns.

Despite a California Supreme Court ruling upholding this right, several county sheriffs—most notably Tulare County Sheriff Robert Wiley—have kept UFW organizers from the fields while permitting Teamster officials to spend the whole day talking to workers. The rule drawn up by the CALRB provides for access to the fields on a limited basis—before and after the workday and during lunchtime.

Chavez's wife Helen and their daughter, Linda Rodriguez, were arrested Oct. 1 near Delano on charges of trespassing at the Pandol Bros. ranch. Along with Jose Lopez, a national AFL-CIO representative from New York, and a freelance photographer, they were held by ranch employes on a "citizen's arrest" and turned over to Wiley's deputies.

The AFL-CIO resolution accused the Teamsters, in collusion with the growers, of attempting to destroy established collective bargaining procedures and, in the process, the Farm Workers.

Meany recalled that the attack on the UFW began on Apr. 15, 1973, when 26 growers in the Coachella Valley signed sweetheart contracts with the Teamsters.

"That collusion still exists," Meany charged. "The Teamsters are still in this fight shoulder to shoulder with the organized financial agricultural structure of this state.

"Perhaps some day when the Teamsters realize the shameful procedure being conducted by their leaders, maybe they may have a change of mind and come back . . . to the point where they can call themselves trade unionists."

Sol Stetin, president of the Textile Workers Union of America, told delegates a victory for the Farm Workers not only will bring credit to the entire labor movement but also "may be the start of organizing the remaining unorganized workers in America."

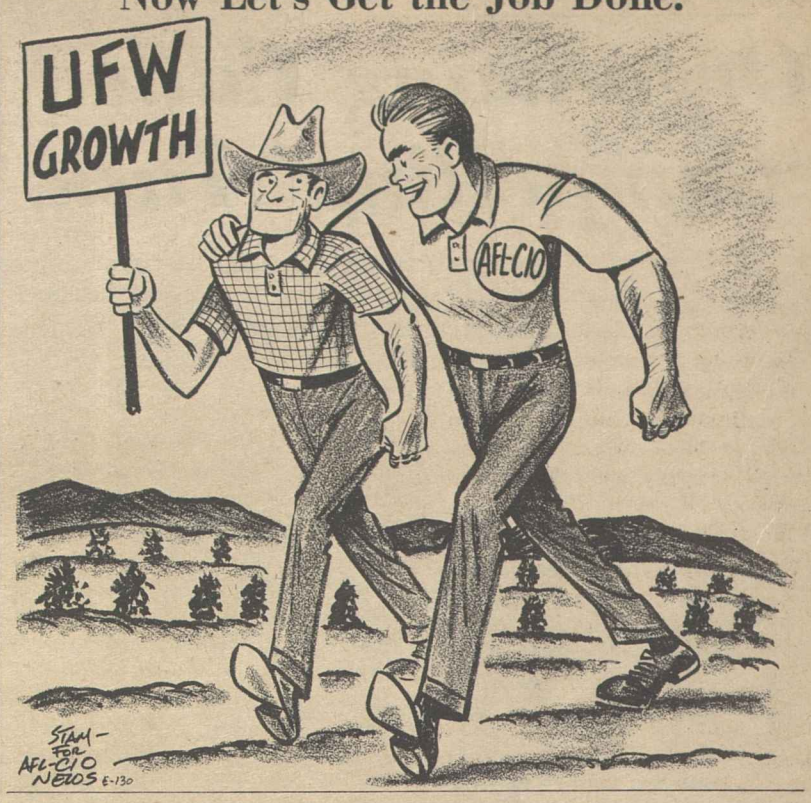
Chavez, reporting on the outcome of some 150 bargaining elections held since the new law went into effect, said that despite all the illegal acts the UFW has received 45 percent of the 26,500 votes cast so far. The Teamsters have received 29 percent, with 14 percent for "no union" and 11 percent yet uncounted because of challenges.

"We feel if we can get the state to act immediately to provide a decent atmosphere so that the workers can truly vote without being harassed and pressured the results will be much higher," Chavez observed.

He thanked the federation for its assistance in the past and gave special thanks to Meany for his personal involvement in the Farm Workers' long struggle to build a union. He recalled Meany's pledge to the UFW at the AFL-CIO's 1973 convention in Miami:

"We are with you and will stay with you until you and your members are able to build a union strong enough to stand alone."

'Now Let's Get the Job Done!'



Major Areas Swamped With High Joblessness

unemployed were virtually unchanged from August.

Seasonally adjusted, the number of workers without jobs and who were actively looking for work held at 7.8 million. Total employment also remained steady at 85.4 million. This is about one million below a year ago when the jobless rate was 5.8 percent.

In September, there wer divergent movements among the major labor force groups, the Bureau of Labor Statistics pointed out.

The jobless rate for adult men increased to the June-July level of 7 percent, after declining to 6.6 percent in August, while the rate for adult women eased to 7.5 percent from 7.7 percent in August.

Unemployment also increased over the month for married men to 5.3 percent and for household heads to 5.7 percent, but declined a bit for teenagers to 19.3 percent from 21.1 percent in August.

For blacks and other minority groups, the jobless rate rose three-tenths of 1 percent to 14.3 percent.

The jobless rate was unchanged for full-time workers at 8.2 percent, while declining nearly a full percentage point for part-time workers to 9.6 percent. The rate also held steady for blue-collar workers at 11.5 percent, but edged up one-tenth of 1 percent for white-collar workers to 4.7 percent.

Construction industry unemployment was below the 20 percent mark for the second month in a row, declining from 19.9 to 19.2 percent. But the rate in manufacturing, after declining in the previous three months, increased one-tenth of 1 percent to 11.6 percent.

BLS also said that the average workweek for all production workers on nonfarm payrolls dropped two-tenths of an hour to 36 hours, the level of June and July. Over the year, average weekly hours are down a full half-hour.

Widespread declines in average weekly hours in the service sector were partly offset by small pickups in mining and manufacturing, the BLS noted.

The average duration of unemployment rose from 15.7 weeks to 16.2 during September. BLS said there was a continued increase in the number of workers unemployed 27 weeks and longer to 1.6 million. This is the higest level since post-World War II and constituted one-fifth of the jobless workers.

The major causes for Washington's jobless rate of more than 6 percent were attributed to a decline in construction activity, as new building permits were at an all-time low, and layoffs in the printing, publishing and hotel industries. The higher unemployment in the Virginia Tidewater area was due to layoffs in electrical machinery and transportation equipment, the Labor Dept. said.

The major areas hardest-hit by unemployment are in Puerto Rico, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Michigan.

The 10 cities topping the list of high unemployment are Ponce, P.R., 21.3 percent; Mayaguez, P.R., 16.9 percent; Lawrence-Haverhill, Mass., 16.3 percent; Providence-Warwick-Pawtucket, R.I., 16.2 percent; Muskegon-Muskegon Heights, Mich., 15.9 percent; Lowell, Mass., 15.6 percent; Springfield-Chicopee-Holyoke, Mass., 15.3 percent; Flint, Mich., 15.2 percent, and Detroit, 14.8 percent.

School Lunch Veto Rejected, House Passes Construction Bargaining Bill

President Ford's veto of an expanded school lunch and child nutrition program was overturned by a massive 397-18 vote in the House and a 79-13 margin in the Senate.

On the same day it overrode the veto, the House mustered another big margin to pass the Construction Industry Collective Bargaining bill that had both Administration and labor support—but was opposed by hard-core anti-union groups seeking to kill the companion job site picketing bill.

The bargaining bill, drafted by Labor Sec. John Dunlop in consultation with unions, management and key members of Congress, would give national unions and contractor organizations a greater role in resolving bargaining disputes.

It was endorsed in an AFL-CIO convention resolution as "a careful and conscientious attempt by individuals who know the construction indusrty" to develop new procedures that make collective bargaining more effective.

The bill would establish a Construction Industry Collective Bargaining Committee of 10 members named by the building trades unions, 10 by the employer organizations, three public members and the Secretary of Labor and director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

It would be notified 60 days in advance of contract expirations and have a flexible choice of options in seeking to resolve disputes. It could delay a strike 30 days beyond the contract expiration, but it could not impose compulsory arbitration.

In addition, the committee would study and make recommendations on such matters as the geographical structure of bargaining in the construction industry, apprenticeship issues and stability of employment.

On the school lunch veto, Ford failed even to convince his own party that the fight against inflation would be lost if children from lower-income working families, as well as families on welfare, were to be eligible for low-cost lunch and nutrition programs.

The vetoed bill, now a law, would require all schools to offer reduced-price meals for eligible families. The family income eligibility test would rise to 195 percent of the poverty level. Under present law, the income ceiling is 175 percent and a school isn't required to serve reduced-price meals to those eligible.

The new legislation also extends federal food assistance to residential institutions such as shelters for abused children or homes for retraded children. And it corrects present limitations in summer food programs and in food services for Headstart programs and day care centers.

Labor Renews Demand For Audit of 'Fed'

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO renewed its call for legislation to provide for regular audits of the Federal Reserve System which it charged has severely damaged the economy and brought on high unemployment through its policies.

"The devastation of the economy has caused the Congress to understand it must undertake some actions to make the Fed less powerful and more responsive to the needs of the people," the federation declared in a convention resolution.

The resolution noted the Federal Reserve System has never been subject to any audit during its 62-year history. It is the only federal agency whose activities the General Accounting Office may not audit.

Legislation now before Congress would curb the powers of the board as well as provide for audits to make it more answerable to the public. Several proposals call for reducing the term of each of the Fed's seven members from 14 to 7 years and fixing the maximum term of the chairman—the position now held by Arthur Burns—at four years.

Many economists who have followed the Fed's activities contend that the power and secrecy of the board and its Open Market Committee under Burns have led to severe fluctuations in the economy, the resolution noted.

Labor Asks Medicare Overhaul

"Inefficiencies in the nation's health care system" are the chief cause of the cost overruns of the Medicare program, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

The federation proposed a number of major revisions in the Medicare financing system to a House Ways & Means subcommittee that is considering amendments to the law. The statement made clear the AFL-CIO's view that these reforms would somewhat relieve the symptoms, but would not cure the disease.

"Only the adoption of a National Health Security program will guarantee a health care system capable of providing comprehensive quality care and of containing cost increases," the AFL-CIO said.

While Medicare has "contributed enormously" to lessening the crushing burden of health care costs for the elderly, the cost reimbursement system for doctors and hospitals "subsidizes inefficiency," the AFL-CIO charged.

Physicians get paid on a basis that "rewards volume rather than quality of service and that provides no financial incentive to keep the patient well."

And hospitals, too, get full payment even when costs are inflated by poor management and unneeded facilities, the statement noted.

While acknowledging no "easy solution," the AFL-CIO proposed:

- Encouraging prepaid comprehensive health services that give the providers of medical care "a financial incentive to keep the patient well and to avoid unnecessary hospital care."
- Replacement of the current prevailing-rate reimbursement to doctors with a negotiated fee schedule. The present system "is an open invitation to doctors in a seller's market for medical services to increase their charges so that the new higher level will have to be considered prevailing."
- Requiring physicians to accept the payment ruled reasonable by the Social Security Administration rather than billing the patient directly and requiring the patient to make up the difference between the doctor's bill and the Medicare reimbursement.
- Establishment of a reimbursement formula for hospitals based on "only those costs incurred by a reasonably prudent and cost-conscious management."

The AFL-CIO emphasized, however, that control of costs in health care should not be permitted to re-

STRIKING PAPERWORKERS are assured the support of their union by President Joseph P. Tonelli, right, during a picket line visit at the Mead Corp. plant at Escanaba, Mich., where two UPIU locals and an IBEW local are on strike. Union members are also striking an Ohio plant.

Despite Abuse of Law:

Farm Union Leads In California Votes

Fresno, Calif. — Despite widespread abuses under California's new agricultural labor relations law, the United Farm Workers have maintained the UFW's lead in its battle with the Teamsters over the right to represent the state's field workers.

As of Oct. 15, the UFW had won 114 elections under the new farm labor election law. The rival Teamsters had won 86, while workers in 13 elections chose neither. Thirty-four other contests were undecided pending the outcome of recounts or court challenges.

In terms of number of workers represented, the elections gave the UFW bargaining rights for 12,750 workers to 9,540 for the Teamsters. An additional 1,740 chose no union representation while 10,800 are involved in the undecided contests.

The UFW's growing strength is reflected in the number of switches to the AFL-CIO affiliate. In its most recent compilation of the outcome of the farm labor elections, the federation's Dept. of Organization & Field Services reported that 36 bargaining units formerly held by the Teamsters had voted to switch to the UFW. In contrast, there have been no shifts from the Farm Workers to the Teamsters.

A three-member panel of the AFL-CIO Executive Council has been touring the farm fields for a first-hand investigation of unfair acts against UFW members during the election campaigns. The committee includes Paul Hall, president of the Seafarers; Joseph Keenan, secretary of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and Paul Jennings, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

A hearing on the challenged election at the E. & J. Gallo winery, the nation's largest vintner, was postponed until Oct. 28. The hear-

Labor Cases Rank High On Court Agenda

The Supreme Court will take a new look at the Fair Labor Standards Act this fall and seek to resolve a constitutional challenge to the right of Congress to set wage-hour standards for all public workers, including police and fire fighters.

That was one of the big holdover cases as the court began its new term. It considered the issues last year, but decided to schedule a new round of arguments before reaching a decision.

Early action by the court, in terms of accepting and rejecting cases decided by lower courts for review, indicate that labor issues will again rank heavy on the court calendar.

Congress Faces Key Decisions

By David L. Perlman

Congress faces a series of tough decisions in the weeks ahead that could determine whether the nation moves closer to labor's full employment goal—at faster than a snail's pace.

After nearly 10 months, the 94th Congress is still trying to shape a comprehensive energy policy that will conserve fuel without sending prices so high that a new inflation-recession round will devastate the still-ailing economy.

A House-Senate conference committee, working under the cloud of a veto threat, will resume its efforts to shape an energy bill after Congress returns from a week's recess on Oct. 20.

In the Senate, a many-sided battle over natural gas pricing will be fought to a decision. The Administration would like all price controls lifted promptly and consumer groups would like to see some of the big producing-distributing monopolies broken up.

The related tax and budget controversies are of special importance to labor's goals.

For weeks the House Ways & Means Committee has been drafting a major revision of the tax code—closing some big loopholes to bring in needed revenue, but in several cases reducing deductions available to working families in the name of "simplification."

Present plans are to couple this bill with a continuation of the temporary tax cuts enacted early this year that pumped billions of dollars in badly-needed purchasing power into the recession-parched economy.

Unless Congress acts this year, taxes shoot back up in 1976 and

New Limit Proposed On Asbestos Fibers

By John R. Oravec

A revised federal job health standard to reduce worker exposure to cancer-causing asbestos fibers is being proposed by the Labor Dept., along with new exposure limits on lead, beryllium and 13 additional toxic chemicals.

But the standards would not become effective for several months, following the lengthy process of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's issuance of economic impact statements and subsequent public hearings.

And the proposed asbestos standard would not cover construction workers, although thousands of building trades craftsmen are in daily contact with asbestos materials.

The proposal would reduce the exposure limit from the current permissible level of 5 fibers per milliliter of air to 0.5 fibers over an eight-hour period. In broader terms, this means the reduction is from 5 million fibers per cubic meter of air to 500,000 fibers.

The existing standard, which OSHA issued in 1972, would automatically lower the exposure limit to 2 fibers per milliliter of air on July 1, 1976. Construction workers would continue to be covered by

Attack on Food Stamps Scored as Anti-Worker

A union witness assailed a right-wing attack on the food stamp program and told a Senate panel there would be less need for the program if more people had jobs at decent wages.

Arnold Mayer, legislative representative of the Meat Cutters, said high unemployment and inflation have been most responsible for the increased cost of the food stamp program.

He took sharp issue with the employer-backed "solution" in a bill introduced by Sen. James L. Buckley (R-N.Y.)—to make eligibility rules so restrictive that millions of low-income families would be disqualified from the program.

Particular targets of disqualification under the Buckley bill are families of strikers, who now are eligible for food stamps if they meet the same test of need that is applied to all other persons.

A National Association of Manufacturers spokesman, Anthony Dragonette, told a Senate Agriculsult in additional charges on the patients.

Further, the federation urged, there should be no further cost increase to the elderly in the Medicare program. In fact, the hospital care and presently optional medical care elements should be combined in a single program, with the premium for medical care eliminated.

Half the cost of such a combined program, the AFL-CIO proposed, should be financed by a contribution to the trust fund from general federal government revenues.

Along with financing reforms, the AFL-CIO said, a prescription drug program and an expanded home health service program should be added to Medicare.

While the present program allows home nursing services, a broader definition of allowable home care is needed, the federation said.

"Services to keep the home clean, to prepare meals and to transport patients to health services are often as important in preventing institutionalization of patients as direct health services themselves," the statement observed.

While its proposals would "do much to improve the Medicare program" by reducing financial hardships and better controlling costs, the AFL-CIO reiterated labor's conviction that only a comprehensive national health security program can make quality health services available to all Americans "as a matter of right" and at an affordable cost.

READY TO WORK on the Truman Medical Center project at Kansas City is Johnnie Irene Archer, the first woman apprentice in Carpenters Local 61. She qualified for the local's apprenticeship program without prior experience.

Auxiliaries Adopt Plan For New Framework

San Francisco—The AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries wound up what in all probability was its final convention as a separate fraternal affiliate of the federation.

Delegates to the Auxiliaries' 10th convention here approved a plan under which its functions and responsibilities as a voluntary arm of the AFL-CIO will be assumed Jan. 1, 1976, by the federation's Dept. of Organization and Field Services.

Novella M. Porter, who will leave her post as executive director Dec. 31, said that an advisory committee will be set up next month to work out a way to restructure the organization within the new framework.

"We will function as is until then," she said. "We stand at the crossroads and look into the future. I can only hope and wish that the path to be chosen will lead to unlimited horizons."

In remarks to the 60 convention delegates, Mrs. Porter noted that the National Auxiliaries has experienced financial stress since its inception in 1959. While 30 new local auxiliaries were organized and affiliated since the last convention two years ago, a gradual decline in members has severely sapped the organization's strength.

"This is due to many contributing factors, primarily the adverse economic trend affecting our country nationwide," Mrs. Porter noted. "As older members became inactive they apparently are not being replaced by the more youthful members who are not aware of an auxiliary program and cannot feel the responsibility to become involved."

Also, the interests and activities of the Auxiliaries have increasingly become integrated with those of other departments of the AFL-CIO and its affiliates, she observed.

Mrs. Porter, who had planned to retire at this year's convention has agreed to stay on through the end of 1975. She was named executive director in 1972 to succeed Marcella Beatty.

President George Meany, who appointed her to the post, cited her "hard and dedicated work" with the Auxiliaries and added in a letter:

"You have demonstrated a trade union spirit and an ability to handle difficult tasks that merits a commendation of your fellow members in the entire labor movement."

In the light of the convention's action, the delegates did not elect executive officers or draw up a formal program.

Among the resolutions adopted was one opposing the elimination of price marking at the retail level. Others supported International Women's Year and efforts to improve the status of women; the nation's bicentennial program, and a recommendation that all printed material received by the Auxiliaries and its affiliates be returned to the sender if it does not bear a union label.

Supreme Court Agenda Heavy with Labor Cases

One of the cases accepted for review raises the question of whether a Texas "right-to-work" law banning the union shop applies to an oil company's tankers that operate principally between Texas and New York. A suit by Mobil Oil Co. sought to void the agency shop contract it had negotiated in 1969 with the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers. A district court said the state "work" law applied. A federal appellate court said it did not because the principal jobsite is "on the high seas." The Supreme Court will decide whether that ruling should be affirmed.

Also accepted for review is another case tied to the issue of whether a company that denies disability benefits for pregnancy is guilty of sex discrimination. This case was brought by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers (IUE) on behalf of a group of women employed by General Electric. Last year, the court agreed to consider a similar case, but has not yet acted on it.

Review was also granted in a case in which the Machinists are challenging a decision by the Wisconsin Supreme Court holding that a union's attempt to persuade its members not to work overtime during a contract dispute violated state labor law. The IAM argues that federal labor law pre-empts the state law and such conduct is not prohibited under the National Labor Relations Act.

Also pending before the Supreme Court are an assortment of cases dealing with the reconciliation of steps taken to increase minority employment and the issue of seniority in layoffs and recalls.

The high court has also agreed to consider various cases involving the job rights of public employes, including one involving 80 teachers who were fired by the Hortonville, Wis., school board after a 1974 strike by the National Education Association.

UFW Keeps Election Lead In California

ing, in Merced, focuses on how many of 131 "economic strikers" who cast ballots last month are deemed eligible to have their vote counted.

Meanwhile, California Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr., has appointed a special task force to attempt to unclog the machinery of the new farm labor law, which went into effect Aug. 28. UFW President Cesar Chavez has accused the California Agricultural Labor Relations Board, which is supposed to administer the law, with failure to act quickly in processing more than 200 unfair practice charges the UFW has filed.

The task force is made up of 24 attorneys, 12 from the CALRB and 12 from private practice. The panel is chaired by Larry Berg, a former associate professor of political science at the University of Southern California.

Sheriff's deputies in the state's growing areas, along with the ranch owners themselves, continued to arrest union organizers and others in the fields, even though the California Supreme Court has upheld a CALRB ruling providing for access by the union.

Bommarito Sets Priorities:

Escalator Termed Major URW Goal

Bal Harbour, Fla.—"Catch-up" pay raises for members of the Rubber Workers should be accompanied by cost-of-living protection, URW President Peter Bommarito said in a keynote address to the largest convention in the union's 40-year history.

He told the 997 delegates that a cost-of-living escalator should be a "Number One goal" for the union.

Another priority, Bommarito said, should be pension improvements for both active workers and "our URW brothers and sisters who have retired."

He called also for greater protection for workers displaced by plant closings, and spoke of "a vast no-man's land where people find themselves too old to easily relocate or secure new jobs, but too young to qualify for pension benefits."

While earlier hopes for a merger at this time with the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers were unfulfilled and the merger talks recessed, Bommarito told the delegates that the need for merger remains "an inescapable conclusion we must accept if we are to more fully meet our responsibilities in the future."

A strong theme of international cooperation marked the opening of the URW's 29th convention.

Among the speakers was the secretary-general of the International Chemical Workers Federation, with which the URW is affiliated, and the president of the Japanese Federation of Rubber Workers Unions, founded a little more than a year ago. The two unions have an agreement for joint cooperation, particularly in the area of worker safety and health.

In his keynote speech, Bommarito voiced concern at the growing concentration of economic power in huge multinational corporations. At the present pace, he warned, multinationals are fast surpassing nations in economic power.

He said the URW works with the ICWF in "an attempt to promote the solidarity and living standards of free trade unionists everywhere." Only through international trade union cooperation, he said, can effective action be taken to protect against job losses and plant closings "which result from the global transfer of production by the multinational corporations."

Bommarito denounced the Ford Administration for following in the path of the Nixon Administration as an ally of big business that is out to "zap labor."

The Ford Administration also was roasted by Sen. John H. Glenn, Jr. (D-Ohio), who cited vetoes of bills dealing with health, jobs, veterans, education and child nutrition.

Glenn said Ford heads "a government of crisis," which "waits for something to happen and then takes a Band-Aid approach" to dealing with the problem.

Labor Editor Duane Emme Dies at 54

Duane A. Emme, a highly-regarded labor editor and writer, died Oct. 13 of a heart ailment at the age of 54.

He was senior associate editor of Press Associates, Inc., the news service for the labor press, and wrote many of the Washington Window columns that appear in the AFL-CIO News.

Emme was an assistant editor of the AFL-CIO News from 1967 until he joined PAI in 1970. Before that, since 1954, he had been on the staff of Labor, the newspaper of the railroad unions.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said Emme "made a great contribution to the labor movement as an outstanding writer and editor in his years of service with the labor press, including the AFL-CIO News. His knowledge of labor and his ability to communicate its various activities will be sorely missed."

Born in Minot, N.D., the son of a railroad union leader, Emme graduated from the University of Minnesota in 1947 after service as an army officer during World War II. He worked as a reporter on the Mankato (Minn.) Free Press before coming to Washington, D.C.

Emme was a long-time member of the Newspaper Guild, a former member of the Washington local's executive board and chairman of its Labor Press unit.

He is survived by his wife, Marguerite, and two children, Matthew 8, and Kristina, 5. Services were held Oct. 16 in College Park, Md., with burial at the Ft. Snelling, Minn., National Cemetery. The family has requested that expressions of sympathy be in the form of donations to the Heart Fund.

Tennessee Convention Backs Voter Project

Nashville, Tenn.—Delegates to the Tennessee AFL-CIO convention voted to raise the state federation's per capita tax from 23 to 25 cents to help finance an expanded voter registration program and to provide added revenue for general operations.

A computerized voter identification project is being developed by the state COPE organization to provide for wider voter education and registration activities. The project is tied in with COPE's statewide efforts to increase voter turnout.

The 356 delegates also called for passage of a federal postcard voter registration law to help spur increased participation in the election process. In other major resolutions, the convention urged congressional enactment of improved consumer protection laws, National Health Security and full collective bargaining rights for public employes.

The federation's top officers were re-elected to new two-year terms, including President Matthew Lynch, Sec.-Treas. Lee Case and 16 of the 19 vice presidents.

Three new vice presidents elected at the three-day convention are Edward Harvey of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Sam Odum of the Rubber Workers and J. D. McGee of the Communications Workers.

Major convention speakers included Representatives Harold Ford, Marilyn L. Lloyd and Ed Jones, all Democrats; Nashville Mayor Richard Fulton and John Perkins, national assistant director of COPE.

Grospiron Tells OCAW:

Oil Decontrol Profit Put at $250 Billion

Hollywood, Fla.—If the price of "old" oil is decontrolled as President Ford advocates, the assets of the oil industry will jump by more than $250 billion, the head of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers told delegates to the union's convention.

In his keynote speech to the convention, OCAW President A. F. Grospiron said the decontrolled prices would mean that each American family will have to pay "more and more each year" in added fuel costs.

Controls on the price of "old" oil, already discovered but still in the ground, were scheduled to expire Sept. 1, but have been temporarily extended.

Illustrating his point with an example, Grospiron said: "Suppose an oil company has known reserves of 100 million barrels of discovered oil in the ground, ready to be pumped. By decontrolling the price of that oil, thereby permitting it to rise from $5.25 per barrel to $11.25 per barrel, that oil company would be handed a $600 million windfall."

Thus, he said, "if old oil is decontrolled as Ford would like, the assets of the oil industry will be increased by more than $250 billion," a figure he described as conservative.

Grospiron, who has headed the union since 1965, also expressed sharp criticism of the Ford Administration's economic policies. He pointed out that each percentage point of the current 8.3 percent unemployment rate means that about 940,000 workers are without jobs.

The nearly eight million unemployed are equivalent in numbers to the populations of Toronto, Cleveland, St. Louis and Pittsburgh combined, he said.

"Our members are beginning to feel the effects of the Ford Administration's economic policies," Grospiron said. "Many of them who are employed in such places as paint factories already have been laid off because of what's happened in the housing industry.

"When you consider that housing extends far beyond the building trades, into areas such as the manufacture of furniture, appliances, floor coverings, plumbing fixtures and other materials, then you know what a healthy housing industry means to the economy."

Instead of reversing the nation's economic downturn during the 14 months he has been in office, Ford has vetoed many pieces of legislation designed to end the recession, the OCAW president pointed out.

John Simonds, executive secretary of the Canadian Labor Congress, told the delegates that the Trudeau government's recent economic proposals would put a ceiling on wages while providing no effective restraints on other forms of income.

The CLC's response was a nine-point program that could form the basis of labor's cooperation in solving Canada's economic crisis, he said.

In spite of the CLC's proposals, Simonds noted, the Canadian government on Oct. 14 announced a program of wage and price "restraints" that would limit wage increases to 8 percent the first year, provide for an additional 2 percent for "catch-up" because of increased living costs, and an additional catch-up of 2 percent where it can be justified by productivity increases.

Under the program, wage increases would be subject to a minimum of $600 and a maximum of $2,400 in that year, he explained. Prices would be allowed to increase only where it could be proven that production costs have risen, he said.

Because of the recent developments regarding wage and price controls, he said, the "system of free collective bargaining and the structure of the trade unions themselves have come under question."

Printing Crafts Gaining Support In Strike Against Washington Post

Support for striking printing trades at the Washington Post is growing in response to an appeal from the Greater Washington Central Labor Council in calling for a fair settlement of the dispute.

The strike, now in its third week, began Oct. 1 when newspaper pressmen of the Printing & Graphic Communications Union walked out after their contract expired. Photoengravers of the Graphic Arts International Union and the Mailers local of the International Typographical Union went on strike a few days later.

Other craft unions are honoring the picket lines of the three striking unions. More than half of the 840-member unit of the Newspaper Guild is also refusing to report for work, a local Guild representative said. The executive board of the Guild local directed members of the Post unit to respect the picket lines and scheduled an immediate referendum of the entire local membership on the board's order.

The central labor council noted that this is the third strike at the newspaper in 24 months and reflects the failure of the Post's labor relations policies.

In issuing its appeal for support of the strikers, the council said that it condemned the violence associated with the strike, but also expressed concern over the "vicious anti-union conduct" of the Post management. The council placed the Post on its unfair list until a just settlement is made.

Meanwhile, the Post has been publishing abbreviated editions at six non-union plants outside of Washington and at the Post plant.

But circulation of the Post, which has a daily run of more than 500,000 and 700,000 on Sundays, has plunged. The coordinated union strike headquarters reported that the newspaper had received thousands of cancellations.

The company has charged the pressmen of sabotaging operations by damaging the presses before going out on strike.

James A. Dugan, president of the pressmen's local, said that the company "made no real effort to meet with us." Dugan said wages were not the key issue in the contract talks, stressing that the membership was attempting to stave off attempts of management to eliminate its hard-won gains of the past two decades.

He said that because of the company's hard line in the bargaining, some pressmen on the eve of the strike apparently took out their frustrations by damaging the presses.

When union machinists refused to enter the struck plant to restore the presses, the company recruited non-union mechanics to handle repairs. Several presses are now in operation, but the Post continues to publish thin editions of the paper.

The mechanical operations of the newspaper production are being handled by supervisors, executives and some non-union employes in the Guild's jurisdiction, the Washington Guild local said.

The Post had been cross-training executives, personnel officials, supervisors, advertising salesmen and others for the past two years to take over the mechanical operations in the event of a strike.

Mark J. Meagher, executive vice president of the Post, said at a press conference that most of the training took place at the Newspaper Production Research Center in Oklahoma City. That facility has often been termed by members of printing trades unions as a "scab training school."

Armed with this backup crew of "pressmen" the Post hardened its bargaining stance in the negotiations prior to the strike.

Job Issues Dominate Iowa State Convention

Dubuque, Iowa—Labor's program to put the nation back to work was reinforced at the Iowa AFL-CIO's 20th annual convention as delegates explored the impact of state legislative priorities and Ford Administration economic policies.

State Federation President Hugh D. Clark termed 1975 "a bleak" year, in which joblessness has approached depression levels.

Alan Kistler, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, told the 300 delegates that an essential step in achieving labor's goals will be the election of the labor-supported candidates in the 1976 elections.

Kistler said that the nation's economic problems stem from "an unwillingness or inability of those in power to recognize our problems" and to correct them.

Lowell Goss, president of the Iowa Farmers Union, said in an address during the three-day convention that the Administration's failure to adopt a responsible food policy is driving a wedge of misunderstanding between farmers and consumers.

He also warned that an unregulated program of grain sales to the Soviet Union could bring the same inflationary impact that occurred in 1972 when the USSR made massive purchases of U.S. wheat.

The convention called for a state legislation to prohibit employers from monitoring telephone calls of employes in their workplaces to curb the invasion of privacy.

Delegates also approved a 1-cent increase in the monthly per capita tax to finance an oral labor history project conducted in cooperation with the University of Iowa. The per capita tax hike to 31 cents goes into effect Jan. 1.

Convention resolutions called for passage of the labor-backed National Health Security bill, support of the United Farm Workers, and opposition to legislation banning disposable bottles and cans.

Degree Plan Enrolls 44 At Labor Studies Center

Forty-four union officers and full-time staff members are now enrolled in a unique college degree program established by the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center in cooperation with Antioch College. The program leads to a bachelor of arts degree in labor studies from Antioch.

The core of the program is the Labor Studies major which enables students to relate their day-to-day activities in the labor movement to general economic, social and political developments.

Courses are offered in such areas as labor law and legislation, collective bargaining, labor history and labor and politics. Additional credit toward the major is available for competence gained through experience in the labor movement; the student gets some college credits for his regular trade union activity. The program requires substantial course work in the social sciences, humanities and the sciences.

The most distinctive feature of the center's college degree program is the way it is adapted to fit the needs of individuals who cannot attend regular classes at traditional schools or colleges. The degree program revolves around week-long "in-residence" sessions every six months at the center's campus at Silver Spring, Md.

At these sessions, students begin their courses with intensive classroom experiences. During the following six months each student works independently, completing assignments, conferring with instructors by mail and phone before returning to the center to complete the work and begin another set of courses.

In addition to credits earned directly through the program, students receive credit for other learning experiences such as previous college work, experience in the labor movement, long-term labor education programs and technical and vocational education.

Of the 44 who are currently studying for the labor studies degree, all but five have some previous college credits. Most have had the equivalent of two years in college. Twenty are officers of local unions, 12 of international unions, five of district or regional union councils or joint boards, three of city central labor bodies and one of a state federation. One is on the staff of the AFL-CIO while two others come from allied organizations. They are members of 24 national or international unions. Their average age is 37.5.

Any union officer, representative or full time staff member interested in the college degree program can get complete information by contacting the College Degree Coordinator, AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md., 20903. The phone number is 301/431-6401).

Political Action

THE SUCCESSES in 1974 elections created the problems for 1976. Chief among them is the need to retain the many congressional districts that switched from conservative to progressive in the last election.

The continuing development of COPE programs and their growing acceptance and support within the trade union family are encouraging signs that labor's political activities will be able to meet this challenge.

However, to assure full labor movement support of COPE and its goals and to enhance the prospects of its endorsed candidates in 1976, we recommend:

1. Total commitment at all levels of the labor movement to achieve victory at the polls in 1976.

2. Establishment of a COPE committee in every affiliated local union to do its utmost to assure political participation by every union member and voting-age member of his or her family. Our minimum goal should be to get every union member and every voting-age member of his or her family to register, vote and contribute $2 to COPE.

3. Increased efforts at all levels to communicate the issues and candidates' records with our members on a continuing basis.

—Adopted by 11th AFL-CIO convention.

Women Workers

WOMEN ARE TURNING TO the trade union movement in ever-increasing numbers as the only effective means of gaining and maintaining justice and equality. Their number continues to grow as organizing drives push forward.

The importance of women as trade unionists must be recognized and their full participation encouraged. A good union contract is not only the most effective guarantee against economic exploitation, but it is also the basis upon which true equality can be built.

Therefore, the AFL-CIO calls upon its affiliates to:

1. Reaffirm their commitment to the equality of women, especially equal opportunity for women in the work place.

2. Continue to combat discrimination at the bargaining table by seeking to eliminate all wage differentials based on sex; provide for sickness and accident benefits for pregnancy and maternity leave paid on the same basis as any other disability; job posting and upgrading; and supporting expansion of applicable state laws which now protect only women to protect men.

3. Urge Congress to pass fully adequate child care legislation.

4. Encourage full participation of women in all union activity.

5. Endorse the Equal Rights Amendment as a clear statement of commitment to the principles of equality of the sexes and urge all affiliates to work for ratification of ERA in the remaining state legislatures.

—Adopted by 11th AFL-CIO convention.

A Word Edgewise:

Moynihan Deserves a Medal For His Counterpunch to Amin

By John P. Roche

AS ONE WHO VALUES civility, I am disturbed when debate in Congress, the United Nations, or anywhere else degenerates into a slanging match. However, when someone starts to fight on this level, he has named the game, and I will be delighted to play.

Ambassador Daniel Patrick Moynihan's observation about Uganda's President-Field Marshal-tinpot gangster Idi Amin thus struck me as an admirable counterpunch. The interesting thing was not that Moynihan accurately referred to Amin as a "racist murderer," but that he had to do so at the AFL-CIO convention in San Francisco, where presumably he was out of reach of the State Dept.'s tsk-tsk brigade. Now the Coup of the Month Club—the "Third World"—is scurrying around the United Nations collecting signatures on anti-Moynihan petitions and demanding his replacement. I have started a campaign of my own to get him a medal.

Perhaps I feel more strongly about this than most because of past experiences abroad, at the UN, and in Washington. In 1959, for example, when in France as a Fulbright professor, I was asked by the U.S. Information Agency to give some lectures on civil rights in the United States—one of my areas of historical specialization. I gave them with the bark off: American deficiencies were not tucked under the rug, but neither was our remarkable improvement over the past half-century. In the question period I quickly realized the audience had been packed by the Communists—one after another, various characters rose and instead of asking questions gave speeches denouncing every aspect of American life.

I decided to close this playground. Taking the offensive, I inquired why the questioners were so concerned about civil rights in the United States when even the right of habeas corpus was missing in France? (De Gaulle later introduced this procedure.) Continuing on this track, I listed all the liberties Americans enjoyed and the French lacked and wound up by noting that in percentage terms more American blacks went to college than young French men and women. In short, I got my therapy.

Much to my surprise, the American authorities seemed profoundly distressed by this friendly give and take—I was told not to engage in "controversy" which might reflect upon the Fulbright program.

In 1965, when I was lecturing in Italy under State Dept. auspices, I must have touched off another flurry. Again the audience was stacked by the Communists and a 15-minute question explained that American non-recognition of Red China was a bad thing. I agreed—the policy of "Two Chinas" most liberals held made sense to me—and this information was featured next day in a local paper. Fortunately our public affairs officer in Rome was a man of sense and sensibility: when we met, he grinned and said, "When will you learn that it is un-American to be controversial?"

ENTERING PRESIDENT JOHNSON'S White House, I resolved to reform, at least to the extent of refraining from irony (which can get you into more trouble than arson). However, in early 1967 I was talking about Vietnam "off the record" to a group of Young Democrats. As usual, the question period was my undoing: in explaining why things were such a mess I observed that we were "seven months pregnant before we knew we'd been had." A Washington Post reporter outside the meeting had this gem in 10 minutes, and next morning it was on page one. State and Defense were unsettled and, arriving at the White House, I had the strange feeling people were measuring me for a coffin.

Sure enough, no sooner was I settled in my office than the direct presidential phone went off like a fire alarm. President Johnson, too politely I thought, inquired how come I made the funny papers. I explained it was supposedly "off the record." He chuckled, dryly congratulated me on my vivid metaphor, and ended the matter with the observation, "Johnnie, the only things off the record are those you don't say."

Similarly, he seemed privately pleased when I addressed the UN press corps on Vietnam, was assailed hip and thigh, and fought back with extemporaneous vigor. Yet when I suggested to him that our representatives at the UN should fight fire with fire, he backed off, saying there is a kind of contest you don't get into with a skunk.

This argument does not impress me: I'm delighted that President Ford has unleashed Moynihan. It's time we stopped playing the polite patsy.

For Poor, Minority Youths:

Jobs Crisis Threatens Era Of 'Economic Untouchables'

By Bayard Rustin

HIDDEN BY THE HEADLINES of recession and unemployment, there is an unnoticed social crisis with frightening implications. We are perilously close to creating a generation of economic untouchables. Unless the economy is quickly turned around to sustained full employment we risk sentencing a generation of minority youth to growing up without meaningful job experiences.

A few statistics indicate the magnitude of the problem. Among 20 to 24 year old men as a whole the official jobless rate is 14.2 percent—about double the rate of 1973 and triple the rate of the late 1960s. An even more depressing statistic is that black teenage unemployment is officially put at 34.7 percent, while many economists believe that it is actually closer to 50 or 60 percent. And as if the prospects of ghetto youth were not dim enough, with unemployment in many inner city areas above 50 percent, they have little reason to expect their prospects to improve in the forseeable future.

These young people are being told that they can make no useful contribution to society, that their abilities and aspirations are superfluous. They are going to be on welfare not just for one year, but for three or four. Their options will be restricted to welfare, or hustling, or marginal, temporary, dead-end jobs. Their self-esteem will have been badly, if not permanently, damaged and their attachment to society will be fragile at best.

Today, unlike 15 years ago, to talk of racism as the cause of unemployment among blacks or black youth merely diverts us from the real causes and practical solutions.

The causes of unemployment among minority youth include the growing reliance upon automation and cybernation in production, the failures of education in the inner city, the disastrous welfare system, the lack of efficient mass transportation to get the poor to the jobs, and the creation of most new jobs in the suburbs.

A whole series of governmental programs have made it more difficult for youngsters from poor families to get jobs. These programs, of course, did not have the purpose of creating or preserving employment. For the most part they are well-intentioned programs that have pursued useful goals. But in the process they have ignored or inflamed other pressing social problems.

A shocking example of the tendency of government programs to ignore the need for minority youth employment is CETA, the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act. Designed to train and employ the unemployed, the unskilled and the semi-skilled, CETA has been diverted into a program to mostly re-employ fired city employes.

The corruption of CETA's purpose is the result of the failure of the Ford Administration to develop a genuine program for economic recovery. CETA has been asked to perform a task—fighting overall unemployment — for which it was neither designed nor adequately funded. Consequently, the problems of structural unemployment, of unskilled and semi-skilled youth have been left unattended.

IT IS ABSOLUTELY ESSENTIAL that job training programs continue even during the recession and that they be expanded. But these programs will be doomed to ineffectuality unless they take place within a growing, fully employed economy.

In the absence of a healthy economy, we are witnessing a brutal return and intensification of the cycle of poverty. During the Kennedy-Johnson years, when we had steady economic growth, that cycle was broken and 15 million people moved out of poverty. But in three of the five years before 1975, the number of poor increased. In 1974 alone 1.3 million people were thrown back into poverty. Even more have been tossed back into despair and deprivation by the present recession, the worst since the 1930s.

The reversal of the pattern of across-the-board gains of the 1960s is cruel and wasteful. Those thrown back into proverty in the last six years had only begun to have real hope for the future and confidence in the willingness of the larger society to make full use of their skills and abilities.

For poor and minority youth this has a most devastating impact. It is almost guaranteed to produce discouraged, embittered, and frustrated young men and women.

The nation, no less than black Americans, cannot afford to tolerate the creation of a generation of economic untouchables. This catastrophe can be avoided if the nation acts quickly and forcefully to restore the economy to full employment and if there is a renewed dedication to the elimination of poverty and injustice. Central to such an effort must be a massive program of job-training and job-creating for disadvantaged youth.

Federal Efforts Improved:

Stories on Overpayment Twist Role of Supplemental Benefits

UNBALANCED REPORTING of overpayments and other errors have painted a distorted picture of the new Supplemental Security Income program that is aimed at putting more equity into helping the nation's aged, blind and disabled, AFL-CIO social insurance expert Lawrence Smedley declared.

Noting that SSI combined into a single federal program the widely differing state programs, Smedley stressed that the error rate has in fact fallen since the Social Security Administration began handling the programs, and will improve even more in the near future.

"Error is a fundamental characteristic of any means-tested program," he said, pointing out that the federal system has to rely on income and other eligibility data from the states, and that the time lag rules out the kind of day-to-day updates that can alter eligibility and payment amounts.

Smedley, who is assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, said that while there are "some valid criticisms" of SSI, charges of runaway overpayments and "accusations of scandal are simply not accurate." He said that in any program involving some 4.5 million beneficiaries there could be "some cheating," but it is certainly not widespread among SSI beneficiaries, who are "among the poorest people in our nation."

Appearing on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Smedley said that administration of the SSI program has also been hampered by short-funding and lack of experienced personnel. He said that more than 30,000 employes were involved in administration of the programs at the state level, but the original authorization for the Social Security Administration was only 15,000 SSI employes. Noting that the current authorization has been raised to 23,000 employes for SSI, he said that is probably enough to do the job.

Smedley said it is doubtful that much of the $400 million in overpayments will ever be recovered, particularly in view of continuing inflation and the low level of benefits. He also noted that many of the beneficiaries involved are very old, and that "the death rate is very high."

Smedley was questioned by Duane Emme of Press Associates, Inc. and John Grimes, freelance reporter and writer on labor and economic issues.

Full Measure of Quality!

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

ALCOHOLICS WHO HAVE done something to arrest their illness will tell you that alcoholism is caused by drinking too much booze.

In the dictionary, you'll find that an alcoholic is "a person suffering from alcoholism." That's simple enough, even if it doesn't give you any details.

Leo Perlis, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services, is upset that the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse & Alcoholism (NIAAA) has managed to gobbledegook definitions so that an alcoholic worker has become a "troubled employe," and an alcoholism program in industry is "an employe assistance program."

Federal defenders of the "broad brush" approach to the booze problem argue that employers will not "buy" a straight alcoholism program because their employes resent the term "alcoholic." The NIAAA defenders of obfuscation also argue that alcoholic employes have a variety of other problems.

The National Council on Alcoholism, a private organization, last June adopted a resolution saying that the best way to counteract any stigma attached to the term alcoholism "is to forthrightly identify it by name in all preventive, educational and program activities."

And, says Perlis, the federal government's NIAAA "should be among the first to point out that obscurantism neither prevents nor cures."

He is especially indignant about the bureaucratic argument that alcoholics also have other problems. "Permit me to assure them," he says, "that all employes have other problems—marital problems, parental problems, money problems, health problems, legal problems, and employer problems. You name them and they have them. And that goes for employes with diabetes, emphysema, cancer, heart disease, arthritis, neurosis, psychosis—and alcoholism."

LABOR TRIED TO convince the federal people that the "broad brush" approach to the problem of alcoholism was ill-conceived. But the federal defenders of the dogma rejected criticism, promoted "their ill-conceived theories everywhere, made it a factor in funding and instituted no valid controls."

Last May Perlis sent a letter to labor representatives on the subject. He stated that "we have avoided all current 'catch-all' phrases and programs such as 'troubled employe,' 'broad brush,' and 'employe assistance.'" Perlis said such programs were designed to "lump all job problems and behavioral ailments into one basket."

"If a program is an alcoholism program," Perlis wrote, "then we should call it by its proper name. If it isn't, then it shouldn't fly under false colors and use funds appropriated by Congress exclusively for alcoholism."

Alcoholics Anonymous, recognized as a successful program for the treatment of alcoholism, does not engage in "public controversy." But AA members with whom the matter was discussed agreed that "we have the right to expect plain language instead of euphemism from people engaged in the fight against alcoholism."

In June, a House Appropriations subcommittee said it was concerned that NIAAA was promoting "catch-all" health and job-problem programs "instead of concentrating on specific problems of the alcoholic worker." The subcommittee said NIAAA "should not offer programs or guidelines that might interfere with the collective bargaining process."

The Senate Appropriations Committee this September took a similar dim view of NIAAA's "broad-brush," "troubled-employe" approach to the problem of alcoholism.

One old veteran drunk, sober and happy these many years in AA, commented:

"Hell, if the people who are supposed to be treating alcoholics won't call a booze problem a booze problem how can they expect the alcoholic, himself, to face up to the problem? There's nothing the practicing alcoholic likes better than to blame his alcoholism on something else."

OVERBLOWN STORIES on errors in payments to the needy under Supplemental Security Income have distorted the true role of the federal program, Assistant Director Lawrence Smedley, center, of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Duane Emme, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and John Grimes, free lance reporter and writer. The program was taped shortly before Emme was hospitalized with a heart ailment that led to his death.

Union Showtime In San Francisco

The AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center in cooperation with the federation's performing arts unions treated delegates to the AFL-CIO's 11th convention to the tops in musical and dramatic fare.

An Evening with Actors, on Oct. 2, featured Equity President Theodore Bikel and David Hurst of Southern Methodist University's drama department in a comedy skit.

On Oct. 6, the program was highlighted by performances by Rudy Salvini's jazz group and members of the famed San Francisco Opera Co., soprano Linda Roack and tenor Gary Burgess. Salvini's group belongs to the AFM. The operatic performers are members of the American Guild of Variety Artists.

Following performances on both evenings, participating artists engaged in a dialogue with the audience, discussing and answering questions about their work and their unions. The programs were similar to those held regularly at the Labor Studies Center in Silver Spring, Md., under financial grants from the Foundation for the Arts.

Television artist Kathleen Nolan.

Character actress Kathleen Freeman.

Duet by members of the San Francisco Opera Co. highlighted entertainment.

Executive Board Expanded:

Transit Union Votes Per Capita Increase

Calgary, Alberta—A per capita tax increase of $1.35 and an expansion of the union's executive board were approved by delegates to the 43rd biennial convention of the Amalgamated Transit Union.

The 500 delegates also approved a resolution calling for the resignation of President Gerald Ford as it blamed his "government of do-nothingness by veto" for the nation's economy, energy and social problems.

The convention acknowledged, however, that the possibility of Ford's resignation is remote, and agreed to intensify the ATU's political efforts on all levels to work toward his defeat in 1976.

In approving the per capita increase, which raises monthly payments from $2.65 to $4, the convention authorized the ATU to determine in what areas the added revenues should be spent to keep the union moving forward "at a time of great change within the transit industry and a time of overall economic hardship."

To provide more service for the members and obtain more input from them, the convention voted to expand the general executive board from nine to 24 members by placing the 10 international vice presidents on the board and creating five at-large positions to be filled by local division officers.

The convention also reaffirmed the ATU's support of organized labor's legislative programs, COPE, the initiation of urban no-fare transit, and increased government subsidy of mass transit systems.

The delegates received a report that approximately 12,000 new members had been added to the union's rolls since the previous convention. It was also reported that the ATU would engage in further organizing activities "wherever such opportunities may occur."

In other internal matters, President Dan V. Maroney, Jr., was re-elected, as was Executive Vice President Edward W. Oliver. John W. Rowland, who had been filling the unexpired term of retired Sec.-Treas. James J. Hill, was elected to that post for his first full term.

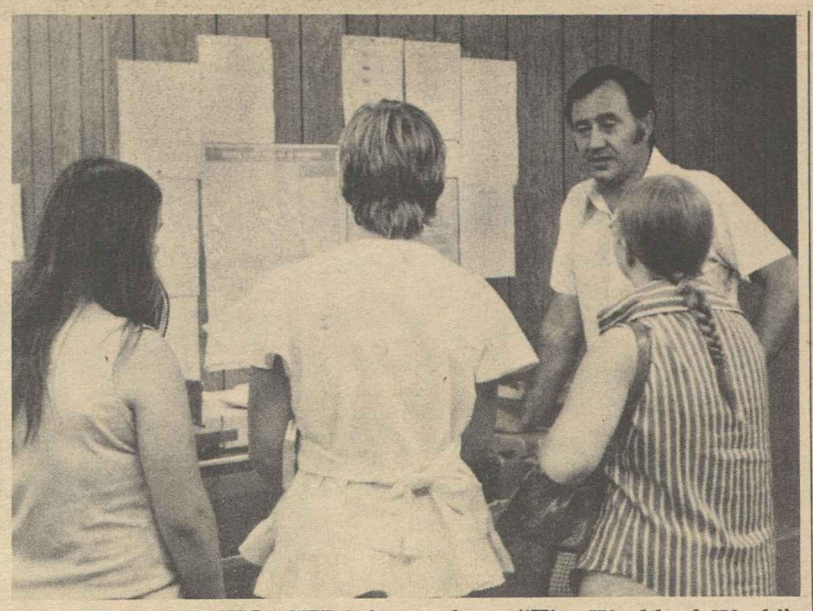
In a telegraphed message to the convention, AFL-CIO President George Meany cited the responsibility of union leaders "to our members and to our fellow countrymen to present policies and programs that will put unemployed workers back to work, reverse the erosion in the living standards of working people and restore the concept that government must be responsive to the needs of its citizens."

Meany praised the ATU as one of the pacemakers "in proposing solutions to this country's mass transit problems, with its implications on energy policy."

A call for greater cooperation between management and labor in the transit industry was issued to the delegates by James L. Kerrigan, president of Greyhound Lines, Inc.

"We have many common problems that represent a greater outside threat to our companies and our jobs than ever before," Kerrigan said. "Those of us who communicate and cooperate will be the ones that survive. . . . All of our labor-management problems have not been solved, but I believe that together we have made a beginning and that our example can serve the interests of our employes, our customers and our stockholders."

Other speakers who addressed the convention included President Matthew Guinan of the Transport Workers Union of America, Executive Director Norman Hill of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, President William C. Marshall of the Michigan AFL-CIO, a member of the ATU, and Sec.-Treas. Donald Montgomery of the Canadian Labor Congress.



MONTANA TEENAGERS learn about "The World of Work" from Executive Sec. James W. Murry of the Montana AFL-CIO in an innovative youth program sponsored by the state federation. The program also covered alcohol and drug abuse problems, grooming, job interviews, and employer-employe relations.

6 Percent Pay Boosts Settle Teacher Strikes

The Teachers wrapped up nearly all their contract disputes of the current school year but the agreement in the nation's largest city remained tenuous and threatened to come apart because of New York's shaky financial situation.

Major strikes in Boston, Berkeley, Calif., and Wilmington, Del., were resolved through contract settlements or, in the case of Berkeley, by sending the dispute to an arbitration panel. Only in Bristol, Conn., and in Cahokia, Ill., were AFT locals still on strike.

The Teachers reported their highest level of strike activity this year, about twice as high as in 1974. AFT members participated in 38 walkouts in 10 states this year. The strikes involved 110,000 teachers.

In Wilmington, 1,000 teachers approved a new three-year contract providing 6 percent raises in January 1976, July 1976 and January 1978. Ratification of the pact ended a strike that began on Sept. 2 and had become the longest teachers' strike of 1975.

I. James Warnick, president of AFT Local 762 in Wilmington, attributed the settlement to the union's solidarity in the face of the city's attempt to break it. The dispute was marked by mass arrests, heavy fines and an unprecedented curfew against the teachers.

The AFT's Boston strike ended after two weeks when the teachers voted by a 7 to 1 margin to accept a one-year contract providing a 6 percent wage increase. The agreement also provided improvements in the local's health and welfare plan.

In Berkeley, striking teachers went back to class to await the outcome of a settlement that refers all outstanding issues to an impartial three-member panel. The strike was prompted by the school board's argument that it did not have the funds to provide wage increases and would have to lay off a large number of teachers.

Meanwhile, the new Emergency Financial Control Board in New York City announced it had rejected last month's agreement between the Board of Education and the United Federation of Teachers —even as the union braced for further cuts in the school budget. The reason given was that the cost of the new two-year pact was more than the ceiling alloted for the city's schools.

AFT officials accused the control board—established to review all new city contracts to help New York out of its grim financial situation—of undermining the basic foundations of collective bargaining. As for the proposed new budget cuts, AFT President Albert Shanker said the reductions would make "a baby-sitting operation" of the nation's largest school system.

In Bristol, Conn., some 640 teachers continued their strike for higher wages, and in Cahokia, Ill., 380 teachers were off their jobs over economic issues. Both strikes were entering their third week.

2¢ Equity Hike Recommended To Shopcrafts

A presidential emergency fact-finding board recommended that railroad shopcraft unions be given a 2-cent-an-hour equity pay increase to enable them to gain parity with machinists of operating rail unions.

The three-member panel, appointed by President Ford last month to block a strike by the shopcraft unions, also proposed adjustments and clarifications in work rules on subcontracted work.

The board's recommendations were part of its report on the long-standing dispute between the four unions that make up the AFL-CIO Railway Employes' Dept. and the nation's major carriers. The unions are the Firemen & Oilers, the Carmen, Boilermakers-Blacksmiths and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The report marks the last step toward resolution of the dispute under the Railway Labor Act. The two sides now have until Nov. 9 to act on the recommendations. If no agreement is reached by that date, the unions would be free to strike.

Eleven rail unions already have accepted a new settlement with the carriers. Generally, the pattern agreement has provided a 41 percent boost in wages and fringe benefits over a three-year period. The shopcraft unions refused to go along with the pattern, citing a number of special problems affecting their members.

Landmark Laws Hailed At Illinois Convention

Springfield, Ill.—More than 2,300 delegates to the 18th annual convention of the Illinois AFL-CIO hailed the enactment of a number of long-sought state legislative goals, protested a veto, and urged action in other areas.

State AFL-CIO President Stanley L. Johnson thanked Gov. Daniel Walker, a convention speaker, for signing bills barring the importation of professional strikebreakers into Illinois, establishing a model workers compensation law, improving unemployment benefits and raising the state minimum wage.

But the convention also protested the governor's veto of a school aid bill and urged the legislature to override it.

The state labor federation will also continue to press for passage of a public employe bargaining law, Johnson declared.

Other resolutions supported passage of the Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution, backed the International Women's Year, and called for a state law barring the use of injunction to break strikes. The injunction was used as a tool in the recent Chicago teachers strike and resulted in the two-time jailing of the president of the AFT local.

Sen. Adlai Stevenson (D-Ill.), in an address to the convention, found "nothing wrong with this country that a Democratic president couldn't solve." He charged that the White House, under Republican Administrations, failed to provide national leadership. And President Ford, he said, has neither a domestic nor a foreign policy.

Sen. Charles Percy (R-Ill.) urged continuation of at least a portion of the individual income tax cuts put into effect this year. Percy maintained that the keystone to economic recovery is renewed confidence among consumers and producers.

President Sol C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers called for curbs on the export of American jobs by multinational corporations.

The United States cannot be a country of paper and pencil pushers, Chaikin said. "We must be a country of working people, who work with the sweat of their brow, with their hands, with their muscles and their heads," he said.

Johnson and Sec.-Treas. Robert G. Gibson were re-elected to new four-year terms without opposition. The new terms begin next Apr. 1.

Also re-elected or elected without opposition was the executive board of 16 incumbent vice presidents and 3 new vice presidents. Retiring vice presidents Thomas J. Burke, former president of Janitors Local 25, and Joseph Germano, former director of Steelworkers District 31, were named vice presidents emeritus.

Broadway Musicians Score Major Gains

New York—Broadway musical houses lit up again as the Musicians ended their 25-day strike to preserve work rules and improve salaries.

The walkout ended with ratification of a new three-year contract covering some 900 members of AFM Local 802. The main point in dispute had been an attempt by theater owners to end a requirement in the old contract that a minimum number of union musicians be employed for certain productions.

Local 802 President Max Arons noted that in addition to wage increases the agreement maintains the minimums, with only minor adjustments at three of the 12 musical houses involved.

Under the contract, which is retroactive to Sept. 3, the musicians' base pay rises immediately from $290 a week to $350. In 1976, the figure goes to $370 and in 1977 to $380. Vacation schedules are improved and pension benefits remain as they were.

The negotiations were conducted with the League of New York Theaters & Producers which represents 30 musical and straight dramatic theaters in the city.

The union gave up its Sunday premium pay and agreed to a freeze of premiums for on-stage and in-costume musicians at $42 and $24 for existing shows. However, in new shows, these premiums will be reduced to $21 and $12.

Rehearsal pay was increased to $10 an hour for two and a half hours minimum for the term of the agreement. The rate was $7 an hour under the old contract.

Arons expressed his satisfaction with the complex agreement, particularly the initial wage increase.

During the strike, nine major musical productions suspended performances and three others delayed their openings.

Mill Vote Won By Textile Union

Belton, S.C.—The Textile Workers Union of America won a representation election in a unit of 135 workers at Essex International's blanket division here.

It was the third TWUA election victory in the South within a month. Other wins were at plants in Rome, Ga., and Charlotte, N.C.

We Love You, Too, Mr. Congressman

When the House passed the jobsite picketing bill, Rep. Robert E. Bauman (R-Md.) explained why he had cast an anti-union vote against the bill.

Labor, he said, was acting like a little boy who wants "every piece of chocolate in the candy shop." And Bauman, "like the wise parent of that little boy," declared that "it is only because each and every member of this Congress loves you in our own particular way that we must deny your unreasonable demand."

A majority of House members had a different concept of "love" for labor, however. They voted for the bill.

Jobs, Energy, Budget:

Votes on Key Issues Confront Congress

Americans will have less take-home pay.

In fact, as the AFL-CIO has pointed out, the $8 billion tax cut in effect for 1975 would have to be raised to $12 billion for 1976, merely to keep withholding taxes at present levels. That's because the 1975 cut didn't take effect until April and was compressed into a nine-month period in terms of the withholding tax formula.

President Ford has sought to use the strong congressional sentiment for renewing the tax cut as a bludgeon for his demand for a hold-down on government spending.

He has demanded that Congress agree in advance to match a 1976 tax cut package for business and individuals with a dollar-for-dollar reduction in the projected budget for the 1977 fiscal year. Otherwise, Ford warned, he wouldn't hesitate to veto a tax cut bill.

The Ways & Means Committee is expected to reach an early decision on extension of the tax cut at least through next year. Committee Chairman Al Ullman (D-Ore.) branded Ford's attempt to couple it with a budget cut "totally preposterous."

Still ahead for both the House and Senate is another step in the congressional budget-setting procedure—a review of the spending targets established earlier this year and the setting of firmer figures.

The self-imposed spending ceiling has swayed votes away from programs the AFL-CIO considered important to economic recovery. And in some job-creating areas, funds included in the congressional budget target have been blocked by presidential vetoes.

In recent testimony, AFL-CIO President George Meany prodded Congress to stop playing "budget one-upmanship" with the Ford Administration and do more to get America back to work.

On legislation of special interest to unions, the House will be acting soon on a bill to lift Hatch Act restrictions on political activities by federal and postal employes.

The labor-backed bill, sponsored by Rep. William L. Clay (D-Mo.) and backed by the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee, would protect government workers from political pressures.

But it would affirm the right of government workers, as with other citizens, to participate voluntarily in the political life of the nation.

On the Senate side, although no firm date has been set, both the Construction Industry Collective Bargaining bill and the jobsite picketing bill are expected to be brought up—whether or not threats of a filibuster by anti-union senators are carried out. Both bills have already passed the House and have the endorsement of the Senate Labor Committee.

Another unresolved issue, awaiting a House-Senate conference agreement, is an appropriations bill that carries a Senate rider barring enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act in establishments with fewer than four workers. There is no such restriction in the House-passed version.

Lie Detector Ban In New Hotel Pact

A new three-year contract covering 7,000 members of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees at 35 Washington, D.C., hotels includes among its fringe benefits a dental care plan, the birthday of Martin Luther King, Jr., as an additional holiday, a fourth week of vacation after 15 years—and a ban on lie detector tests.

The contract, which averted a scheduled strike, provides wage increases of $33.80 for non-tipped workers and $18 for tipped workers.

Voluntary Approach To Metrics Pressed

Conversion to the metric system of weights and measures should be "entirely voluntary" and not the result of government pressure, the AFL-CIO said at Senate hearings.

Legislative Rep. Kenneth Peterson opposed any legislation that would commit the federal government to the metric system or set up a timetable for conversion.

Instead, he urged acceptance of a House-passed bill that he termed "generally in line with the position of the AFL-CIO."

The House measure, passed in early September, would establish an independent U.S. Metric Board with representation from labor and other interested groups. The board would facilitate voluntary conversion to metrics and help develop an educational program to familiarize Americans with the metric system. It would also study and make recommendations dealing with problems of conversion, including the impact on workers, consumers and on small firms.

Peterson told the Senate Commerce Committee that the AFL-CIO does not agree with the assumption of most proponents of the metric system that "costs should lie where they fall" and that workers with investments in tools of their craft should absorb their loss.

Labor's position, he testified, is for "full reimbursement to workers" for new tools and all other costs associated with any metric system legislation.

An AFL-CIO convention resolution, anticipating the enactment of the House-passed bill with few changes, urged affiliates to participate actively in all levels of metric system planning.

ture subcommittee that allowing strikers to qualify for food stamps has a "crippling effect" on collective bargaining. He termed it "an outrage" to allow food stamps for persons who "voluntarily refrain from working."

Mayer countered that the real goal of the anti-striker campaign is "a humble, docile and hungry labor force."

He noted that the Buckley bill not only seeks to starve strikers back to work, but also would deny food stamps to the family of any unemployed worker who quit a job "without good cause" or who refused to strikebreak.

As for attempts by conservatives, including Administration spokesmen, to portray food stamps as an experimental program that went wild in cost escalation, Mayer noted the relationship between unemployment and food stamp participation. In September 1974, when the jobless rate was 5.8 percent, 15 million Americans received food assistance. By May 1975, when unemployment reached 9.2 percent, the food stamp rolls rose to 19.5 million. Since then, following the slight dip in joblessness, they declined to 18.8 million.

Far from being "a well-known haven for chiselers and ripoff artists," as Treasury Sec. William E. Simon has charged, investigations found fraud in only 8/100ths of 1 percent of food stamp households.

"Workers do not want food stamps and they do not want welfare," Mayer testified. "They want jobs which will pay decent wages and benefits, so that they can raise their families in dignity with an American standard of living. But if those jobs are not available, if programs to create work are scuttled . . . then workers and their families will not willingly go hungry," he warned.

President Ford was scheduled to submit the Administration proposal for changes in the food stamp program when Congress reconvened on Oct. 20, and the Senate panel anticipated reopening hearings in November.

In a recent letter to state and local central bodies, AFL-CIO President George Meany warned of a "concerted, coordinated attack" on the food stamp program by the Administration and congressional conservatives.

He linked it to an attack on workers in general involving blocking job-creating legislation, promoting policies that raise the cost of fuel and food, and finally seeking "to starve the jobless and the working poor by knocking them off food stamps."

Los Angeles ITU Local Marks 100th Birthday

Los Angeles—Local 174 of the Typographic Union celebrated its 100th anniversary, and the birthday party at the Convention Center was attended by leading trade unionists from throughout the Los Angeles area.

Mayor Tom Bradley and ITU President Sandy Bevis were among the speakers and Local 174 gave its first honorary membership to William R. Robertson, executive secretary-treasurer of the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO.

Long-Term Joblessness Up Further

Long-term unemployment continued to plague the nation in the third quarter of 1975, as the average duration of joblessness rose from 13.9 to 15.8 weeks, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The increase in long-term unemployment was the third straight quarter in which average duration has risen, BLS noted. The number of persons idle for 15 weeks or more has tripled over the past year, and 1.5 million workers have been out of work for six months or longer, the government added.

BLS said the number of "discouraged" workers—those who are not looking for work because they feel jobs for them do not exist—held steady at 1.2 million over the July-September period. The number of discouraged workers in third-quarter 1974 was 625,000.

The national jobless rate fell to 8.4 percent in the July-September quarter, after reaching a post-World War II peak of 8.9 percent in the year's second quarter. Although representing the first quarterly decline in over two years, the third-quarter jobless rate still was nearly three percentage points above the level of third-quarter 1974.

During the most recent quarter, the jobless rate for adult women dropped to 7.7 percent from 8.5 percent in the previous quarter. The rate for adult men fell from 7.1 to 6.9 percent while the rate of teenage joblessness dropped from 20.5 to 19.8 percent.

White unemployment fell from 8.2 to 7.7 percent in the July-September period. Blacks had a jobless rate of 13.8 percent—down from 14.3 percent in the second quarter.

New Limits Proposed For Asbestos Fibers

this standard unless OSHA's Construction Industry Safety Advisory Committee comes up with a proposal to lower the exposure limit.

When the original standard was being promulgated in 1972, organized labor had sought to get the 2-fiber limit issued immediately. It also urged that the limit be reduced to 1 fiber within a year and eventually to zero.

In a subsequent court suit, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. was unsuccessful in getting a speedier reduction in the exposure level, but an appelate court directed OSHA to review its monitoring regulations and to extend the time period for keeping medical records on workers exposed to asbestos.

The new proposal would require employers to retain monitoring and medical records of their workers for 40 years or for the duration of a worker's employment plus 20 years—whichever is longer. Under the existing standard, monitoring records are retained for three years and medical records for 20 years.

An estimated 50,000 workers are involved in the manufacture of products containing asbestos, the Labor Dept. said. But the number of workers exposed to asbestos on the job is unknown, although the number runs into the millions.

The proposed lead standard would limit worker exposure to 100 micrograms per cubic meter of air. Monitoring would have to begin at 50 micrograms, and any time the level exceeded 100, employers would be required to use all feasible engineering controls to reduce the workplace concentrations.

A new beryllium standard would also bring the exposure level to 100 micrograms per cubic meter of air, down from the existing standard of 200 micrograms.

Other toxic substances in the proposed standards are toluene, trichloroethylene, p-tert-butyltoluene, cumene, ethyl benzene, alpha-Methyl styrene, styrene, vinyl toluene, cyclohexane, camphor, mesityl oxide, 5-methyl-3-heptanone, and ozone.

The proposed standards would allow exposure levels to remain at existing limits. Employers would be required to make the determination of whether the exposure exceeds an action level of one-half the permissible limit for each chemical.

Meanwhile, the Supreme Court refused to review an appeal by the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the Health Research Group challenging OSHA standards on 14 toxic substances suspected of causing cancer among workers. In the court suit, OCAW and HRG charged that the Secretary of Labor did not comply with the mandate of the federal job safety law. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit held, however, that he exercised "reasonable" judgment and deferred to his view of what was practical.

In another development, President Ford announced his intention to nominate Morton Corn, an occupational health professor at the University of Pittsburgh, as assistant secretary of labor for safety and health to succeed John H. Stender who is resigning.

Real Earnings Drop Below 1965 Level

Prices Up 7.8 Percent Over Year

By James M. Shevis

Real spendable average earnings fell in September, leaving American workers a smaller take-home pay than they averaged 10 years ago, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

A worker with three dependents took home seasonally adjusted average weekly earnings of $91.13 this September—19 cents less than he averaged in 1965, BLS announced. Last month's average was 51 cents below the previous month's. All figures are adjusted for the effects of inflation since 1967.

In percentage terms, the September drop in buying power was six-tenths of 1 percent. BLS said real spendable earnings were up 1 percent over the year despite a 2.9 percent decline in real average weekly earnings because of a reduction in federal income tax rates which went into effect last May.

The decrease in real average weekly earnings last month was the result of a six-tenths of 1 percent decline in average weekly hours and a five-tenths of 1 percent rise in the consumer price index, the government said.

The September CPI increase lifted the index to 163.6 of its 1967 base—7.8 percent higher than a year ago. Large increases in local transit fares, college tuition, physicians' fees, gas, electricity, clothing and pork were responsible for most of last month's CPI rise, BLS said.

Meanwhile, the Commerce Dept. reported that real output—gross national product adjusted for inflation—rose at an annual rate of 11.2 percent in the third quarter, compared with 1.9 percent in the April-June quarter. More than half of the increase was due to what Commerce called "a reduced rate of inventory decumulation."

Inventory decumulation, or cutback, amounted to $9.5 billion in the third quarter, compared with $31 billion in the second and $19.2 billion in the first, the government noted. The third-quarter figures are based on preliminary and incomplete source data and are subject to revision, the Commerce Dept. stressed.

Consumer spending in the third quarter increased to $31.4 billion, compared with $25.4 billion in the second.

Business investment in plant and equipment rose slightly, compared

Farm Union Victory Tied To Enforcing Law Fairly

SPECIAL PANEL of the AFL-CIO Executive Council returns from observing representation election at a Watsonville area orchard which the United Farm Workers won overwhelmingly. Hall Panel Cites Flaws, Violations

By Allen Y. Zack

Sacramento, Calif.—If California's new agricultural labor relations law is strictly and fairly enforced, with elections conducted in a "free atmosphere," the votes will go overwhelmingly for the United Farm Workers, AFL-CIO Vice President Paul Hall told a press conference here.

Hall, president of the Seafarers and chairman of a special three-member panel of the AFL-CIO Executive Council sent to California for a first-hand investigation of election practices, said that "proper enforcement of this law" is essential to fair elections.

Hall and the other panel members, Vice Presidents Joseph Keenan, secretary of the International Brotherhood of Electical Workers (IBEW), and Paul Jennings, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers (IUE), spent five days touring key growing areas of the state talking with farm workers, representatives of the Agricultural Labor Relations Board and others involved in enforcement of the law.

The subcommittee members expressed encouragement at the performance of the UFW under "tremendous adversity."

They stressed that the UFW has not lost a single election where it held the contract and had won more than 30 elections on farms where the Teamsters held contracts.

The AFL-CIO convention earlier this month renewed the federation's commitment to the UFW and called

New Wage Law Needed:

$3 Minimum Urged To Combat Poverty

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to raise the minimum wage to $3 an hour as rapidly as possible in order to raise America's lowest-paid workers above the poverty level and give the economy a job-creating stimulus.

Inflation has already frustrated the planned step-up to $2.30 an hour begun in 1974, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller testified. Most workers covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act are now under a $2.10 minimum, which will rise to $2.30 on Jan. 1, 1976. But those whose jobs were more recently brought under the FLSA — including most low-wage groups—aren't scheduled to reach $2.30 until 1977 or, in the case of farm workers, 1978.

Meanwhile, Biemiller told a House Labor subcommittee, the amount of income needed to escape family poverty has long since passed the $2.30 an hour mark and is projected to exceed $3 in 1977.

AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger noted at the hearing that the Consumer Price Index has risen nearly 60 percent since Feb. 1, 1968, when the minimum wage reached the $1.60 level. Over the same period the minimum wage has gone up less than 32 percent.

Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.), the subcommittee chairman, has introduced a bill that would accelerate the minimum wage step-up and reach the $3 level on Jan. 1, 1977 for most workers, and a year later for all other workers.

It also would impose stiffer premium pay penalties for overtime work as a prod to employers to hire new workers when the workload expands. And it would phase out the amount of tip income an employer

Meany Calls Grain Pact 'Good News'

A long-term grain-sale agreement negotiated by the United States and Russia "is good news for American consumers and farmers," AFL-CIO President George Meany declared.

"We believe that it will eliminate the possibility of future Great Grain Robberies, minimize the inflationary impact of grain sales on American consumers and bring stability to the American farmer," Meany said.

As a result of the pact, Meany said, Longshoremen have ended a

Federal Aid Vital in N.Y. Fiscal Crisis

New York—The national implications of a possible default by fiscally troubled New York City spurred renewed efforts in Congress to obtain emergency federal aid for the nation's largest city.

New York City Mayor Abraham D. Beame, appearing before a Senate panel a day after the city teetered on the edge of default, summed up the situation:

"There can no longer be any doubt that without appropriate federal assistance the city of New York will default by the end of the year, triggering national and international consequences that will touch the lives of every American."

House Votes to Lift Hatch Act Curb On Political Rights of U.S. Workers

The House voted 288-119 approval of a labor-backed bill that would allow federal and postal workers to participate voluntarily in the nation's political life—and encourage them to do so.

It would amend the Hatch Act by lifting nearly all restrictions on off-duty voluntary political action, and the harsh penalties of dismissal or 90-days suspension that has had such a chilling effect on the federal civil service.

The legislation, which now goes to the Senate, would continue to protect government workers from political pressures on the job and from coercion to contribute to the party in power.

The Hatch Act amendment carried the endorsement of the recent AFL-CIO convention, and was strongly supported by the federation's government worker unions and the Public Employee Dept.

A letter from AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller, urging House members to support the bill without crippling amendments, said present Hatch Act restrictions deprive several million Americans of full citizenship rights.

The "carefully drafted" bill sent to the House floor, Biemiller stressed, "would significantly enhance the political rights of federal employes while strengthening the protection against improper political activities."

During nearly five hours of debate, the House rejected all amendments that the sponsors of the bill considered harmful.

The key vote came on an amendment by Rep. Joseph L. Fisher (D-boycott of Russian grain shipments.

Signed in Moscow, the agreement provides for a minimum Russian purchase of 6 million metric tons of wheat and corn a year for five years. The Soviets could buy an additional 2 million tons each year but this would require consultations between the two governments and specific permission of the President.

The agreement, which does not become effective until Oct. 1, 1976, ended a two-month ban on further U.S. grain sales to the USSR. President Ford also announced the United States would resume talks with the Soviets later this month on plans to buy up to 200,000 barrels of Russian crude oil a day.

When the Russians last summer purchased massive amounts of U.S. grain, members of the ILA refused to load grain bound for the USSR as a protest against possible price rises to American consumers.

President Ford sent Charles W. Robinson, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, to Moscow to seek an agreement on a more orderly purchase of grain. This was the agreement announced Oct. 20.

"Only such government-to-government negotiations, which we have long sought, can insure that America's tremendous agricultural resources will not be used just for the private profit of grain dealers and speculators," Meany declared. "No longer will the Soviet Union be able to enter U.S. grain markets at will and create chaos through large purchases."

Assistant Agriculture Sec. Richard Bell said the Russians, who purchased 10.3 million tons of American grain before Ford imposed an embargo, may purchase another 6 or 7 million tons this year under the new agreement.

All sales would be executed through private U.S. grain exporters at market prices.

Little Real Progress Seen in Output Report

with a decline in the second quarter. Government purchases of goods and services increased $1.5 billion in the third quarter, just under the $1.9 billion rise in the second.

AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger said he saw "very little forward momentum in this overall picture."

He noted that the level of buying power in the third quarter—despite the effects of the tax rebate and reduced withholdings since last May—was considerably less than what it was in the same quarter two years earlier.

"It would take an increase of about $40 billion in after-tax personal income to bring the average buying power of every man, woman and child in the country to where it was in the fall of 1973 when the recession got under way," Goldfinger observed.

He emphasized that extension of the individual income tax cuts and lower interest rates are needed to pump up retail sales and to stimulate housing.

"Housing is weak and at a very low level and cannot pick up much unless interest rates decline and government programs are implemented," Goldfinger said.

"A continuing improvement of retail sales depends largely on extension of the tax cut and the related degree of consumer confidence."

In another report, the Commerce Dept. said the number of new housing starts in September fell at an annual rate of 2 percent from August levels, to a seasonally adjusted 1.24 million units.

Housing starts are still about 50 percent below 1972 levels and the issuance of permits for future starts indicates little, if any, increase in activity in the next few months.

Reporting on quarterly changes in the consumer price index, the Bureau of Labor Statistics noted that retail prices rose at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 7.3 percent in the three months ended in September. This compared with a 7.1 percent rate in the quarter ended in June and a 6 percent rate in the first quarter.

"Prices in the food and energy components continued to rise substantially but by less than in the second quarter," BLS said. "Prices of other items, on the other hand, rose at a somewhat faster pace. . . ."

The index for non-food commodities rose at a 7.5 percent annual rate in the third quarter, compared with 5.9 percent in the preceding quarter. The rise in the services index during the July-September period was 8.5 percent, compared with 6.3 percent in the second quarter.

Much of September's CPI rise was due to a 1 percent increase in charges for services. All major categories of services except rent increased more in September than in August, BLS said.

Release of Funds Held Limited Housing Aid

The Ford Administration, prodded by a lawsuit challenging government impoundment policies begun in the Nixon days, agreed to free $264.1 million over the next two years to help persons of modest income buy new homes.

But funds for the Section 235 Low-Income Homeownership program will not be available until next spring. Meanwhile, unemployment in the depressed construction industry is still around 20 percent, and the government reported a further decline in housing starts.

Henry B. Schechter, director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Urban Affairs, said release of the funds "will be of some help but it is limited by the absurd mortgage limitations." The program, which has been somewhat revised by the Housing & Urban Development Dept., is geared to the $9,000-$11,000 annual income group.

The maximum allowable mortgage will range from $21,600 to $28,000 at a below-market 5 percent interest rate subsidized by the federal government. Schechter contends these mortgage limitations will not permit construction to go forward at a significant rate in high-cost areas of the country.

"Also, we don't see why the program couldn't get under way sooner," he noted.

HUD Secretary Carla Hills said the goal of the subsidy program is to stimulate production of homes priced under $30,000, adding that it could provide 250,000 newly built or "substantially rehabilitated" houses, condominium units or cooperative apartments.

Funds for the program were frozen by former President Nixon in January 1973 on grounds it was too costly and difficult to administer. President Ford also refused to spend the congressionally appropriated funds.

The General Accounting Office, an arm of Congress, sued HUD last April to release the impounded funds. The suit followed dozens of complaints over the impoundment by housing specialists, congressmen and others, including the AFL-CIO.

At a press conference, Hills said the program could generate $6.5 million in new construction over the next two years and create half a million construction jobs. She said lower-income families now are priced out of the new-home market by interest rates averaging 9 to 9.5 percent and a median price of $39,000 on new homes.

CWA Presses Search For Missing G.I.s

San Francisco — The Communications Workers called on the House of Representatives to give full support to the new select committee created to examine the problem of American servicemen still listed as missing in action.

The CWA board at a meeting here said the fate of approximately 2,500 servicemen remains an unanswered question more than two and a half years after the end of the U.S. combat role in South Vietnam. CWA charged that the federal government has maintained a tight silence about the MIA groups.

New Formula Approved:

OCAW Links Dues To Hourly Pay Rate

Hollywood, Fla.—Delegates to the 13th convention of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers voted to establish a self-adjusting per capita and local dues structure, in addition to spelling out procedures for merger negotiations and re-electing top union officers.

Under the dues formula, monthly per capita payments to the international will be based on the weighted average hourly pay, with members on lower wage scales making lesser payments than those on higher scales.

The per capita currently is $4.80 a month for most of the 180,000 OCAW members and $4.10 for the lower-paid members. With the new rates taking effect Dec. 1, the per capita payments will range from $4.10 to $6 a month.

Annual adjustments, to be initiated Oct. 1, 1976, will provide for an increase in the per capita of 1 cent a month for each negotiated 1-cent raise in the hourly pay of members. Local dues will also be increased by the same hourly wage formula each year.

The new dues structure provides for increasing payments to the OCAW defense fund from the present 82 cents a month to $1. Also, 20 percent of future per capita increases will go into the defense fund.

The 800 delegates also adopted a resolution setting procedures for merger discussions with other unions, including the possibility of reviving negotiations with the Rubber Workers.

OCAW and the URW had conducted serious discussions on merger earlier this year, but an impasse ended the negotiations.

President A. F. Grospiron, head of OCAW since 1965, was re-elected without opposition to his sixth two-year term. Other top incumbent officers were returned to office in several contests.

Sec.-Treas. Anthony C. Sabatine was elected to his first full term in a race with Robert Palmer, an international representative from Louisiana. Sabatine was named to the post earlier this year after B. J. Schafer retired.

Vice Presidents Robert Goss and Elwood Swisher were re-elected in a four-way race over international representatives James Bergerson of Minnesota and Richard Watson of Indiana.

C. R. Reimer was re-elected by the Canadian delegation as the Canadian national director. All nine executive board members, representing geographical districts, were re-elected.

A convention resolution spelled out the union's position on energy pricing and sharply criticized President Ford's program to do away with all controls on natural gas and "old" crude oil. Such decontrol would result in increased living costs of more than $550 per year for the average family, as well as add to the unemployment problem, the resolution stated.

Ratification by the states of the Equal Rights Amendment also was advocated by the convention. Another resolution called upon the President and Congress to more closely oversee the operations of the nation's intelligence activities.

Mrs. Coretta Scott King in her convention address denounced the Ford administration's theory that high unemployment is necessary to cure inflation.

"Even if that were true, this decision would still stand as one of the most stunningly cold and inhuman economic decisions of recent memory," she said.

"Recent events have clearly shown that even with massive unemployment, inflation can still rise for reasons that have little to do with the labor market," she said. "Despite more than 8 million unemployed Americans, fuel and food prices have shot up in recent months."

The convention also voted pay raises for union officers, district directors and international representatives.

John Beidler Dies, Labor Lobbyist

Alexandria, Va. — Funeral services were held here for John H. Beidler, legislative director of the Auto Workers and a former AFL-CIO legislative representative. He died Oct. 15 at the age of 46.

Beidler began his labor legislative career in 1953 with the former CIO, served on the AFL-CIO staff after merger and from 1965 to 1968 was legislative director of the Industrial Union Dept. After two years with the Center for Community Change, he became the UAW's legislative director in 1971.

A graduate of Antioch College with a law degree from Georgetown University, Beidler was "a brilliant legislative tactician" who "worked hard for millions of people who never knew his name," UAW President Leonard Woodcock said. He leaves his wife, Beverly, and four children.

Teachers Get Labor Support In Delaware

Rehoboth Beach, Del.—The Delaware State AFL-CIO's 19th annual convention adopted legislative goals and voted strong support for a no-contract, no-work strike by Wilmington teachers that has since been settled.

Delegates re-elected John A. Campanelli as president of the state federation. Norman L. Tyrie succeeded Edward F. Peterson as vice president, and Thomas E. Watson replaced Howard E. Hillis as secretary-treasurer.

In major resolutions, the convention urged:

- Passage of the construction site picketing bill presently before the U.S. Senate.
- Federal legislation extending health insurance to the unemployed.
- Strengthening Delaware's Prevailing Wage Act to guarantee the prevailing wage and benefits on state-funded construction as the Davis-Bacon Act does on the federal level.
- Curbs on job-destroying foreign imports.

The state central body formally changed its name from the Delaware State Labor Council to the Delaware AFL-CIO.

Machinists Expand Unit At Rohr Industries

San Diego—Technical and office workers at Rohr Industries voted 375-159 for union representation. They will be represented by Machinists Local 755, which has represented the firm's hourly-paid workers for more than 35 years.

on affiliates to give all possible aid to the union's struggle for survival.

The subcommittee will submit its formal report to AFL-CIO President George Meany, but Hall highlighted some of the panel's findings:

"There has been and is at this point intimidation of the workers involved in the elections. There has been inadequate investigation of the charges that have been lodged by the workers and their representatives," he said, and enforcement of the law has been "bad."

Hall said the subcommittee's "saddest" finding was the failure of the Agricultural Labor Relations Board (ALRB) to make its presence felt in the fields through quick investigation of charges, explanations to the workers of their rights and speedy processing of complaints.

Specifically, the subcommittee criticized the general counsel of the ALRB, Walter Kintz, for not providing leadership to the board's agents.

Hall noted that Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr., has appointed a special task force headed by a California trial attorney, Sam Cohen.

This task force, Hall said, is taking "vigorous action" and in a short time has produced a "noticeable change" in the administration of the law.

In seperate meetings, the subcommittee received assurances from the governor, Kintz and Bishop Roger Mahony, chairman of the ALRB, that the board would launch a bilingual advertising program to inform workers of their rights under the law.

Cohen, in his meeting with the subcommittee, emphasized the efforts of his task force to speed up administration of the law, particularly the process of certifying election results and issuance of complaints for unfair labor practices.

Hall expressed the hope that the task force would be continued after its four-month temporary appointment.

Unfair labor practices, particularly the wholesale discharges of workers who support the UFW, constitute the major source of intimidation to the workers, Hall said.

This point was repeated many times when the subcommittee held public hearings in Delano, Guadalupe, Salinas and Stockton to hear from the workers themselves.

Workers told about the discharges of entire crews who were sympathetic to the UFW, individual workers who had been blacklisted by growers for supporting the UFW, and repeated threats to fire workers who are known as "Chavistas."

Hall expressed amazement at the degree of physical intimidation of UFW organizers and was critical of the failure of law enforcement officers to properly enforce the law.

He cited the so-called "Posse Comitatus," a vigilante group in the Stockton area, that has threatened to kill UFW organizers, board agents or law enforcement officials attempting to enforce agricultural labor relations act.

John F. Henning, executive secretary-treasurer of the California Labor Federation, reported that his request for an investigation of the vigilantes by the state and federal attorneys general has not been answered.

The presence of vigilantes with shotguns in Stockton and other instances of growers and Teamster organizers armed with rifles, pistols, clubs and shovels in other areas has made any attempt at free elections a "farce," Hall added.

Hall told reporters that the exploitation and intimidation has created a "terrible situation."

Sheriff's deputies in several areas, along with the growers, have continued to arrest union organizers and others in the fields, even though the California Supreme Court has upheld an ALRB ruling providing for access to the workers in the fields by the union.

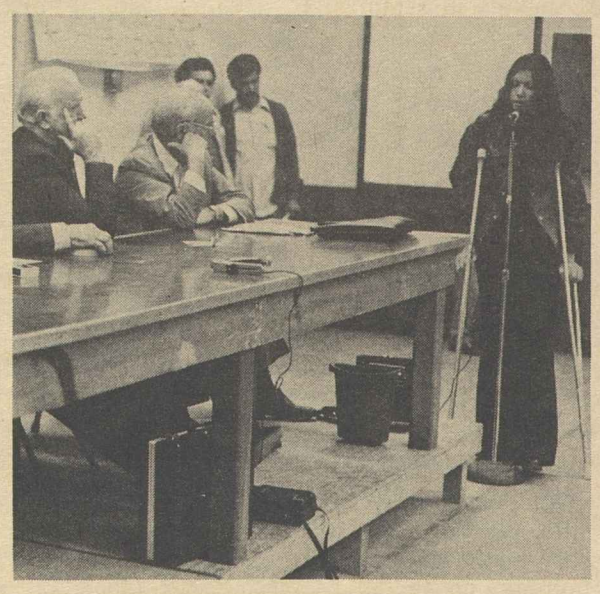
There is "no doubt of collusion between the grower and the Teamsters in many areas," Hall added. But the subcommittee found "no evidence" of collusion between the growers and the ALRB. "We only found ignorance of the law," he said. The ALRB staff has "suffered tremendously from a lack of leadership."

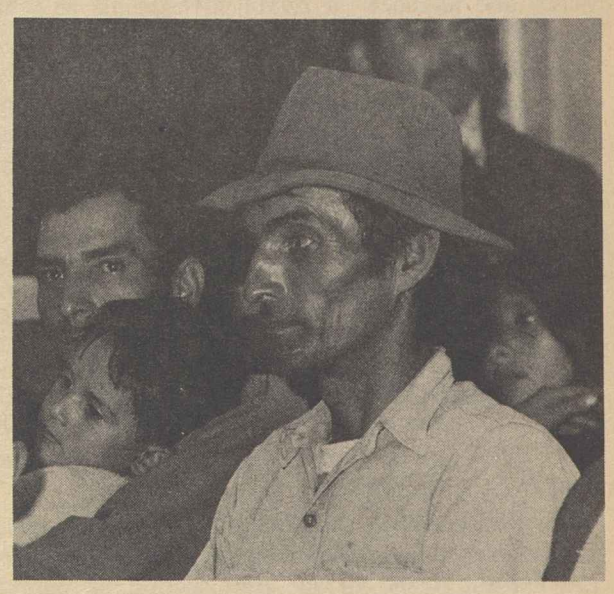
He told reporters that the subcommittee would recommend that the AFL-CIO "continue its maximum support" to the UFW.

He said the UFW would need extra assistance as the elections move into the pivotal Imperial Valley, where the UFW hopes to make strong inroads in a major Teamster area, and into the courts where key legal issues will be decided.

The three-member panel was named by the Executive Council to investigate the reports from UFW President Cesar Chavez of unfair acts against UFW members during the elections.

The subcommittee was accompanied by Alan Kistler, director of organization and field services, and members of the AFL-CIO field staff who have been working with the UFW.





UFW SUPPORTER told the panel at a hearing in Delano that her leg was injured when her car was forced off the road by a Teamsters' organizer. At right is part of the overflow crowd attending the hearing at Guadalupe, Calif.

Jobless Benefit Fight Shifts to Full Panel

Key legislative proposals to establish federal standards for unemployment compensation—including weekly benefit amounts, qualifying requirements and duration of payments—will be fought out in the full House Ways & Means Committee.

A 10-member subcommittee approved a bill that would strengthen the financing of the federal-state unemployment compensation systems, substantially broaden coverage and make it a bit easier to "trigger" extended benefits for workers who exhaust their state benefits when unemployment is still high. More than 9 million additional workers would be covered.

But the subcommittee failed to muster a majority for either the benefits standard backed by the AFL-CIO—based on two-thirds of lost wages up to a ceiling of 75 percent of the average state wage—or the Administration proposal for 50 percent of lost wages to a ceiling of two-thirds of the state wage.

Amendments incorporating the labor-supported improvements to the jobless benefits program are expected to be introduced later.

Subcommittee Chairman James C. Corman (D-Calif.), who sponsored a bill that included labor-backed benefit and duration standards, said he expects action by the full committee in the near future.

Among the key provisions in the bill approved by the subcommittee:

- Extension of coverage to most public employes, domestics who earn $600 or more per quarter and to workers in the Virgin Islands.
- Coverage for more than 700,000 workers on farms employing four or more persons 20 weeks a year.
- An increase in the employer-paid federal tax rate Jan. 1 from five-tenths of 1 percent to seven-tenths of 1 percent, but with the taxable wage base staying at $4,200 for 1976. The taxable base would increase to $8,000 in 1977, but the tax rate would revert to five-tenths of 1 percent in 1982.
- Extended benefits would be triggered on sooner by eliminating the requirement that state unemployment must be 120 percent higher than it was for the preceding two years. The nationwide trigger of 4.5 percent of insured unemployment would be activated on the most recent 13-week period rather than the current requirement of the last three consecutive months.

The bill also would prohibit disqualification for jobless benefits solely on the basis of pregnancy, but would also disallow summertime benefits for teachers and school administrators between spring and fall contracts.

375 OK'd for Aid On Import Job Loss

The Labor Dept. has certified 375 shoe workers in Jackson, Mo., eligible for trade adjustment assistance because they lost their jobs to the increased imports of women's shoes. But another 160 workers at two shoe plants in St. Louis were denied certification.

The 375 certified workers were employed at an International Shoe Co. plant following a Labor Dept. investigation of a petition filed by the Boot & Shoe Workers.

Turned down on their bid for trade adjustment benefits were 130 workers producing women's footwear at the Hamilton Shoe Co. and another 30 at the Rockmore Co. which produced bows, stripping and ornamentation for shoes.

Tax Deduction On Gas Kept In House Bill

The House Ways & Means Committee has reversed an earlier decision and voted to retain the federal income tax deduction for state and local gasoline taxes. Removal of the gasoline tax deduction would have amounted to a tax increase for more than 18 million car-owners who itemize deductions, most of them middle-income workers.

In a letter to committee members, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller had strongly protested a tentative decision to end the deduction.

Biemiller said the added tax burden if the deduction were eliminated would fall heaviest "on those Americans who must use their automobiles for transportation to and from work, most of whom have no alternative means of transportation."

He said the AFL-CIO "favors measures which would simplify the tax-filing chore." But tax simplification, he stressed, "must be part of a total package which insures that legitimate expenses and costs that affect the ability to pay are taken into consideration." The AFL-CIO opposes actions "taken in isolation which have the effect of increasing the tax burden of working people."

A recent survey showed that 88 percent of all AFL-CIO members use their automobile in transportation to work.

For a typical working family, Biemiller said, wiping out the deduction would have been equivalent to raising the price of gasoline 1.5 cents a gallon.

Plight of the Cities

THE ECONOMIC DOWNSLIDE has put severe pressures on state and local budgets. Vital services have been cut back; essential projects have been postponed or cancelled; payrolls slashed; jobs destroyed, and a number of cities are on the brink of bankruptcy. The nation's stock of public facilities has deteriorated and public services essential to the nation's well-being have been curtailed.

The AFL-CIO firmly believes that the nation's major domestic problems are still rooted in the shortages of services and facilities that are traditionally and appropriately the responsibility of government.

We are deeply concerned over the fact that the Administration, by focusing obsessively on the dollar deficit in the federal budget, is pursuing policies which are widening the already huge gaps in public facilities and services. Congress has shirked its responsibility to challenge and overturn these policies.

We believe that there is much that the states and localities and particularly the states can and must do to improve their public investment capabilities. But especially in times of economic crisis it is the federal government—which represents all of the people and can marshal the nation's resources—that holds the key.

The federal government's role in providing the leadership, programs and finances for public investments to build America must be continued, strengthened and expanded.

Substantial increases are needed in federal grants-in-aid to the states and local governments for specific programs in the nation's interest, such as education, manpower training, health services and facilities, metropolitan transportation, air- and water-pollution control, urban renewal, public service jobs and energy conservation and development.

Federal grant-in-aid programs should be fully funded and monies already appropriated by Congress and impounded by the President should be made available to state and local governments as quickly as possible.

WE URGE ENACTMENT of special federal legislation to authorize payment of funds directly to local governments suffering from depressed economic conditions so that they can maintain essential public services.

Institutions, such as a federal urban bank, should be developed to provide states and localities with easier access to long-term, low-interest loans for the construction of public housing, urban transit systems and other community facilities. The federal government should have stand-by authority to provide emergency aid to local governments in times of severe fiscal crisis.

There should be a thorough review of present federal categorical grants-in-aid. Such a review should aim at increasing their efficiency, re-examining matching-fund formulas and making it easier for state and local officials to be aware of and obtain the federal aid available to them. However, the purposes, performance standards and requirements of the programs must be safeguarded so that the national interest is served.

We encourage state governments to share a greater portion of their tax revenues with local jurisdictions, especially those which are responsible for financing a continually growing level of public services from an eroding tax base.

—From the resolution on Financing State and Local Governments adopted by the 11th AFL-CIO Convention.

A Word Edgewise:

Low-Cal Soft Drink Fans Taste Sweet Victory in Bitter Fight

By John P. Roche

UP TO A CERTAIN POINT I'm willing, even glad, to be protected against myself. It's reassuring to know that the Food & Drug Administration is out there barring such menaces as thalidomide. The buzzers in the car that alert me to close the door, fasten my seatbelt and also put one around the bag of groceries next to me on the front seat are not intolerable.

And by stretching my patience a bit I can even put up with the new tops on medicine bottles that call for some expertise in safecracking. (Fortunately—since I am a timid soul—I do not encounter the Surgeon General's warning on either cigars or pipe tobacco.)

However, three times in the last decade my willingness to go along with Big Brother has been severely tested. At the top of the list was the Surgeon General's definition of "alcoholism," which converted virtually any non-teetotaler into a lush. The exact formulation escapes me, but plus or minus an ounce or two it indicated that if you drank six ounces of spirits in any one day, or a total of 10 a week, you were in the bag.

I hate to challenge the Surgeon General, but where I come from alcoholism is an addiction which can't be defined in ounces: it is the ability to take it or leave it. Drinking too much is undoubtedly bad for the health, but it is not necessarily alcoholism. Indeed, I have known alcoholics who were one-drink drunks.

The second occasion on which I almost looked up the local anarchists for a membership application was the swordfish ban. Luckily we can still get swordfish (in fact we had it for dinner last night), but I am informed it is a federal offense to take Massachusetts swordfish to, say, Rhode Island—or vice versa. The FDA's excommunication of the swordfish—which incidentally decimated the swordfishermen and jacked up the price where you can still get it—arose from a single incident. Again the exact details are vague, but, if memory serves, a woman on a special weight-losing diet was eating about 10 pounds of swordfish a week over a sustained period and developed mercury poisoning.

That was unfortunate, but I have a sneaking suspicion that, if you ate 10 pounds of peanut butter a week for six months, you would come down with something. And subsequent research has indicated that mercury levels in fish have remained stable over 50 years (some old cans of fish still in good chemical condition were analyzed). But the ban still stands, and, even if it were lifted, the fishermen have shifted to other waters, or gone out of business.

The third episode was the 1969 ban on cyclamates, the artificial sweetener used in low-cal soft drinks. This I took personally. For about 30 years I have been fighting my waistline (I have probably lost about 600 pounds), and the only low-cal soft drinks that—for some metabolic reason—didn't give me the jitters were those made with cyclamates. If your summer option is low-cal ginger ale and the jitters, or beer and calories, you have a problem.

NOW WE LEARN from a fascinating piece of detective work in "Barron's" that there is every indication that the barring of cyclamates by FDA was a "triumph of pseudoscience," if not a set-up sponsored by the sugar industry to eliminate competition. The article by Dana L. Thomas explores in meticulous detail, the history of the attack on cyclamates as a potential carcinogen.

The lead is the confession by Dr. Bernard Oser, who did the 1969 tests which triggered federal action, that the experiments had not been designed to show if cyclamates caused cancer and concluded that the "decision to select cyclamates as the culprit . . . was probably not justified."

Thomas points out that in the 1960s production of cyclamates jumped from 5 million to 15 million pounds and "some sugar producers feared that if the boom continued unchecked, the industry eventually would lose half its yearly sales." "In 1964," he says, the industry "swung into action . . . via the Sugar Research Foundation (which) contracted with the Wisconsin Alumni Research Foundation to launch a study on the effects of feeding cyclamates to rats."

Four and a half years later, the drive paid off: cyclamates were suddenly withdrawn from the U.S. market. Needless to add, this did not hurt the price of sugar. "Barron's," on behalf of us weight-watchers, thanks.

Professor Nisbet's Fumble:

Doomsday Outlook on Sports Not Mood of Most Americans

By Msgr. George G. Higgins

PROFESSOR ROBERT NISBET of Columbia University, one of the nation's leading scholars in the history and philosophy of social and political thought, argues in his latest book, "Twilight of Authority" (Oxford University Press, New York) that we live at a dangerous turning point in history, that we are caught up in a political and cultural crisis not dissimilar to that preceding the fall of Rome. I found the book a bit too pessimistic for my own taste, but nevertheless well worth reading.

In fact, I would agree with those critics who have already hailed it as one of the most important books of the year. Despite its doomsday tone, it turns out to be, in the end, a very hopeful treatise on ways of arresting, even reversing, "the decline of the West."

On one minor point, however, I think Professor Nisbet, like a number of other academicians, is somewhat out of touch with middle America and is also inclined to take life a bit too seriously. I am referring to his brief and ever so solemn reference to professional sports in the United States.

He says he is inclined to think that "professional sports take a great deal of the load off war as the source of release to a bored, increasingly tension-ridden population. Teams are combat units, and there is much in common psychologically between the team in the field and the actual fighting unit, the squad or platoon or company in wartime. . . . Anyone who hates war," he concludes, "must dread the day when athletics, amateur and professional, loses its present capacity for mobilizing agressive forces on the field and thrilling large audiences."

I wonder what the boys would make of that at a KC or American Legion smoker? I suspect they would find it rather amusing—but more about that in a moment.

Professor Nisbet, in another section of his book, laments the fact that Americans have become increasingly careless in their use of the English language. Yet in his own apocalyptic reference to sports, he himself is guilty of this very fault. He equates "sports" in general with an aggressive type of warlike team play on the football field, but, for at least half the year, the sporting events that glue the American people to their television sets don't fit that description at all.

What's so aggressive or warlike about Jack Nicklaus chipping to the pin with a nine iron, or Chris Evert catching her opponent off balance with a backhand shot to the far corner of the court, or your favorite hitter stealing second base? For that matter, what's so aggressive or warlike about basketball or soccer? Hockey, yes — but aside from hockey, boxing and football, the other sporting events that hold the American people enthralled for weeks on end are no more aggressive or warlike than a genteel game of shuffleboard, cricket or croquet.

And when you come right down to it, what's all this stuff about football taking a great deal of the load off war and serving as a providential source of release for a bored, increasingly tension-ridden population? To most Americans it's only a game. Why, then, do so many intellectuals feel constrained to describe it as a surrogate for war? In short, why do they take the game and themselves so seriously?

Above all, why do they so frequently insult the American people by referring to them (and Professor Nisbet is not unique among intellectuals in this regard) as a bored, tension-ridden population? With apologies to the professor — who strikes this reader as being a very decent type human being—I think it must be said that there is something rather snobbish about this kind of inflated ivory tower rhetoric.

PROFESSOR NISBET DOES have a point, however, when he says that "whether sports can survive the present headlong rush toward huge profits, enormous individual contracts carefully negotiated by batteries of lawyers for individual stars, and the growing image of each of these same stars as businessmen—owners of hamburger or bowling alley chains, with names prominently displayed—is still uncertain."

It seemed very "uncertain," indeed, a couple of weeks ago when a number of NFL teams went on strike to protest against the so-called Rozelle rule. Our own house was divided on the pros and cons of this monumental dispute, but, for my own part, I was on the players' side.

The Rozelle rule—if I, too, may indulge in a bit of inflated rhetoric—is a form of (admittedly well-paid) indentured servitude, and the owners, in my opinion, would be well advised to give it up voluntarily before they are compelled to do so by the courts.

In any event, my good friend Willie Usery, director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service and the greatest living expert in the field of labor mediation, deserves the Congressional Medal of Honor for having mediated the NFL strike in time to get the players back into uniform for the opening games of the season, thus restoring their "capacity for mobilizing aggressive forces on the field and thrilling large audiences."

Professor Nisbet doubts that many of them will emerge as national heroes. In fact, he says that the age of sports heroes may soon be gone forever. We shall see. Meanwhile it's time to go—the Redskins are about to kick off to the New Orleans Saints (an unlikely name, by the way, for a platoon of aggressive warriors).

States Lag on Update:

Benefits Improvements Pressed As High Joblessness Continues

WITH ALL SIGNS now pointing to high unemployment for at least two or three more years and the Administration calling for budget cuts that will trigger even more joblessness, overhaul of the 40-year-old unemployment insurance system just can't be shoved to the back burner.

That view was expressed in a network radio interview by Assistant Director James O'Brien of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, as he scored the failure of most states to keep their programs in pace with economic changes and growing needs. He listed as the major shortcomings of the present regular unemployment insurance system:

- Denial of protection to more than 12 million workers, such as public employes, most farm workers and most domestics, when they are temporarily unemployed.
- Lagging benefit levels that most often fall far short of the 50 percent wage replacement goal of the program.
- Harsh eligibility rules that let unscrupulous employers or those seeking to avoid "experience-rated" premium increases block millions of otherwise eligible workers from receiving compensation while they are out of work and looking for jobs.

O'Brien said that emergency legislation adopted in response to the current recession has eased the impact of some of the program's shortcomings. But, he pointed out, that relief is only temporary, with the measures terminating in early 1977.

For that reason, he declared, there is no time for Congress to delay in remedying the "serious inadequacies that . . . have been put into sharp focus" by the recession. He said that the AFL-CIO favors federalization of the unemployment insurance system, but that stands as a long-range goal.

The immediate aim—and it can be achieved quickly by a determined Congress—is minimum federal standards that will make the system equitable, fair and adequate in all parts of the nation, he stressed.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

A VISIT WITH Secretary of Labor John T. Dunlop in his conference room on the second floor of the new Labor Dept. building is an intriguing experience.

Dunlop is available to the press. His long experience of teaching at Harvard and mediating tough labor-management disputes for 35 years has made him nimble and quick. And one has to be nimble and quick with Washington reporters.

Dunlop knows a lot about labor. He especially knows a lot about the leaders of labor and the leaders of management. And he gets along with them as he puts it because he does not "ride any white horses into the West;" he accepts things as they are.

The reporters had gathered a little early on a warm October afternoon to plunk themselves down in the comfortable chairs provided. The secretary came in with his aides and sat down at a table and started to talk about unemployment insurance.

There was a prolonged discussion about unemployment benefits and the need for an overhaul of the system—a reform which Dunlop favors. He explained that the department is pushing for some quick changes in this Congress to make the system more equitable. Then, he said, he will push for a thorough study of the whole jobless benefits system so that, hopefully, there can be a complete overhaul—something that hasn't been done for 40 years.

The secretary explained that one of the big unanswered questions about jobless benefits that he is asked is whether people who are unemployed really don't try hard enough to find jobs but simply collect their benefits. One reporter suggested that unemployed workers would rather work than not. Speak for yourself, said another reporter who probably would rather have gone fishing on this nice fall day.

Dunlop said that the question is still there and critics of the jobless benefits system are going to have to be satisfied that working people would really rather work. So, the secretary said, we'll take a look at people who have actually exhausted their benefits to find out if, not having any funds, they actually will try harder to get jobs.

DUNLOP REMINDED the reporters that he is seeking federal standards and trying to modernize the unemployment insurance system so that jobless workers will receive benefits the equivalent of from one-half to two-thirds of normal pay.

Dunlop repeated that his goal—since "day one" when he came into the job—has been to get a limited number of practical changes in the unemployment insurance system this year and then to move ahead for a comprehensive study of the whole system.

The reporters turned to what one reporter called "Mr. Ford's tax-and-slash" program. The secretary reminded the reporters that he favors an indefinite extension of the income tax cut. He said he agreed wholeheartedly with the President that middle-income Americans need continued tax relief. It is most important that adjustments be made in tax rates so that the middle-income Americans will get some long-range benefits, Dunlop said.

The secretary said that if "people think their tax rates are going back up again in six months, they will not go out and spend money for new cars and help stimulate the economy and put people back to work."

There was some conversation about how the Labor Dept. would handle the problem of cutting its own budget in line with the President's proposal. Questions were asked about the "suggestions" of the Office of Management & Budget (OMB). The secretary said OMB did not tell the department what to cut; "they just gave us a gross figure." Dunlop emphasized "gross." He said the experts in the department are studying the matter.

A reporter asked Dunlop if he ever argued back with the White House. "I regard that as an absolute insult," said Dunlop, who is noted in Washington for arguing back.

WITH UNEMPLOYMENT sure to stay high for the next few years and President Ford pushing for budget cuts that will throw more Americans out of work, modernization of the outdated unemployment insurance system can't be delayed, Assistant Director James O'Brien, center, of the AFL-CIO Social Security Dept., warned on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Lloyd Schwartz of the Fairchild Publications and Michael Posner of the Reuters news agency. The AFL-CIO produced public service program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

LABOR'S CONCERN that rigid budget curbs could plunge the nation into a deeper recession was expressed at recent House hearings by AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Ray Denison, left, and Assistant Legislative Director Kenneth Young.

Safety Council Pressed On Job Disease Curbs

Chicago—Organized labor urged the National Safety Council to spearhead a campaign against occupational diseases, the silent killers which take the lives of more than 100,000 workers each year.

William W. Winpisinger, vice president of the Machinists, told a session of the Labor Conference at the council's annual National Safety Congress here that up to now the stress has been on accident prevention — the "dropping hammer" syndrome.

He praised the Safety Council's work to curb on-the-job accidents, which kill 14,000 workers each year, and asked it to turn its attention to the materials workers handle, noise and other unseen dangers.

"The primary threat to workers today is constant exposure to toxic substances," Winpisinger said. "Workers wind up selling not labor, but years of their lives to employers."

He noted that 97 percent of materials workers handle are untested for their long-range dangers to health.

Winpisinger said the Ford Administration has been playing the dollars-and-cents angles on job safety with no attention to the human factors. He called for the hiring of 2,000 new compliance officers and an end to miserly funding for job safety enforcement and research.

The Labor Conference presented its top 1975 Safety Awards to Machinists Lodge 1781, Burlingame, Calif.; Steelworkers Local 480, Trail, B.C., Canada; International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 1379, Bettendorf, Ia.; Machinists Lodge 851, Joliet, Ill.; Meat Cutters Local 342, Jamaica, N.Y.; and the Laborers International Union.

Gene Kozlowski, safety director of IBEW Local 1859, Cicero, Ill., received the top individual award.

Robert Farrell, safety director of Operating Engineers Local 150, Countryside, Ill., is outgoing chairman of the Labor Conference. Incoming chairman is Jack R. Suarez, job safety and health director of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. Joe M. Short of the Laborers was named vice chairman of the conference. Paul Connelley, safety director for the Carpenters, is National Safety Council vice president for labor.

Study Explores Wage Drain by Multinationals

Foreign tax breaks for multinational corporations take money out of the pocket of the average worker and give it to corporate stockholders and executives, according to a report released by the Senate Subcommittee on Multinational Corporations.

The study also blames part of the current shortage of capital in the United States and the general economic malaise on multinationals and their foreign investment. It says $200 billion in foreign investment over the last 25 years has displaced domestic investment and reduced this nation's capital stock.

The study, by Prof. Peggy B. Musgrave of Northeastern University, is titled "Direct Investment Abroad and the Multinationals: Effects on the United States Economy." It will be the subject of a series of hearings by the subcommittee this fall.

It concludes that the operation of multinationals reduces wages throughout society while enriching stockholders. In reducing the U.S. capital stock, foreign investment raises the rate of return on available capital but lowers wages, the author says. "It follows that U.S. labor loses . . . and U.S. investors gain."

Subcommittee Chairman Frank Church (D-Ida.) said the study appears to indicate that "it is not further subsidies for the corporations which are needed to revitalize our economy and encourage employment but rather a reform of the tax subsidies given to multinational corporations."

Labor Board Opens San Antonio Office

The National Labor Relations Board announced the opening of a new office in San Antonio, Tex., and appointment of new regional directors in San Francisco and Chicago.

John C. Crawford, 49, of Houston, a career member of the NLRB staff, will direct the San Antonio resident office. The new office—the fourth in Texas—will handle cases filed in 31 southwest Texas counties.

Natalie P. Allen was named to head the San Francisco office, replacing Roy O. Hoffman who retired in July. She becomes NLRB's only woman regional director. The San Francisco office is the agency's largest in terms of staff and case handling.

The new Chicago regional director is Alex V. Barbour. At 33 he becomes NLRB's youngest regional director. He succeeds Ross M. Madden who also retired last July.

Multinational Politics:

Overseas Scandals Uncover Web of Business Corruption

A new and tangled web of corporate corruption now coming to light dramatizes the lengths to which some American businesses will go to satisfy a burning greed for profits.

The latest scandals, an outgrowth of the Watergate investigations, involve millions of dollars in political payoffs to foreign agents or governments by big U.S.-based multinational corporations bent on building up earnings.

The payoffs, which may take the form of bribery, kickbacks or other special favors, are doled out to those with influence to secure contracts, protect in-place investments or gain favorable concessions such as a tax break in the host country.

James M. Shevis, writing about the overseas payoffs in the October issue of the AFL-CIO magazine, the American Federationist, notes that the wrongdoing "is widespread and corrosive and threatens to weaken our economic system and the nation's ethical fiber."

The full dimensions of the payoffs cannot be fully grasped at this point, Shevis observes, since an array of government and other agencies is still knee-deep in its investigations of the corrupt business practices.

But facts already unearthed show that the corruption reaches directly into the executive suites of some of the best-known companies of America, including Gulf Oil Corp., Ashland Oil, Inc., Lockheed Aircraft Corp., United Brands Co., Phillips Petroleum Co., and Northrop Corp.

The payoffs touch presidents, prime ministers, generals and government officials of countries throughout Europe, the Middle East, Central and South America and Asia, Shevis notes, adding that "it is this extent of involvement at the very pinnacles of power that makes the scandals unprecedented."

Shevis, an assistant editor of the AFL-CIO News, points out that the disclosures thus far have led to the suicide of one corporate head, the firing of several top executives, dozens of stockholder suits, threats of expropriation of U.S. property and the overthrow of a foreign ruler.

Sen. Frank Church (D-Ida.), chairman of a Senate panel only midway through its probe of the foreign payoffs, has referred to the overseas bribery as "a cancer eating at the vitals of Western society." Church added:

"Corruption, in big business as well as in politics, has become the enemy of free societies, giving the Communists a potent weapon to wield against us."

At home, of course, it is against the law for corporations to make political contributions to federal election campaigns. But unless specifically forbidden by the laws of a given country, U.S. political payoffs abroad violate only ethical considerations. Yet, as Shevis notes, this is precisely the issue.

"The crux of the matter is the cavalier acceptance of such unethical practices by the big American corporations and their leaders who view them as 'normal' business behavior," he observes.

The multinational firms, most of which are based in the United States, say they must grease palms in many of the nations in which they do business just to stay even with the competition. They write off the payments—many of them outright bribes—as the "cost of doing business."

Chairman B. R. Dorsey of Gulf Oil Corp., after admitting his company gave $4 million in payoffs to the ruling party of South Korean President Park Chung Hee, offered a revealing explanation for his decision to make the corporate contributions.

Gulf had a total investment in refining, shipbuilding and other operations in South Korea in excess of $300 million, he told Sen. Church's Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee on multinational corporations. Leaders of Park's party demanded money from the firm, he said, a demand accompanied by pressure which "left little to the imagination as to what would occur if the company would choose to turn its back on the request."

Recalling the incident, Dorsey noted that Gulf was expanding its Korean operations and was faced with myriad problems.

"I carefully weighed the demand for a contribution in that light," he said, "and my decision to make the contribution was based upon what I sincerely considered to be in the best interests of the company and its shareholders."

Sen. Dick Clark (D-Iowa), a member of the Church subcommittee, following up Dorsey's testimony, asked incredulously:

"This was the sole basis of your decision? I assume it was not something that had to do with the national interest of the United States. That, I assume, is not your responsibility. You make decisions on these contributions solely on profit motives for the stockholders' interest, is that correct?"

"Exactly right," Dorsey replied. As for the correctness of the ethics involved in the transaction, Dorsey put it this way: "What is immoral to some is perfectly correct to others. What is onerous to one culture may be perfectly proper and decent to another."

While bribing a foreign official does not violate U.S. law, covering up the payoff through bookkeeping gimmickry constitutes a violation of the Securities & Exchange Commission's reporting requirements. SEC has led a vigorous investigation of firms that have allegedly made undisclosed payments abroad, among them Northrop, General Refractories, Gulf, United Brands and others.

Meanwhile, in Congress, Rep. Stephen J. Solarz (D-N.J.) has introduced a bill to prohibit the bribery of a foreign government official or political organization.

Whether such a law would put an end to the payoffs is highly debatable, though, since many big multinational companies already have knowingly broken other laws at home and abroad in their reach for profits, Shevis observes.

But, he emphasizes, "the problem of how to deal with corporate bribery abroad must be faced up to squarely for the problem is not likely to go away by itself."

Abel Hits 'Trivial Fines' On Coke Oven Abuses

Pittsburgh—Steelworker President I. W. Abel strongly criticized the Occupational Safety & Health Administration for a settlement allowing U.S. Steel to pay "trivial fines" for violation of OSHA emission regulations at its coke plants in four states.

OSHA inspectors cited the company for the violations after the USWA filed complaints at coke plants in Fairfield, Ala.; Gary, Ind.; Duluth, Minn.; and Clairton, Pa. The OSHA representatives assured the USWA that they would "insist upon a strong settlement" that would impose meaningful engineering controls and work practices. Abel said, "OSHA then caved in and agreed to let the company off by paying trivial fines."

Abel said that the settlement was "further proof of the weakness of present OSHA coke plant regulations and enforcement procedures," and demonstrates the real need for coke oven regulations that will force steel companies to eliminate smoke emissions from the plants.

Findings of medical researchers show that the cancer death rate among coke-oven workers is 2.5 to 10 times greater than that of all workers in the basic steel industry. Studies have failed to determine the exact cause of the high rate.

Abel criticized coke oven standards proposed by Secretary of Labor John T. Dunlop last July. He charged that standards recommended by an OSHA advisory committee were largely ignored by Dunlop in favor of regulations more acceptable to industry. The committee, composed of representatives from industry, labor, and the public, recommended fixed standards for air quality, mandatory engineering controls and work practices, worker access to their own medical records, a reduction of coke oven emissions of benzo-a-pyrene, a known cancer producing agent, detailed monitoring of work sites, and employer provided medical exams for all coke oven workers.

The USWA represents about 90 percent of the 15,000 coke oven workers at 65 plants across the country.

Cennamo Fills No. 2 Post in Leather Union

San Francisco—Ralph Cennamo, 57, of Bridgeport, Conn., was unanimously elected secretary-treasurer of the Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers Union by the union's executive board, President Benjamin Feldman announced.

Cennamo's election followed the resignation of Harry Frankel, effective Oct. 1, for reasons of health. Frankel had served in this position since 1970 and before that was an officer of the Luggage Workers Local 60.

Cennamo will continue to serve as director of organization in addition to his new responsibilities. A member of the union since 1937 when he started to work in a handbag plant, he has served for nearly two decades as a member of the executive board.

Key Negotiations in '76:

Rubber Union Votes Strike Benefit Hike

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Delegates to the Rubber Workers 40th anniversary convention voted to increase strike benefits as the URW prepares for negotiations with the "Big Four" rubber companies. Contracts with Goodyear, Firestone, Goodrich and Uniroyal will expire next spring.

While the individual strike benefits payments were raised from $25 to $35 a week, the URW per capita tax will continue to be collected on an existing formula which links membership dues to increases in hourly earnings.

URW President Peter Bommarito warned that the union may face a "tough" situation in the 1976 round of master contract negotiations. He said union negotiators will be seeking "the most meaningful and sizable packages of recent years." Topping the priority list are catch-up raises, cost-of-living adjustments and pension improvements.

Bommarito was re-elected to a new three-year term over Gilbert Laws of Lincoln, Neb., by a vote of 1,537 to 284. Sec.-Treas. Ike Gold and Vice Pres. Kenneth Oldham were unanimously re-elected, while the 1,013 delegates elected 13 new executive board members and returned one incumbent to office.

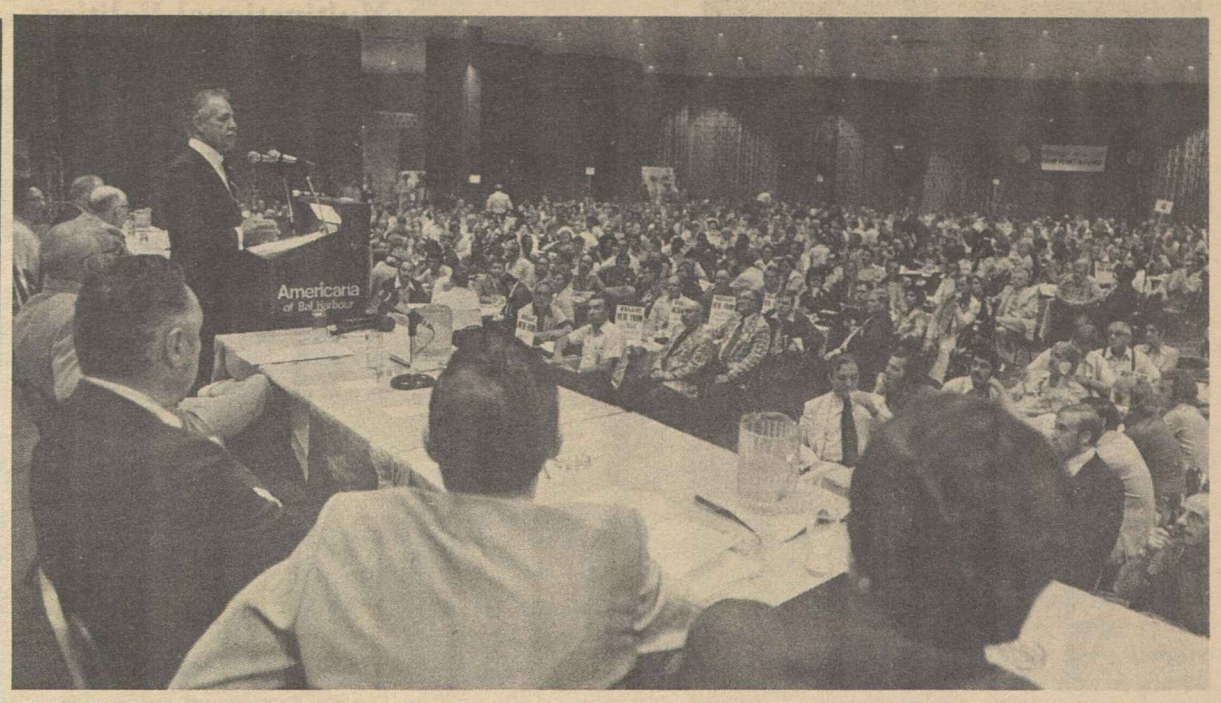
The convention also amended the URW constitution to provide for further exploration of merger and affiliation with other unions. Officers were authorized to create new vice presidential positions and an executive board seat to represent new affiliates.

The URW had been involved in merger discussions with the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers earlier this year, but the talks have been recessed.

Another constitutional change authorizes organizing in any "acceptable industries," rather than limiting the URW to rubber, cork, linoleum, plastic and allied industries.

Major speakers addressing the convention included Sen. John Glenn (D-Ohio); Bayard Rustin, president of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, and John Simon, executive secretary of the Canadian Labor Congress.

The 13 new board members elected at the convention are Fred Belair, Clairemont, N.H.; Darwin Bixler, Jr., Oaks, Pa.; Don Cox, Miami, Okla.; Wilbur Davis, Akron, Ohio; John D. Fuhrman, Kitchener, Ont.; Donald Gilbert, Findlay, Ohio; Zelma Harris, Madisonville, Ky.; Eugene Knowles, Dayton, Ohio; Shelby McLaughlin, Carleton, Mich.; Alfonso Roybal, Wheatridge, Colo.; Lyle D. Skinner, Salesburg, Ill.; Georges St. Laurent, Waterville, Que., and W. Aaron Waldrop, Northport, Ala. Re-elected to the board was Joseph Daniele of Akron.



BARGAINING GOALS are outlined by President Peter Bommarito at the Rubber Workers convention. He listed catch-up raises, cost-of-living adjustments and pension improvements as key objectives of the union.

Alabama Labor Backs Improved Job Injury Aid

Montgomery, Ala.—The Alabama AFL-CIO is mounting an all-out legislative drive to expand coverage and improve benefits under the state worker's compensation law.

Delegates to the state federation's 10th biennial convention endorsed proposed amendments to the law that will be considered by the state legislature at a special session opening Nov. 3.

The nearly 600 delegates also called for renewed efforts to repeal Alabama's "right-to-work" law and win collective bargaining rights for public employes throughout the state when the new legislature convenes next year.

In his report to the convention, President Barney Weeks noted that membership in the state federation increased to 104,000 with the affiliation of 103 local unions representing 30,000 since the last convention.

He urged delegates to transform the growing strength of the state labor movement into an effective political action program for the 1976 elections, calling for the election of candidates that have solid programs to revitalize the nation's economy and to correct the "mismanagement" of the Nixon and Ford Administrations.

On key national issues, convention resolutions spelled out proposals for effective housing and energy programs, health insurance coverage for the unemployed, postcard registration of voters, tax reform, curbing job-eroding imports and passage of National Health Security.

The convention re-elected Weeks, who has headed the state federation since 1957, to a new two-year term. Also re-elected were Sec.-Treas. A. G. Trammell and Executive Vice President Connie Entrekin.

Four new vice presidents elected to the board are W. E. Johnson of the Communications Workers, Clayton Suddith of the Iron Workers, Ralph Minor of the Machinists and Isom Clemon of the Longshoremen.

Major speakers at the three-day convention included National COPE Director Al Barkan, Rep. Robert E. Jones (D-Ala.), State Attorney Gen. William J. Baxley, AFL-CIO Regional Director James Sala, Executive Director Charles Bradford of the Human Resources Development Institute and Executive Director Norman Hill of the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

Ford Names John Irving NLRB Counsel

John S. Irving has been named general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, subject to confirmation by the Senate.

Appointed by President Ford, Irving has been deputy general counsel since 1972. He was named to succeed John C. Miller, who has been acting general counsel since the expiration of the term of former general counsel Peter G. Nash last Aug. 15.

Irving, 34, is a career government employe. He was a law clerk with the NLRB while still a law school senior. Later, he was an attorney adviser to former board member Sam Zagoria and a trial attorney in the general counsel's appellate court branch.

From 1969 to 1971, Irving served as special assistant to the solicitor and executive assistant to the Under Secretary of Labor. He returned to the NLRB as associate general counsel for operations, in charge of the agency's field operations and its advice branch.

Federal Assistance Held Essential In New York's Financial Crisis

President Ford has voiced opposition to a federal aid for New York, although he has avoided flatly saying he would veto legislation providing financial assistance in the form of long-term loans or guarantees.

Federal aid to New York and other hard-pressed cities and states was urged in resolutions adopted at the AFL-CIO's 11th Convention in San Francisco. The convention warned:

"If New York City defaults, the repercussions will be felt far and wide throughout the country. Already the market for municipal bonds is weakening so that other cities are no longer able to borrow at reasonably low rates to meet the normal demands for funds used for temporary or long-term needs such as public works, rehabilitation and maintenance of essential facilities."

Another resolution noted the economic recession of the past two years has put severe pressure on state and local budgets, and that the Ford Administration's obsession over federal budget deficits has exacerbated the situation by short-changing the states and localities of needed funds.

President Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employees told a press conference that New York's problems differ from those of other areas only in size. "The model for disaster for other local and state governments is clearly discernible" in New York City's crisis, Wurf warned.

"The federal government must stabilize the credit market for New York State, New York City and other state and local governments," Wurf said. "The only meaningful assistance should be a federal guarantee mechanism of state and local debt."

New York City narrowly averted default on Oct. 17 when the United Federation of Teachers agreed to instruct its representatives on the teacher pension fund to invest $150 million in bonds issued by the Municipal Assistance Corp. The money was needed to meet the city's notes coming due.

"Teachers made the investment they did because they were aware of what default would have meant, both to the city and to the state," UFT President Albert Shanker declared.

"In defaulting, the city would have dragged with it hundreds of city and state governments and school systems and thousands of private concerns throughout the United States, and overseas as well," said Shanker, also head of the American Federation of Teachers.

The city's fiscal problems came to a head when major banks in New York refused to go along with the latest plan worked out between the state and the city for financing debt payments due in October.

After the Teachers pension fund had come to the rescue, Gov. Hugh Carey sent President Ford a telegram asking his cooperation and leadership in resolving the crisis.

"New York, by exhausting all of its resources, can meet its obligations until Dec. 1," Carey noted. "After then, the welfare of our citizens rests in the hands of the federal government."

Federal Reserve Board Chairman Arthur F. Burns, who until the city nearly went bankrupt Oct. 17 had minimized the seriousness of the situation, said he is reviewing New York's plight.

"If the New York City crisis remains unresolved, and if the fate of New York State remains tied to the city's, the process of economic recovery now under way in our nation could be injured," Burns warned.

Insurance Workers OK Prudential Pact

The Insurance Workers announced ratification of a two-year bargaining agreement with the Prudential Insurance Co. The vote was 3,604 in favor of ratification and 3,183 opposed in returns from 156 local unions. Affected are 16,000 Prudential district agents represented by the union in 35 states and the District of Columbia.

The new agreement provides $32 per week in new benefits, equally divided between salary increases and fringe benefit improvements. IWIU's Prudential members had earlier authorized by a 15-1 margin a strike against the company if a satisfactory agreement could not be concluded.

This wraps up the 1975 round of bargaining for IWIU during which it reached agreements with Prudential, Metropolitan Life and John Hancock Mutual Life for a total of about 35,000 insurance agents.

Strip Mining Controls Asked in North Dakota

Bismarck, N.D.—A legislative program drafted by the 18th annual convention of the North Dakota AFL-CIO proposes measures to insure payment of prevailing wages on state and local government projects, effective environmental controls of strip mining and the expansion of the state-owned bank.

The 200 delegates called for strict regulations on strip mining in the state, stressing that unrestricted mining operations would produce adverse social and environmental results.

Delegates also endorsed the extension of branch offices for the State Bank of North Dakota, the only state-owned and operated bank in the nation.

Other resolutions adopted at the three-day convention called for passage of the labor-backed National Health Security bill and reform of the National Labor Relations Act to provide added protection for workers.

Sen. Quentin Burdick (D-N.D.) in his convention address assailed President Ford's policy of government by veto. He said that the repeated efforts of Congress to bring about economic recovery have been frustrated by a string of 39 vetoes while the President attempts to hold Congress responsible for the nation's problems.

"Every time we tried to give him a tool or something to operate with, he vetoed it," Burdick observed.

Other major speakers included Margaret Thornburgh, western area director of the COPE's Women Activities Dept.; Charles Bradford, executive director of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute, and Stanley Moore, president of the North Dakota Farmers Union.

Delegates re-elected President Wallace J. Dockter, Sec.-Treas. Robert A. Donegan and five vice presidents to new two-year terms. Two new vice presidents elected to office are Earl Swanson of Fargo and Alton Schuette of Bismarck.

Mayors Back Aid To New York City

A delegation of three mayors, representing the majority of some 15,000 municipalities across the country, urged Congress to pass legislation to keep New York City from bankruptcy.

The mayors of New Orleans, St. Louis and Syracuse told a House hearing that a default by New York City "would have a significant effect on the entire municipal bond market."

From Appropriations Bill:

Panel Asked to Drop Curb on Job Safety

The AFL-CIO asked a House-Senate conference committee to scrap an amendment to the Labor-HEW appropriations bill that would effectively deny protection of the Occupational Safety & Health Act to nearly three million workers.

The Senate-passed amendment would limit OSHA's enforcement authority by exempting from federal inspection all businesses with three or fewer employes.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller, in a letter to House and Senate conferees who are ironing out differences in appropriations bills cleared by their respective chambers, noted the amendment would exempt 47 percent of all presently covered establishments.

"These same establishments—employing three or less workers—have a disproportionate number of lost work-days caused by job accidents and related illness," Biemiller observed.

The federation's strong opposition to the amendment was shared by Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop. Responding to queries from conferees as to the Labor Dept's position on the amendment, Dunlop said that all workers should be entitled to job safety and health protection under the law that Congress passed five years ago.

Any exemption based on the size of the workforce of an establishment could have long-range debilitating effects on the safety and health act, Dunlop noted. He added that additional exemptions probably would be sought in later years, if the amendment were enacted into law.

Biemiller's letter noted that, while the AFL-CIO is against the restriction on coverage, it supports another Senate-added amendment providing for $10 million for additional federal compliance officers.

"The addition of these inspectors is badly needed to make the proper enforcement of OSHA a reality for America's workforce," he said.

Turning to another rider on the Labor-HEW appropriations bill, an amendment on busing that is unrelated to the proposed OSHA limitations, Biemiller urged the House-Senate conferees to delete the Senate's anti-busing addition or at least make the provision consistent with the United States Constitution.

"Busing may be a controversial issue, but there can be no controversy concerning the court's right —without congressional interference—to interpret the Constitution," he said.

5-Day Workweek Still the Pattern

Most Americans still work a five-day week, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

A BLS study of non-farm workers on full-time schedules revealed that 83.7 percent work five days a week, 14.1 percent work more than five days, and 2.2 percent work less than five days.

The largest percentages of full-time employes working more than five days per week were in the mining and trade industries.

House Eases U.S. Employe Political Curbs

Va.) that would have reinstated many of the Hatch Act restrictions the bill sought to remove. It would have prohibited federal employes from holding office in a partisan political organization, barred them from running for any full-time state or local office or any federal post, and limited their partisan political activity to support of candidates running for part-time local or state office.

Rep. William Clay (D-Mo.), the principal sponsor of the original labor-backed bill, told the House that the amendment would "gut" a major section of the legislation.

It was beaten by a 260-147 margin and was the only amendment taken to a full rollcall. Before final passage, the House voted 327-81 against a motion by Rep. Edward J. Derwinski (R-Ill.) which would have limited the legislation to employes of the semi-autonomous U.S. Postal Service, while leaving all other employes under the Hatch Act as it now stands.

During the debate on the bill the point was strongly made that the Hatch Act, when passed in 1939, was intended to protect workers against political discrimination and not discourage them from an active citizenship role.

While the Civil Service Commission in recent years has responded to complaints by trying to balance the list of "can't do" prohibitions with "can do" listings, the legislation would make the change in emphasis explicit. It declares that the policy of Congress is that federal employes should be encouraged to exercise their rights of voluntary participation in the political processes of the nation.

$3 Wage Floor Urged To Aid Poor, Economy

could deduct from the minimum wage. Under present law, an establishment can pay a worker only half the minimum wage if the employe can make up the difference in tips.

Biemiller told Dent that the bill "reflects many of the same concerns" that were expressed by the AFL-CIO at its recent convention. The federation went on record for a $3-an-hour wage floor, double-time pay after eight hours in a day and 40 a week, and progress towards "the principle of a 35-hour workweek."

One of the main purposes of the original Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 was to bolster the national economy, Biemiller noted, and today's problems are similar.

"We view this bill as emergency legislation," Biemiller said, to "benefit the entire economy by generating additional purchasing power and creating additional jobs."

Increasing premium pay for overtime work is intended to create new jobs rather than increase earnings, he stressed. The amount of overtime worked in a sample week in September was the equivalent of nearly 900,000 full-time jobs, Biemiller testified. He told the subcommittee:

"We recognize that not all overtime can be eliminated by changing the overtime standards, but we are persuaded that much of it can and will be eliminated when employers find it more expensive to schedule regular, recurring overtime than to hire additional workers."

Because the part of compensation represented by fringe benefits isn't affected by premium pay for overtime, the time-and-one-half rate now required after 40 hours a week is actually less than that in terms of employment costs.

To stimulate job creation, Biemiller said, "we must restore the penalty aspect of the overtime pay standard."

The Dent bill would establish a cost-of-living escalator after the $3 level is reached and Biemiller termed the feature a needed protection for purchasing power. He said the AFL-CIO would also like to see the lowest-paid workers share in productivity increases through an improvement factor.

Biemiller expressed strong support for the phaseout of the tip credit provision of the present law.

"We believe that an employe should be paid at least the minimum wage and that his employer should pay it. He should not have to depend on the generosity of his customer to earn a living wage," Biemiller said.

Eliminating of tips from the minimum wage calculation was urged also by Legislative Rep. Robert E. Juliano of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees, who testified on behalf of President Edward T. Hanley.

First Bank Contract Includes Union Shop

Tacoma, Wash.—A first contract with the Union Bank here includes a union shop as well as pay and fringe benefit improvements. The Office & Professional Employees' contract allows sick leave to accumulate to 60 days.

Ford Moves to Slash Food Stamp Program

President Ford asked Congress to cut back the food stamp program so as to eliminate or reduce benefits for almost half of the 18.8 million Americans who now receive food coupons.

The Administration proposal would tie eligibility to the official poverty line of $5,050 for a family of four, eliminating one million households or some 3.4 million people from the program. Another 5.3 million who would still qualify would receive reduced benefits. Chief victims of the Ford plan would be the unemployed, the low-wage earners and those on strike.

"The bill would make it impossible for most jobless workers to be eligible for food stamps until they have been unemployed for a number of weeks," Meat Cutters Legislative Rep. Arnold Mayer said.

"It is a first-class prescription for hunger among the families who are most in need," he charged.

AFL-CIO President George Meany recently warned state and local central bodies of right-wing attacks on the food stamp program. It is "part and parcel" of the Ford Administration's attacks on workers, Meany said.

"First, they prevent the enactment of job-creation legislation. Second, they promote policies which sharply increase food and energy costs. Third, they seek to starve the jobless and the working poor by knocking them off food stamps," he charged.

The Administration's proposals, submitted by Agriculture Sec. Earl L. Butz at Senate hearings, would determine eligibility by allowing families to deduct a standard $100 a month from gross income. If there were a family member 60 years old or older, the deduction would be $125 per month.

If, after the deductions are made, the net income is below the poverty line figure of $5,050, the family would be eligible but would have to pay a flat 30 percent of its net income for food coupons.

Currently, net income eligibility is 50 percent above the poverty line figure. Most families end up paying between 16 and 24 percent of their net income for the stamps.

Political Fund Limits Cited for Corporations

Corporations should be limited in soliciting voluntary contributions to a corporate political fund to stockholders and their families, organized labor told the Federal Elections Commission.

This can be the only interpretation of the new elections law, attorneys for the AFL-CIO and the Auto Workers told the commission, in light of the plainly written provision that solicitation of voluntary contributions to a union political fund is limited to members and their families.

The union viewpoint was filed with FEC chairman Thomas Curtis in reply to a request by corporations asking the commission for an interpretation of the law.

"There can be no doubt," said the letter from AFL-CIO General Counsel J. Albert Woll, Special Counsel Laurence Gold and UAW General Counsel Stephen I. Schlossberg, "that Congress intended to permit corporations and unions to establish separate, segregated political funds composed of voluntary contributions, and to administer such funds in the sense of determining what federal contributions and expenditures should be made.

"In all these respects, the fact that in 1975 a corporation should feel the need for guidance on the establishment of such a fund demonstrates only the business community's blithe disregard of the law over the years."

The letter pointed out that one adopted amendment to the law by Rep. Orval Hansen (R-Ida.) was intended to permit the "use of corporate treasury money only to defray the costs of reaching stockholders."

Congress drew the line between corporate political activity directed at stockholders and political activity financed by treasury money directed at the general public on "an overriding issue of principle," the union attorneys declared, noting that it applies also to union political activity directed at members only. They quote Hansen, during floor debate on the bill, as terming his amendment "a complete victory for those who believe that corporations and unions have no moral right to utilize their organizations' general funds for active public partisan politicking. It totally subordinates organizational interests to individual interests."

To permit corporations to use treasury money to solicit non-stockholder employes would "destroy the equity Congress intended to achieve," the union letter said.

It added that against the background of Watergate and the "systematic refusal by the corporate community to abide by the limitations imposed by Congress" the commission would be "most unwise" to interpret the law "in a manner which opens wide opportunities for abuses."

Rail Repair Clears House, Would Aid 20,000 Jobless

Bill Goes to Conference, Faces Veto

A labor-supported bill to put thousands of unemployed to work repairing badly-deteriorated segments of railroad roadbeds won 261-129 House approval in the face of another in a long series of presidential veto threats.

An even larger-scaled bill passed the Senate by a 67-10 margin earlier this year, and a House-Senate conference committee will draft the final version.

As passed by the House, railbed and signal maintenance workers who have been laid off because of the near-bankruptcy of major railroads would be the first hired.

Persons who have exhausted unemployment benefits and other long-term unemployed would be given second priority.

An estimated 15,000 to 20,000 jobs would be created under the $240 million authorization in the House bill. Railroads could not reduce their regular maintenance spending.

The Senate bill carries a $700 million price tag. The Senate would subsidize part of the cost of materials, while the House would fund only wages.

The presidential veto threat was relayed by the conservative Kansas Republican, Joe Skubitz, who led the fight against the bill. He read a letter sent to him by the Office of Management & Budget declaring that the Administration considers the bill "highly objectionable" and declaring that "the President has indicated that he would veto it if passed."

Skubitz sharply attacked the requirement in the bill that workers hired be paid the regular wages for the work they do. He couldn't see why workers should be paid "union wages" of about $6 an hour instead of a $2.10 minimum wage.

18.3 Million Unemployed During '74

A total of 18.3 million American workers were unemployed at some time during 1974, according to a special report by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. This was nearly 4 million more than were out of work in 1973.

Among all persons in the workforce for any part of 1974, the proportion of those with one week or more of unemployment was 17.6 percent, the highest in over a decade, the BLS report observed. This was more than triple the 5.6 percent average rate of unemployment in 1974.

The figures are contained in a Monthly Labor Review article titled "Work Experience of the Population, 1974," by BLS economist Anne McDougall Young. The article is in the October issue of the publication.

Other highlights of the report:

- The number of workers unemployed for 15 or more weeks in 1974 was 5.6 million, compared with 4.3 million in 1973.
- One-third of all construction workers and one-fifth of all factory workers were unemployed at some time during the course of the year.
- The increase in unemployment was sharper for men than for women but the proportion of the workforce with joblessness during the year continued to be higher for women—18.3 percent, compared with 17.1 percent.
- The drastic decline in economic activity at the end of 1974 "was reflected in a drop of nearly 500,000 in the number of men who worked year-round full-time. Most of the loss in steady employment among men was in manufacturing industries."
- In contrast, the number of women who worked year-round full-time increased 800,000, "led by workers in wholesale and retail trade and in services."

AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger noted that on the basis of the report, the federation's estimate of the number of workers who will experience joblessness at one time or another this year probably is "quite conservative."

The AFL-CIO estimates that about 20 million or more workers will be unemployed some time during the course of 1975 and that about 8 million or more will be jobless for 15 weeks or more during the year.

BLS's annual survey of the work experience of the population during a given year is made in March of the following year.

Issues Veto Threat:

Ford Rules Out Aid In New York Crisis

President Ford washed his hands of New York's financial crisis and said the federal government's only role should be to prevent a breakdown of essential public services if the nation's largest city goes bankrupt.

And if a divided Congress should nevertheless come up with legislation providing emergency federal aid to enable New York to avoid financial collapse, Ford said he will veto the bill.

The President's long-awaited statement on the New York crisis was made in a suddenly-scheduled speech to the National Press Club in Washington, just before he left on a Republican Party fund-raising trip to California.

It was a flat repudiation of federal responsibility to avert a crisis that Ford said was the result of New York's own mismanagement.

Earlier, leaders of unions representing New York City employes appeared before a House Banking subcommittee to urge approval of federal loan guarantees. The guarantees are essential to both the city and New York state, they said, and necessary to prevent potentially serious economic consequences for the nation.

Ford merely asked Congress to amend the bankruptcy law so that a federal court could assume direction of the city's finances after default. This, he indicated, would allow continuation of such functions as police and fire protection, and emergency hospital care, while the city tried to work out arrangements with its creditors.

But the President stressed that he was "fundamentally opposed" to any of several proposals before Congress aimed at preventing the city's default through federal loan guarantees.

"I can tell you now that I am prepared to veto any bill that has as its purpose a federal bailout of New York City to prevent a default," Ford threatened.

In a sharp retort, the U.S. Conference of Mayors said the

Meany Hits Distortion of Busing Policy

Recent demonstrations in Louisville, Ky., and in the nation's capital against so-called "forced busing" do not represent the policy of the AFL-CIO, Federation President George Meany declared.

In a letter to Kentucky State AFL-CIO leaders, Meany deplored "the actions of those who pretend they are representing the labor movement or speaking in the name of the AFL-CIO" in organizing and staging such demonstrations.

Meany pointed out that the federation has gone on record three times in support of school busing for the purpose of securing quality education for all children, when ordered by the courts. This policy was most recently endorsed at the

$29 Million Chiseled From Workers' Pay

Labor Dept. investigators reported that employers short-changed nearly 138,000 workers of more than $29 million in the first quarter of fiscal 1976. That amounts to a 31 percent increase over the same period last year.

Over $21 million of these underpayments resulted from violations of the minimum wage and overtime pay provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Labor Dept. said. Most of those short-changed were among the nation's lowest-paid workers.

The remaining $8 million in underpayments resulted from employer violations in the following areas: 6,320 workers due $4,549,458 under the Equal Pay Act, which requires equal pay for men and women doing comparable work in the same establishment; 750 workers due $2,136,157 under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, which prohibits employment discrimination against workers ages 40-65; and 6,127 workers due $1,320,095 under prevailing wage provisions of federal government contracts.

The government managed to get employers to restore only $16.5 million in back pay to workers during the first quarter, and some of this total was a

Unions Retain Rights On Health Plan Choice

Revised federal regulations covering prepaid health maintenance plans provide full guarantees for collective bargaining rights of unions.

The new rules issued by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, to take effect late in November, make clear that a "dual choice" provision obligating employers to offer an HMO plan as well as a conventional-type reimbursement plan does not bypass the union's role as representative of the workers.

An earlier interpretation by HEW had brought a strong protest from the AFL-CIO. It would have nullified basic collective bargaining principles by requiring an employer to offer workers a plan that had already been rejected by their union.

Under the new regulations, the employer's option offer must meet the collective bargaining requirements of the National Labor Relations Act and the Railway Labor Act. Thus the dual choice obligation will be met when the employer makes the offer to the workers through their union.

Dispatchers Endorse ConRail Restructuring

Chicago—ConRail, the federal government's plan to restructure the country's rail system in the Northeast, received strong support at the Train Dispatchers 22nd convention here.

Delegates also called for expansion of Amtrak, the quasi-governmental agency charged with developing and managing a rail passenger network in the United States.

In other actions during the three-day convention, the 100 delegates elected officers, voted a dues increase, adopted a series of resolutions and heard several speakers.

ATDA President C. R. Pfenning, reviewing collective bargaining gains since the previous convention, noted that pay increases averaged over $4,000 per member over the four-year period—"the largest gain in the history of our union."

Pfenning was re-elected without opposition as were Sec.-Treas. D. E. Collins and Vice Presidents B. C. Hilbert, D. V. Chandler, R. J. Irvin, Jr., and R. E. Johnson.

Delegates approved a constitutional amendment increasing dues to the national organization by about 28 percent. The increase will take effect in three steps over three years.

Another change raised the initiation fee from $35 to $50 for full-time dispatchers while maintaining a reduced rate for those working only part-time.

Among the resolutions adopted by the convention were those calling for:

- A joint move by ATDA and other interested unions to secure fair and impartial hearings for employes charged with rule violations by the carriers.
- An investigation of the effects on commerce and the environment of proposals to transport coal via slurry pipelines.
- Transfer of railroad safety regulations from the Federal Railway Administration in the Transportation Dept. to the Labor Dept.'s Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

Principal speakers were James E. Yost, president of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes' Dept., and C. J. Chamberlain, president of the Signalmen and chairman of the Railway Labor Executives Association.

Yost, noting that the four shopcraft unions affiliated with the RED have nearly exhausted all legislative remedies in their current contract dispute with the railroads, said it may be necessary "to call on members of the ATDA and members of other rail unions for support if we are forced to use our economic strength to get an agreement." Delegates responded enthusiastically.

Chamberlain, observing that over one-half of the delegates were attending their first ATDA convention, called for strong educational programs by rail unions to spread the word about what the trade union movement is all about.

Thomas Kessel Named NLRB Chief Judge

Thomas N. Kessel, a trial examiner and administrative law judge with the National Labor Relations Board for 22 years, has been named the NLRB's chief administrative law judge.

Kessel has been directing the NLRB's Division of Judges as acting administrative law judge since July 1. He has served the division in an executive capacity for nine years, first as associate chief and later as deputy chief administrative law judge.

A 20-Year Stocktaking:

Labor Movement Presses Fight for Jobs, Social Justice

The AFL-CIO's 20th anniversary this year finds the labor movement strong and vigorous, Thomas R. Donahue writes in the October issue of the American Federationist.

"The U.S. labor movement remains the strongest, most solid, most consistent voice for social improvement, for democracy and for the betterment of the human condition this nation has ever known," he observes.

Donahue, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President George Meany, takes stock of the labor movement's progress toward two main goals. The first goal is to improve the job-related conditions of union members. A secondary object is to improve the general condition of members by improving conditions for everyone, everywhere.

In pursuit of the primary goal, an extensive system of collective bargaining has been constructed. And it works, despite imperfections, Donahue notes.

"It sorts out the demands and the final offers; it continually devises new approaches, systems and techniques, and it accommodates to constantly changing conditions."

The sharp growth in the number of workers covered by cost-of-living escalator clauses is but one example of that effort to accommodate. Others include innovations in the bargaining process such as the Experimental Negotiating Agreement in the steel industry.

"The trade-union movement's 1975 hopes for collective bargaining remain the same as the objectives of the government outlined in the Wagner Act 40 years ago," he declares.

"Those are: to create the conditions in which workers, with full freedom of association, can band together to equalize their buying power with that of the employer and thereby better enable both employer and employes to accommodate to one another's interests and the interests of all the people—in a sense, to better enable them to live productive lives together—with benefits for each and all."

Hampering the bargaining process are government policies and management schemes that result in lengthy delays in settlements, Donahue notes. He cited delays in the processes of the National Labor Relations Board, the federal government's failure to give its employes more than token rights to bargain and employer dodges in the textile and air transport industries.

"But the most significant point is that labor recognizes both the successes and shortcomings of collective bargaining and continues every day to try to improve the system and make it more responsive," Donahue observes.

In pursuit of its larger goals—that is, the improvement of the general condition of everyone—American labor can be seen as a movement with a social philosophy, the author notes.

"The effective pursuit of those larger social interests is manifested every day in the fight for national health insurance, minimum wages, full employment, decent housing, better education, equal rights, tax justice, better social security, workers' compensation, fair trade, the free movement of peoples and the dozens of other items which make up our agenda of social concerns," Donahue points out.

Within the trade union movement, he sees more mergers among unions, more coordination of bargaining, more cooperative organizing efforts among affiliates, a greater emphasis on political and legislative action and an enlarged participation by minorities in union affairs.

The current recession and inflation will cause a concentration on job security and wage catch-up for the next few years, he suggests. There will also be renewed concerns about safety and the work environment.

"A large part of the available money, in the short term, is going to have to be applied primarily to catch-up costs in wages and basic fringes and that fact is going to put a severe strain on bargaining," Donahue notes.

"The trade-union movement has never accepted the concept that our function is only to maintain our current position in the economic order. Rather, we insist on improving our position," he said, "and insist on a more rational distribution of the wealth we create."

Georgia Labor Pushes Agency Shop Measure

Savannah, Ga.—The Georgia State AFL-CIO renewed its commitment to repeal of the state's so-called right-to-work law which forbids unions and employers to negotiate union-shop agreements.

At the same time, delegates to the organization's 19th annual convention here set their sights on passage of an agency shop bill in the 1976 session of the state legislature. They said the open shop law has retarded progress in Georgia while promoting distrust between labor and management.

The convention approved a 5-cent increase in monthly per capita dues, effective Jan. 1, 1976. The hike, necessitated by the employment of a full-time women's activities director, raises the per capita to 20 cents.

Another constitutional amendment, aimed at trimming costs, requires that future executive board meetings be held in Atlanta. Most board members live in or close to the city. In the past, the quarterly meetings had been held in different cities throughout the state.

The three-day convention, attended by 450 delegates, also went on record in favor of a collective bargaining law for all state, county and city employes in Georgia. And it announced its solid backing of efforts by the Textile Workers Union of America to secure a first-time contract with the anti-union J.P. Stevens & Co. at Roanoke Rapids, N.C.

Speakers included Lt. Gov. Zell Miller; John Perkins, assistant director of the AFL-CIO's National COPE; Charles Bradford, executive director of the Human Resources Development Institute; and Nicholas Bonanno, a vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Steelworkers Get 10-Cent COL Hike

Pittsburgh—Some 400,000 members of the Steelworkers employed in the basic steel industry and about 36,300 USWA members in the container industry become eligible for additional cost-of-living adjustments this month. Steelworkers President I. W. Abel announced.

Basic steel workers will receive a 10-cent COL increase, effective Nov. 1 while the can industry workers will receive a similar adjustment Nov. 15.

November Schedule Set By Labor Studies Center

A five-day institute to help union officers, representatives and staff members develop more effective leadership skills highlights the November program at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, Silver Spring, Md.

Students at this institute will explore the ways groups are motivated and decisions are made, how a good leader can help groups toward the effective use of resources and efficient organization. The class becomes an experimental group so that members can analyze their own leadership styles and explore alternative techniques. Lectures, discussion and video tape playbacks are used.

The institute begins at 4 p.m. Sunday Nov. 16 and runs to Friday, Nov. 21.

Other activities at the 47-acre campus during November include:

Carpenters—A seminar for new business agents of the international. Topics will include the pensions reform law, leadership skills, collective bargaining developments, the law of picketing, Davis-Bacon Act and equal opportunity laws. Participants will spend one day at the Carpenters headquarters building in Washington, D.C. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Nov. 9 to Friday, Nov. 14.

Machinists—A program for local union presidents. Subjects include local administration, the IAM constitution, union communications, developing public understanding and the union's dues structure. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Nov. 16 to Friday, Nov. 21.

Two off-campus institutes are scheduled for November.

A five-day seminar on Labor Law will be held Nov. 2 to 7 at the Unversity of Colorado, Boulder. It will cover organizing and the law, collective bargaining and the law, Landrum-Griffin and the regulation of internal union affairs, and the impact of the Equal Pay Act and Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.

A seminar on Grievance Arbitration is set for Nov. 16 to 21 at the University of Illinois, Champaign. It offers training in the preparation and presentation of grievance arbitration cases. Topics will include the issue of arbitratility, the law of arbitration and the selection of arbitrators. Participants will prepare and present cases before a professional arbitrator.

Two unions will use the Silver Spring campus for one-day training sessions during November. The American Federation of Government Employees will conduct a steward training program for District 14 on Nov. 8; and the Council of School Officials will meet on campus Nov. 21.

More information on these and other programs may be obtained from Fred Hoehler, executive director, AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md., 20903. Phone 301/431-6400.

Breakthrough Election:

Farm Workers Win Napa Valley Vote

Delano, Calif.—The Farm Workers scored a major breakthrough in winning the first union representation election in the Napa Valley.

Workers at the Charles Krug Vineyards of C. Mondavi & Sons favored the UFW by a vote of 77 to 35 for no union. Six ballots were challenged.

The victory is viewed as significant, not only because it was the first election in the valley, but also because the UFW organizing activities were far less extensive than in other parts of California.

In a statewide vote tally released by the state Agricultural Labor Relations Board, the UFW has won 121 of the 215 elections conducted between Sept. 2 and Oct. 17. During the same period the Teamsters won 83 elections and 11 others went "no union."

Overall, the UFW won 56 percent of the elections, compared with 39 percent for the Teamsters and 5 percent for no union.

Of the total votes cast, the UFW received 15,959, or 49 percent, to the Teamsters' 8,643, or 26 percent. Another 5,019, or 15 percent, voted no union.

The ALRB also reported that 3,100 ballots have been challenged since the farm labor elections have been under way.

As a result of the elections decided, the UFW represents 13,776 workers, or 56 percent, the labor board said. The Teamsters will represent 9,488, or 38 percent.

UFW President Cesar Chavez refuted the claim of Teamsters President Frank Fitzsimmons that the IBT has made no efforts to confront the Farm Workers in a number of elections.

"They have been trying," Chavez stressed, "but they haven't been able to get enough signatures to get on the ballots on any ranches except where they have made backdoor deals with the growers."

Meanwhile, the UFW scored another victory when Superior Court Judge Jay R. Ballantyne of Visalia upheld an ALRB order that about 300 workers on the White River Farm were ineligible to vote because they were not company employes.

The board honored a UFW unfair labor practice charge against the ranch after the ALRB investigation disclosed that 300 names were added to the payroll in an effort to head off an UFW election victory.

Fund Launched for Wayne Morse Chair

A nationwide committee has been formed to raise $500,000 for the recently established Wayne Morse Chair of Law and Politics at the University of Oregon.

The fund was started by contributions at the time of Morse's death in 1974. Among the initial contributors was the AFL-CIO.

Morse was dean of the university's law school for 14 years and was a leading mediator and arbitrator before his election to the Senate in 1944. The Morse chair is planned as an annual rotating professorship, to be filled by well-known public figures.

AFL-CIO President George Meany is a member of the fund-raising committee, which is headed by former Supreme Court Justice Arthur Goldberg.

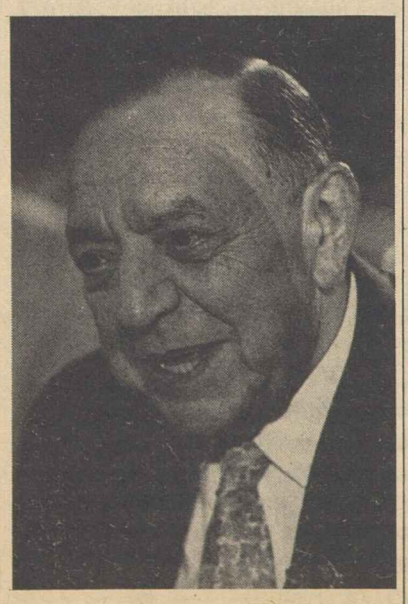
Peter Fosco Dies, Head Of Laborers Since '68

Chicago—Peter Fosco, president of the Laborers for the past seven years and a vice president of the AFL-CIO, died after a heart attack at his family home here Oct. 26.

Fosco, 83, was elected to the AFL-CIO Executive Council in 1969, a year after succeeding the late Joseph V. Moreschi as president of the LIU. He also served as first vice president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

In a message to his widow, Carmela, Federation President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland expressed their sympathies to the Fosco family.

"He was a great trade union leader, a fine and decent man, who truly believed in fairness and justice and who devoted his entire lifetime to serving his fellow workers," Meany and Kirkland said.



PETER FOSCO

Fosco was born of Italian parents in an eastern Europe territory that is now Poland in 1892. He came to the United States in 1913 and began a career as construction laborer in Chicago.

After becoming active in Local 2 of the Laborers, he was elected financial secretary in 1916 and local president in 1920.

In 1936, Fosco was named manager of the union's Chicago region, which encompassed nine states and two Canadian provinces, the largest in the international.

Active in civic and political affairs of the Chicago area, Fosco served as a Cook County commissioner from 1938 to 1946.

Fosco was elected secretary-treasurer of the international in 1950, and held the post until he assumed the presidency of the union. During his tenure, he brought about the merger of the Mail Handlers with the LIU.

In addition to his widow, Fosco is survived by two sons and several grandchildren. Funeral services were held Oct. 29 in Chicago.

NEWSPAPER GUILD members march on the picket line in support of striking Washington Post pressmen, mailers and photo-engravers. The Washington-Baltimore Guild local reported that it has paid weekly benefits to 200 Post unit members who have refused to cross picket lines, even though the unit voted narrowly to continue work.

News Executives Train At 'School for Scabs'

The Newspaper Production & Research Center in Oklahoma City, despite its scholarly name, has little to do with the development of new technologies in the news publishing industry.

The center's key objective is the development of the "executive" strikebreaker.

Members of printing trade unions call it a "school for scabs," where management personnel receive cram courses in newspaper mechnical operations during strike situations and how to weaken the collective bargaining position of unions.

News stories in the New York Times and the Wall Street Journal described how the center operates.

Labor writer Damon Stetson reported in the Times article that 200 U.S. and Canadian newspaper publishers are members of the Southern Production Program, Inc., which operates the center.

Stetson noted that the corporation was originally founded in 1951. The stated purposes in its articles of incorporation were to improve the production of newspapers through "sound economical methods" and to assist members in newspaper production in "any emergency when normal means of production have failed or are unavailable."

The apparent reference to strike "emergency" situations was later dropped, Stetson reported.

But since the Newspaper Production & Research Center was established in 1967, a total of 2,333 newspaper executives, supervisors and other non-craft personnel have been trained in all phases of newspaper production. Center officials expect to instruct about 300 newspaper officials every year.

In addition to the operation of printing presses, instructions are given in stereotyping, photoengraving, offset plate-making, news and advertising paste-up of pages, and various composing room techniques.

Douglas Martin in the Wall Street Journal article noted the costs of the courses at the center range from $40 for two days of introduction to computer operations to $500 a student for offset press training. Some courses range up to four weeks.

"Graduates" of the center have been handling mechanical and production operations during the current strike at the Washington Post. The paper was struck by pressmen of the Graphic & Printing Communications Union Oct. 1 when their contract expired. Walkouts by the mailers of the International Typographical Union and photoengravers of the Graphic Arts International Union followed shortly.

Other craft unions at the Post have been honoring the picket lines of the three unions, along with about 200 members of the Newspaper Guild.

But even with the cross-trained supervisors, mechanical failures are a daily problem at the Post. A Post official, quoted in the Wall Street Journal story, referred to the executive pressmen as "couple-of-week wonders," and said that "every night we've had delays."

Despite the problems, the WSJ said publishers feel that the Oklahoma City school is a big asset to employers.

Supervisors trained at the school continued to publish at the Dallas Morning News and the Dallas Times Herald during strikes last year. Striking workers have since been replaced by nonunion employes at both newspapers. The Kansas City Star made similar use of the executive strikebreakers in 1974.

The center also conducts workshops for industrial relations executives involved in negotiating contracts with unions. Robert Spahn, who directs operations of the school, said in the Times article the seminars familiarize management negotiators with equipment, operations and production techniques for negotiations.

Spahn told the WSJ that he isn't disturbed by the "scab school" label given the center. "I don't take any offense," he said, "I've been called far worse than that."

Meany Scores Distortion of Busing Policy

AFL-CIO's 11th convention in San Francisco.

"While individual union members certainly have every right to exercise their constitutional privileges of free speech," Meany said, "they have no right whatever to claim or imply that their actions represent the policy of the AFL-CIO, the Kentucky State AFL-CIO, the Louisville Central Labor Council or any other AFL-CIO organization."

Meany warned, "it is emphatically against AFL-CIO policy for the Kentucky AFL-CIO or any local central body to lend any aid or support whatever to those who seek to ignore or to pervert" federation policy.

Meany's letter, addressed to Joseph Warren, president, and Leonard S. Smith, executive secretary-treasurer, of the Kentucky AFL-CIO and to Herbert E. Hale, secretary-treasurer of the Greater Louisville Central Labor Council, noted the AFL-CIO has consistently supported both quality education and integrated education.

"We understand the emotionalism that has swept over your area as a result of the court's decision," Meany said in a reference to the Supreme Court's position on busing.

"But we recognize as well that that emotional response has been fanned into hysteria by members of the Ku Klux Klan, the American Nazi Party, discredited dissidents from the Boston area and other extremists who prefer to exacerbate hatred rather than seek sensible readjustments and resolution of legitimate grievances."

Meany said the labor movement's responsibility is to seek workable schedules, to minimize friction and to make the busing system work as it was intended to work: for the benefit of children who need and deserve the highest quality of education available, regardless of their race or color.

Meany added that it is the duty of the Kentucky AFL-CIO and all local central bodies to implement the policy of the AFL-CIO and to make sure that Kentucky union members are not misled by demagogues and that they understand and respect the law.

John Hall Named Aide To Musicians President

New York—John C. Hall, Jr., has been named assistant to President Hal C. Davis of the Musicians. He is a member of AFM Local 802 and formerly was on the staff of the Stage Employes.

Senate Urged to Block Blackburn Appointment

The AFL-CIO has asked the Senate not to confirm Benjamin R. Blackburn as chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said Blackburn opposed civil rights and fair housing legislation and was a strong supporter of anti-labor groups when he served in Congress from 1966 to 1974.

"The chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board should not be an individual who is opposed to basic civil rights and equal opportunity in housing which are supposed to be affirmatively enforced by the person in that position," Biemiller wrote members of the Senate Banking Committee.

"Nor would it be appropriate to have at the head of the most important home-financing regulatory agency of the government a man who has displayed an antipathy to organized labor and to low-income housing occupants," he added.

Biemiller said that Blackburn, when a congressman from Georgia, actively wrote letters in behalf of the anti-labor National Right-to-Work Foundation, and allowed his name to be used for solicitation of funds by that organization.

A Moral Crossroad for the UN

THE UNITED NATIONS General Assembly faces one of the gravest challenges in its 30-year history—a challenge that goes to the very roots of its existence as a humanitarian organization—the question of whether it will officially endorse anti-semitism.

There can be no other interpretation of the action of the UN's Third Committee in adopting a resolution that zionism is "a form of racism and racial discrimination." That resolution was adopted in the committee that deals with social and humanitarian issues by a vote of 70 to 29, with 27 nations abstaining and 16 absent.

The wide support that the UN has gained in the United States since its birth in San Francisco in 1945—support led by the labor movement whose representatives were involved in the organization's founding—is narrowing and the beginnings of a re-examination of the extent of the U.S. commitment is stirring.

General Assembly action supporting the position of the Third Committee would be a grievous and perhaps fatal error in the life of the UN.

In the debate in committee on the resolution brought before it by the Arab bloc nations, Leonard Garment, the U.S. representative, stated the issue clearly and concisely:

"This committee is preparing itself, with deliberation and foreknowledge, to perform a supreme act of deceit, to make a massive attack on the moral realities of the world.

"Under the guise of a program to eliminate racism in the United Nations, it is at the point of officially endorsing anti-semitism, one of the oldest and most virulent forms of racism known to human history. This draft explicitly encourages the racism known as anti-semitism even as it would have use believe that its words will lead to the elimination of racism.

"I choose my words carefully when I say that this is an obscene act. The United States protests this act. But protest alone is not enough. In fairness to ourselves we must also issue a warning. This resolution places the work of the United Nations in jeopardy."

THE RESOLUTION is the final result of the Arab campaign against Israel in the UN, a campaign that started in 1973 when the General Assembly's resolution on apartheid was amended by the Arab bloc and its allies to include a sentence on the "unholy alliance" between apartheid, colonialism and zionism.

The Arab campaign reached its peak this year—at the Women's conference in Mexico, the Conference of the African heads of state, the Conference of the Non-Aligned States and finally the current UN General Assembly session. The goal is to bring about Israel's expulsion from the UN or its suspension from the assembly. Failing at the moment to achieve either goal, the Arab nations have touched off the attack on zionism as a form of racism.

Garment makes the point that the UN throughout its 30-year history has been an important organization "because it had been thought that the nations of the world, assembled together, would give voice to the most decent and humane instincts of mankind."

This is the basis of the UN's moral authority and its influence on human affairs. This is the authority that must be preserved by an overwhelming defeat in the General Assembly of the resolution that would give the UN's blessing to anti-semitism.

A Word Edgewise:

Overexpansion of Programs Backfires on Private Colleges

By John P. Roche

ADAM SMITH, the great proponent of "laissez faire," and Karl Marx, the prophet of "scientific socialism," were in full agreement on one proposition: the division of labor would be the key to attaining modern, enlightened society. Curiously, when you investigate the major problem in the private sector of American higher education, you discover that colleges and universities—theoretically strongholds of enlightment—have rejected that principle. Indeed, with few exceptions, they are the last stronghold of primordial individualism.

What triggered this thought was Columbia University President William D. McGill's announcement that "for all intents and purposes, the university's general endowment is gone." While other presidents have been less forthcoming, it is no secret that for the past decade many institutions have, in the old phrase, been eating their seed corn, that is, drawing on capital to meet operating costs. At the same time tuition has been increased to the point where any student without scholarship aid costs his or her family about $5,000 a year, room, board and textbooks included.

Obviously the combination of inflation and recession (and a staggering increase in heating bills since the OPEC cartel went into action) has played a significant role in this push toward bankruptcy. But other factors not beyond control also must be taken into consideration. As McGill pointed out, in the lush 1960s, when federal and foundation money was flowing freely, many schools expanded wildly. When the tap was turned off, they found themselves with programs, projects and, above all, personnel that required internal funding.

In many, if not most cases, those "dynamic, innovative" programs (to use the unpatented cliche) were nothing of the sort. They were simply replications of similar programs already in existence at other institutions. They were, in other words, gross violations of the principle of the division of labor. But when the music stopped, the university was committed to tenured faculty and also trapped by its own press releases. After all, how could you scrap the most "dynamic, innovative" graduate program in the country?

This is not 20-20 hindsight on my part. A depression kid, I have always had something of an economic catastrophe complex. (At the moment I'm worrying about how much of my retirement annuity is invested in "moral obligation" bonds. Who but John Mitchell would have put something like that over on flinty-eyed capitalists?) Thus when the big money began to flow into higher education, I was very leery. For years I tried to block the establishment of a graduate program in my former department, arguing that Harvard and three or four other universities in the area could handle the business. Ironically I was overriden when the National Defense Education Act threw some money at us. Once we had the money (which has long since disappeared), we had to have the program.

ANOTHER FACTOR that merits discussion is the vast increase in public higher education. With the annual fee at the City University of New York $110 (with a huge increase of $25 in the offing), private universities like Columbia and New York University are economically out of the running. The University of Massachusetts creates the same difficulty in the Boston area.

This has led some presidents of private institutions to denounce the growth. In my judgment this is a thoroughly reactionary view (although I believe some increase in fees for those who can pay them would be justified); private institutions should utilize, not criticize their public neighbors.

To be precise, if this is the year of the "dynamic, innovative" university without walls or Gaelic Studies Program and the state university sets one up, there is no need for all the private schools in the area to join the parade. The same ground justifies phasing out weak academic programs whenever the state or another private university has superior offerings.

The private college or university should not be an educational supermarket—it should honor the division of labor and do what it does best. It was hard to get a hearing for this rational viewpoint with all that money floating into the groves of academe. Now, when push comes to shove, it may have a chance.

Job Expansion Needed:

Destroying Seniority Principle Won't Solve Employment Crisis

The following is excerpted from a paper presented to the Labor Relations Law Section of the American Bar Association by Elliot Bredhoff, general counsel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., on affirmative action and seniority.

PROBABLY THE MOST time-honored concept in all of labor-management relations is that of seniority. From the employes' point of view it determines promotional opportunities, settles competition for shift preferences and overtime, determines fringe benefit entitlement, and most importantly, provides for protection in layoff situations.

As concerns layoffs, the near-universal application of the seniority principle is that of "last in, first out." It is justified among employes on the basis that longer service workers are entitled to retention of jobs based on length of service. From the employe's point of view, it is justified by the fact that it means retention of the most experienced and usually most skilled of the work force.

The significance of seniority to employes and unions cannot be overemphasized. It provides a uniformly accepted mechanism for assuring workers of job security based on length of service in place of favoritism, discrimination and arbitrary management decisions which are possible in its absence.

These concepts are axiomatic to all of us who practice the art of labor relations. But it is essential to recall and reiterate them today because some of the attacks on seniority systems being advanced by zealous proponents of the interests of minorities and females would effectively destroy the seniority principle. They are blaming the seniority system for social and economic ills and for employer discrimination in hiring or assignments, despite the fact the system can in no way be held responsible for these problems.

The solutions they propose, namely, to grant junior minority and female employes artificial or fictional service credit to avoid layoffs, would destroy job security arrangements which are the lifeblood of industrial workers and their unions. And a significant number of minority group employes who have earned long years of service credit in American industry, would be as adversely affected as long service whites by such gimmicks.

It may be that these proponents of fictional or phantom seniority are not aware of the devastating impact their proposals would have on employes and unions. A union which cannot provide seniority protection to workers, particularly against layoffs, would not be worth its salt, and would quickly lose favor with the workers. This would result in a sharp imbalance in labor-management relations. It would be a step toward the days when unorganized workers were at the mercies of their employers. Such a retrogressive turn of events simply must be avoided.

The overriding imperative for our economy as well as for our objective of a balanced and integrated work force is to expand economic output. But until government policies achieve these results, it is to the overall advantage of all workers—minorities, females and whites—to utilize existing programs to place the optimum purchasing power in the hands of workers.

Generally speaking, devices such as work sharing reduce rather than maximize the number of dollars flowing to workers. The reason is quite simple. If a full employe complement shares a limited amount of available work, all employes involved suffer reduction in weekly hours of work and earnings. They all in effect share the poverty. On the other hand, if the junior employes are laid off, the remaining more senior employes will draw down the same amount of wages from the employer as would the full employe complement under a work sharing program. In addition, however, the junior employes will receive unemployment compensation from the government and, in many cases, supplemental unemployment benefits under private collectively bargained programs. Hence, the aggregate yield for the same group of employes is substantially greater in the layoff situation than the work sharing situation.

It is no wonder, therefore, that the labor movement is opposed to government-mandated work sharing programs. The cold, hard economic facts demonstrate the adverse impact of such programs on the work force as a whole.

While the labor movement opposes compulsory work sharing programs, it recognizes the existence and viability of many private programs which have evolved through collective bargaining. Under some of these private programs, senior employes are given incentives to elect lay off or early retirement, restrictions are placed on overtime, extended vacations and holidays are provided, and scheduled work periods are reduced. These and other arrangements under which the interests of the entire work force are safeguarded serve to provide additional work opportunities for junior employes.

It is through such voluntary private programs, as well as through expanded governmental unemployment and assistance programs, that the adverse effects on those who are laid off can be mitigated, while avoiding the destructive effects of fictional seniority or forced work sharing programs.

The only real answer to this problem, however, is to be found in an upturn in our economy, with its attendant expansion of employment opportunities for all. This of course can only be brought about by a government firmly committed to recognizing the problem and acting decisively thereafter. Unfortunately, our government thus far has failed to meet these vital needs.

Ford's Plan Assailed:

Propaganda Campaign Twists Debate on Food Stamp Reform

CHARGES OF WIDESPREAD waste, fraud and abuse in the food stamp program are part of a "vicious propaganda campaign" that is distorting the debate over reform of the system, Legislative Rep. Arnold Mayer of the Meat Cutters declared.

Mayer said that while there have been some administrative errors in the food stamp operations, it is a "very complicated program" that serves 18 million Americans in all parts of the nation. But, allegations of wholesale cheating, he asserted, are largely "half-truths and outright lies." Mayer appeared on the network radio interview Labor News Conference.

Mayer said the food stamp plan that President Ford sent to Congress last week is really not reform at all, but an attempt to cut off 6 million people from food stamps and reduce benefits for several million others. He branded the Ford plan anti-union, pointing out that it would drop both unemployed and striking workers from the program's protections.

Workers pay a big share of the taxes in this country, Mayer said, "helping to pay for that program, and they should be able to benefit from it when they are in need." He pointed out that "a strike is a legal situation . . . employers get all sorts of government aid during a strike or during a walkout," and strikers too should get needed protections for themselves and their families against malnutrition and starvation.

"I thought we had given up years ago the idea that strikers should be starved back to work," as the Ford proposal would do, he declared. He said the push to ban food stamps for strikers and their families is "an effort to cut down the strength of workers, rather than an effort to change the food stamp program."

Reporters questioning Mayer were Ann McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE BASIC PROBLEMS of New York City, Philadelphia, Atlanta, New Orleans, St. Louis, Indianapolis, San Francisco and other cities are national rather than local and require a national remedy.

New York used to be not only part of the United States, but the gateway to a land of opportunity. More than 16 million people came to escape poverty and political and religious oppression. In seeking and making a better life, they built railroads and toiled in mines and mills and factories.

We are a nation of immigrants, according to anthropologist Margaret Mead. In case anybody had forgotten, Franklin D. Roosevelt opened his address before the Daughters of the American Revolution with the words: "My fellow immigrants." He was never invited back.

The quest for a better life revealed itself in the world's most mobile population. Americans moved out of the South to the North and West, to shipyards and defense plants in World War II and to booming manufacturing centers in peacetime. The nation became highly integrated in its transportation, commerce and communications.

In recent decades, however, the large cities suffered a deteriorating economic base as people and industry moved to the suburbs and, regionally, to the Southwest and West.

More recently, the Administration's decision to fight runaway inflation by accepting a prolonged period of high-level unemployment has aggravated the social and economic problems of the cities.

New York City's fiscal problem was thoroughly examined in an excellent study by the Congressional Budget Office headed by Dr. Alice M. Rivlin.

Between 1970 and 1975, New York City lost a total of 380,000 private sector jobs while the population remained relatively constant, according to the study. Due to immigration from the South, the shift to the suburbs and the aging of residents, New York City found itself with a larger proportion of people dependent on city services—the poor, the uneducated, the aged, the non-English speaking.

The city's welfare-related expenditures total some $3.5 billion or about one-third of its current spending. One billion dollars of this is borne alone by New York since it is a city-county. If New York were part of a large county, as are Los Angeles, Chicago and Newark, the county would share the cost.

WHILE EMERGENCY ACTIONS can help meet the present crisis, the CBO said, it is probable the underlying problems facing New York and other large, aging cities can be dealt with effectively only by the states or federal government. New York City would be "aided immensely" if the state or federal government assumed the city's welfare burden, CBO concluded.

President Ford's moralizing about New York perhaps reflects his quarter-century in Congress representing a homogenous Grand Rapids, Mich., district of Dutch-Americans—stubbornly honest, hard-working, strongly religious and conservative. He wants New York to repent and mend its ways.

Treasury Secretary William Simon, campaigning for a rollback in social programs and federal spending, also exploits the anti-city bias by calling the food stamp program "a well-known haven for chiselers and ripoff artists." Yet the Agriculture Dept. found that fraud amounted to less than 1 percent among 19 million recipients.

After the orgy of moralizing tapers off, and the greatest amount of sacrifices in social service cutbacks, layoffs and other concessions are wrung out, congressional hearings may turn the spotlight on hard realities and lay a factual basis for effective aid.

As the AFL-CIO convention declared in October, what is needed is not only emergency aid for New York and other cities but a range of basic actions—"countercyclical" federal aid to states and localities, reform of welfare costs and revenue-sharing and increased grants to meet social needs.

DEBATE OVER REFORM of the food stamp program is being distorted by a vicious propaganda campaign, Legislative Rep. Arnold Mayer of the Meat Cutters charged on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Ann McFeatters of Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Tom Joyce, right, of Newsweek magazine. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Rollcall on Federal Workers' Rights

Before the House passed a labor-supported bill lifting Hatch Act restrictions, it rejected by a 260-147 vote an amendment which would have continued nearly all of the prohibitions that have kept federal employes from participating voluntarily in the nation's political life. The vote was taken Oct. 21.

On the AFL-CIO's scoreboard, right votes (R) were cast by 225 Democrats and 35 Republicans who voted against the amendment. Wrong votes (W) for continuing harsh restrictions were cast by 40 Democrats and 107 Republicans.

New Legislation Needed:

Health Crisis Tied To Manpower Use

The lack of comprehensive health manpower legislation is a major cause of the nation's health care crisis, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman testified.

Seidman identified four major health care problems before the Senate Subcommittee on Health. He cited:

- Maldistribution of physicians by geographical areas.
- Maldistribution of specialties.
- Increased reliance on foreign medical graduates.
- Lack of uniform licensing and relicensing standards among states.

While no single bill being considered by the subcommittee meets all these problems, Seidman suggested "that by taking the best provisions from each, Congress can enact excellent legislation."

Seidman told the subcommittee that the "maldistribution by geographical area is two-fold—it exists among various regions and states within the U.S. and it exists in the lack of physicians and other health care manpower in inner city and rural areas." He pointed out that while New York State has a ratio of 2.36 physicians per 1,000 persons, in the poverty areas of New York City, the ratio drops to 0.65 per 1,000.

Citing an overconcentration in medical specialties, Seidman noted that eight out of 10 medical students went into general practice in 1940. Now, he said, nine out of 10 go into specialty training.

Seidman said that over 20 percent of the active physicians in this country are foreign medical graduates and yet no standards exist which insure that the quality of their work is comparable to graduates of American medical schools.

The AFL-CIO favors consolidating all of the current scholarship programs into the National Health Service Corps Scholarship Training Program, Seidman said. Medical students would be required to provide one year of service in a shortage area for each year of such financial assistance with a minimum requirement of two years.

Seidman supported federal grants so that health profession schools could begin or expand programs in understaffed fields.

He urged uniform testing programs for alien doctors, taking into consideration the problems of maldistribution of medical resources.

There should also be national licensing standards for doctors, he said, with the competence of all physicians reviewed at least every six years.

AFL-CIO members, as consumers, Seidman told the committee, realize that America is experiencing a health care crisis when they cannot obtain needed medical care they can afford even though they are covered by negotiated health benefit plans.

Shortchanging On Paychecks Shows Rise

result of investigations prior to this fiscal year.

The Labor Dept. said that the major reason for the discrepancy between the amount of money found due to the workers and what was actually restored is the refusal of employers to pay back wages in cases considered unsuitable for litigation by the department's lawyers. In these instances, the workers may initiate a private suit, but wages recovered in this manner are not reflected in the statistics.

The Labor Dept. earlier reported $108.8 million in illegal underpayments to 472,404 workers for fiscal 1975.

New Mexico Renews Public Bargaining Bid

Carlsbad, N.M.—The New Mexico AFL-CIO reaffirmed its goal to win collective bargaining rights for public employes throughout the state at its 20th anniversary convention and elected two new executive officers.

A convention resolution urged Gov. Jerry Apodaca to have the public employe bargaining measure placed on the state legislature's agenda at a special budgetary session convening later this year.

Labor-supported legislation providing for public employe bargaining was approved by the House in the last session of the legislature, but died in the Senate with adjournment earlier this year.

Neal Gonzalez was re-elected to a fifth two-year term as executive secretary-treasurer.

The 150 delegates elected Toby Pacheco of the Laborers to succeed Carl Smith as state federation president. Smith, who withdrew from the election after nominations, will continue to serve on the executive board representing the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters.

C. M. Norris of the Machinists was elected first vice president. Incumbent Nowell Ricer of the Steelworkers did not seek re-election.

Major speakers at the three-day convention included Gov. Apodaca, Sen. Joseph M. Montoya (D-N.M.), Rep. Harold Runnels (D-N.M.), Atty. Gen. Toney Anaya, Assistant Director John Perkins of COPE, AFL-CIO Regional Director Nicholas Kurko and Margaret Thornburgh, western area director of the AFL-CIO Women's Activities Dept.

Senate Sidetracks Coors Nomination

The Senate Commerce Committee has refused to approve President Ford's appointment of Joseph Coors to the board of directors of the Public Broadcasting Corp.

Coors, a brewery executive who set up his own television news service, was associated with extreme right-wing ideologies and the AFL-CIO had opposed his appointment as a threat to the integrity of public broadcasting.

The Senate panel voted 11-6 to table the nomination, a move that is usually considered equivalent to rejection.

Major Contract Settlements Show Wage Gains Running Above '74

The average first-year wage increase in major collective bargaining agreements during the first nine months of this year was 10.3 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The figure represents a pickup over the 9.8 percent average first-year gain for all settlements concluded in full year 1974.

The BLS report, which is based on 612 collective bargaining agreements covering 2.4 million workers, noted that annual average gains over the term of the contracts came to 7.8 percent for settlements reached in the first three quarters of 1975. This compares with a 7.3 percent average increase over the life of all contracts reached in 1974.

BLS's data are drawn from agreements covering 1,000 or more workers. The settlements were primarily in the construction, railroad, apparel and wholesale-retail trade industries.

In larger contracts—those covering 5,000 or more workers each — increases in wages and benefits combined averaged 11 percent in the first year, up slightly from the 10.7 percent average first-year increase in 1974. Over the life of the agreement, pacts concluded in the first nine months of 1975 provided a 7.9 percent average annual wage and fringe gain, compared with 7.8 percent last year.

BLS noted the 1975 figures exclude possible increases under cost-of-living escalator provisions.

During the third quarter of this year, average first-year wage increases totaled 10 percent, well below the 11.2 percent gain for the corresponding period of 1974. Annual increases over the life of the contract averaged 7.9 percent in third-quarter 1975, only slightly above the 7.7 percent gain in settlements reached in the same quarter a year earlier.

Other highlights of the government report:

- Contracts with COL clauses, covering 34 percent of workers under major agreements concluded in the first nine months of 1975, provided for annual increases averaging 7.2 percent, excluding any COL increases. Contracts without escalators provided average annual boosts of 8.2 percent.
- First-year gains alone under contracts with escalator clauses reached in the January-September period averaged 12.8 percent, considerably higher than the 9 percent first-year average increase provided by contracts without COL provisions. When cost-of-living gains are combined with negotiated general increases, first-year gains amounted to 13.2 percent.
- New escalator provisions were adopted in 76 settlements reached during the first three quarters of the year. The provisions cover 586,000 workers, mostly in the railroad industry. COL provisions now cover 58 percent of all workers in major bargaining units, BLS noted.
- In the manufacturing sector, some 630,000 workers received average first-year gains of 10 percent under contracts negotiated in the first nine months of 1975, compared with 8.7 percent in all of 1974. Wage increases over the life of the contract came to 8.2 percent, compared with 6.1 percent last year.
- First-year average increases for some 1.7 million non-manufacturing workers amounted to 10.4 percent, compared with 10.5 percent last year. The over-term increase amounted to 8.9 percent annually, up from an average of 8 percent in 1974.
- First-year increases for about 768,000 workers in the construction industry reflected a sharp decline in the first three quarters of this year. The average was 7.9 percent compared with 11 percent in all of 1974. Over the life of the contract, annual increases averaged 7.4 percent compared with 9.6 percent in 1974.

The average length of contracts concluded in the first nine months of 1975 was 27.2 months, compared with 22.5 months when the same agreements previously were negotiated, BLS noted.

Oil Monopoly Assailed On Energy Policy Grip

The United States should break up the monopoly position enjoyed by the big oil companies in order to restore competition to the oil industry and establish a workable energy policy, President Jesse M. Calhoon of the Marine Engineers said.

Calhoon testified before a Senate Antitrust subcommittee in favor of legislation that would require oil-producing firms to divest themselves of retail and other functions.

"The oil companies have made a discovery far more valuable than any new oil deposit: they have learned that they can spend less money, produce less oil, and still make far higher profits because consumers have no choice but to pay the high prices they set," he said.

"Even more important, the high degree of economic concentration within the oil industry allows those companies to determine what our national energy policy is going to be.

"They decide how much domestic oil to produce, and, therefore, how much oil we must import. They decide what lands will be explored for new oil and how fast new deposits will be developed," he said.

Also, he told the panel, "because oil companies control such a large share of other forms of energy, they decide how much we will have to depend on oil in the years to come and how fast we can develop alternative sources of energy."

Calhoon pointed out that the oil companies enjoy higher rates of return and lower effective tax rates than many other types of business.

He noted that "the largest American oil companies control 85 percent of the nation's oil refining capacity, 95 percent of proved oil reserves and half of domestic natural gas production. They own 50 percent of our uranium reserves, 30 percent of domestic coal reserves, and are responsible for 77 percent of the domestic motor gasoline market."

"This excessive economic concentration works to the detriment of our economy and to the detriment of the national energy interest," Calhoon said.

18.3 Million Jobless in '74

In the 1961 recession year, 18.4 percent of the workforce had a period of unemployment. The 1974 tally was the highest since then.

In 1974, the proportions of workers having some unemployment were highest among those under the age of 25 and lowest among those 45 and over. As in past years, a higher proportion of black workers than whites was unemployed at some time last year, the BLS report noted.

AFL-CIO Tells Congress:

Immigration Policy A Growing Concern

The operation and administration of the nation's immigration laws is a matter of "growing concern" to the AFL-CIO and there is a need for comprehensive overhaul and reform, Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller told Congress.

There is a specific need, he told the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, for swift passage of a bill reported out by the full committee in September which would provide criminal penalties for employers who knowingly and willingly employ aliens.

Illegal aliens, Biemiller noted, "have for years been taking jobs from American citizens and legal immigrants" and working at substandard wages and under substandard working conditions. There is, in addition, the increasing problem of temporary non-immigrant aliens depriving American workers of jobs.

He expressed the hope that the subcommittee would give careful attention to abuses of the immigration laws by a number of government agencies and would draft a comprehensive approach in line with AFL-CIO policy.

Biemiller's statement dealt with a number of points raised by various committee bills.

He noted that the AFL-CIO has consistently opposed any amendment of existing law that would allow temporary alien workers to take jobs which are permanent in nature. If the job is a permanent one, the person should apply for permanent entry, the statement said, because the temporary worker is all too often "wholly at the mercy of his employer."

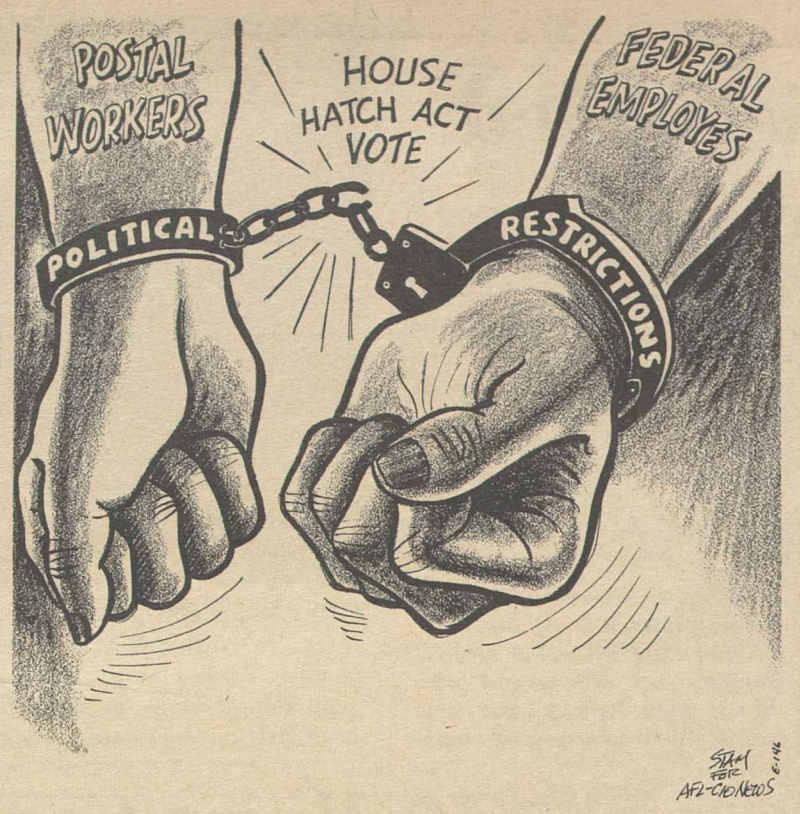
On the question of applying the preference system under the immigration act to the western hemisphere, the statement said the federation would support any reasonable recommendations to have such a preference system and that the special treatment set up in the 1965 act is no longer valid.

At the present time a ceiling of 12,000 is fixed for immigrants who may be admitted from the western hemisphere and they are admitted without reference to any limitation with respect to their country of origin or any of the established preference quotas.

On applying the preference system to the western hemisphere, the AFL-CIO said, consideration will have to be given to the fact that the largest proportion of the 120,000 come from Canada and Mexico. The overwhelming number comes from Mexico and some adjustments may have to be made. Any solution must keep in mind the special problems posed by Mexican commuters and those who enter the country illegally.

On the question of labor certification, the statement declared the AFL-CIO opposes any modification in the present law that requires the Secretary of Labor to certify that aliens are allowed in only if there are not sufficient workers available and qualified and that employment of the aliens will not adversely affect wages and working conditions of U.S. workers.

Biemiller pointed out that the labor certification requirement was written into the 1965 act "upon insistence of the labor movement." Any change would reduce the authority of the Secretary of Labor to protect the job opportunities of American workers, he added.



Wage Base Up $1,200 On '76 Social Security

Persons earning more than $14,100 during 1976 will pay more in social security taxes than they did this year, and will also be increasing their future retirement or survivorship benefits.

An escalator provision in the social security law, tied to changes in average wage rates, will raise the taxable wage base from the current $14,100 to $15,300 next year. The new maximum will affect an estimated 18 million persons, about one out of five persons covered by social security.

Since there is no change in the tax rate, persons earning less than $14,100 are not affected by the higher wage base.

The payroll tax rate paid remains at 5.85 percent of covered earnings for workers and their employers, and at 7.9 percent for self-employed persons.

Thus, a person earning $15,300 or more will pay a total of $809.05 during 1976, up $70.20 from the current maximum. The increase will be $94.80 for a self-employed person.

Another feature of the escalator provision, however, will enable persons drawing social security retirement payments to earn more during the year without reduction of benefits.

Presently, benefits are reduced by $1 for every $2 earned in excess of $2,520 a year, or $210 a month.

During 1976, the amount of earnings allowed before a reduction in benefits is made will rise to $2,760, or $230 a month.

An estimated 1.3 million beneficiaries will receive higher payments with the rise in exempt earnings.

For workers affected by the rise in the taxable wage base to $15,300, the Social Security Administration noted the silver lining:

"In return for the increase in taxes," Social Security Commissioner James B. Cardwell said, "these affected workers will have greater protection because a larger amount of their earnings will be credited toward benefits than before. This will mean higher benefits for them and their families in the event of retirement, disability, or death, than would have been possible without an increase in the base."

Retirement Payments Lowest for Women

A task force studying the adequacy of social security protection for women reported that "a retirement income crisis now affects millions of aged and aging women and threatens to engulf many more."

The Senate Special Committee on Aging, chaired by Sen. Frank Church, set up the six-member task force which released a working paper containing immediate and long-range proposals to strengthen social security protection for women. Lawrence Smedley, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, was a member of the task force.

The working paper — "Women and Social Security: Adapting to a New Era"—served as the focal point of two days of committee hearings on the higher degree of deprivation among aged and aging women.

The report noted that older women are nearly twice as likely to be poor as men of the same age, primarily because more women have worked in part-time and low-paying jobs.

These employment patterns produce considerably lower social security benefits for retired women workers, since monthly payments are wage-related, the study noted.

Average monthly benefits for retired women workers now amount to $180, compared with $225 for male retirees.

"The differential reflects an economy in which women are disproportionately found in low-pay and part-time occupations, even when they are the mainstay of family support, and that their working careers are commonly interrupted," the task force observed.

In a preface to the working paper, Church noted that "the tide of questioning and criticism related to sex discrimination under social security is markedly on the increase. It must be recognized, and it must be understood."

Among the recommendations for women and their families were the following:

- A 12.5 percent increase in workers' benefits to help assure that couples with working wives will not receive lower monthly payments than a couple with a nonworking wife when both couples have identical earnings.
- Additional dropout years — now limited to five low-earnings years—to relate benefits to more current earnings.
- Benefits for disabled spouses of covered workers.
- Elimination of the dependency requirement for a husband or widower to qualify for benefits on the basis of a wife's earnings.
- Extension of social security coverage to dependent close relatives, such as a sister, living in the home of an insured worker.
- Provision for social security benefits for disabled widows and disabled divorced widows at any age—instead of 50 as under present law—and without any actuarial reduction in payments.

Unions Retain Rights On Health Plan Choice

AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman welcomed the change and said it makes it easier for organized labor to continue to promote the development of HMOs.

The regulations affect companies employing 25 or more workers. Under the Health Maintenance Organization Act of 1973, if an employer provides a health benefits plan for his employes he also must provide an option for membership in a federally qualified HMO.

Labor has sponsored and supported "consumer-oriented HMOs," but there are also some bad HMOs run by unscrupulous entrepreneurs out to make a quick profit, Seidman said in protesting the earlier regulations bypassing the union.

The AFL-CIO's position was supported by the Labor Dept. and the National Labor Relations Board's general counsel. The support of the two government agencies helped bring about the HEW revised regulations, Seidman noted.

Seidman also said that the final HMO rules would allow for the maintenance of employe-employer trust funds to finance health and welfare programs.

Jeffery Cohelan, executive director of the Group Health Association of America, described the final HEW regulations as a major step toward reform of the health delivery system.

Ford Rejects Financial Aid To New York

"unique" financial problem of New York was caused by the inescapable obligation to provide services and help for a vast number of poor families in a period of recession, high unemployment and staggering interest costs.

Albert Shanker, president of the United Federation of Teachers and its parent national organization, the American Federation of Teachers, criticized as "simplistic and fundamentally untrue" the view that New York City's problems stemmed from extravagant spending programs.

Shanker, whose union's trustees on a pension fund helped avert the city's default on Oct. 17, attributed much of New York's financial difficulty to "gross mismanagement of our economic affairs on the federal level."

Jerry Wurf, president of the State, County & Municipal Employees, cited a recent, non-partisan study of New York's fiscal crisis prepared by the Congressional Budget Office which showed that the salaries of New York city workers are well in line with those paid in other major cities.

Victor Gotbaum, executive director of AFSCME's New York City district, accused the Ford Administration of trying to "punish" the city. Shanker told the panel that Ford had "turned on national hatred for one city."

The Senate Banking Committee defied the President's veto threat and voted 8-5 for a bill that would provide a $4 billion loan guarantee for New York City. But there were indications that opponents of federal aid were prepared to filibuster to keep the Senate from voting on the measure.

Federal aid to New York and other financially troubled cities was urged in resolutions adopted by the AFL-CIO at its convention in San Francisco last month.

In his speech, Ford said he doubted that a New York City default would cause a financial panic since the money markets "have already made a substantial adjustment in anticipation" of such a development.

Peter Walther Named to Seat On NLRB

President Ford has nominated Peter D. Walther, a Philadelphia attorney who once worked for the National Labor Relations Board, to fill a vacancy on the NLRB.

The appointment of Walther, a Republican, will keep the five-member board political alignment at three Republicans and two Democrats. If confirmed by the Senate, he will succeed Ralph S. Kennedy, who resigned on July 30.

Walther, 47, has been a partner in a Philadelphia law firm since 1962, representing management in labor relations matters.

A native of Elizabeth, N.J., Walther served as an attorney in the NLRB's regional offices in Detroit and Philadelphia from 1955 to 1962. He is married, with two children, and has been residing in Malvern, Pa.

NLRB Chairman Betty Southard Murphy described Walther as an able attorney with outstanding experience in labor law who "will bring the board to full strength at a time when our docket contains a number of important cases."

Health Security Price Put Within Present Care Cost

LABOR'S CASE for National Health Security legislation was made by AFL-CIO President George Meany before a House Ways & Means subcommittee headed by Rep. Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.), second from right. AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller, left, and Social Security Director Bert Seidman took part in the discussion.

Site Picket Bill Facing Filibuster

By David L. Perlman

The construction site picketing bill—one of labor's major legislative goals—moved to the Senate floor where opponents are prepared to filibuster to prevent a vote.

It passed the House, 230-178, in late July and carries the near-unanimous endorsement of the Senate Labor Committee. President Ford has indicated he will sign it if it reaches his desk along with a union-endorsed construction industry collective bargaining bill that is next on the Senate agenda.

Supporters are planning an early move to impose cloture and limit debate.

This will require the votes of 60 senators—three-fifths of the total membership of the Senate. Until the rules were changed this year to make it somewhat easier to shut off a filibuster, two-thirds of senators present and voting were needed.

In a letter sent to all senators, AFL-CIO Presiden tGeorge Meany said the prohibition on peaceful picketing at an employment site "abridges" free speech and denies to the building trades "a right accorded to all other unions in a labor dispute."

Meany strongly urged senators to support the bill and oppose delaying tactics.

The legislative battle has stretched over more than two decades.

A 1951 Supreme Court decision, based on what union attorneys considered a faulty understanding of the close relationship between a general contractor and the subcontractors he hires to work at the same jobsite, prohibited picketing a common construction site in a dispute with one of the subcontractors.

In the case at issue, the Denver Building & Construction Trades Council was held to have engaged in an illegal secondary boycott when it picketed to protest the use of a non-union electrical contractor who paid his workers 42 cents an hour less than the union scale.

The Senate Labor Committee report, with only Sen. Paul D. Laxalt (R-Nev.) dissenting, said the picketing ban "ignores the economic reality" of the close relationship between contractors and subcontractors "and imposes greater restrictions on the union right of concerted action in the construction industry than in other areas of employment."

That point was made also in testimony supporting the site picketing bill by Industrial Union Dept. President I. W. Abel and in the resolution adopted at the AFL-CIO convention.

Meany Bids Congress Act on Bill

A comprehensive Health Security program for all Americans could be financed with the money now being spent for an inefficient medical care system, AFL-CIO President George Meany told Congress.

Meany acknowledged that the $100 billion-a-year price tag on the labor-endorsed Health Security bill appears a staggering sum—to most people "an incomprehensible figure."

But the nation's health expenditures amounted to more than $118 billion in fiscal 1975, Meany told the House Ways & Means Subcommittee on Health.

"Health Security would take the same money that is being spent today by individuals, insurance companies and governments to purchase health care for some individuals and use that money to purchase health care for everyone."

As federal expenditures for health care increase, he stressed, other expenditures for health care would be reduced. "The pie is the same $100 billion. The difference between all national health insurance proposals is how that pie is divided up."

To settle for a "worthless catastrophic program" with a $2 billion price tag, or the $8 billion cost of the Nixon-Ford program "would be like pouring money down a drain," Meany said.

The cost factor was also highlighted by Leonard Woodcock, who testified as head of the Health Security Action Council as well as president of the Auto Workers.

UN's Future Periled By Zionism Libel

The United Nations General Assembly will outrage public opinion and jeopardize United States participation in the UN if it condemns zionism as a form of racism, AFL-CIO President George Meany warned.

"Real racism" is a major world problem, Meany said. But he termed it "ludicrous" to apply the term to the concept of a Jewish homeland—an ideal that became a reality ony after the ashes of Hitler's death camps.

The goal of the Arab sponsors of the anti-zionism resolution, "with the cynical backing of the Soviet Union," is to expel Israel from the UN, Meany said. He noted that the supporters include

AFL-CIO Backs Move:

U.S. Serves Notice Of ILO Withdrawal

By James M. Shevis

The AFL-CIO strongly endorsed the government's formal notice of its intention to withdraw as a member of the International Labor Organization.

At the same time, the federation expressed the hope that the United Nations agency would stop being a political organization and get back to its original purpose of helping to raise workers' living standards.

"The ILO is not doing the things for the little people of this world that it was set up to do," AFL-CIO President George Meany declared at a Labor Dept. news briefing announcing the U.S. action.

Meany added that the ILO must now decide whether to resume its role as an instrument for improving the conditions of life and labor for the world's working people or to continue to "degenerate as an arena of empty rhetorical and ideological warfare."

Notification of U.S. intentions to quit the ILO came in a letter from Sec. of State Henry A. Kissinger to the organization's director general, Francis Blanchard of France.

The notice was in accordance with the ILO constitution requiring member nations to give two years' notice of withdrawal. During that period, a country intending to pull out must continue to pay its dues and it can also change its mind.

Organized labor has been unhappy over ILO policies for a number of years, but "the last straw" was the admission of the Palestine Liberation Organization to official observer status at a conference of the ILO at its Geneva headquarters last summer, Meany said. Meany referred to the PLO as "the leading symbol and practitioner of terrorism and race hatred in the world today."

If events continued at this rate, Meany charged, "the next move will be to kick Israel out of the ILO." The PLO is an umbrella group that refuses to recognize

Labor Denounces Ford's Rejection Of New York City Plea for Support

The AFL-CIO's top leadership assailed President Ford for callousness to New York City's financial crisis, and for a double standard that justifies bailouts of corporations and assistance to hostile nations.

AFL-CIO President George Meany expressed a "fervent hope that Congress will have the guts to defy the President of the United States and give to the City of New York . . . the federal backing for its bonds that it must have" to gain time to resolve its financial problems.

To Meany, Ford's indifference to New York is consistent with:

- "His vetoes of legislation designed to improve the welfare, health and education of the American people. . . .
- "His unrelenting war against the food stamps program. . . .
- "His vetoes of any and all legislation designed to put people back to work. . . ."

Meany's blast at Ford was made at a New York City dinner honoring Max Greenberg, president of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

At a Washington, D.C. function, a collective bargaining dinner held by the American Federation of Government Employees, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland spoke in a similar vein:

"President Ford says there will be no federal help to New York City. Let it go bankrupt, he says. And Arthur Burns promises the banks that if they get in trouble as a result, the Federal Reserve will bail them out.

"No help for New York City. No help for the people. But the banks . . . will be taken care of," he said.

Delays Seen Frustrating Labor Law

The record of the National Labor Relations Board has been "commendable" and "consistently far better than most" federal agencies, but legislative reform of the board's statutory base is sorely needed, AFL-CIO President George Meany said.

The National Labor Relations Act, signed into law in 1935, "is not working as well as it should, and that's why we are asking the Congress to study what has been done and come up with a better way of achieving the goal of encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining,"

Foes Prepare To Filibuster Site Picketing

Both the House and Senate bills would require a local union to give a 10-day notice of its intent to picket a common construction site, and to obtain the approval of its parent national union.

In his lone dissent to the bill, Laxalt complained that construction workers are overpaid and said allowing common site picketing would weaken state "right-to-work" open-shop laws.

In other congressional developments:

- The House moved into a second day of debate on a union-supported Administration-opposed bill to establish an independent agency to represent consumers.
- A long-stalled House-Senate conference committee moved somewhat closer to agreement on energy policy legislation which would combine some continued curbs on the price of domestic oil with measures to hold down consumption.
- Another conference committee, on an appropriations bill carrying funds for the Labor Dept. and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, remained deadlocked over a school busing rider but agreed on other matters. One tentative decision was to drop a Senate-passed rider that would have excluded establishments with fewer than four workers from enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

Angelo Fosco Elected Head Of Laborers

Chicago—Angelo Fosco, a vice president of the Laborers and manager of the LIU Chicago region, was elected president of the union at a special meeting of the executive board here.

He succeeds his father, Peter Fosco, who died Oct. 26, for the remainder of the term running through October 1976.

Fosco had been associated with Laborers Local 2 in Chicago a number of years before his appointment as an international representative in 1951.

He was named assistant manager of the Chicago region, the largest in the international, in 1964. The region takes in several midwestern states and two Canadian provinces. He became manager of the region in 1968, the same year he was elected an LIU vice president. He also serves as a trustee of both the Laborers' National Pension Fund and of the union's Pension Fund of Central & Eastern Canada.

A resident of Chicago, Fosco has three children and three grandchildren.

JEWISH LABOR COMMITTEE salutes the Ladies' Garment Workers, celebrating their 75th anniversary, with the presentation of a scroll at the JLC's convention in New York. From left are JLC President Jacob Sheinkman, secretary-treasurer of the Clothing Workers; Harold Ostroff, president of Workmen's Circle, which also was honored on its 75th anniversary; ILGWU President Sol C. Chaikin, and ACWA President Murray H. Finley.

Jewish Labor Group Marks Anniversaries

New York—The Jewish Labor Committee marked the twin 75th anniversaries of the Ladies' Garment Workers and the Workmen's Circle with a special tribute at the JLC's biennial convention.

Citing the ILGWU's "leading role in the fight for social and economic justice" and the Workmen's Circle's "broad and humane vision," the JLC saluted both organizations for the prominent role they had played in the struggle to establish a strong labor movement in the fight for civil rights.

In his keynote address, JLC President Jacob Sheinkman, secretary-treasurer of the Clothing Workers, noted that as both groups had worked together in the civil rights movement of the 1960s, "so must we provide the spark for achieving social and economic justice today and in the future."

In accepting the citations, ILGWU President Sol C. Chaikin and Workmen's Circle President Harold Ostroff both pledged continued support for the ideals and goals of the JLC, "which encompass the best interests and the highest hopes of humanity."

Featured speakers at the convention were Jacob Clayman, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., and Donald Slaiman, deputy director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services. Both are JLC vice presidents.

In discussing the effect of imports, Clayman pointed out that "no catalogue of ills besetting our economy is complete without listing multinational corporations."

American workers, he declared, are the direct victims of multinational expansion. First, their jobs are transported overseas along with the technology necessary for the work. Then this transferred technology helps boost the productivity of other countries, and the products that result end up in worldwide markets in competition with U.S. goods.

Commenting on the present state of the U.S. economy, Slaiman charged that "while the labor movement was warning of the dangers of unemployment, the economists—liberal as well as conservative—were paying major attention to inflation. This has led to the present situation in which inflation and unemployment are increasing together. And the President's call for a balanced budget is not the way to solve the problem."

Other discussions at the convention sessions focused on the prospects for peace in the Middle East, contributions of the Yiddish culture to American life and the problems of working women.

Charles S. Zimmerman, retired vice president of the ILGWU and chairman of the JLC's National Trade Union Council for Human Rights since its formation, announced at the convention that he would not be a candidate for re-election. He was warmly greeted by the delegates, who lauded his long years of service to the labor movement and to the JLC.

The JLC was formed in 1933 to rescue the victims of Nazi and fascist brutality and to provide a bridge between the Jewish community and the labor movement.

Slander of Zionism Perils UN's Future

rulers who "can scarcely conceal their admiration" for Hitler and nations that have persecuted both religious and national minorities within their own borders.

The resolution, endorsed in a General Assembly committee by the "automatic majority" that the Arab and Communist blocs can muster, is clearly anti-Jewish as well as anti-Israel, Meany said.

Meany, a former member of the United States delegation to the UN, praised U.S. Ambassador Daniel P. Moynihan and delegation members Leonard Garment and Clarence Mitchell, Jr., for "eloquent resistance" to the "disgraceful drift" away from the UN's original ideals.

The new majority, he said, "seems determined to steer the UN towards self-destruction."

A delegation of trade union leaders called on Moynihan in New York to endorse his "courageous defense of freedom" and his denunciation of the attempt to link zionism to racism.

Harry Van Arsdale, president of the New York City Central Labor Council, termed the anti-zionist resolution "repugnant to us as Americans and as trade unionists." He praised Moynihan, Mitchell and Garment for speaking out when the UN makes "a mockery of its own principles."

"We who cherish the ideals of freedom and social justice will stand taller now, knowing that we are represented in the UN by a courageous and articulate spokesman," Van Arsdale said.

The 24-member labor delegation included union Presidents Thomas W. Gleason of the Longshoremen, Albert J. Shanker of the Teachers, Sol C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers, Alex Rose of the Hatters, Carl Scarbrough of the Furniture Workers and Ben Feldman of the Leather Goods Workers; Secretary-Treasurers William DuChessi of the Textile Workers Union of America and Alvin E. Heaps of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, along with President John J. Driscoll of the Connecticut AFL-CIO.

Meany's statement in Washington termed it "high time" that President Ford make it clear "to the despots who currently wield a voting majority at the UN" that:

1. "The United States pays a disproportionate share of the UN's bills only with the consent of the American people, and

2. "Our government, unlike most of those represented in the General Assembly, cannot indefinitely conduct itself in defiance of the popular will."

Meany said adoption of the resolution would "set back" the struggle against racism, which "can only be weakened and disoriented when the term racism itself loses meaning."

As for zionism, "the Israelis will surely continue to build their society along democratic lines. . . . All this outrageous resolution will do is add to the legitimate fears of the Israelis and thus contribute to an atmosphere of distrust and tension that can only prevent a durable peace in the Middle East."

Ford Names Wage & Hour Administrator

President Ford has nominated Ronald J. James, an attorney for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission's regional litigation center in Chicago since 1973, as administrator of the Labor Dept.'s Wage & Hour Division.

James, 38, would succeed Betty Southard Murphy, who left the post last February to become chairman of the National Labor Relations Board. His appointment is subject to Senate confirmation.

Prior to going to the EEOC, James was a trial attorney for the Office of Economic Opportunity.

Federal Agency Sharply Reduces Cost of Handling Medicare Claims

The Social Security Administration is questioning the conclusions of a General Accounting Office study that fails to focus on the government's 66 percent cost reduction in processing claims for Medicare payments since 1973.

The government's unit cost on claims is now substantially lower than that of private insurance carriers and even below most of the Blue Cross plans which provide narrower processing services than the government and private carriers.

Between 1973 and fiscal year 1975 the SSA's Division of Direct Reimbursement (DDR) cut its cost per claim from $12.39 to $4.11. During the same period, private insurance firms lowered unit costs from $7.28 to $5.46.

But the GAO report issued Sept. 30 emphasizes findings based on fiscal data going back to 1973 when the processing costs of private insurance firms were below those of the government's reimbursement division.

The GAO report is likely to have broad implications on the role of the government and private carriers in the administration of a national health insurance program.

In 1973, DDR was still processing claims manually. Based on the two-year-old data, the GAO study shows that while the reimbursement division was charging $12.39 per claim, unit costs of Travelers Insurance Co. were $7.31 and Mutual of Omaha's rate was $7.28.

Two Blue Cross plans providing limited processing service charged even less in 1973—Blue Cross of Chicago, $3.81, and Blue Cross of Maryland, $3.55.

GAO concluded in its report to the House Ways & Means Committee that "higher salaries and lower productivity appear to be major reasons for higher costs of the division, which, unlike the private intermediaries, had no production standards."

However, the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare has taken issue with the GAO report, claiming that the results of the study were more dependent on methodology than on actual operations of the division.

"It reflects neither the improvements that have been made in our direct reimbursement operations, nor the very substantial changes in workload that have occurred since 1973," HEW said.

HEW officials also pointed out that the report tends to distort the various cost factors in 1973 when the division was going through a transition period from manual to automated processing of Medicare claims.

Thomas M. Tierney, director of HEW's Bureau of Health Insurance, also noted that the GAO report fails to stress the increased productivity of the DDR staff. Since 1973, the number of claims handled by the division rose from about 500,000 to more than 1 million without an appreciable increase in personnel.

Tierney said that another major problem area of the report is GAO's failure to consider the element of quality.

"The study addresses only the mechanical handling of bills and no aspect of quality in claims-processing or any aspect of the intermediary or DDR operation," HEW noted. "The result," HEW said, "does not constitute a valid review of performance."

Per Capita Doubled:

N.Y. Labor Mounts State COPE Drive

Kiamesha Lake, N.Y.—The New York State AFL-CIO convention voted solidly to double the present five-cent per capita payment to assure a maximum state COPE operation in the 1976 elections for President, U.S. senator, 39 Congress seats and 210 in the state legislature.

More than 1,700 delegates representing over 2 million union members, with State AFL-CIO President Raymond R. Corbett in the chair, approved constitution changes making three cents of the higher per capita effective Jan. 1 and the remainder effective a year later. All of the two-stage increase was earmarked to set up and operate a year-around COPE program.

That program, titled The Spirit of '76, calls for a staff of eight to ten, a new publication to be mailed to New York union members in ethnic, youth and other groups with aims in line with labor's, annual statewide and periodic area COPE conferences, voter registration drives and get-out-the-vote phone banks.

Beginning next year, state conventions will be held biennially instead of annually, under another constitution change adopted.

The convention voted an appropriation of $20,000 to aid the United Farm Workers in their representation election campaign in California and Corbett announced the state federation would seek enactment of a similar law at the legislature in January.

With a roaring chorus of "aye" the delegates also voted to "condemn as reckless and inhuman" President Ford's announced decision to let New York City default and go into bankruptcy rather than provide the federal guarantee of city securities in line with federal insurance of bank deposits and home mortgages.

Such a guarantee, it was noted, would restore the city's credit and give it time to complete drastic reforms already well under way to balance its budget and solve its own money problems, without asking for funds or "bailout" from the federal government.

Cutbacks in city spending have, already forced dismissal of more than 30,000 full-time civil service workers, with 40,000 more slated to go, and cut construction funds to a point that threatens to boost the city's building trades jobless rate to 35 percent or more.

Gov. Hugh L. Carey (D) brought the delegates cheering to their feet when he told of the many projects spelling thousands of jobs that hang in the balance "unless we can get help from Washington." Carey insisted that New York does not want a handout, "just the credit we deserve." He paraphrased Sen. Hubert Humphrey's demand of "not a nickel for Zaire, not one nickel for foreign aid unless you recognize the state of New York."

Carey said that as a descendant of the Irish he likes "a fair fight" but asserted that Ford's insistence on default and bankruptcy for New York City "isn't a fair fight," adding:

"When the President of the United States hauls off and kicks the people of New City and New York State in the groin, I fight back. And we're going to fight back and we're going to win."

Without exception, every major convention speaker emphasized repeatedly that the basic solution to the nation's economic ills is employment and they scored Ford as "veto-happy" for killing the numerous bills Congress has passed to expand employment.

President Sol C. Chaikin, of the Ladies' Garment Workers told the delegates he was "delighted to hear of the efforts being made" by the New York State AFL-CIO to develop an ongoing COPE program "that'll be effective, that'll fight and one that will work for your best interests."

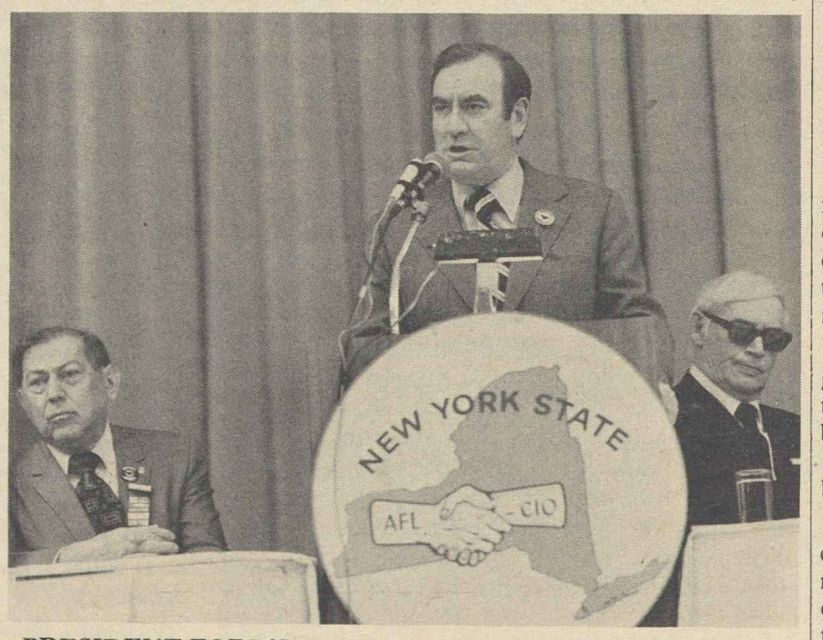
Referring to Administration leaders who have said they expect high unemployment to continue possibly into the beginning of the 1980s with jobless percentages of 7 percent to 8 percent, Chaikin cited the action in France when the unemployment rate hit 3 percent.

"France immediately put $6 billion to work in government projects in order to employ their unemployed. And at that rate we should have allocated at least $20 billion to rebuild America. In Germany when the unemployment rate reached 2.5 to 3 percent, it was a national calamity and they gave employers bonuses to hire unemployed workers so they could become wage earners and consumers."

Alfred Barden, the U.S. Labor Dept.'s assistant regional director for occupational safety and health for the New York area, reported on the operations of the job safety law in the state since the federal agency took over administration last July 1. He asked the union leaders to call to his attention any shortcomings and to take full advantage of their rights under the law.

In other actions the convention adopted 189 resolutions outlining the organization's legislative and COPE policy for the coming year, calling especially for improvements in the social insurance laws because New York's benefits lag so far behind scores of other states.

The delegates voted unanimous approval of a call for repeal of the harsh prison penalties allowed under the state's Taylor Law for striking public employes. The action occurred on the day eight leaders of striking teachers were jailed in the Buffalo suburb of Orchard Park. More than 40 other teachers are fighting similar sentences or face trial for rejecting the Taylor Law's ban on strikes by public employes.



PRESIDENT FORD'S reaffirmed opposition of federal assistance to New York City was described as a "kick in the groin" by Gov. Hugh L. Carey in his address to the New York State AFL-CIO convention. Seated are State AFL-CIO President Raymond R. Corbett, right, and Vice Pres. Sam Kovenetsky, the governor's special assistant for labor affairs.

LEGISLATIVE ACTION is needed to extend full collective bargaining rights to all workers in the public sector, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland stressed in an address to a Government Employees dinner. He conveyed the AFL-CIO's strong support for the AFGE's drive for a new law to replace the presidential Executive Orders that currently govern federal employe labor relations.

Kirkland Pledges All-Out Support In Drive for Public Employe Rights

A collective bargaining law and lifting of Hatch Act restrictions on political activity are needed to achieve "first-class citizenship" for federal workers, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland declared.

Kirkland pledged the "full resources" of the AFL-CIO to the twin goals in a speech to a collective bargaining dinner sponsored by the American Federation of Government Employees and attended by more than 1,200 AFGE members.

At the same time, Kirkland reminded the AFGE that the collective bargaining achieved by the postal workers—which brought them a 15 percent raise when federal salary increases were being held to 5 percent—came only after the eligible workforce was solidly organized.

"You get what you are strong enough to get," he stressed.

Kirkland said public employes have taken "a lot of bum raps" recently, but "have been fighting back" and winning "a great deal of public support" in the process.

"The American people are not stupid; they can tell greed from need," he said.

"They can tell real justice from window dressing. They can tell grievance from propaganda. And they understand very well that the more human beings are kicked around, the more determined they become in the fight for justice."

Encouraging AFGE members to continue to mobilize their united strength to bargain for what they want and need, Kirkland said the key to trade union strength is collective bargaining.

He noted that the AFL-CIO convention in San Francisco last month unanimously supported collective-bargaining rights for public employes. AFGE members should be able to negotiate with their employer — the federal government — on every aspect of their wages, hours and working conditions "in exactly the same manner as workers in the private sector of the economy do," Kirkland said.

Extension of collective-bargaining rights to government employes would be no more than an extension of the nation's 40-year-old policy under the National Labor Relations Act to accord workers justice in their relations with employers, he observed.

"That policy has been translated into a way of life for practically every group of workers in America with one glaring exception: the employes of government itself," he said.

Kirkland was introduced by AFGE President Clyde M. Webber at the dinner gathering, which touched off the final leg of AFGE's drive to obtain a collective bargaining law for government workers. The House Post Office & Civil Service Committee is expected to open public hearings in the next few weeks on a bill to replace the presidential Executive Orders regulating federal employe labor relations with a law setting up a system parallel to that in the private sector.

AFGE Vice President Joseph D. Gleason, who chaired the committee that planned the dinner, warned Congress and the Ford Administration in his opening remarks "to listen and act, not to react, as has been the case of late," to the union's efforts to better present conditions in the federal service.

Committee Cuts Back Tax Reform Provisions

Tax reform advocates in the House are seeking a way to restore revenue-raising provisions to a two-part bill approved by the House Ways & Means Committee.

There was general agreement—at least on the Democratic side—on extending for another year the job-stimulating income tax cuts enacted last spring. The committee bill would ensure that purchasing power wouldn't be choked off by a sudden rise in withholding taxes in January.

In sticking close to the present formula for both individual and business taxes, the committee rebuffed President Ford's tax proposals which included a demand that Congress agree to cut spending on a dollar-for-dollar trade-off for tax reductions.

But the final version of the tax reform provisions of the bill was only a thin shadow of the loophole-closing reforms that had been on the committee table during two months of deliberations.

At one time, the committee had given tentative approval to reforms that would have brought in $2.6 billion a year in new revenue. In its final version, the bill would bring in only about $650 million.

To take the issue to the floor, committee liberals are seeking to modify the no-amendment rule under which tax bills are usually sent to the full House.

The labor-supported amendments would tighten restriction on tax shelters, increase the minimum tax that the wealthy must pay on income otherwise exempt from taxation, and close off the tax-deferment loophole in the Domestic International Sales Corp. (DISC) program.

House action on the tax bill is expected to come before the Thanksgiving holiday recess.

Iron Workers Win Dismissal Of ABC Case

The National Labor Relations Board has dismissed all charges of violence and coercion brought against the Iron Workers two years ago by the Associated Builders & Contractors, Inc.

The charges were part of a highly publicized consolidated complaint against the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and its 17 affiliated unions filed by the nonunion contractor group.

ABC accused the construction unions of engaging in a "national conspiracy of violence and coercion" over a six-year period, and alleged 170 instances of coercive picketing and violence.

In June 1974, however, the NLRB dropped all charges against the BCTD and all but four of its affiliates—the Iron Workers, Roofers, Carpenters and Laborers.

Silencing an Effective Voice

PRESIDENT FORD'S dismissal of James Schlesinger from his post as Secretary of Defense raises very disturbing questions.

Amidst the lingering atmosphere of Watergate, Schlesinger has shown himself to be a government servant of rare integrity, principle, and courage. He was one of two members of the President's Cabinet who accepted our invitation to the AFL-CIO banquet honoring Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn.

Schlesinger, who addressed our recent convention in San Francisco, had become the Administration's most effective voice for a strong national defense. This voice, we felt, served as a necessary counterbalance to the wishful rhetoric of detente generated by the Secretary of State, who now apparently emerges as the unchecked, all-powerful voice of American foreign policy.

As Secretary of Defense, Schlesinger demonstrated that he was not prepared to play down our real national defense needs in the interest of political expediency in an election year. All thoughtful Americans must now wonder whether President Ford really wants, or will henceforth receive, national security advice that is candid and free of politics. This question is especially urgent now, in light of the dangerous and complex issues at stake in the current SALT II negotiations.

The Role of the ILO

THE AFL-CIO SUPPORTS and endorses our government's letter of intent to withdraw from the International Labor Organization. We concur fully in the statement of considerations—arising out of years of adverse developments within the organization—leading to that decision.

Those developments reached a culmination at the last annual conference of the ILO in June of this year, with the admission of the PLO—the leading symbol and practitioner of terrorism and race hatred in the world today—as an official observer and participant in the affairs of the organization.

The International Labor Organization, its officers, and its member states must, in the months ahead, decide whether the founding principle of tripartitism lives in fact as well as form, or continues to be smothered in the suffocating spirit of accommodation with totalitarianism of the left or right.

They must decide whether the ILO will resume its proper role as a practical instrument for the improvement of the conditions of life and labor for working people, or will continue to degenerate as an arena of empty rhetorical and ideological warfare.

Member states—particularly those who have asserted the most vocal concern for the preservation of the ILO—must decide now whether opportunism, evasion and abstention are honorable responses to plain issues of freedom, justice and due process.

The response to these fundamental decisions will determine whether or not continued membership in the ILO serves any useful purpose upon the expiration of the two-year notice initiated by the United States letter of intent.

A Word Edgewise:

New York Needs Federal Aid Like Any Other Disaster Area

By John P. Roche

HAVING BEEN RAISED by my maternal grandfather to believe that the saddest day in the history of Brooklyn occurred in 1898 when the independent city agreed to become part of New York, I have been a bit ambivalent about the "Perils of Pauline." The "Bankers' Limited" keeps roaring down the tracks and, just as the poor girl is about to be run over, a rescuer appears with $150 million and hauls her to safety.

However, whatever my reservations about Manhattan (or for that matter, the Bronx, Queens, and Staten Island) the time has come for solidarity against the hicks and their suburban allies, those who—in Ron Nessen's quaint phrase—consider New York "a wayward daughter, hooked on heroin."

It is now perfectly clear that the struggle to save New York's finances has achieved the status of an armageddon between pious, upper-middle-class America and the forces of evil incarnate in Sodom on the Hudson.

You get the impression, for example, that a number of figures in the Administration—probably nephews of George Babbitt—are licking their chops at the prospect of a New York default. To date nobody has suggested that minefields and automated machine guns be installed—on the East German model—around the city limits, but there is a good deal of obscene chuckling at the prospect of letting the Big Apple die of rot.

The irony of this Black Mass was pointed out with characteristic perception by Howard K. Smith. As a nation, he said, we owe an immense historical debt to New York (and he could have extended this to other big cities suffering similarly) because so many of our ancestors came from poor urban environments. It was there that they got their starts and eventually made enough to move to the suburbs, where they felt free to close their memories and let the latest wave of poor immigrants (mostly black and Hispanic-Americans) stew in their own juice.

Undoubtedly New York is responsible for a number of its fiduciary problems. Former Mayor John Lindsay was a one-man disaster area, and Mayor Abraham Beame in his former capacity as city controller set a number of traps which are now snapping shut on his ankles. But in objective terms we have had a very nasty economic slump which has radically decreased the flow of cash and required increased borrowing to meet even minimal services. In short, just as unemployment and underemployment has increased the demand for succor from misery, the tax revenues required have fallen drastically.

Take as a case in point real property taxes: whole sections of New York are littered with houses abandoned by owners (mainly big operators) in preference to paying tax arrears. (These arrears, however, are carried on the city's books as assets—technically correct, I suppose, but practically absurd.) In Boston 55 percent of the city's land is off the tax rolls entirely; it is owned by various governments, churches, and educational institutions.

In realistic terms New York and Boston have been hit by earthquakes. In desperation such cities turn to nuisance taxes, most of which are nickel-and-dime operations, but cumulatively regressive. New Yorkers are reputed to be the most highly taxed inhabitants of the country, a consideration which leads those who can afford it to join the suburban exodus.

THE POINT OF THIS IS that the citizens of New York City—even admitting their responsibility for some financial eccentricities—have been hit by a long-term natural disaster over which they have had virtually no control. Doubtless it could have been (and probably was) predicted by some lonely voices, but then the same proposition applies to the national energy crisis of 1973.

There is a simple but politically impossible rational response: metropolitan government which would bring the affluent suburbs back into the tax base. Since this would launch a civil war, the alternative is to turn to the federal government for equivalent relief.

Sticking with the natural disaster metaphor, it is quite common for the national government to rush aid to states (e.g., Alaska) hit by earthquakes, or floods, or droughts, or tornadoes. Why should the plight of New York City (and other cities in the same historical bind) not fall into this category? This will not appeal to those waiting to dance on the grave of the city of sin, but it is in the best tradition of American compassion, one of our most admirable characteristics.

'Time for Action' by Congress:

Justice for Federal Employes Keyed to Collective Bargaining

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland to the Collective Bargaining Dinner held by the American Federation of Government Employees in Washington.

THE MOST IMPORTANT KEY to trade union strength is collective bargaining. The AFL-CIO is also committed, by unanimous action of the convention last month, to fight for your equally fundamental right to organize and negotiate with your employer—the federal government—on every aspect of your wages, hours and working conditions, in exactly the same manner as workers in the private sector of the economy do.

Obviously you are ready to fight for that right, and I think you're going to win it.

It is ironic, in a way, that public officials who have done so much to repress public employes have also contributed so much to the very militance they deplore.

It's plain to see that at every level of government, all across the land, public employes have been chosen as scapegoats for mistakes made by their bosses. Teachers, policemen, firefighters and other government employes of all kinds have been "selected" as the sacrifices to the politics of hard times.

But public employes have been fighting back. They have been organizing, they have been protesting, and—when they have been driven too hard—they have been striking. They have struck in the teeth of laws that deny them the rights of free men and women—the right to withhold their labor when they are being exploited.

And despite all the efforts to paint them as greedy exploiters of the public treasury, holding the public welfare to ransom, they have been getting a great deal of public support.

The American people are not stupid. They can tell greed from need. They can tell real justice from window dressing. They can tell grievance from propaganda. And they understand very well that the more human beings are kicked around, the more determined they become in the fight for justice.

And the pressure for collective bargaining is nothing more or less than a demand for justice; for the machinery to resolve grievances in an orderly manner; for a forum to present and discuss human goals and hopes, and to arrive at realistic compromises that both sides can live with.

Of course, public employes are not the only workers who have been legislated out of the right to collective bargaining. Farm workers are in every state except California. There, under a state law, after 40 years of oppression and exploitation, they have collective bargaining rights. To date, the administration of the California law is far from perfect but the farm workers are on their way.

Just last year Congress put two million workers in nonprofit health-care facilities under the protection of the National Labor Relations Act. And what happened? Did the industry fall apart under a wave of strikes? Of course not.

In the first nine months after health-care workers won the right to organize, Bill Usery, the federal mediator, reports 1,100 labor-management contracts were negotiated. There were exactly 31 strikes, all of them short. Organizing campaigns are continuing all across the land, and the results have been good for the workers, good for the industry, good for the patients and good for the social policy of the United States.

And let me remind you that that policy—now 40 years old—is to promote and protect the rights of workers to join unions of their choice in order to bargain collectively with their employer.

That policy has been translated into a way of life for practically every group of workers in America with one glaring exception: the employes of government itself.

OF COURSE you made great strides toward that goal under the Executive Order promulgated by President Kennedy. It was an early and courageous act on the part of the late and great President. And it was strengthened by another great friend of labor, President Johnson.

But it is not good enough. And we all know that what one President can establish by Executive Order, another President can rescind. I don't say President Ford would try to rescind it, but given his political statement—about federal workers—why take a chance?

So now it's up to Congress to finish the job by passing HR 13, a bill to give federal employes the right to organize and bargain collectively with their employer.

The hearings have been held in both houses of Congress. It's time now for action. It's up to you and me and all of us to see that Congress faces up to the question of justice in public employment.

I can assure you that the AFL-CIO is going to do everything it can to insure that public employes have first-class citizenship. But you have a job to do, too, and you have to tackle it in exactly the same way as every other union has done.

This union has made tremendous strides in membership in recent years, against heavy odds. Now is the time for every member of this union to redouble his and her efforts and enlist every federal worker under the union banner.

Bicentennial Focus:

Wider Recognition Pressed For Workers' Role in History

FILLING THE VOID in public education that most often gives only surface treatment to the role of workers in the development of this nation is a key aim of organized labor's year-long bicentennial effort, AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis said on Labor News Conference.

Many of the major accomplishments that Americans now take for granted became realities only with the strong backing and push provided by the trade union movement and working people, Davis stressed. He listed social security, Medicare, the eight-hour day and free public education as among the most important milestones this country has reached, and said that labor played a major role in all of those drives.

"Few people in America know that our whole system of free universal public education was brought about by working people in the 1830s. . . . That doesn't appear in the history books, but that's what happened," he declared.

Davis said the AFL-CIO is preparing materials that spell out labor's views on a number of topics "chosen as of great interest to the American people . . . by the American Issues Forum," which is sponsored by the National Endowment for the Humanities. He said that the materials also will be used by young people taking part in the Bicentennial Youth Debates that will center on the American Issues Forum topics. He said Bicentennial Youth Debates are already scheduled for some 10,000 schools in all parts of the country.

A great many state and city central labor bodies, as well as a large number of international unions, will be organizing and sponsoring their own bicentennial programs, he said.

The programs will include professional theater, music and other entertainment, live craft and skill demonstrations, and radio and television productions. Davis said the interest and enthusiasm of local labor about being involved in the bicentennial is encouraging, and he predicted it will grow even more in the months ahead.

Reporters questioning Davis were Donald Barnes of Press Associates, Inc. and Ben Rathbun of the Bureau of National Affairs. Labor News Conference is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

A SENSE OF HISTORY was revived in the nation's capital when the National Labor Relations Board sponsored a gathering to mark the 40th anniversary of the Wagner Act.

Though the Wagner Act is sometimes referred to as labor's "Magna Carta," the law actually stands as a tall landmark in the extension of industrial democracy to millions of workers in the basic and mass production industries.

The Wagner Act provided the tool—legal protection of the right to organize and bargain collectively—and labor did the job. In one of the bloodiest periods of American history, workers organized and cracked the great concentrations of power in the steel, coal, auto and rubber industries.

The long and never-ending struggle of workers to secure the benefits of freedom dates to colonial days. Tradesmen, artisans and mechanics were the rank and file of the Sons of Liberty. Historians say their militancy kept the revolutionary movement alive when the more conservative lawyers and merchants faltered.

American workers have banded together ever since to defend their craft and seek greater opportunities for themselves and their children. They adapted their unions to meet changing circumstances and survive chronic recessions, employer attacks and hostile laws and injunctions.

An era of escape and unreality preceded the Wagner Act. The speakeasy, silk shirts, flappers and flivvers. Babe Ruth. Tunney vs. Dempsey. Rockne. Lindbergh. Valentino. Heroes and fads.

For most workers, however, these were what one historian called "the lean years." An Australian observer remarked that "America is an employer's paradise." The manufacturer-endorsed "American Plan" called for blacklists, labor spies, "yellow-dog" contracts, injunctions, company unions. "The business of America is business," declared President Coolidge.

As the nation slid into the Great Depression, President Hoover optimistically announced that the worst was over. Unemployment meanwhile rose to an estimated 15 million when Hoover left office.

In his inaugural address, Franklin D. Roosevelt declared: "This nation asks for action and action now." Out of the "alphabet soup" of reforms came NIRA—the National Industrial Recovery Act—and its famous Section 7(a) which put the force of law behind the right to organize. But judicial nullification of New Deal reforms increased and NIRA was declared unconstitutional.

A STRONG RESURGENCE of union organizing and a rise in company unionism and industrial turmoil required prompt federal action. The White House finally joined the AFL and others in backing the Wagner bill, and it was signed into law in July 1935.

This victory for human rights in the workplace was endorsed by the Supreme Court in 1937 in a narrow 5-4 vote.

Chief Justice Hughes, speaking for the majority in NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Co., declared: "Employes have as clear a right to organize and select their representatives for lawful purposes as the respondent has to organize its business and select its own officers and agents. . . . Long ago we stated the reason for labor organizations. We said that they were organized out of the necessities of the situation; that a single employe was helpless in dealing with an employer, that he was dependent ordinarily on his daily wage for the maintenance of himself and his family . . . that union was essential to give laborers opportunity to deal on an equality with their employer. . . ."

What followed is history. Despite the private armies and spies employed by "blue ribbon" corporations and the bloodshed of the "Memorial Day Massacre" at Republic Steel, unionism swept through most industries and membership quadrupled to 11 million by 1941.

But the law is one thing, its exceptions and implementation another. Today, some two million farm workers and over 12 million public employes remain outside the protection of the law. They are demanding democracy in the workplace. It's an old American tradition.

LABOR'S BICENTENNIAL effort will focus on telling the story of workers in the development of the nation—a point often missed in public education, AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis, center, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Donald Barnes, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Ben Rathbun of the Bureau of National Affairs. The AFL-CIO produced public service program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

HISTADRUT DINNER honoring Max Greenberg, president of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, was the occasion for an announcement of forthcoming changes in the RWDSU leadership. Greenberg, center, who has headed the union since 1954 will retire on Jan. 1, 1976. Succeeding to the presidency until the union's 1978 convention, will be Sec.-Treas. Alvin E. Heaps, right. The RWDSU board designated Vice President Frank Parker, left, the union's southern area director, to succeed Heaps.

Specialty Steel Imports Pose New Job Threats

Record imports of specialty steels are threatening the livelihood of thousands of American workers, the Steelworkers warned in calling for mandatory quotas on shipments to U.S. markets.

USWA President I. W. Abel said in testimony to the U.S. International Trade Commission that quick action is needed to assist laid-off workers and others facing layoffs in the nation's specialty steel industry.

He said that heavy layoffs in stainless and tool steels "constitute an urgent warning signal of the serious injury being imposed on both the American steel workers and the specialty steel industry."

Abel called for a long-term solution that includes mandatory import quotas and a system of binding international safeguards.

He also urged the commission to grant immediate and effective relief under the 1974 Trade Act to workers who already have lost jobs to the increasing steel imports.

Imports of stainless steel are presently running at an annual rate of 225,000 tons and tool steel at nearly 30,000 tons, Abel reported.

Because of the record flood of foreign steels, he said, stainless imports have captured 20 percent of the U.S. market and foreign tool steel accounts for 28 percent of the domestic market.

"When imports of specialty steel products remain this high and continue to increase, serious harmful injury is inflicted on American workers—they lose their jobs," he declared.

The flow of imports for the first four months of 1975 was equivalent to 10,000 jobs to add to previous layoffs and higher unemployment rates, he told the Trade Commission.

Abel said a comparison of working time between the last quarter of 1974 and the first quarter of 1975 shows that the drop in man-hours in some stainless steel production ranged from 21 to 54 percent. Comparable reductions were recorded in U.S. tool steel production, he said.

Industry officials echoed similar warnings at the Trade Commission hearings. Richard P. Simmons, president of Allegheny Ludlum Steel Corp. said that unemployment in some sectors of the industry is currently as high as 40 percent.

Simmons noted that foreign producers—often heavily subsidized by their governments—don't operate under the same rules as American producers.

He charged that foreign steelmakers have formed cartels to sell their products below cost in the effort to meet economic and political goals of their countries.

In the past decade, Japan has expanded its stainless steel capacity 400 percent, the commission was told. And while West Germany, France and Italy increased production capacity about 200 percent, the United States was able to boost capacity only 40 percent.

Sen. Richard S. Schweiker (R-Pa.) warned that the combination of shrinking U.S. production and increasing imports could affect the entire American economy. He said that thousands of workers in Pennsylvania and other steel-producing states have already been thrown out of work because of the imports.

Labor Costs Drop:

Strong Gain in Productivity Sends Corporate Profits Up

A strong rise in productivity leading to a decline in employers' labor costs greatly improved the profits picture for many American firms in the third quarter.

The earnings improvement was partially reflected in a Wall Street Journal survey showing a 4.9 percent rise in corporate profits from the second to the third quarters of 1975.

While still 12.1 percent below last year's record profits, the quarter-to-quarter gain "is leading analysts to suggest a turnaround in profits is under way," the Journal reported.

A major factor in the improved profits situation was the sharp increase in worker productivity, or output per man-hour. It jumped at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 9.5 percent in the July-September period—the largest increase since the first quarter of 1971, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Unit labor costs, meanwhile, fell 2.4 percent in the third quarter, the first decline since the second quarter of 1972 and the largest drop since the third quarter of 1965, BLS said.

Productivity fell steadily during 1973 and 1974. After a six-tenths of 1 percent decline in the first quarter of this year, however, output per man-hour turned up in the second quarter, rising 4.2 percent.

The explanation for the rise in productivity is that while production rose in many industries in the July-September period it was accompanied by only a very small relative increase in employment, AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger observed. Companies are slow to recall laid-off workers or add to their workforce until they are confident of future gains in demand, he noted.

"As a result, industries whose production and sales have been increasing in recent months have seen their profits margin go up sharply," Goldfinger said.

But while an upturn in production may be under way, unemployment continues to rage at high levels. In its latest reporting period, the Labor Dept. noted 5,423,800 persons were receiving jobless insurance benefits in the week ended Oct. 18, an increase of 241,000 from the previous week.

In addition, the government reported 404,500 initial claims for benefits were filed in the week ended Oct. 25, an increase of 44,400 from the week before.

On the price front, the latest report of the Bureau of Labor Statistics showed that the government's wholesale price index jumped 1.8 percent in October. If prices were to continue to rise at that pace for a year, the increase would mean an inflation rate of 21.6 percent.

The October increase, which is expressed in seasonally adjusted terms, was the largest monthly rise since October 1974. Increases in wholesale prices soon are passed on to consumers in the prices they pay for retail goods and services.

Contributing the most to last month's jump in wholesale prices was a hefty 1.2 percent rise in the prices of industrial commodities. Farm prices were up, too—2.2 percent—but they tend to fluctuate from month to month. Industrial commodities make up 70 percent of all items measured in the monthly BLS survey.

While price increases were posted across the board, especially sharp rises were registered for new 1976 model automobiles, steel and other metals, textile goods and lumber products.

In other economic news, the Commerce Dept. reported a decline of nine-tenths of 1 percent in its composite index of leading indicators in September, the first drop in seven months. The index is designed to anticipate future economic trends.

Six of the 11 indicators available for the September report registered declines, Commerce noted. The series contributing most to the overall decline in the index was a smaller rise in liquid assets, the government observed. The layoff rate in manufacturing, an inverted index, also showed a decline over the month.

Other declines were posted for contracts and orders for plant and equipment, new orders for manufactured consumer products and materials, stock prices and the money balance.

The five indicators showing increases were vendor performance, average workweek, net business formation, building permits and change in sensitive prices.

Another government report showed the buying power of household heads dropped 5.7 percent between 1973 and 1974, the second successive year-to-year decline.

BLS said the drop in purchasing power—after-tax earnings adjusted for price changes—was attributable to an 11 percent jump in consumer prices which more than offset a 5.2 percent rise in gross earnings.

Gross median annual earnings for all household heads last year came to $8,865, BLS said.

Meany Assails Ford Hostility To New York

Kirkland suggested: "Perhaps that's the best way to describe President Ford's theory of government—take care of the banks and to hell with the people."

Meany noted that Ford, with "obsequious echoes" from Federal Reserve Chairman Burns and Treasury Sec. William Simon, has "scolded and castigated" the city because it tried "to meet the basic needs of its citizens."

The President's "philosophy of the moment," he said, appears to be that "spending to meet the social needs of the little people of America is in some ways basically sinful."

Ford's moralizing "sounds odd coming from the Administration that finds millions of dollars to bail out American corporations . . . and billions of dollars for unfriendly foreign nations in the name of detente," Meany suggested.

Congress appeared still far from a consensus on what, if anything, to do to help New York City meet its financial crunch. Bills proposed by Senate and House committees were unacceptable to many supporters of help to the city, and President Ford's veto threat continued to hang over the deliberations.

New Regulations on Granting Credit Aimed at Ending Sex Discrimination

New federal regulations aimed at ending discrimination on the basis of sex or marital status in the granting of credit took effect on Oct. 28. A year after Congress passed the Equal Credit Opportunity Act, and following public hearings and a tug of war between lenders and consumer groups over draft language, the Federal Reserve Board issued rules implementing the law.

Aimed primarily at protecting women, the law covers banks, finance companies, department stores and all companies that issue credit cards.

A key provision, which would also benefit men, would require a creditor to give the reasons, on request, for terminating or denying credit. However, reflecting compromises in drafting the rules, the creditor does not have to provide the reasons in writing. Consumer groups support a bill proposed by Senator Joseph R. Biden, Jr. (D-Del.) that would require a creditor to put in writing the reason for denying credit. Other major regulations provide:

- A ban on the use of sex or marital status in credit scoring systems.
- A ban on creditors inquiring into birth control practices or into childbearing capabilities or intentions or assuming from her age that an applicant or applicant's spouse may drop out of the labor force or have income interrupted due to childbearing.
- A creditor may not discount part-time income, but could examine the probable continuity of an applicant's job.
- A creditor may ask to what extent an applicant relies on alimony or child support or maintenance payments to repay the debt, but the applicant must first be told such disclosure is not necessary if this income is not relied on to obtain credit.
- As of Nov. 1, 1976, creditors must identify for reporting purposes those accounts that both spouses may use or be liable for so that a credit history can be established for each spouse.
- No later than Feb. 1, 1977, the creditor must inform holders of existing accounts of a right to have credit history reported in both names.
- Effective Nov. 30, 1975, creditors must keep applications and other materials, including any written allegations of discrimination, for 15 months following the date the creditor gives notice of action to an applicant.

The regulations define discrimination under the law as treating "an applicant less favorably than other applicants on the basis of sex or marital status."

The law provides that an aggrieved applicant may sue creditors for actual damages and for punitive damages up to $10,000. In class actions, penalties up to $100,000 or one percent of the creditor's net worth, whichever is less, may be assessed.

Enforcement of the law and regulations is vested primarily in the Federal Trade Commission. Other agencies also responsible include the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., the Comptroller of the Currency and a number of other agencies which oversee industries providing credit to consumers.

2 Join AFL-CIO Research Staff

John Zalusky, for the last four years research director of the Allied Industrial Workers, has joined the staff of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

Zalusky will specialize in the areas of collective-bargaining issues and trends, worker job satisfaction, industrial engineering, the Service Contract Act and related matters.

Earlier, William Cunningham, an AFL-CIO intern in 1971-72, joined the federation's research staff. Formerly with the State, County & Municipal Employees, Cunningham handles matters pertaining to energy and productivity.

'Unfair, Unworkable':

Canadian Unions Hit New Controls Policy

Ottawa—The Canadian Labor Congress denounced the Trudeau Government's newly imposed economic controls and called instead for an action program to revive the nation's economy.

Effective policies to spur the economy, create jobs, and provide for equitable income would make controls unnecessary, the CLC stressed.

CLC President Joseph Morris warned that Prime Minister Trudeau's anti-inflation plan would fail to control the rise in prices, interest rates and corporate income, "but would effectively put the lid on wage increases."

The plan was imposed Oct. 14 under emergency powers provided in the Canadian constitution. But further enabling legislation is facing stiff opposition in Parliament.

As presently written, the controls would limit wage increases to 10 percent the first year, 8 percent the second year and 6 percent the third year.

Prices, which have been climbing at an annual rate of 11 percent, would be limited to increases justified by increased costs.

Morris called the Trudeau plan "unfair, inequitable and unworkable."

"Wage controls without corresponding price and profits restraints will reduce the purchasing power of wage and salary earners," he said.

The CLC has launched a nationwide educational campaign to increase pressure in Parliament for the defeat of the controls legislation.

Meanwhile, labor officials are urging unions to persue their bargaining goals as usual despite the mandatory guidelines.

Workers affected by the new wage controls include those employed by large corporations with more than 500 employes, construction firms with more than 20 employes, and all workers in the federal and public sector. Professionals, such as doctors, lawyers, engineers and others who charge fees for services, are also affected by the guidelines.

Because the number of persons covered by the wage controls totals only 4 million—slightly less than half of the nation's labor force—critics of the Trudeau plan have cited serious doubts as to its effectiveness.

They also have pointed to the ineffectiveness of wage-price controls instituted by the Nixon Administration in the United States.

Trudeau himself had cited the failure of U.S. economic controls in his last election campaign, speaking out against the Progressive Conservative Party, which advocated mandatory wage and price curbs.

The CLC's action program to spur the nation's economy stresses the development of full employment policies, regulation of fuel prices, home mortgage subsidies and a negative income tax. It also calls for an increase in old age pensions, rent controls, and tax incentives for corporations to create jobs.

Florida Labor Focuses on Jobs Issues

Jacksonville, Fla.—The high unemployment plaguing Florida was the chief focal point of the State AFL-CIO's 19th annual convention here.

Florida's jobless rate is 12.4 percent. The four-day convention renewed its commitment to the AFL-CIO's Action Program to get the nation's economy moving again. The 350 delegates also zeroed in on issues affecting job security, education, taxes and other matters.

The delegates also elected 16 district vice presidents and heard several speakers. Election of executive officers — president, secretary-treasurer and first vice president — is held every four years and is not slated again until 1977.

The convention adopted resolutions pledging the State AFL-CIO to work for passage of an agency shop bill in the Florida legislature. Florida is an open-shop state.

Other resolutions called for immediate implementation of the state's public employe bargaining law, congressional repeal of the airline industry's so-called mutual aid pact that provides benefits to struck carriers, and exemption of local union properties from the state's ad valorem tax.

Among the convention speakers were Rep. Claude D. Pepper (D-Fla.), Gov. Reubin Askew, President R. H. Semon of the Florida State Building & Construction Trades and Robert Uhrig, a nuclear scientist with the Florida Power & Light Co.

FORTY YEARS of collective bargaining developments under the National Labor Relations Act are reviewed at an anniversary banquet which brought together R. Heath Larry, vice chairman of U.S. Steel Corp., AFL-CIO President George Meany and Chairman Betty Murphy of the National Labor Relations Board.

'Happy Birthday—You Look Rundown!'

Reform of Labor Law Pushed to End Delays

Meany told a dinner marking the board's 40th anniversary.

All too often, he observed, the NLRA frustrates and impedes the fulfillment of its original promise: to assist workers in exercising their basic right to organize and bargain collectively.

Citing "needless" delays built into the board's election and unfair labor practice machinery, Meany declared:

"The right to bargain collectively has no meaning if it is afforded a year, two years or even more after it is sought. . . . The time has come to act on, rather than merely give lip service to, the principle that justice delayed is justice denied."

Also speaking at the commemorative dinner were Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop and R. Heath Larry, vice chairman of United States Steel Corp. President Ford sent a congratulatory letter. Betty Southard Murphy, the first woman to chair the NLRB, made brief introductory remarks.

In his address, Meany noted that even in the most simple of cases—a petition for a representation election—it takes an NLRB regional director about six weeks to issue an election notice. In cases that go to the full board, the median time is 89 days.

He added that as of last April the median time from the filing of an unfair labor charge to issuance of a board decision was 385 days—one year and 20 days.

"And then, of course, the employer can take the matter to court and consume an additional year or two before any relief is afforded the employes whose rights the act is supposed to protect," Meany pointed out.

"We want a law that provides even-handed remedies, not one that allows the J. P. Stevenses of this world to thumb their noses at the board and the courts and still receive luscious federal contracts," he said. "We want a law that mandates a prompt resolution of disputes."

Meany noted the difficulties the NLRB faces in handling an increasingly heavy caseload with a limited budget and staff and said the AFL-CIO would continue to support larger appropriations for the agency.

Dunlop warned that increasing tension between government regulation and collective bargaining faces the nation. He said he hoped some way would be found to make the two systems "less antagonistic" and more compatible.

U.S. Steel's Larry called for efforts to achieve greater mutual understanding of business and labor. He said the present condition of the national economy and its competitive posture in the world underscore more than ever "the need to cultivate our sense of interdependence."

U.S. Serves Notice Of Intent to Quit ILO

Israel's right to exist as a nation.

Founded in 1919 as part of the now-defunct League of Nations, the ILO is a specialized agency of the UN composed of 126 member nations. The U.S. has been a member since 1934 and pays one-quarter of the ILO's budget, an assessment of $11.3 million this year.

Until about 15 years ago, Meany noted, the ILO had been doing its job. But in recent years it has not performed its functions of improving working conditions, promoting human rights and providing technical assistance to developing countries, he charged. It has been particularly neglectful in the area of human rights, he said.

"The greatest human right is the right of workers to get together and associate in a free trade union," Meany declared. "This is denied to workers in many countries in the ILO and the ILO closes its eyes to this."

Over the next 24 months, Meany said, the U.S. government, in concert with labor and management, "must decide whether the ILO is really important enough to our objectives in the world." The United States, along with other member states, is represented in the UN agency by a tripartite delegation that speaks for labor, management and government separately.

The AFL-CIO's strong dissatisfaction with the performance of the ILO was echoed by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. Charles H. Smith, Jr., chairman of the chamber's executive council as well as the U.S. employer delegate to the ILO, told reporters at the press briefing:

"The origin of much of this dissatisfaction can be found in the willingness of a growing number of member states to use the meetings and conferences of this organization to pursue political objectives."

Smith and Meany also agreed that "the present system in the UN is deteriorating rapidly." Asked if the U.S. notice to withdraw from the ILO might be construed as a warning to other UN organizations, Meany said:

"I would consider it a warning to UNESCO (United Nations Educational, Scientific & Cultural Organization) and other UN organizations that have become politicized."

Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop told the news conference the U.S. would seek to bring about internal reforms within the ILO over the next two years but added "if things deteriorate further, I don't see all that much purpose in staying with it."

"If they don't change," Meany added, "we're out." He noted too that he doubted Congress would vote for funds to keep the U.S. in the ILO unless there is a change.

Kissinger's letter to ILO Director General Blanchard was delivered in Geneva by U.S. Ambassador to Switzerland Francis Dale. The letter read, in part:

"The United States does not desire to leave the ILO. The United States does not expect to do so. But we do intend to make every possible effort to promote the conditions which will facilitate our continued participation. If this should prove impossible, we are in fact prepared to depart."

Kissinger noted that President Ford planned to create a Cabinet-level committee to consider how the U.S. might help the ILO return to its basic principles. Dunlop announced the panel would include the Secretary of Commerce, the director of the National Security Council, and the assistant secretary of state for international organization affairs, with Dunlop as chairman.

New Structure Approved by Telegraphers

Quebec — The Telegraph Workers' quadrennial convention here approved a major reorganization program under which 70 locals of the Western Union Division will become directly affiliated with the international union.

The measure approved by the 150 convention delegates is designed to consolidate equipment and work duplication. It calls for the Western Union Division to relinquish its charter and abolish its national office, with the international assuming its "assets, liabilities, authority, and responsibilities."

Per capita payments from the Western Union locals would flow directly to the international.

The delegates re-elected D. J. Beckstead as president and chose Jerry Grim to succeed T. T. Freeman, who retired as secretary-treasurer. As a result of the absorption of the Western Union locals, a new position of international vice president was created and R. C. Brockert was elected to the post.

Although the convention did not increase the per capita payment to the international, per capita to the union's divisions was boosted from 60 cents a month to $1.60.

The UTW is now made up of five major divisions — Associated Press, Radio Officers' Union, United Press, Canadian Press division and the Canadian Telecommunications Union — along with the 70 directly affiliated Western Union locals.

Meany Tells Congress:

Nation Can Handle Health Security Cost

Without the cost controls and budgeting of Health Security, Woodcock warned, the nation's health bill would continue to outpace other rises in living costs without improvement of services. He cited an actuarial analysis indicating that when Health Security is fully in effect its cost would be about $11.6 billion less than the cost "of doing nothing."

Meany noted that he had testified for Health Security before the full Ways & Means Committee four years ago, and the legislation "is still at Square One."

Since then, he said, health expenditures have increased 50 percent but "the American people are not any healthier." And "the problems of access, cost, waste, duplication, poor quality —the undeniable health care crisis that exists in America—have become more critical."

The 13-member Subcommittee on Health, headed by Rep. Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.), includes the principal House sponsor of the Health Security bill, James C. Corman (D-Calif.), and one of its co-sponsors, Charles A. Vanik (D-Ohio).

Pressing for action in this Congress, Meany noted that public opinion polls show "strong and growing support" for a comprehensive health care program. And he reminded the panel that many members of Congress had pledged support for national health insurance when they ran for office.

Meany outlined the "essential elements" of the labor-supported Health Security plan:

Comprehensive benefits. All needed services should be provided without deductibles or co-insurance, "which are barriers to preventive care, early diagnosis and treatment." Studies have shown that even a seemingly modest charge imposed on the patient keeps many people from seeing a doctor until an illness becomes acute and costly to treat. And, the AFL-CIO also noted, imposing a charge adds to administrative costs.

Universal coverage. Covering everyone, regardless of age, income or geographic location, under the same program would be another big factor in combining health protection with administrative savings.

Health care as a matter of right. Just as with public education, no one should have to go before a government agency and declare, "I am a pauper" before receiving help. With no income test or means test, there would be no need to waste money on elaborate policing to detect a handful of "chiselers" and the available money "would be used to purchase health care instead of red tape."

Cost control. The law of supply and demand doesn't work in the medical field, and areas with the highest ratio of physicians also often have the highest fees. The Health Security approach would be keyed to establishment of a national budget, allocated to health regions and in turn to health service areas.

Hospital budgets would be negotiated and physicians would have various options from group negotiations to payments based on the number of persons who elect their services.

Quality controls. A federal commission would have continuing responsibility for enforcing national standards for doctors and health-care institutions.

Reform of the delivery system. Health maintenance organizations would be encouraged, and the goal would be to replace "the profit-motive ethics of the marketplace" with "a primary commitment to improving the health of the American people."

Administrative costs. Without the waste of competing private insurance plans, determination of eligibility and adjudication of claims, administrative costs could be held to about 4 percent of outlays.

Financing. "Health security would be financed by a payroll tax matched by general revenues. Out-of-pocket expenditures by patients would be eliminated for physician and hospital services, and the flat premiums consumers pay under private health insurance would be abolished."

Consumer participation. For the first time, consumers of health services would be involved in decisions dealing with costs and services.

Meany concluded by telling the House panel that "Health Security makes economic, medical and humanitarial sense. It is a program whose time has come, and we urge speedy action on it."

COPE-Endorsed Candidates Win Key State, Municipal Elections

COPE-endorsed candidates won two governorships in the 1975 elections and more than held their own in mayors' races across the country.

The governors were both Democrats, Julian Carroll in Kentucky and Cliff Finch in Mississippi, and their victories had more than usual significance for labor. Carroll overcame potential reaction to busing in the Louisville area and Finch aimed his campaign at jobs and economic issues, leaving behind the racial overtones.

Both were elected along with women lieutenant governors, each with COPE backing. They are Democrats Thelma Stovall in Kentucky and Evelyn Gandy in Mississippi.

In the mayors' races in the biggest cities, candidates endorsed by local COPE organizations won in Baltimore, Boston, Philadelphia, and Salt Lake City and got into runoffs in San Francisco and Houston. The labor-backed candidates lost in Minneapolis and Indianapolis.

Both the Kentucky and Mississippi governors' races were to succeed Democrats, so the outcome and the earlier re-election of Democrat Edwin Edwards in Louisiana did not alter the nation's line-up of 36 Democratic governors, 13 Republicans and an independent in Maine. That line-up, achieved with a net gain of four Democrats in 1974, represents a complete turnabout in the 32-18 advantage the GOP had five years ago.

Carroll won his first full term after moving up from lieutenant governor when Wendell Ford ran successfully for the Senate in 1974. His GOP rival, Robert Gable, took a strong anti-busing stand and advertised the endorsements of a scattering of local union officers in Louisville.

Labor officials credited a concentrated COPE telephone canvas with clarifying that Carroll had the endorsement and helping him to a 350-vote edge in Jefferson County (Louisville), where Republicans have to run strong to do well state-wide.

Finch's unorthodox campaign in Mississippi featured handshaking tours and his working one day a week in various manual jobs. He disdained media campaigning and press conferences and pitched his campaign to jobs—including a pledge to make out-of-state companies pay the same wages in Mississippi as elsewhere.

He also departed from Mississippi patterns by openly seeking the COPE endorsement, going before the state convention to get it.

Busing was also an issue for one of the COPE-backed incumbent mayors who won, Kevin White in Boston.

Other incumbents who won with labor endorsement were Frank Rizzo in Philadelphia and William Schaeffer in Baltimore. Mayor Fred Hofheinz of Houston faces a runoff and incumbent Al Hofstede of Minneapolis was beaten by former Mayor Charles Stenvig, running as an independent.

Salt Lake City social services director Ted Wilson won the mayor's race with labor backing and COPE-endorsed State Sen. George Moscone faces a runoff in San Francisco after leading a field of 10. Former Democratic Gov. Robert Welch had labor's backing in his loss in Indianapolis to former congressman William Hudnut.

Women's rights suffered a setback when state equal rights questions were defeated in New York and New Jersey. Previously, both state legislatures had ratified the amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Backers of the labor-endorsed ERA had hoped victories on the ballots in New Jersey and New York would build momentum toward winning ratification next year. Only four more states are needed for the necessary 38, but 1976 is the last year in the time allowed for ratification.

No-Fault Auto Insurance Endorsed by House Unit

A no-fault auto insurance bill that carried a strong AFL-CIO endorsement won a 5-4 vote of support from a House Commerce subcommittee and now awaits action by the full committee.

The start of House action is important because last year a Senate-passed no-fault bill died with adjournment of the 93rd Congress without action by the House.

Rep. Lionel Van Deerlin (D-Calif.), chairman of the Consumer Protection subcommittee, sponsored the bill which would establish federal minimum standards for state no-fault auto insurance laws. A stricter federal plan would be imposed if states failed to meet the standards within three years.

The no-fault concept seeks to avoid costly litigation that jacks up auto insurance premiums and usually results in long delays before accident victims can be compensated for their expenses and losses. Vehicle owners would be required to carry insurance that would reimburse accident victims for medical and rehabilitation expenses, lost wages and other costs stemming from the accident — regardless of the party at fault. Civil damage suits would be limited to cases where the victim died, was permanently and seriously injured or disfigured, or was disabled more than 90 days.

A powerful lobby of trial lawyers who handle most of the litigation under the present system has worked to defeat or greatly water down no-fault legislation in Congress and in the state legislatures.

In a letter sent to all subcommittee members before the vote, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller termed national no-fault insurance standards a "vital reform" in an area in which "the states have clearly abdicated responsibility."

Unless Congress acts, he suggested, the "patchwork" of 50 differing state laws would be comparable to the situation which has developed in workers' compensation laws where the need for federal standards is finally being recognized.

A companion bill was approved by the full Senate Commerce Committee last summer, but has not yet been scheduled for floor action.

While most of the provisions of the two bills are the same, the House version has some additional labor-urged safeguards, including restrictions on cancellation and non-renewal of auto insurance.

Open-Shop Contractors Cited for 'Laugh of Year'

A letter sent by an open-shop employer's association to building trades unions could be "the laugh of the year" if it weren't so "hypocritical and self-serving," President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. suggested.

Georgine referred to a letter the president of the open-shop Associated Builders & Contractors sent to 12,000 building trades local unions. It contended that enactment of the construction site picketing bill—a major union goal for more than 20 years—would somehow be harmful to union members.

"The ABC telling building trades union members what is good for them is like the fox telling the farmer how best to lock his chicken coop," Georgine said.

Anti-Zionism Vote Shatters UN Image

New Rise in Jobless Rate Refutes Recovery Claims

Meany Rips Arab-Soviet 'Mockery'

A "clearly anti-Semitic vote" by the UN General Assembly "has shattered the moral authority of the United Nations and raised clear doubts as to the value of its continued existence," AFL-CIO President George Meany declared.

Meany and other American leaders condemned in the strongest terms the General Assembly resolution that sought to brand Zionism — the ideal of a Jewish homeland in Israel — as a form of racism to be fought by the world community.

The Arab-sponsored, Soviet-backed resolution was "reminiscent of the days of Hitler and appeasement," Meany said. It "makes a mockery" of the UN's "supposed fight against racism."

Calling on Congress to "immediately re-evaluate continued United States participation in the UN," Meany asked:

"How long can the American taxpayer be expected to bear a disproportionate share of the UN's bills when it produces this kind of evil?"

Meany also asked that Congress take a hard look at continued economic and military support for nations that in the General Assembly "voted for this abomination."

When they seek aid, Meany said, many of these countries profess to subscribe to "America's goals of peace and freedom." But then "they voted with the despots."

On this "clear test of friendship," Meany said, "those who failed the test deserve no help from this country."

Seldom, in time of peace, has American opinion been so united. The day after the UN vote, both the House and Senate unanimously condemned the action and President Ford said the resolution "weakened" the United Nations and damaged its credibility.

A protest rally called by Jewish groups drew a vast throng of more than 100,000 to New York's garment center—filling every street and alley as far as the eye could see.

Religious leaders of all major faiths spoke out in protest, as did black civil rights organizations. Clarence Mitchell, Jr., long-time Washington representative of the NAACP, spoke out vigorously against the resolution as a member of the U.S. delegation to the United Nations. And the executive committee of the Leadership Con-

MASSIVE RALLY in New York's garment center protested the anti-Semitic resolution adopted by the UN General Assembly branding Zionism as racist. An estimated 100,000 persons including thousands of trade unionists turned out for the demonstration, one of the biggest in the city's history.

Recession, Inflation Continue Unabated

By James M. Shevis

New government reports showing increases in both wholesale prices and unemployment "prove the Ford Administration statements that the economy is now out of danger are not based on fact," AFL-CIO President George Meany declared.

"No one can pretend that the recession is over or that inflation is contained," Meany said as the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported its wholesale price index shot up 1.8 percent in October—the biggest rise in a year—while the nation's jobless rate jumped three-tenths of 1 percent to 8.6 percent over the same period.

"Both sets of statistics prove that the twin evils of recession and inflation are still plaguing America," Meany noted, as he reiterated the federation's call for job-creating programs to end mass unemployment and restore the nation's economic health.

The rise in unemployment last month reversed a four-month downward trend in the jobless rate and returned the number of unemployed once again above the eight-million mark. BLS Commissioner Julius Shiskin, appearing before the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, acknowledged that the October jobless rate was "very high by historical standards."

The increase in unemployment last month was fairly widespread, with rises in many labor-force categories. The jobless rate for adult white women, for example, shot up by six-tenths of 1 percent over the month to 7.4 percent.

There were also increases in the jobless rates for teenagers, household heads and full-time workers.

Site Picket Bill Clears First Test

By David L. Perlman

The Senate squelched a filibuster and agreed to take up the labor-supported construction site picketing bill.

With 60 votes required to limit debate, the Senate leadership mustered a convincing 66-30 majority to overcome the first stage of the filibuster—an attempt to block action on the routine motion to bring the bill to the floor for debate.

Another filibuster-breaking cloture vote is expected to allow the Senate to vote on the merits of the measure—the right of a union to picket a construction site even though its dispute is only with one of the subcontractors working on the job.

The legislation, a major goal of the AFL-CIO and its Building & Construction Trades Dept., is needed to remedy a 1951 Supreme Court decision that interpreted such pick-

Passed by House:

Veto Threat Looms Over Consumer Bill

The House rejected a crippling anti-labor amendment and voted to establish an independent agency that would speak up for consumer interests within government and before the courts.

The legislation, similar to a bill the Senate passed last May, was strongly backed by both the trade union and consumer movements. But elation over its passage was tempered by a presidential veto threat that left only a faint hope that the bill can become law in this Congress.

Even though consumer supporters agreed to an assortment of amendments designed to increase votes for the measure, it passed by only a 208-199 margin—far short of the two-thirds that would be needed to override a veto. (Rollcall on Page 6)

The bill's chief opponent in the House debate, Rep. John N. Erlenborn (R-Ill.), said President Ford "has clearly indicated that he will veto this bill" and his "resolve" had not been weakened by the amendments adopted.

Foes of the consumer agency sought at one stage to kill the bill with an amendment that would have caused labor to withdraw its support. They sought to eliminate a section of the bill that made it clear that the consumer agency wouldn't be getting involved in labor disputes and proceedings of the National Labor Relations Board and the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Fair Farm Elections Tied to Enforcement

A special subcommittee of the AFL-CIO Executive Council branded enforcement of the new California Agricultural Labor Relations Act "generally slack and, in several instances, incompetent," and made 20 specific recommendations to improve enforcement of the law.

The subcommittee's report, released by AFL-CIO President George Meany, also urged the labor movement to provide increased legal, negotiating and financial assistance to the United Farm Workers. The report stated:

"The subcommittee is convinced that if the Agricultural Labor Relations Act is enforced fairly and aggressively and if the labor movement provides the assistance we have recommended to the United Farm Workers of America, then the ultimate victory for the UFW and for the workers themselves will be much closer at hand.

"This long struggle has reached a crucial stage," the subcommittee said. "Now is the time for all of us to redouble our efforts to assure victory to the UFW."

More Layoffs, Cutbacks Add to New York Crisis

Bone-deep cutbacks in essential services, further layoffs of city workers, and a construction freeze throwing thousands of private sector workers out of jobs faced New York City as it struggled to avoid complete financial collapse.

Congress remained divided on what, if anything, should be done to avert bankruptcy by the nation's largest city — and a ripple effect that already was threatening to push New York state into insolvency.

Labor's position, expressed in Washington by AFL-CIO President George Meany and by union witnesses at a day of public hearings in New York City by the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, was that a federal loan guarantee program is essential to give the city the financial breathing spell it needs.

Meany said New York deserves "the same financial consideration" that was given to the Lockheed Aircraft Corp. to enable that private firm to avoid bankruptcy — a loan guarantee "without any strings attached."

The type of legislation labor can't support, Meany stressed, involves penalizing city workers by unilaterally destroying collective bargaining agreements and slashing

BOTH LABOR AND MANAGEMENT gave strong endorsements to the government's formal notice of its intention to withdraw from the International Labor Organization. AFL-CIO President George Meany charged the organization "has become a political sounding board to carry out propaganda." Joining him at a Labor Dept. news conference were Charles H. Smith, Jr., right, the U.S. employer delegate to the United Nations agency, and Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop.

Meany Calls UN Vote 'Clearly Anti-Semitic'

ference on Civil Rights termed the anti-Zionist resolution "an appalling act" that hurts the real battle against racism.

"We recognize Zionism, itself, as part of the long fight against racism," the civil rights groups said. "For more than a century it has been a movement of the Jewish people to save themselves from discrimination by establishing, through peaceful means, a nation in the Middle East ready to live at peace with its neighbors."

At the UN General Assembly, Ambassador Daniel P. Moynihan used some of the strongest language ever heard from a U.S. representative to declare that the United States "will never acquiesce in this infamous act."

The 72-35 vote, with 32 nations abstaining, loosed on the world "a great evil," he said. "The abomination of anti-Semitism has been given the appearance of international sanction."

Delegates from the Arab and Communist countries, and from most of the so-called Third World nations, form what has become an automatic majority in the 143-nation assembly. The vote, Meany said in his statement, reflected the pressures from "the military might of the Soviet Union and the economic strength of the Arab oil blackmailers."

Israel's ambassador to the UN, Chaim Herzog, said bitterly, that the United Nations "is on its way to becoming the world center of anti-Semitism."

He told the delegates that "Zionism is to the Jewish people what the liberation movements of Africa and Asia have been to their own people."

TWUA Mourns 2 Retired Leaders

Two former officials of the Textile Workers Union of America, John Chupka and Ralph J. Cline, died within hours of each other Nov. 4 and 5.

Chupka, 70, secretary-treasurer of the TWUA from 1953 until his retirement in 1968, died after a brief illness at his home in East Douglas, Mass.

Chupka had been active as a union organizer for a number of years before joining the CIO Textile Workers Organizing Committee in 1937. He later held a number of key posts with the TWUA, in addition to serving on the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. board and COPE operating committee.

Cline, 62, retired director of the TWUA synthetic and film division, died at his home in Fairfax, Va. Cline also had been on the CIO organizing staff and later was a TWUA joint board manager.

Meany Scheduled For TV Interview

AFL-CIO President George Meany will be the guest on ABC-TV's "Issues and Answers" program Sunday, Nov. 16.

The program will be broadcast live at 1:30 p.m. (EST), but may be shown at a later time on some stations. ABC affiliates should be checked for local broadcast times.

Public Sector Goals Pressed By Donahue

Overland Park, Kan. — Public employes all over the country are being offered up for sacrifice on the alter of the budget deficit, Thomas R. Donahue, executive assistant to the AFL-CIO president, told the Kansas AFL-CIO convention here.

Urging the 269 delegates to be conscious of the need for solidarity with public employes, Donahue declared that "the enemies of collective bargaining are doing all they can to convince the American people that public employes who stand up for their rights are the cause of all the government economic troubles and not the victims."

The convention described the state law governing public employe labor relations as an inadequate "meet-and-confer" statute and called for full collective bargaining rights for state and local government workers and "organizational security" for their unions.

The delegates approved an increase in per capita tax payments to the State AFL-CIO from 27 cents to 30 cents per month to finance a health and welfare program and a pension plan for headquarters staff, and elected 16 members of the executive board. The executive officers — President Carl L. Courter, Vice President H. J. Yount and Sec.-Treas. Ralph McGee — have two years remaining in their four-year terms.

Other major speakers included Harold J. Buoy, president of the Boilermakers; Frank Emig, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services; Earl McDavid, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; Sen. James B. Pearson (R-Kan.); Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.); and Rep. Martha Keys (D-Kan.).

Clerks Cite Job Loss:

Coded Pricing Seen Blow to Customers

Federal legislation to require price-marking of consumer goods was urged by the Retail Clerks at Senate hearings.

Its aim is to head off an attempt, initiated in the grocery industry, to abandon marking prices on products in favor of an electronic code that can be deciphered only by a checkout counter scanning device.

Retail Clerks President James T. Housewright said consumers would be the losers if this were done.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller agreed. In a letter to Sen. Frank E. Moss (D-Utah), whose Commerce subcommittee is considering the legislation, Biemiller said price marking is essential for buyers to make "an educated choice" among competing products or brands.

He said substitution of a coding device would be "a step backward." Biemiller noted that the recent AFL-CIO convention opposed eliminating price markings.

Housewright told the panel that the RCIA "of course" is concerned about loss of jobs in supermarkets. He noted that some 400,000 of the union's 700,000 members work in the retail food industry.

But on this issue, he stressed, the fight is over "a basic consumer right—the right to know and be able to verify the price of our purchase."

In fact, Housewright told the subcommittee, it was consumer representatives who first sounded the warning of the dangers of removing prices from food and other products.

RCIA members, the clerks in the stores, are aware of "the intense pressures on individual store managers to produce profits," Housewright said. Under such pressure, he warned, store managers would be strongly tempted "to program increased prices into a computer" when sales are down in their stores.

Also, he added, "our people personally know that shelf prices drift around in their slots and that they are frequently not updated to reflect changed prices, sometimes deliberately."

He stressed that achieving the technical capability of eliminating price marking does not make it either "prudent or proper" to do so.

Housewright noted that the "hard sell" for conversion to electronic coding and elimination of price marking has come from "the billion dollar computer industry" which markets the equipment. One result, he suggested, might be a growing number of supermarket bankruptcies caused by large investments in expensive equipment that at best would save only pennies.

The costly new systems would, under proper conditions, provide greater accuracy, Housewright agreed. But he warned that they introduce additional risks. Thus, "while under-ring and over-ring errors will be virtually eliminated, computer programming errors will not."

Consumer Bill Passes House But Faces Veto

other sponsors of the bill made clear the mischievous nature of the amendment and it was beaten, 233-175.

The closer vote on passage of the bill reflected the desertion of more Democrats than usually side with Republicans on liberal versus conservative issues.

Even though the strong lobbying against the bill has come from business organizations, the Administration's announced reason for opposition has been that a new agency would just add unnecessarily to an already swollen federal bureaucracy.

Enough House members thought their constituents were impressed by that argument so that the vote for passage was substantially less than the 293-94 margin of approval by the 93rd Congress in 1974. That year, the bill was killed by a Senate filibuster.

In this Congress, the Senate broke a filibuster in May and passed the bill, 61-28, a bigger margin than the two-thirds that would be needed to override a veto.

A House-Senate conference is expected to reach agreement on meshing the two bills, which would provide another test of support on final passage votes in the House and Senate.

Kathleen Nolan Elected Head of Screen Actors

Hollywood, Calif. — The Screen Actors Guild elected Kathleen Nolan president in a national referendum. She is the first woman to head the Guild in its 42-year history.

Nolan, first vice president for the past two years, was elected to a two-year term over four other candidates to succeed Dennis Weaver, who did not seek re-election. Weaver was elected to the Guild's board of directors for a one-year term.

The membership also elected five new vice presidents, 18 board members including Weaver, and re-elected Recording Sec. Elizabeth Allen and Treas. Gilbert Perkins.

Other top officers are First Vice President Bert Freed, Second Vice President Jessica Walter, Third Vice President Bob Kaliban, Fourth Vice President Kathleen Freeman and Fifth Vice President Eugene Francis.

Nolan, 42, has been in the performing arts all her life, beginning her career as a tot on a Mississippi River showboat. She performed in tent shows before moving to Broadway and Hollywood productions, including a major supporting role in the long-running television series, The Real McCoys. She also holds membership in Actors' Equity and the Television & Radio Artists.

She has been on the Guild's board for the past 12 years and served two terms as a vice president before her election as the first vice president two years ago. As a representative of the Guild, she also has been active in the Associated Actors & Artistes.

AFL-CIO Panel Reports:

California Farm Labor Act Hurt by Lax Enforcement

In receiving the report from AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Paul Hall, Joseph Keenan and Paul Jennings, Meany said it indicated that the UFW is "doing an outstanding job in the face of tremendous adversity." He called on federation affiliates to implement the recommendations of the subcommittee.

Meany sent copies of the report to members of the federation's Executive Council, which had appointed the subcommittee on Oct. 1, to UFW President Cesar Chavez and John F. Henning, executive secretary-treasurer of the California AFL-CIO.

In a letter to Chavez, Meany called the report's conclusions "both distressing and heartening. I am distressed at the inadequate, at times incompetent, enforcement of the law. At the same time, the victories scored by the UFW in the face of tremendous adversity are very encouraging.

"As the elections swing into the vital Imperial Valley, please assure the valiant members of the United Farm Workers of the continued support and assistance of the AFL-CIO," Meany wrote.

As of Nov. 6, the ALRB had declared the UFW the victor in 154 elections giving it representation rights for 14,859 workers, compared with 95 for the Teamsters covering 10,219 workers. Another 12 elections went "no union," and the results of 44 elections are still pending.

The federation's organizing field staff also noted that 5,145 workers in 48 elections have voted to switch from the Teamsters to the UFW. There have been no switches from the UFW to the IBT.

Meany revealed that the federation's general counsel, J. Albert Woll, and its Dept. of Organization & Field Services were carrying out the specific recommendations of the Executive Council subcommittee.

Highlights of the conclusions reached by the subcommittee include:

- "There has been and is continuing a pattern of intimidation of workers that is so severe as to threaten the free atmosphere that must exist for elections."
- "Potential and actual physical violence on the part of the Teamsters, the growers and vigilantes permeates the atmosphere and makes free elections difficult or impossible."
- "While the California Agricultural Labor Relations Act is a good law, the enforcement of the law has been generally slack and, in several instances, incompetent. . . . The primary cause of an absence of aggressive enforcement is a lack of leadership on the part of the general counsel."
- "Naivete and an over-reliance on bureaucratic procedures initially swamped the board when the law went into effect. . . . To our amazement, we found that the general counsel was totally unprepared for the mountain of unfair labor practice charges and the tough, advocacy positions of all parties."
- "The committee was impressed and encouraged by the showing the UFW has made in the elections. . . . We noted an increased knowledge and use of basic organizing techniques and a more highly developed trade union sophistication."
- "Unlike the Teamsters, the UFW does not need any special collusive deals with the growers or anyone else, because the UFW has the support of the workers."
- "The effort the Teamsters made to divide the loyalties of AFL-CIO union members in California has been a failure. The Teamsters attempted to cajole, to bluff and to bluster, (seeking) at best support and at worst neutrality from AFL-CIO unions. They were not successful."

In its recommendations to Gov. Brown, the ALRB and the general counsel, the subcommittee urged intervention of board representatives where intimidation of workers is anticipated and immediate on-site investigations of unfair labor practice reports involving physical assaults or discharges.

Better use of the ALRB staff and more bilingual representatives to inform workers of all legal rights are vitally needed, the subcommittee stressed.

It also urged the board to make criminal penalties apply to false documentation of election petitions and false voter eligibility lists.

Investigators should be assigned to areas where there are large concentrations of economic strikers, the subcommittee said, rather than waiting for these strikers to come to hearing officers.

Increased board presence is also needed "in the fields before, during and after elections to insure fairness to all parties," the recommendations said.

The subcommittee urged that the UFW concentrate organizing efforts in the Imperial Valley and step up its staff training program in organizing techniques, labor board procedures and communications.

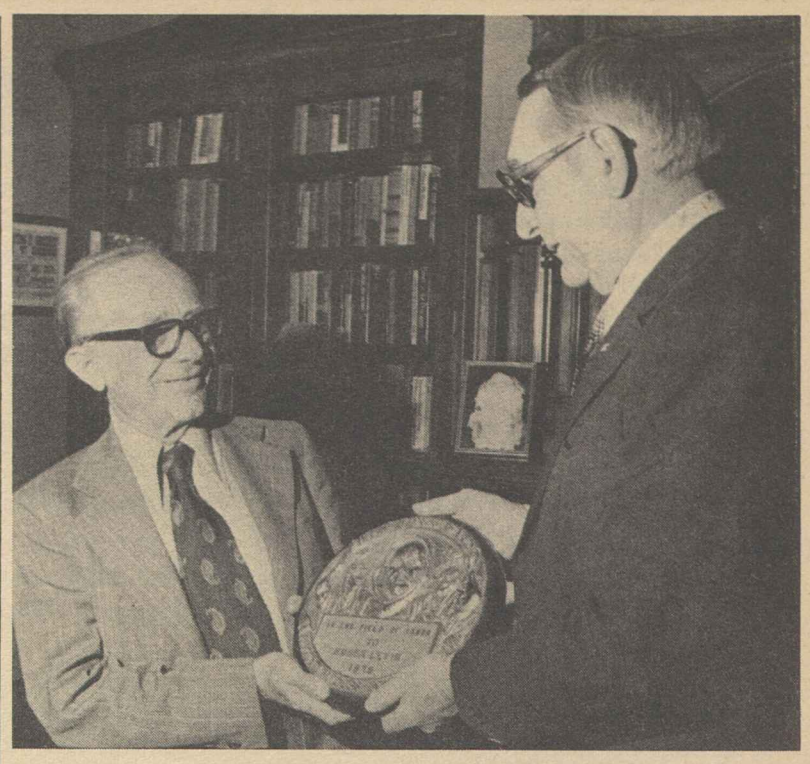
The UFW should increase and improve documentation of violations of the law, board regulations and inadequacies of board personnel to assist it lawyers in legal cases, the report recommended.

It also called for the UFW to enlist the aid of the California AFL-CIO in communications with the governor's office and the labor board while expanding communications with other labor groups throughout the state.

The UFW should make strong efforts to negotiate contracts immediately where elections are certified, the subcommittee recommended.

For the AFL-CIO and its affiliates, the subcommittee called for increased promotion of the UFW union label on lettuce, table grapes and other produce. It also urged legal and technical assistance from union lawyers and skilled negotiators.

Noting that the election campaigns have drained the UFW's financial resources, the subcommittee said contributions from affiliates are crucial.



EUGENE V. DEBS AWARD is presented to Ruben Levin, editor of Labor newspaper, by President Al H. Chesser of the United Transportation Union. The presentation was made at Debs's restored home in Terre Haute, Ind. Chesser cited the appropriateness of the award to Levin, whose paper is published by a group of railroad unions. Debs also was editor of a rail labor journal.

Debs Award Presented To Editor Ruben Levin

Terre Haute, Ind.—Ruben Levin, editor and manager of Labor newspaper, was honored here for helping to shape "a more equitable, humanitarian world" in the tradition of the late Eugene V. Debs.

Levin received the 1975 Eugene V. Debs award at a dinner attended by more than 300 union leaders, government officials and noted liberals. The occasion was connected with annual memorial observances for Debs, pioneer union official and socialist, whose lifelong home here has been restored and opened to the public by the Eugene V. Debs Foundation.

In making the presentation on behalf of the foundation, President Al H. Chesser of the United Transportation Union said that in honoring Levin "we honor at the same time the entire American labor press." The award citation observed:

"Nothing could be more appropriate than the election of Ruben Levin as recipient of the 1975 Eugene V. Debs award. Like Gene Debs, Ruben Levin is the editor of a railroad brotherhood newspaper.

"Like Gene Debs, Ruben Levin is first and foremost a humanitarian, a believer in the brotherhood of man."

Levin, whose newspaper career has spanned more than half a century, is the first labor press recipient of the Debs award. Previous recipients have been union and liberal leaders.

The tribute to Levin said he has provided "a brilliant example for the American labor press . . . in the tradition of Eugene V. Debs."

In his response, Levin appealed for broad, vigorous support for a move under way in Congress to restore Debs's citizenship, taken away when he was convicted and imprisoned for opposing America's entry into World War I. At its recent convention in San Francisco, the AFL-CIO adopted a resolution in support of the move.

Chesser, the keynote speaker, said he thought Debs's dream of one big union on the nation's railroads eventually would come true.

"This will not be a case of takeover, but a case of survival," Chesser said.

Levin, who is 72 years old, has been editor of Labor for the past 25 years. The newspaper is owned by 14 national unions in the railroad, airline and related transport fields.

Labor Pushes Broadening of GI Benefits

Too many veterans are still being priced out of educational and training opportunities under the GI Bill, the AFL-CIO said in letters to the House and Senate Veterans' Affairs Committees.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller termed underutilization of educational benefits "a significant contributing factor" to the high unemployment rate among Vietnam veterans, particularly those of college age.

He sent to the House and Senate committees the comprehensive resolution on veterans affairs adopted by the recent AFL-CIO convention.

Among its recommendations, he noted, were measures that would bring the post-Vietnam GI Bill closer to the educational benefits provided World War II veterans. Among these would be the option to compensate for high tuition costs by allowing veterans to accelerate payment of basic benefits—a means of obtaining higher payments over a shorter period of time that the convention noted would be especially useful "for those in less than four-year institutions, such as vocational training, or married veterans seeking to complete previously interrupted courses of study."

The convention resolution also urged Congress to consider providing some form of educational benefits for persons who serve in the present volunteer, peacetime armed forces—as a program that would serve a useful national purpose. The House earlier this year voted to end the GI assistance program for future veterans, but the Senate has not yet acted on the issue.

Railway Clerks' Accords Expand Job Options for Minorities, Women

Chicago—The Railway & Airline Clerks announced the signing of two agreements with the nation's major railroads that provide new opportunities for minority and women workers to transfer to other jobs.

BRAC said the pacts represent the first national agreements reached by a railroad union to provide for affirmative action covering equal opportunity conditions.

At the same time BRAC President C. L. Dennis declared in a letter to Chairman William H. Dempsey, Jr. of the National Railway Labor Conference that "our organization is not satisfied with the position taken by you and your committee relative to making necessary changes in the seniority system of the railroad industry."

Dennis said the union should not be held responsible for the hiring or promotion practices of the railways, either before or after passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. He pointed out that the union has made known to employers at various times during the past year its desire "to change our seniority system."

"We have reluctantly signed the seniority modification agreements presented to us by you and your committee, solely to afford to our members and other individuals affected by carriers' hiring and promotional practices an opportunity to secure the corrective measures the carrier is now willing to institute," Dennis said. He indicated that BRAC will seek appropriate remedial proposals for additional broadscale changes in the seniority system.

One of the two closely related agreements signed by BRAC and the carriers covers blacks, Spanish-surnamed individuals, American Indians and Orientals who have been continuously employed by the carriers since prior to Aug. 31, 1971, and who initially established seniority by working in any one of 30 named classifications. The other agreement covers women in a continuously employed relationship over the same span.

The agreements permit any employe covered by them to apply to fill a vacancy for which the employe is qualified and to use his or her earliest company seniority date in bidding to fill job vacancies under collective bargaining agreements.

The vacancy, according to the agreement, must be within 30 highway miles of the applicant's present job site or within the same or an overlapping seniority district of the craft or classification of the employe's old job.

The pacts provide that an employe shall retain seniority rights in the old job for a period of 90 days after transfer or after required probationary or training periods, so that the employe may return to the prior job in that time.

The carriers must notify each eligible employe of the right to transfer under the agreement. The employe has 180 days within which to notify the carrier of a desire to transfer.

The agreement takes effect in January 1976.

A Memorial to Hitler

THE VOTE IN the United Nations General Assembly adopting the "Resolution on Zionism and Racism" was a cowardly, reprehensible act, reminiscent of the days of Hitler and appeasement.

The military might of the Soviet Union and the economic strength of the Arab oil blackmailers combined to produce a monstrous, clearly anti-Semitic vote which makes a mockery of detente and the UN's supposed fight against racism.

This action has shattered the moral authority of the United Nations and raised clear doubts as to the value of its continued existence.

The U.S. Congress must immediately re-evaluate continued United States participation in the UN. How long can the American taxpayer be expected to bear a disproportionate share of the UN's bills when it produces this kind of evil?

The Congress must also re-evaluate, on an individual basis, continued economic and military support for those nations who voted for this abomination.

Many of those pretend friendship with the United States and claim to share America's goals of peace and freedom when they seek aid. But on Monday, through racism or fear they voted with the despots to besmirch the name and the character of the United Nations.

The Congress must realize that this was a clear test of friendship and that all those who failed the test deserve no help from this country.

—Statement by AFL-CIO President George Meany, Nov. 12, 1975.

The ILO Must Change

THE ILO WAS SET UP to improve labor standards, improve working conditions, and promote human rights. Now, the promotion of human rights has always been recognized as the promotion of the right of freedom of association—in other words, the right to have a free trade union.

For many years the ILO followed that principle quite rigidly until the Soviet Union and these blocs of other nations came in some years back, and the whole character of the ILO was changed. It became a political sounding board to carry out propaganda for these nations who are really not eligible to belong to the ILO. . . .

What I think the Kissinger letter says quite plainly is that there's got to be a change in the ILO. There's got to be equal treatment there. There can't be a double standard. They've got to at least make the effort . . . to see that workers are not denied their rights, that there is freedom of association. . . .

We do intend to make every possible effort to promote the kind of conditions which will facilitate our continued participation. If this should prove impossible, we are in fact prepared to depart.

A Word Edgewise:

Arab States Provide Crumbs In Aid to Palestinian Refugees

By John P. Roche

WHEN IN 1973 THE ARAB OIL embargo was clamped on, it created a near panic in western Europe and a full-fledged one in Japan However, the oil-producing states were good enough to lift it at an astronomical level of price increases. This made it possible for the advanced industrialized states to resume their consumption, but it was a devastating blow to the economies of the less-developed nations. The latter were reassured by vague promises that the Third World would be given a special break. With characteristic pessimism, I noted here at the time that they should not stand on one foot waiting for Santa Claus.

Alas for the people of these poor nations, my hunch was correct. The World Bank indicates that the price increase has added $8.5 billion to the liability side of the ledger for the emerging nations and kicked their projected economic growth rate from 4.5 percent annually (1973) to 1 percent in 1975. It has been the hope of Arab alms that led to the massive anti-Israeli votes in every available form from the United Nations down. But a number of African states finally seem to realize they have been played for suckers, which could lead to a somewhat different voting alignment in the future.

Well, the Arab oil cartel's 1975 take of $110 billion did not go to charity. Where did it go? Into arms purchases, domestic development and foreign investment. Not in Uganda, of course, but in the United States, Britain and the other "good risk" nations. About $4 billion came to the United States in the first six months of 1975 from the Persian Gulf states for arms, and next year we plan to sell $3.7 billion in advanced military hardware to Kuwait alone.

Official estimates for 1974 indicate that OPEC nations invested $11 billion in the United States. Needless to say, these investments are managed with great care; $6 billion went, presumably as a token of esteem for the stability of our regime, into government securities and another $4 billion into savings accounts and bills of credit.

Now let me make it clear that I do not expect Arab capitalists to be any more benevolent than their western counterparts. What surprises me is that others—particularly the less-developed nations who meretriciously joined the anti-Israel frenzy—assumed that these burnoosed devotees of Adam Smith would be the poor world's almoners. The Africans in particular might have gotten wisdom from a reading of their fellow African St. Augustine's analysis of human character.

BUT THERE IS ONE AREA in which it seems to me the Arabs have demonstrated more than usual capitalist malevolence, namely, in their contributions to the United Nations Relief & Works Agency (UNRWA) which is responsible for handling the problems of Palestinian refugees. Yasir Arafat of the Palestine Liberation Front received a roaring Arab welcome when he crashed the United Nations, but his constituents in the various UNRWA settlements have received only crumbs from their brothers. Israel, for example, contributed more ($1,138,000) than every Arab state except Saudi Arabia.

Kuwait—while shooting its $3 billion for American arms purchases—came across with $400,000 for UNRWA. The brothers-in-arms of the "Palestinian people"—Egypt and Syria—came up with a combined $117,000. The Persian Gulf states, also busy buying expensive military stuff, were a bit more generous: $360,000 was pledged by the United Arab Emirates, Oman and Qatar. Saudi Arabia, which has raised the price of oil from $1 per barrel in 1970 to $12 in 1975, was the most generous. It promised the magnificent sum of $11.2 million. The United States, which has been paying the $12 per barrel has made a $42 million commitment; militant Libya, $600,000.

The figures may get boring, but to wind it up what you have is a situation where the rich Arab states have flatly refused to put their money where their mouth is, once again demonstrating that the poor Palestinian refugees are pawns in the game, meriting only crocodile tears.

Finally, comrades, it goes without saying that the Soviet Union, that great defender of the oppressed everywhere, has not promised a ruble. Without intending to sound mean, before I'll listen to another heartbreaking plea on behalf of the Palestinians, a lot of Arab players have got to fork up the ante. They have to earn the right to give us instructions in morality.

Drive for Quality Education:

Labor's Stand on Busing Hailed As Responsible, Courageous

By Bayard Rustin

BUSING, perhaps the toughest and most controversial issue in recent years, presents a dilemma for politicians and public officials alike. While white acceptance of integrated schools has continued to rise until even a majority of white parents in the South approve, there is widespread rejection of "forced busing" for integration.

In such cities as Boston and Louisville, resistance to busing has reached such proportions as to disrupt education and spark violent street brawls. An overwhelming majority of Americans support the constitutional and moral mandate to end segregation, yet the very instrument that is often required to integrate schools is resisted.

Regrettably, life is more complex than to permit us to conclude that every issue that is colored by racial tensions can be meaningfully discussed in black/white polarities. There have been unfair court decisions and even the most perfect busing program will cause inconveniences.

Moreover, much of the opposition to busing has been motivated not by racism, but by the legitimate concerns of parents for the quality of their children's education. But the great majority of court-ordered busing has been done with the firm intention of improving the education of all children.

How politicians and others have responded to the busing issue reveals a great deal. Some are quite simply running from the issue. Others oppose busing for legitimate reasons and are diligently seeking alternatives that would provide for both integration and quality education. Under the slogan of quality education, still others seek an end to the process of integration. Finally, there are those desperate extremists who exploit resentments to fan the flames of racial bigotry and hatred.

The American labor movement has been consistently vilified as racist. George Meany, the president of the AFL-CIO and the symbol of the labor movement, has been attacked in similar terms or, by his more charitable critics, as less than enthusiastic in the pursuit of racial equality. Yet Meany and the AFL-CIO have held firm in their support of quality integrated education, including the use of busing when ordered by the courts.

On Oct. 25, Meany released letters to the Kentucky AFL-CIO and the Louisville Central Labor Council declaring that it was against AFL-CIO policy for the Kentucky State AFL-CIO or any local central body to lend any aid or support to those who seek to ignore or pervert the AFL-CIO policy of support for busing when it would improve the educational opportunities of children.

SUPPORT OF BUSING is not an easy decision for the AFL-CIO to take. For this issue vitally concerns many of its members. A movement less committed to racial equality could have taken a more ambiguous position. A man less principled than Meany could easily have been content to rest on the pro-busing resolution adopted at the recent AFL-CIO convention in San Francisco, while giving tacit approval to the anti-busing demonstrations.

The AFL-CIO's support of busing has not only been courageous, it has been responsible. In its support for both quality education and integrated education, the AFL-CIO has opposed anti-busing constitutional amendments, fought for massive investments of federal funds to improve substandard schools, and supported legislation to achieve open housing as the most effective way to achieve integrated education.

Even while recognizing the difficulties that busing has caused in Louisville, the AFL-CIO has insisted that "it is the responsibility of the labor movement to make the busing system work as it was intended to work: for the benefit of children who need and deserve the highest quality education available, regardless of their race or color."

The AFL-CIO and George Meany deserve the gratitude and admiration of black Americans and all others committed to racial justice and improved education for their intelligent and principled support of quality integrated education. As the labor movement recognizes, the nation—and most importantly our children—cannot afford for quality education to become a code word for segregated schools.

For Younger Families:

Delays Threaten to Raise Cost Of Solving Housing Problems

FAILURE TO RESOLVE the nation's housing crunch could spell worse problems demanding even costlier solutions 30 years from now, the labor movement's top housing expert, AFL-CIO Urban Affairs Director Henry B. Schechter, warned.

Young families need homes and want to buy them, but are blocked out of the market by historically high interest rates and escalating utility costs stemming from the energy crisis, Schechter stressed. The long-range threat, he said, is that younger families will reach retirement age and reduced income without the financial advantages that retired homeowners now have.

"The working family that is able to acquire ownership of a home 25 or 30 years before retirement is in a much better position, economically, and does not need assistance for housing when they are older," Schechter declared.

He said that was borne out by the recently completed AFL-CIO housing survey among its membership, which showed elderly-renter households spending 28 percent of their total income for housing, while those who own a home "free and clear"—85 percent of those age 65 or over surveyed—have a housing outlay of only 9 percent of total income.

Long-range fiscal responsibility would be better served by a fuller and more effective commitment to home ownership by young and growing families, and by heading off the bigger and harder-to-solve problem that is bound to result three decades or so down the road, Schechter asserted on Labor News Conference.

Schechter renewed the call for allocation of credit into housing and other high-priority public needs, and away from recreational land development, over-production of luxury items and other low-priority uses. He said that those looking for money for the low-priority luxury items "don't mind paying higher interest rates" and drain off a large part of available credit, creating a credit crunch for housing, public improvements and other "socially needed purposes."

Congress gave the President the authority to direct the Federal Reserve Board to implement more selective regulation of credit, and he should use that authority now, as Congress intended, Schechter urged.

He was questioned on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program by Sara Fritz of United Press International and Kenneth Harney of the Housing & Development Report, a publication of the Bureau of National Affairs.

NO ONE REALLY KNOWS whether a news story that 100,000 American workers die each year from occupational illnesses is an accurate figure. No one, including the federal government, is sure whether the death figure should be 100,000 or 50,000 or 150,000.

The lack of an accurate national accounting of the extent of occupational illness is just one of the problems that confronts American labor, health professionals and employers in dealing with what has been called a "national scandal."

The man who calls this neglect a "national scandal" is well qualified to make that charge. He is Dr. Lorin E. Kerr, the immediate past president of the American Public Health Association. Kerr is a career-long public health physician who for 20 years was assistant to the medical director of the United Mine Workers health and retirement program and has been, since 1968, director of occupational health for the UMW.

The American Public Health Association's 103rd annual meeting in Chicago had as its theme "Health and Work in America," the first time a major professional health organization in America has devoted its annual meeting to this subject.

There can be no doubt that the health of workers on the job—and the effect of those jobs on workers' total health and well-being—is one of the nation's priority health problems today. Labor health professionals agree that the subject has been kept too long on the "back burner."

The passage of the Occupational Safety & Health Act of 1970 has focused public attention primarily on the more dramatic problem of job safety rather than occupational health. Safety hazards are easier to document and labor, management and government—with the statistics at hand—could then get down to the business of making the workplace safer.

But occupational health, too often, has seemed to be a problem of little concern. The worker has tended to regard occupational disease as a kind of necessary evil, which, if he is lucky, can be avoided. Dr. Kerr says there are still physicians in the coal fields who deny the existence of black lung as an occupational illness.

LABOR MUST BE ABLE to document to Congress the extent of occupational illness. To do this labor and "people-oriented" health professionals—as opposed to "company-doctor" types—must have the cooperation of such government agencies as the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and such professional organizations as the American Public Health Association.

Many employers, and the "company-doctor" types, are not inclined to do much about occupational health until job illness starts cutting into profit margins.

Labor can expect to continue to get the classic response: "It costs too much" to many of its arguments in behalf of occupational health.

The human question, of course, is: "How much is too much; how much is a human life worth?"

That question was not answered at the APHA meeting. But there was a lot of public airing of the problem. Among the principal speakers were Auto Workers President Leonard Woodcock, Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop and Dr. John Finklea, director of the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health. Scattered throughout the discussion sessions were a few representatives of organized labor who work in the field of occupational health.

That's a lot better than it used to be when labor had no voice in such matters. And as labor gets a firmer grip on the essential facts and figures more action can be expected in making occupational illness an unnecessary evil about which something can be done.

COSTLIER SOLUTIONS will face the nation in 20 or 30 years if it fails to resolve the current housing crunch, AFL-CIO Urban Affairs Director Henry Schechter, center, warned on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Sara Fritz of United Press International and Kenneth Harney of the Bureau of National Affairs. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Key Votes on Consumer Agency Bill

There were two key votes on Nov. 6, when the House passed a labor-backed bill to establish an Agency for Consumer Protection.

Column I shows the 233-175 defeat of a mischievous amendment to inject the consumer agency into the proceedings of the National Labor Relations Board and the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. Its obvious intent was to kill the bill by forcing unions to withdraw their support. Right votes (R) against the amendment were cast by 204 Democrats and 29 Republicans. Voting wrong were 66 Democrats and 109 Republicans.

Column II shows the 208-199 vote to pass the bill. Voting right were 188 Democrats and 20 Republicans. Voting wrong were 80 Democrats and 119 Republicans.

Numerals show districts; AL—at large; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not paired.

Hatch Act Reforms Sought:

U.S. Workers Push Full Political Rights

By J. Gary DiNunno

Legislation to lift the restrictions of the Hatch Act against political activity by government employes would restore full citizenship rights to postal and federal workers while continuing to protect them against improper partisan pressure, President William H. McClennan of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. told the Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee.

McClennan said enactment of the bill—similar to a measure already passed by the House—would cause "neither disruption of the normal civil service system nor jeopardy to the status of federal employes," concerns that led to the adoption of the Hatch Act 36 years ago. The fundamental question, he continued, "is whether the restrictions on political activity now in effect are warranted today to the same extent as in 1939."

Clyde M. Webber, secretary-treasurer of the department and head of the Government Employees, told the committee that federal workers are "fed up with being treated as second-class citizens." But they will never be first-class citizens, he said, or be able "to contribute to effective democratic government until they are free to run for any public office and to participate fully in the political activities which are lawful for all other citizens."

McClennan said the current law has led many federal workers to believe "that the safest course is to take no part whatever in the political life of the community, rather than risk the severe censures imposed by the Hatch Act and the criminal code." Rather than a philosophy that is completely negative, he asserted, federal and postal workers should be encouraged to participate in political work to the maximum extent possible.

Further indicating the need for change, McClennan pointed to the discouragingly low rate of voter participation in national elections and the lifting of most restrictions on political activity for state and local government workers.

"American history," McClennan said, "has been characterized by an effective, continuing broadening of the franchise." Property ownership, sex, race and age restrictions have been lifted or amended, he noted, and removing the Hatch Act restrictions would be another step in that direction.

Webber said the measure presently before the committee "will protect employes' right to freedom in the political arena without fear of either coercion or reprisal" and will prevent the establishment of a spoils system.

The bill to revise the Hatch Act also would create a Board on Political Activities of Federal Employees to investigate violations. The PED recommended that the board be a completely independent agency rather than part of the Civil Service Commission.

The Public Employee Dept. is made up of 29 unions with more than 2.3 million members who work for federal, state and local governments and the postal service.

UTU Opposes Bill For Coal Pipeline

Rail transportation of coal is "more efficient, economical and flexible" than transportation by a coal slurry pipeline, the United Transportation Union contended at House hearings.

UTU President Al H. Chesser urged the Interior Committee to reject legislation to facilitate construction of coal slurry pipelines.

Added to the cost of pipeline construction and operation, Chesser argued, should be the economic cost to the nation of the loss of railroad jobs.

Most Financial Issues Turned Down by Voters

A scattering of elections in which bond issues and other referenda were on local or state ballots found voters generally in a nay-saying mood.

Ohio voters overwhelmingly defeated a multi-billion dollar package of bond issues, coupled with sales and gasoline tax increases, that Republican Gov. James A. Rhodes had proposed. The State AFL-CIO had opposed all but one part of the package, terming it "a $10 billion boondoggle." But voters also rejected, although by a closer margin, a labor-supported housing program for middle-income and lower-income families.

In New Jersey, voters rejected a $922 million bond issue strongly backed by the state's labor movement, the governor and the legislature. It was designed to generate 118,000 new jobs in transportation, housing construction, social services and water resource projects.

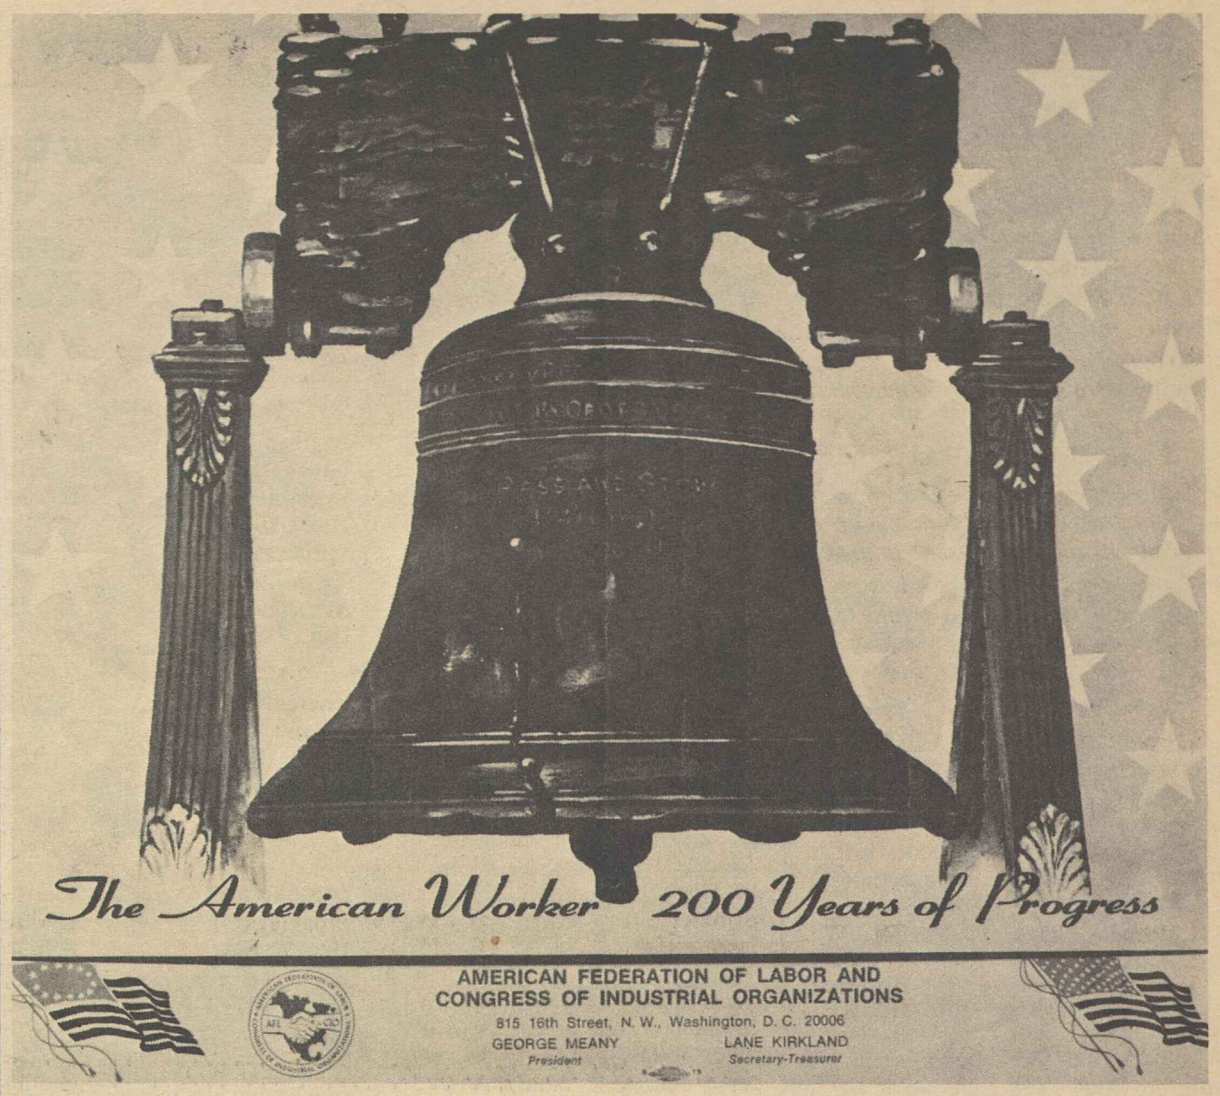
Gov. Brendan T. Byrne, a Democrat, said the shadow of New York City's financial crisis doomed the bond issues. He charged also that President Ford's "harsh treatment" of New York City's financial crisis had "clearly destroyed voter confidence in government borrowings of all kinds."

New York state, already reeling from the ripple effect of the city financial crisis, voted down a $250 million bond issue to finance housing for the elderly.

Relatively small bond issues were approved by voters in statewide balloting in Maine and Pennsylvania. And larger-scaled city bond issues won support in Columbus, Ohio, and in Philadelphia and Baltimore, among others. But most spending proposals were beaten.

A conservative mood also was reflected in San Francisco, where voters approved an amendment to the city charter that will mean lower pay for a number of blue-collar public employes. Their wages had been linked to prevailing craft rates, which generally ran higher than other municipal salaries.

San Francisco voters also adopted a series of measures generally regarded as punishing fire fighters and police for work stoppages last summer. The propositions adopted will curb future pay raises, allow readjustments of working hours, and set up machinery for firing police and fire fighters who strike.



BICENTENNIAL CALENDAR marking key events in American trade union history and depicting the role of workers during nation's first 200 years is being made available for distribution by AFL-CIO affiliates. The calendars are produced by Brown & Bigelow in cooperation with the federation's Dept. of Education. They cost $1 each.

New Calendar Cites Labor's Role in Nation

A bicentennial calendar commemorating key events in American trade union history during the nation's first 200 years is being made available for distribution by AFL-CIO affiliates and state and local central bodies.

The calendar, titled The American Worker—200 Years of Progress, depicts the role of working men and women and their unions in full color reproductions of 12 original paintings.

Among the notable achievements and places featured in the paintings are colonial craftsmen protesting unfair taxes in 1775, early organizing efforts following the Revolution, demonstrations for shorter workdays, parades of pickets for union contracts, and the AFL-CIO headquarters building.

The calendar also marks key dates in the development of the trade union movement and major labor achievements.

Director Walter G. Davis of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education said a number of unions are planning to use the calendars as Christmas cards and for distribution to members, government officials and to schools and libraries.

Davis noted that the calendars, costing $1 each, can be imprinted with the name of the union affiliate for an additional charge of $4.75 per order.

The calendars were produced by Brown & Bigelow, a major calendar manufacturer, in cooperation with the federation's Dept. of Education.

Davis said detailed information dealing with purchase orders is being forwarded to affiliates. All orders will be handled directly by Brown & Bigelow, 1286 University Ave., St. Paul, Minn. 55104.

Budget Ceiling Raised $1.1 Billion by House

The House approved a binding budget ceiling for the current fiscal year after adding $1.1 billion to the spending totals proposed by the House Budget Committee.

Of the added money, $235 million would be earmarked for what the AFL-CIO termed "badly-needed jobs and education programs." The largest item in this category is $125 million added for public service jobs.

Most of the increase, however, represents funds for the aid to Israel and Egypt program sought by the Administration to implement the Sinai agreement.

House Majority Leader Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., offered the amendment raising the budget total. It was approved by a narrow 213-203 margin, following several vote switches when it appeared at one stage that the amendment had been beaten by a single vote.

In a letter sent to all House members, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller had urged approval of the O'Neill amendment "as an important step in the right direction."

Biemiller stressed that the latest unemployment statistics "clearly demonstrate that the recession is far from over. The jobs and education part of the O'Neill amendment," he said, "will permit added economic stimulus without breaking congressional budget ceilings."

Following adoption of the O'Neill amendment, the budget resolution was passed by a 225-191 vote. Only 11 Republicans voted for it, even though its spending ceilings were closer in many areas to Administration proposals than to the increased economic stimulus that many economists have prescribed to get America back to work quickly.

As adopted by the House, it set a $378.9 billion ceiling on outlays and estimated the resulting budget deficit at $72.1 billion.

The figures won't be firm, however, until the House bill is reconciled with a Senate bill scheduled for action soon. Once a final version is agreed to by both bodies, all legislation must conform to its restrictions, with the Budget Committee empowered to rule in the event of a dispute over interpretation.

The AFL-CIO has been critical of the use of rigid budget ceilings that impose a dollar test rather than a need test on proposed legislation. In testimony earlier this year, AFL-CIO President George Meany prodded Congress to stop playing "budget one-upmanship" with the Ford Administration and do more to get America back to work.

In developing its deficit estimate, the House Budget Committee assumed that Congress will raise an additional $1 billion in revenue through tax reform as well as extend this year's tax cut through 1976. The tax bill drawn up by the Ways & Means Committee is substantially below that added revenue total, however.

In considering the budget resolution, the House voted down a Republican-sponsored amendment to reduce the spending totals by $4,67 billion. The vote was 259-157. It also defeated, 283-127, a resolution by a right-wing California Republican, Rep. John Rousselot, to cut $72 billion in order to achieve a balanced budget.

CORRECTION

An article in the Nov. 1 issue of the AFL-CIO News incorrectly listed the maximum social security tax that employes will pay during 1976, when the amount of wages subject to the payroll tax rises from the present $14,100 to $15,-300.

A person earning $15,300 or more next year will pay a total of $895.05 (not $809.05, as the story read). The article correctly noted that this is $70.20 more than the current maximum.

Filibuster Move Defeated:

Debate Limit Voted On Site Picket Bill

eting as a Taft-Hartley Act violation.

While the Senate rebuffed the filibuster tactics its leaders had sharply denounced as "obstructionism," the votes on the merits of the bill—amendments as well as final passage—are expected to be closer.

Opponents are expected to seek to muddle the legislation through amendments to the point where its passage would become either meaningless or actually harmful to unions.

The House passed the construction site picketing bill by a 230-178 margin in July and President Ford has said he would sign the bill if it came to his desk along with a construction industry bargaining bill that also has passed the House with labor support.

One of the opponents of the site picketing bill, Sen. Paul D. Laxalt (R-Nev.) told the Senate after a meeting with Ford that the President told him he would sign the legislation only "with great reservations."

If they can't block enactment of the site picketing bill, anti-union employers are expected to press for delaying tactics and another filibuster to try to kill the bargaining bill.

Their reasoning is that blocking enactment of the collective bargaining legislation, drafted by Secretary of Labor John Dunlop in consultation with labor and management, could bring a veto of the site picketing bill.

In other congressional developments:

• A House-Senate conference committee dealing with comprehensive energy conservation and oil pricing legislation was putting the final touches on a compromise bill designed both to avoid a threatened presidential veto and prevent a sharp rise in oil prices after existing controls expire Nov. 15.

The committee, which has been working on the legislation since October 1, reached tentative agreement on a formula that would initially roll back the price of oil that is now uncontrolled—resulting in a reduction of about three cents a gallon for gasoline and heating oil. Prices would then be allowed to rise up to 10 percent a year, with controls ending after four years unless the President chose to retain them.

The bill includes mandatory fuel-efficiency standards for automobiles and other conservation measures including standby authority for the President to impose gasoline rationing.

There were indications, but no firm assurances, that the President would sign such a bill if Congress gives it final approval.

11-15-75

• The House voted 309-45 approval of a bill designed to correct some of the problems found in a 1973 law intended to spur the growth of health maintenance organizations (HMOs), which provide comprehensive care and emphasize preventive medicine. The changes are intended to allow HMOs to compete more easily with traditional health insurance programs.

• A proposed amendment to the Occupational Safety & Health Act to set up a Labor Dept. program of on-site consultative services for employers is unnecessary and should be rejected, the AFL-CIO said.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said in a letter to House members that Congress has already provided funds to help states establish consultative programs and most states have done so.

Unions have expressed concern that dilution of the Labor Dept.'s key enforcement function would result from adding a "consultative" program.

• The tax bill drawn up by a divided Ways & Means Committee is expected to run into a buzzsaw of amendments when it reaches the House floor. There is relatively little controversy about extension of current tax reduction to avoid a sudden falloff of purchasing power. But the committee's watered-down proposals were under attack from tax reform advocates, while Administration supporters want to tie continued tax reductions to President Ford's proposal for a spending ceiling in the next fiscal year.

Running Wild

"Most of the increased joblessness over the month resulted from persons re-entering the labor force following a period of labor-market inactivity," BLS said. The number of unemployed persons rose by 230,000 to 8,002,000, seasonally adjusted.

President I. W. Abel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. viewed the two BLS reports, issued a day apart, as further gloomy news for the country.

"Here we go again," Abel commented. "More price increases, more unemployment, more human misery and insecurity for America's workers. We have an Administration with no plan and no constructive purpose."

The October rise in joblessness resulted from the addition of 252,000 persons to the civilian labor force, coupled with a slight increase of 23,000 in total employment. The total number of employed persons last month was 85,441,000 in an overall workforce of 93,443,000.

In a breakdown by occupation and industry, BLS reported the largest rises in unemployment occurred among clerical workers and persons in the finance and service industries, sectors that traditionally provide a large proportion of the jobs held by women.

Employment in contract construction declined by 30,000 over the month, after having stabilized somewhat since June, BLS noted. Employment in this industry has dropped by 730,000 from its all-time high in early 1974.

In manufacturing, employment rose by 110,000, with the largest gains posted in the apparel, food and textile industries. Substantial increases took place in state and local government.

The average duration of unemployment fell from 16.2 to 15.4 weeks in October, the first decline since it began its dramatic lengthening at the beginning of the year, BLS reported. There was also a decline in the number of persons unemployed for six months or more.

The average workweek in October edged up one-tenth of an hour to 36.2 hours.

More Layoffs, Cutbacks Add to New York Crisis

promised pension rights.

City, state and union officials who testified before the Joint Economic Committee warned that the unemployment crisis that was instrumental in tipping New York towards insolvency is being fed by the drastic budget slashes the city has been compelled to make.

Victor Gotbaum, director of District Council 37 of the State, County & Municipal Employees, warned that default would push the city's current 11.9 percent jobless rate to a devastating 17 to 19 percent unemployment. He and Albert Shanker, president of the United Federation of Teachers and its parent national union, protested both President Ford's apparent vendetta against New York and bills in Congress that would void union contracts in return for federal loan guarantees.

Shanker said contracts between the city and its workers and retired workers are as much an obligation as its debts to banks and bondholders.

President Murray H. Finley of the Clothing Workers—with 50,000 members living in New York—said further cutbacks in city services and higher taxes would drive industry out of New York, adding intolerably to the loss of private industry jobs that has contributed heavily to the city's problems.

In addition to an emergency loan guarantee, Finley said, the federal government should assume costs of welfare, health care and a larger share of the education budget.

A New York Times article citing the views of economists on the ripple effect of city cutbacks noted that New York lost 100,000 jobs in the private sector last year and 370,000 since 1969.

The 37,000 city jobs already abolished as New York struggled to avoid bankruptcy will bring a further cutback of 15,000 private industry jobs, the article notes. And additional threatened cuts in city spending could boost the private sector jobs loss to 60,000.

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, released a staff study warning that a default by New York City could hold down the gross national product for the entire United States.

Mayor Abraham D. Beame and Gov. Hugh L. Carey continued to try to counter President Ford's threat to veto any attempt to "bail out" New York City, and there were some indications they were making headway.

Beame reiterated in dozens of forums that a loan guarantee would not cost the federal government or the public anything, while default would "cost billions," directly and indirectly.

While Ford made no public retreat from his insistence that New York City must sink before the federal government can throw out a life preserver, some of his aides and congressional Republican leaders were taking a softer position.

In pressing for a "no-strings" loan guarantee, Meany said the financial crisis in New York City is "obviously" a greater danger to the national economy than was the risk of Lockheed's bankruptcy.

TWUA Sues J.P. Stevens on Pension Plan

New York—the Textile Workers Union of America has filed suit against J. P. Stevens & Co. under the Pension Reform Act. Purpose of the suit is to compel the nation's second largest textile manufacturer to amend its profit-sharing and retirement plan for hourly-paid workers in conformance with that law, according to Henry C. Woicik, TWUA's general counsel.

Woicik said the U.S. district court here is being asked to require Stevens to establish a "floor" under benefits to protect workers covered by the company's profit-sharing and retirement plan against declines of investment values in their individual accounts.

The suit seeks to have the company "put into writing" various guarantees it announced informally last January, Woicik said. It also asks the court to require J. P. Stevens to fund this new obligation from current assets, he added.

Woicik said the union, which is bargaining representative of Workers in eight Stevens plants, "intends to scrutinize the management or mismanagement of these invested monies." Some $20 million is involved, he added.

The District Court action is only one of a number of current litigations involving the firm and TWUA. These include two charges that the firm is in contempt of court orders to bargain.

Denials Top Approvals of Trade Act Aid

Fewer than half of the unemployed workers who filed for trade adjustment assistance under the law that went into effect last April have had their requests approved, the Labor Dept. said.

Between Apr. 3 and Sept. 24, 174 petitions were filed—mostly by unions—on behalf of 91,000 workers who lost their jobs in industries affected by imports. Of these, 57 petitions affecting 34,000 workers were approved, 41 affecting 38,000 workers were denied, and 76 petitions affecting 19,000 workers were still pending.

Assistance to unemployed workers under the 1974 Trade Act may include weekly payments that in most cases are higher than state unemployment compensation, training, testing, counseling, job placement, and relocation allowances.

The largest number of workers qualifing for benefits have been in the automobile, leather products, and electrical equipment industries, the Labor Dept. said.

Blackburn Turned Down For Home Bank Board

For the second time in a month, a Senate committee has refused to recommend confirmation of a presidential appointee.

The Senate Banking Committee voted 8-5 to reject the nomination of Ben B. Blackburn, a former four-term Republican congressman from Georgia, to head the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

Blackburn's nomination had been attacked by the AFL-CIO because of his strong hostility to civil rights and fair housing legislation in Congress, his disparagement of the poor, and his active fund-raising for the anti-labor National Right-to-Work Foundation.

Earlier, the Senate Commerce Committee had refused to approve Joseph Coors, a brewery executive associated with extreme right-wing groups, as a director of the Public Broadcasting Corp. That nomination also had been opposed by the AFL-CIO and other groups.

Passage Climaxes 25-Year Struggle

By David L. Perlman

The Senate joined the House in passing a construction site picketing bill, climaxing a quarter-century campaign by building trades unions that had the support of the entire labor movement. The vote was 52-45.

Included in the Senate measure is the construction industry collective bargaining bill that the House had passed as separate legislation. It had the endorsement of the AFL-CIO convention as "a careful and conscientious attempt by individuals who know the construction industry" to develop procedures to make the bargaining process more effective.

Senate Labor Committee Chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) steered the legislation to passage with a bipartisan assist from Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.). Twice, the Senate had to invoke cloture in order to break a filibuster by hard-core opponents. (Rollcalls on Page 6.)

Before the legislation can be sent to the President's desk, a House-Senate conference committee will have to reconcile some differences between the two versions and both the House and Senate must then approve the final language.

President Robert Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. expressed confidence that the legislation, "approved so convincingly by the Senate and the House," will become "the law of the land." He noted President Ford's promise to sign the site picketing bill if it was accompanied by the bargaining legislation that had been initially drafted by Labor Secretary John T. Dunlop in con-

Veto Threat Stalls N.Y. Aid Action

The House put off action on a compromise bill to help New York City stave off bankruptcy after President Ford said he would veto it.

Without a strong presidential endorsement, House Democratic and Republican leaders saw no chance of passing a loan guarantee bill.

Ford dangled the hope that he might relent if New York City follows up its layoffs and budget slashes with further economies, and if the state legislature approves a new package of city taxes.

The House Banking Committee bill would have provided loan guarantees of $3 billion over seven years — with fiscal stringencies to make it probable that the federal government would not lose on the deal. It had the personal endorsement of House Republican Leader John J. Rhodes (Ariz.), who had worked with Banking Commit-

AFL-CIO Defends Program:

Facts Trip Administration In Battle Over Food Stamps

The AFL-CIO defended the food stamp program from attacks by the Ford Administration and congressional conservatives who want to cut it back sharply.

During this recession, the program has worked just as it is supposed to, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman testified at Senate hearings.

As unemployment rose, so did the number of families qualifying for and using food stamps, Seidman noted. "People who once thought that they would never need food stamps have had to resort to them. They have had to use them just to keep their families from going hungry."

When unemployment dipped somewhat after its high point last May, so did the number of food stamp recipients.

Persons who are suddenly without income shouldn't have to wait until they are completely destitute before qualifying for food stamps, Seidman said in an attack on the Administration bill and an even more stringent proposal by Sen. James L. Buckley (R-N.Y.).

When these people were working, their taxes helped finance the program "and now they are drawing on it to sustain their families during the worst recession since World War II."

Seidman told the Senate Agriculture subcommittee that the government's own figures refute the vehement criticism of the food stamp program leveled by Administration officials, particularly Treasury Secretary William E. Simon.

Simon's claim that families with incomes over $16,000 a year are receiving food stamps is contradicted by Agriculture Dept. figures for families of four showing none with incomes that high on the food stamp roster.

Further, 87 percent of all participants in the food stamp program had gross incomes under $6,000 a year, and "the great bulk" of those over that amount were in households of five or more.

As for Simon's charge that the food stamp program is a "haven for chiselers and rip-off artists," the Agriculture Dept. found fraud in only eight one-hundredths of 1 percent of food stamp households.

Seidman noted that Congress has already barred students claimed as tax dependents by their families from receiving food stamps.

Equally invalid, Seidman said, was the charge by the Secretary of the Treasury that the food stamp program "began as a small $14 million experiment in 1962" and could cost $6.6 billion next year," "a 47,000 percent increase."

What he "failed to mention," Seidman noted, was that only eight

Ban on Jobless Benefits In Pregnancies Voided

The U.S. Supreme Court struck down a provision of Utah's unemployment compensation law that makes women workers automatically ineligible for jobless benefits during their last three months of pregnancy and the immediate six weeks following delivery.

The decision means the state may no longer deny unemployment benefits to pregnant women workers simply because it presumes their condition makes them unable to work. At least 14 states have laws almost identical to the Utah statute.

The Utah unemployment compensation system deems a woman ineligible for benefits "during any week of unemployment when it is found . . . that her total or partial unemployment is due to pregnancy."

Another provision of the state law amounts to a blanket disqualification for benefits during an 18-week period preceding and following childbirth.

The Supreme Court, noting the state's presumption often has been or could be inaccurate, observed in a three-page, unsigned ruling:

Consumer Prices Jump, Real Earnings Decline

By James M. Shevis

The Labor Dept.'s consumer price index turned up again last month, rising by seven-tenths of 1 percent or as much as the increases in August and September combined.

The October rise in the CPI was outstripped this year only by increases of eight-tenths of 1 percent in June and 1.2 percent in July. Meanwhile, real spendable earnings—the buying power of the average worker — dipped slightly over the month while big corporations were reporting sharp increases in third-quarter profits.

The rise in prices was led by unexpected increases in grocery store items, the Bureau of Labor Statistics noted. Also contributing to the CPI increase were price hikes for a variety of consumer goods and services—particularly clothing, new cars, fuel oil, mortgage interest rates and auto insurance.

The seasonally adjusted increase of seven-tenths of 1 percent in overall prices lifted the CPI to 164.6 of its 1967 base. Put differently, goods and services that cost $100 eight years ago now cost consumers $164.60.

If it were to continue a full year, the October rate of increase would

Carpenter Apprentices Compete for Trophies

Milwaukee — California, Pennsylvania and Michigan took top honors in the 1975 International Carpentry Apprenticeship Contest here which drew the largest number of competitors ever.

A total of 84 state and provincial champions, representing 32 states and 5 provinces of Canada, vied for the trophies and prizes. The contestants — all fourth-year apprentices — underwent a four-hour written test and a grueling eight-hour manipulative test at Mecca, Milwaukee's new exposition hall.

While thousands of spectators watched, the carpentry contestants produced an elaborate wooden form for concrete steps in 20-foot square enclosures, while judges rated them under a point system.

Mill-Cabinet contestants produced hutch cabinets with adjustable shelves and with hinged doors on the base unit.

The 21 millwrights who competed performed a series of manual exercise designed to show their skills and knowledge—a floor plan for a monorail system, a layout for a chute on heavy metal plates, assembly of a rack-and-pinion device, and a demonstration of knots and cable rigging.

Hundreds of vocational students from Wisconsin schools were bused in to see the apprentices in action. Eleven Job Corpsmen undergoing pre-apprenticeship training at the Blackwell Job Corps center near Rhinelander, Wis., also were brought in to view the competition.

The top carpentry award went to 24-year-old Lee Hoffseth, a member of Local 771, Watsonville, Calif. His win marked the third time that California has taken top honors in the carpentry division.

William Leupold of Local 359, Philadelphia, took top honors in the mill-cabinet competition. He is employed by a building supply company in his home city while undergoing apprenticeship training.

The first place millwright was Barry Krogh of Local 1102 of Detroit. Krogh carried on a lively tradition to become the fifth Detroit millwright winner in the nine years of competition.

The contest was preceded by two days of seminars for coordinators, instructors, and sponsors under the direction of First Vice President William Konyha and Technical Director James Tinkcom.

The 1976 contest will be held in Philadelphia.

AFL-CIO Rebuts Attack On Food Stamp Plan

counties in the United States were initially covered, while some 7.4 million persons in 1,741 counties were receiving surplus foods under the since-discontinued program, and the poor in 1,300 other counties had no federal food aid at all.

The inclusion of Puerto Rico in the food stamp program added 1.5 million persons, Seidman noted. And the tremendous increase in food prices—in part the result of the Administration's own economic program — significantly increased the total cost.

Under the Administration food stamp bill, Seidman said, most persons receiving food stamps would either be dropped from the rolls or have their benefits cut significantly.

It would drop from the program all households with a gross income more than $100 a month over the official poverty line.

A 90-day averaging formula to determine income would disqualify most of the recently unemployed. And even though it doesn't specifically bar strikers from receiving food stamps, the effect would be the same except in very long strikes.

The more openly anti-worker Buckley bill would disqualify even more workers, Seidman noted, and force many unemployed persons to choose between hunger for their families or giving up a car or home.

Not only would strikers be barred, but so would persons who refuse to help break the strikes of other workers, Seidman said. Also ineligible would be the family of a worker who had quit his job "without good cause."

Seidman said a bill introduced by Senators Bob Dole (R-Kan.) and George McGovern (D-S.D.) has a desirable feature in eliminating payment for food stamps, but also would disqualify many low-income families although not as "devastating" as the other bills.

Labor's position, he said, is that "this program which has served millions of families in need must not be permitted to be scuttled or slashed. Food stamps must be available to all Americans who need them to stave off hunger for themselves and their families."

Labor Center Memorializes Miles Stanley

Charleston, W.Va. — The West Virginia AFL-CIO headquarters building was dedicated in the memory of the late Miles C. Stanley during the 10th convention of the state labor federation.

Stanley was president of the state body from its founding in 1954 until his death last year. A bust of Stanley, unveiled by his daughter Terri at the dedication ceremony, was placed in the building lobby.

The 12-story Stanley Building also carries a bronze plaque presented by the AFL-CIO Appalachian Council and its co-chairman, President Harry Boyer of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO. Presidents of state federations which are members of the council attended the dedication.

The 470 delegates to the convention elected Joseph W. Powell president to serve out the two remaining years in Stanley's unexpired term. Powell had been appointed interim president by the executive board shortly after Stanley's death.

Also elected to fill unexpired terms as vice presidents were Vivian Sansom of the Glass Bottle Blowers and Don Clingerman of the Steelworkers.

In other action, the convention called for improvements in state job injury benefits, unemployment compensation and the minimum wage.

Maximum weekly benefits of workmen's compensation—including those for widows—should be raised to 70 percent of the claimant's average wage and minimum benefits to $200 a month, the convention resolution declared.

The state minimum wage, now $2 an hour, should be raised to $2.20 in July 1976 and to $2.40 in July 1977, the convention urged, while reducing the length of the workweek before overtime pay is required from the current 44 hours to 40 over two years.

Disability Benefits Held to 5% Boost

Disabled federal workers and coal miners receiving black lung disability benefits will get only a 5 percent adjustment in benefits this year, less than the rise in living costs.

Their disability payments are linked to the annual comparability salary adjustments for federal employes, which should have resulted in an 8.66 percent raise.

But President Ford cut the amount back to 5 percent, and both the House and Senate agreed to the reduction.

'Just a Lot of Wind':

Recovery Claims Assailed by Meany

President Ford's oft-repeated statements that the economy is recovering are Administration propaganda—"just a lot of wind"—AFL-CIO President George Meany declared on a nationwide television interview.

While there has been an increase in gross national product overall, "this doesn't indicate immediate recovery," Meany said on ABC's Issues and Answers.

"If you look back at the history of the Great Depression, which lasted from 1930 until at least 1939," Meany observed, "production started increasing nationally in March 1933 and we still had five years of deep depression ahead of us."

Meany said the end of the current recession — the sharpest downturn in the nation's economy since the 1930s—can be measured only in one way: when people go back to work.

"I don't know any other measuring rod that means anything," said Meany. More than 8 million workers are unemployed today, with the nation's jobless rate at 8.6 percent in October.

Also in the interview, Meany discussed the 1976 presidential-election campaign, the Paris economic summit, the removal of Defense Sec. James Schlesinger from the Ford Administration, New York's financial crisis, and detente.

He predicted little of substance from the economic summit conference in Paris, declaring that President Ford took with him to the meeting a negative attitude. Ford has consistently refused to do anything to beef up the American economy, Meany said.

"He is following the old theory that we have got to suffer unemployment, that sooner or later we will get out from under unemployment." But this hasn't happened, and joblessness continues to grip the nation, Meany observed.

On New York's fiscal difficulties, Meany expressed confidence the city would work its way out of the budgetary problems that now threaten it with bankruptcy, but would probably need federal loan guarantees.

"What we would like to see here is the Lockheed formula," he said. "Lockheed went out and borrowed $250 million in order to keep going, and they borrowed it because Uncle Sam was going to guarantee the principal."

The government didn't step in to run Lockheed, nor did it attempt to renegotiate the firm's contracts with labor, Meany noted, suggesting that the same tack should be used with New York City.

"I am opposed to giving the federal government control over our contracts and our pension funds in the city of New York," he stressed. "I am sure that the unions involved are opposed, and I am going to continue to oppose that approach."

Asked what he thought the recent firing of Defense Sec. James Schlesinger does to American foreign policy and to detente, Meany said "it was a great big plus for the Soviet Union." He added:

"The impression has gone forth all over the world that this was a decision made because Schlesinger would not follow the soft line vis-a-vis the Soviet Union — in other words, the Kissinger line."

Castigating the diplomacy of Sec. of State Henry Kissinger, Meany deplored "this policy of unilateral concessions to the Soviet Union, which is what detente adds up to."

On next year's presidential election, Meany said he would not want to make any forecast as to labor's choice of candidates "at this time."

"I will tell you that when the candidates get lined up next year," he said. "I don't know who is going to run. We have a lot of candidates." However, he reaffirmed his own opposition to Alabama Gov. George C. Wallace.

Meany also pointed out that it is still uncertain whether President Ford will be the Republican candidate in 1976.

BRONZE BUST of Miles C. Stanley, late president of the West Virginia AFL-CIO, is unveiled by his daughter Terri at the dedication of the state federation's headquarters building. Joseph W. Powell, rear, was elected to fill out Stanley's unexpired term.

Amendments Proposed:

Tax Reform Issues Set for House Vote

Liberal Democrats will try to inject a bigger dose of tax reform into a bill that will continue, with minor changes, the economy-stimulating tax reduction Congress enacted last spring.

Without an extension, individual income taxes will rise in 1976 and higher withholding taxes will take a bigger bite out of purchasing power, starting in January.

Combined with the tax reduction bill that is scheduled to reach the House floor in early December are the remnants of a once ambitious attempt by the Ways & Means Committee to raise additional revenue by closing some of the most notorious of tax loopholes for the wealthy and corporations.

After having given tentative approval during weeks of deliberations to $2.6 billion in tax reforms, a conservative coalition on the committee managed to knock out all but about $700 million from the bill before clearing it for the House floor.

The committee's liberal minority did win the right to offer a series of amendments to the bill that would about double the tax reform revenue. The House Rules Committee agreed to allow the five liberal-sponsored amendments and two other amendments to be voted on by the full House. This is a modification of the traditional no-amendment rule under which complex tax legislation is usually taken to the House floor.

The labor-supported amendments that will be in order during House consideration of the tax bill would:

- Tighten a section curbing real estate tax shelters.
- Eliminate a new capital gains loophole that was tailor-made to give a Texas millionnaire, H. Ross Perot, a $15 million tax break.
- Tighten the minimum tax that must be paid on income excluded from regular taxes.
- Restore the federal withholding tax on U.S. investments by foreigners.
- Begin cutting down special tax treatment for exports under the DISC program in three years, instead of five years.

Republicans sought, but were refused, the right to offer an amendment that would impose the spending ceiling demanded by President Ford as the price for his signature on a bill extending the tax cuts.

If the House succeeds in moving the controversial tax bill to passage, the Senate will be under heavy pressure to complete action during the remaining weeks of 1975. There are no restrictions on amendments when the Senate takes up tax bills.

In other congressional developments:

- The House ignored labor's objections and approved a bill authorizing the Labor Dept. to set up a program of on-site consultation to advise employers how to comply with job safety and health standards.

The AFL-CIO position was that Congress has already voted funds for states to set up such programs and the federal emphasis should be on enforcement. The bill passed on a non-record 115-15 vote.

- Disagreement over a Senate-added school busing amendment continued to block final agreement by a House-Senate conference committee on appropriations for the Labor Dept. and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.
- The Senate approved a $90.7 billion defense appropriations bill, about $7 billion below the Administration budget request but $564 million more than the House had voted. It rejected, 55-38, a motion to cut the amount to the House-passed level.

Teacher Jailings Spur Protests in New Haven

New Haven, Conn.—Members of the New Haven Federation of Teachers voted to suspend their 10-day-old strike to enable their jailed leaders to resume negotiations with city officials.

The vote followed a decision by custodial and other non-teacher workers to join the strike as a protest against the jailing of 77 teachers a day earlier.

The mayor subsequently ordered the closing of the schools as preliminary talks opened.

The school teachers were jailed Nov. 18 shortly after Connecticut Superior Court Judge George A. Saden found them guilty of contempt of court for not obeying his order to return to work.

At the same time, the union's 12-member negotiating team was ordered back to jail for refusing to call off the strike. Saden fined each member $250 a day, the union $5,000 a day, for the duration of the strike.

More than 900 teachers left their classrooms Nov. 9 after 12 months of fruitless talks over a new contract. The school board claimed the city does not have enough money to pay either raises or earned increments to the teachers.

The board also refused to extend the teachers' old contract, suspending the grievance procedure along with other contract provisions. The teachers' union is Local 933 of the American Federation of Teachers.

AFT President Albert Shanker, deploring the jailings and fines, said that "once again a judge has shortsightedly reacted to the strike rather than to the issues.

"It is utter folly to expect agreement to be reached on a contract while the teachers are in the local jail house," Shanker declared.

Support for the strike was solid among New Haven community groups. A consortium of these organizations accused the school board of bad-faith bargaining and demanded that the schools be closed for two days and the teachers released from jail so that an attempt could be made to reach agreement on a new contract.

President Vincent Sirabella of the New Haven Central Labor Council also strongly affirmed organized labor's backing for the walkout. In addition to the non-academic union members who voted to join the striking teachers, other unions in the 92-member council would be asked to become involved if the situation deteriorates, he declared.

Rail Crafts Push Back Strike Date

The four shopcraft unions of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes' Dept. agreed to move back their strike deadline against the nation's major railroads to Dec. 4. A walkout had been scheduled for Nov. 18.

Federal mediators asked for the later date so that a presidential emergency board could be reconvened to clarify its position on the disputed issue of subcontracting.

The four unions are the Firemen & Oilers, the Carmen, the Boilermakers-Blacksmiths and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

E. J. Hickey, Jr., general counsel for the unions, said they felt the board was "clear and unambiguous" in recommending that the carriers not subcontract work "except when it's genuinely unavoidable."

In the past, the unions have charged that management has abused an agreement permitting the railroads to subcontract work under certain conditions, and the result has been erosion of the jobs of their members.

The contract dispute has exhausted all remedial procedures available under the Railway Labor Act. Both sides have been free to seek "self-help," including a strike, since Nov. 9.

The presidential emergency board, after investigating the dispute for a month, also recommended in October that members of the shopcraft unions be given an additional 2-cent-an-hour equity pay increase to put them on a par with machinists of operating unions.

Eleven other rail unions already have accepted new settlements with the carriers, but the shopcrafts refused to go along with the pattern, citing a number of special problems affecting their members, including the "fundamental issue on subcontracting."

U.S. Mediation Service Sets Up Seattle Region

Seattle—A new regional office of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service has been set up here to serve an eight-state area of the Northwest.

The new region is responsible for FMCS activities in Alaska, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Oregon, Washington, Wyoming and Utah. The states were previously under the region headquartered in San Francisco.

James L. Macpherson, director of the new region, has requested that all labor and management representatives in the eight-state area file statutory notices of contract reopenings with the Seattle office.

Ban on Jobless Benefits In Pregnancies Voided

"It cannot be doubted that a substantial number of women are fully capable of working well into their last trimester of pregnancy and of resuming employment shortly after childbirth."

Indeed, the high court noted, the principal figure in the suit that prompted its ruling worked intermittently as a clerical employe for portions of the 18-week period during which she was conclusively presumed to be incapacitated.

Such a presumption thus violates the 14th Amendment to the Constitution, the court observed, and must be replaced by "more individualized means when basic human liberties are at stake."

The high-court decision evolved from the case of a young Utah woman, Mary Ann Turner, who was dismissed from her job in November 1972. She was due to give birth in June 1973.

Turner received unemployment compensation until Mar. 11, 1973—12 weeks prior to the expected date of the birth of her child. When the payments ended, she sued in the state courts, charging violation of her 14th Amendment rights. The Utah Supreme Court ruled that the law did not violate any of her constitutional protections.

"What she should do," the Utah Supreme Court suggested tongue in cheek, "is work for the repeal of the biological law of nature. She should get it amended so that men shared equally with women in bearing children.

"If she could prevail upon the Great Creator to so order things, she would be guilty of violating the equal-protection of the law unless she saw to it that men could also share in the thrill and glory of motherhood."

But the U.S. Supreme Court apparently was not amused. It vacated the Utah ruling and remanded the case for further proceedings.

The high court relied in its decision on a 1974 case involving a Cleveland school teacher who was forced by law to take a mandatory leave, without pay, five months before the date her child was due to be born.

The Utah case "is virtually identical" to the Cleveland litigation, and the challenged Utah statute is based on the same presumption found unconstitutional in the latter case, the Supreme Court noted.

Justice William Rehnquist dissented in the ruling, but did not file an opinion. Chief Justice Warren Burger and Justice Harry Blackmun objected to the majority's summary disposition of the case, saying they would have scheduled it for oral arguments before deciding it.

Ford Suffers Third Rebuff On Nominees

The Senate Commerce Committee rejected the nomination of Isabel A. Burgess for a second term on the National Transportation Safety Board by a vote of 11 to 7. She is the third appointee of President Ford's to fail to win confirmation in the past month.

A committee staff report raised serious questions of conflict of interest in citing her close ties with firms the board is supposed to police.

Mrs. Burgess was charged with failing to disclose publicly her stock holdings in Allegheny Airlines, as is required by law, and participating in board decisions involving Allegheny.

The report also said she had an "abnormally high absentee rate from board meetings and unusually high travel expenses in relation to other members of the board." It noted too that she had received free transportation and "other emoluments" from firms under the board's jurisdiction.

Two other Ford appointees turned down on confirmation bids earlier are Ben B. Blackburn, to head the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and Joseph Coors for a seat on the board of directors of the Public Broadcasting Corp.

Meanwhile, the full Senate confirmed the nomination of Donald Rumsfeld to be the new Secretary of Defense. Rumsfeld, a former congressman, had been a top White House aide.

The Senate also confirmed the nomination of Morton Corn as an assistant secretary of labor to head the Occupational Safety & Health Administration. Corn, a University of Pittsburgh professor, succeeds John A. Stender.

Transport Workers Elect Albert Terriego

New York—Albert Terriego has been elected a vice president of the Transport Workers and director of the TWU railroad division.

Prior to his election by the union's executive council, Terriego had been acting director of the railroad division. Earlier, he was an international representative and president of TWU Local 2001 in New York.

Food Stamps vs. Hunger

THE FOOD STAMP PROGRAM, which currently serves 18.5 million needy men, women and children has come under severe attack from the Ford Administration and other conservatives in recent weeks.

During the current recession, the food stamp program has done exactly what it should have done. As unemployment rose from 5.4 percent in August 1974 to 9.2 percent in May 1975, food stamp participation increased by over 4 million recipients, from 15 million to 19.4 million. Since May unemployment has eased somewhat and the number of recipients has declined to 18.5 million.

Lower-middle and middle-income recipients have the right to use food stamps when they are in need. Their taxes supported the program over the years, and now they are drawing on it to sustain their families during the worst recession since World War II, a national economic crisis that is a personal economic catastrophe for each of them.

The increased participation in the program and the consequent changes in the composition of food stamp recipients have brought forth a heavy barrage of attacks from the Administration and other conservatives intending to severely cut the program. Some of these attacks have involved charges which are completely inaccurate.

The Dept. of Agriculture says not a single family of four earning $16,000 a year receives food stamps. The department's statistics show that the food stamp program is overwhelmingly a program for low-income families. A recent USDA report for July 1975 finds 84 percent of all participants below $6,000 gross income and 94 percent below $9,000 a year. USDA reported to the Senate in May that the percentage of households fraudulently receiving food stamps is 0.08 percent.

SO IF THERE ARE NO families of four with incomes of $16,000 to clear out of the program, a fraud rate of only 0.08 percent to contend with, and no middle class students eligible, just whom is the Administration really trying to hurt by its vicious attacks on the millions of needy Americans for which food stamps have been the only alternative to hunger, and by its proposal to slash the program?

The AFL-CIO considers the drive against the food stamp program, which follows on the heels of Administration policies that have saddled the country with both high unemployment and rapid inflation, a direct attack on workers and indeed the labor movement.

Workers do not want food stamps and they do not want welfare. They want jobs which will pay decent wages so that they can raise their families in dignity with an American standard of living. But if those jobs are not available, if programs to create work are scuttled, if the Administration's own predictions of massive unemployment for the next half-decade and beyond are allowed to come true, then workers and their families will not willingly go hungry. They will not be denied the benefits of the programs which they have so long supported with their tax dollars.

This program, which has served millions of families in need, must not be scuttled or slashed. Food stamps must be available to all Americans who need them to stave off hunger for themselves and their families.

A Word Edgewise:

Sakharov's Message May Fail To Pierce Intellectual Deafness

By John P. Roche

THE LATEST BOOK by Andrei D. Sakharov, the great Soviet physicist and gallant spokesman for civil liberty, in some ways is a heartbreaker. "My Country and the World" is the testament of a highly rational man with high expectations that rational men elsewhere, once they know the facts, will speak out against Russian tyranny.

Where Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn uses a scourge and swings it with prophetic fury against the western intelligentsia, Sakharov makes his case calmly and logically. It is a devastating indictment of Soviet policy, domestic and foreign, but I fear it will drop like a stone. You see, by and large, American intellectuals don't want to come to grips with Communist totalitarianism—the confrontation could be risky.

Listen to Sakharov's plea: "Basically, however, the majority of (western left-liberal intellectuals) have an outlook that is high-minded and humane, have real grounds for dissatisfaction with their society and feel good will and an aspiration towards justice and the common weal. And this permits me to hope that in the final analysis the western intellectual won't let the rest of us down. Totalitarianism, fascism of whatever brand, demagogues and intriguing politicians—these things, I trust, are not for the likes of him."

Sakharov chides the western intellectuals for not understanding the nature of Soviet policy. He even commits the mortal sin of sympathizing with the poor South Vietnamese now under totalitarian rule. "I want to believe," he says, "that the terrible lesson of Indochina will not be lost upon the whole world—and especially not on America. Instead of isolationism, a selfless, generous, and courageous concern for the fates of all human beings. In place of illusions, a sober understanding of the challenge that history has thrown out to the leaders of the western world. Not a half-hearted, inconsistent foreign policy never adequately explained to the public, but a carefully weighed choice of key ideas and a maximum of resolve in carrying them out."

These statements move me profoundly, particularly when one realizes that Sakharov is sounding his trumpet well in the hearing of the KGB. He is a true internationalist who believes that freedom and justice are universal values and that intellectuals everywhere should be in the forefront of the battle to achieve them. After all, isn't a totalitarian society a monstrosity? Isn't it as plain as the nose on your face that incarcerating dissidents in mental "hospitals" is wicked? Surely, then, now that the evidence is there for all to see, the western intelligentsia will unite in condemning this brutal system.

Sakharov's only problem is that he is addressing the wrong audience. The western intelligentsia—with a few honorable exceptions—has long since abandoned such naive notions. They have unilaterally ended the Cold War and simply tuned out Communist barbarism. The basis of this blackout is a logical process that runs backwards: Premise 1 establishes the proposition that if the Communists (Soviet, Chinese, or Vietnamese) are totalitarian aggressors, war is likely. From there you move to step 2: war is unthinkable. With these two premises locked in place, the conclusion is simple: Communists are not really totalitarian aggressors. And nuts like Sakharov and Solzhenitsyn are dangerous warmongers.

THIS MAY APPEAR to be a harsh caricature, but let me remind you that a leading American intellectual who happens to be Secretary of State utilized precisely this weird logic when asked about his reaction to Solzhenitsyn. In effect, Prof. Kissinger said, "What does he want? Nuclear war?"

In addition to being lousy logic, this is a gross misstatement of the positions held by both Solzhenitsyn (from one perspective) and Sakharov (from another). Above all, they want to avoid war, but they are convinced that Kissinger's one-way detente increases, rather than decreases, the likelihood of Communist adventurism.

In any case, Sakharov is a magnificent citizen of the world who richly deserved the Nobel Peace Prize. My only suggestion is that he address his next work not to the intellectuals but to the American trade union movement, which still recognizes the distinction between right and wrong.

Usery Tells Seminar:

Expanding Scope of Bargaining Escalates Role of Mediators

The following is excerpted from an address by W. J. Usery, Jr., director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, to the agency's annual mediation seminar, Nov. 3, 1975, in New Orleans.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING is no longer a tightly structured process limited in use to a specific segment of our society. The march toward expansion of collective bargaining has continued unabated, picking up momentum with each passing year.

At first it was a privilege exercised—and closely guarded—by highly skilled craftsmen. Railroaders, miners and, after a monumental struggle, industrial workers joined in, along with a few in the arts—musicians, actors, newspaper people.

This is where the limits of collective bargaining stood when our agency was created.

The range of collective bargaining issues was just beginning to expand from simple wage-and-hour agreements into the complexities of arbitration, welfare and pension plans, incentives and seniority provisions.

During the next 20 years, changes came—but they came at a rather leisurely pace.

Within the past decade and particularly in the past five years—change has become the norm.

Millions of workers have been demanding and getting admission to the collective bargaining club. Employes of the federal, state and local governments, workers from health-care facilities and the agricultural industry have poured into the ranks of union-represented employes.

Doctors, nurses and orderlies . . . farm hands, street sweepers and garbage collectors . . . teachers, fire fighters and policemen—all are insisting that they be allowed to share in decisions affecting their lives through collective bargaining.

We are seeing them back their demand with a growing militance. The soft tactics embodied in the blue-flu, the sick-out, working-to-rules—these are being replaced by that age-old, singularly effective action of the worker, the strike.

Beyond this, a steady, unrelenting outpouring of legislation affecting employers and employes has added to the complexities of collective bargaining—and mediation.

Safety and health, equal rights in hiring and promoting, pension protection, wage and price controls, fuel allocations—all have had a heavy impact on labor-management relations. And all have brought to us new challenges in the development of programs that will provide effective mediation.

I can promise you that the string of new complications has not run out.

For example, with increasing frequency we are finding a third party at the negotiating table. And usually the two parties in dispute have little control over this uninvited visitor.

Who is this third party?

In public-sector disputes, it is the taxpayer. In health-care bargaining, it is the insurance carrier. In trucking and airline negotiations, it is a ghostly group that determines what the price of petroleum will be sometime in the future. In the construction industry, it is the makers of interest rates. In time of economic controls, it is the government.

There is even a campaign afoot now in our land to give the consumer a place at the bargaining table.

This rapid gush of change—much of which you will be hearing about from experts throughout the week—has touched many of us in the past two years. In some instances it has taken us out of what we once considered the traditional and true path of mediation.

Even as we were meeting in Washington in our last seminar, an energy crisis was welling up in our land, capped by the Arab oil embargo.

Wearing my newly acquired hat as special assistant to the President, I became deeply involved in a dispute that involved tens of thousands of individual managements—and no specific union.

I'm referring, of course, to the strike by the nation's independent truck drivers.

No sooner did we have the trucks rolling again than service station operators—caught between a shortage of their primary product and price controls that forced them to sell it at a loss—threatened to end their frustrations by closing shop.

As in the case of the truck drivers, we found ourselves mediating what were actually grievances by a group of citizens against necessary government actions that had collided with their way of life—their ability to earn a living.

Again breaking with tradition—and again functioning as special assistant to the President—we coordinated efforts with the National Mediation Board in a number of railway and airline disputes.

THIS TREND away from the traditional has not been limited to my office.

Many of you have found yourselves mediating unusual disputes under unique circumstances—particularly in the public-sector and health-care fields.

Our plea of two years ago to parties confronted with a collective bargaining conflict—the plea to "call your mediator"—is being made with increasing frequency by the media, the courts and other public officials. It is our obligation to answer that call.

At the same time, we must multiply our efforts to teach and preach the methods of avoiding conflict.

For Full Political Rights:

Federal Workers Gain in Drive To Lift Hatch Act Restrictions

LONG-SOUGHT ACTION to give federal workers the same political rights their fellow citizens have may be closer than ever to reality this year, President Clyde Webber of the Government Employees said on Labor News Conference.

Revision of the Hatch Act, which currently restricts more than two million Americans from the "real-life power struggles in their own communities," has been a high-priority aim of the 300,000-member union for more than 14 years, Webber stressed. He rejected the contention of some Republican partisans that giving federal workers the right to become involved in the political arena, if they want to, would only benefit the Democrats.

The opportunity to take full and active roles in the political processes of their communities, their school districts, their states and the nation isn't "going to change the voting patterns of federal employes very much," he said.

Webber said that Hatch Act revision won't weaken the merit system through "mass job-disruption when new political administrations take power," or by keying "advancement in careers . . . to political activities." He said that "many people simply fail to understand that not all the federal employes work in offices . . . or operate at a level where they make policy."

Of the more than two million federal, non-postal employes, most are below the GS-8 level, "have very modest incomes and live in neighborhoods of wage earners and workers," Webber said. He pointed out that non-federal employes who do the very same jobs under the government's growing practice of "contracting-out" have no such restrictions on political activities.

"It is wrong to wholly exclude other American citizens who happen to work for the federal government from the same activities," he said.

Reporters questioning Webber on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Joseph Young of the Washington Star and Don Mace of the Federal Times. The program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

THE UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY vote which declared Zionism "a form of racism" produced shockwaves which finally may wake up those who profess to believe in humanitarian values.

On the one hand, the UN vote posed the danger of encouraging anti-Semitism, this time with a UN label. On the other hand, the shock may inspire western democracies to redefine more realistically what the United Nations is for, what it can do and cannot do.

The degeneration of the UN General Assembly to its latest excess already had occurred in the International Labor Organization, the only UN agency with worker and employer representation.

As AFL-CIO President George Meany said recently, "the last straw" was when the ILO conference last June admitted the Palestine Liberation Organization to observer status. The American worker delegation walked out; the U.S. government delegate forcefully pointed out that the PLO is not a government and represents neither workers nor employers.

Yet the perversion of the purposes of the UN and the ILO, as well as other agencies, has developed over several decades. The wholesale admission of tiny nation-states and the entry of newly independent nations produced a big shift in voting power. The coalescence of "Third World" interests, the rise of Arab power based on oil, and skillful tactics of the Soviet bloc combined to turn UN general forums into propaganda sounding boards.

Other trends are just as serious as politicization of the conference, in the eyes of the United States—and especially in the eyes of organized labor which helped found and build the ILO. These trends are an erosion of the tripartite principle, a selective concern for human rights and disregard of due process in handling allegations of the violation of trade union rights.

The battle-lines were drawn Nov. 6, when the United States formally notified the ILO of its intention to withdraw unless the ILO returns to its basic aims. Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop will head a Cabinet-level committee in devising strategy, consulting with Congress as well as with the AFL-CIO and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The big test will come at the ILO annual conference in June 1976. Two key issues will be who is elected to preside over the one-month conference and who is elected to chair the all-important Governing Body which directs ILO activities during the year.

A STRONG PRESIDING OFFICER with a sense of the ILO's basic purpose would put an end to political propaganda and rule such speakers out of order. A basic change would shorten the conference and stress committee work. A move to break tradition and elect a Communist government delegate to chair the Governing Body would ignite a major fight.

The United States will vigorously fight renewed proposals to undermine the right of worker and employer groups to determine the credentials of their own delegates. These proposals would require "equitable geographic distribution" and open a back door for government-controlled delegates to pose as "worker" or "employer" representatives.

The United States also will demand an end to the "double standard" in citing some nations as in violation of conventions on freedom of association and forced labor while granting immunity to the Soviet Union and Soviet bloc nations.

There may be influential allies to back at least some American objectives.

Bertil Bolin, the Swedish trade unionist who serves as ILO deputy director, in October told delegates to an International Confederation of Free Trade Unions meeting in Mexico that critics of the ILO are "partly right."

"The ILO has been used for the wrong purposes and is less effective as a result," Bolin said. He stressed that the ILO is not the place "to try to resolve conflicts between nations."

FULL POLITICAL RIGHTS for federal workers are closer than ever to reality this year, President Clyde M. Webber, center, of the Government Employees, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning the AFL-CIO vice president were Joseph Young, left, of the Washington Star and Don Mace of the Federal Times. The public affairs interview is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Mediators Told Workers Miss Out On Fruits of Increased Productivity

New Orleans—A warning that workers cannot count on sharing in the fruits of increased productivity was issued here by President Paul Hall of the Seafarers at the 17th annual seminar of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Hall, addressing some 300 mediators taking part in the conference, noted that the American maritime industry today is operating ships as much as ten times larger and twice as fast as the standard cargo vessel of a few years ago—and with half the crew.

"Now that's increased productivity," he said. "And what has the seafarer gotten out of it? Nothing. Not even the right to a steady job."

Turning to the effects of foreign trade on the American worker and collective bargaining, Hall said that "what we used to conceive of as free trade no longer exists."

Profit-motivated corporations, whether in shipping or elsewhere, cannot compete with politically oriented state-owned operations that can absorb their losses at will, he declared. The result is being reflected at the negotiating table and at the workplace, he noted.

"American workers now have a terrible fear of losing all they've got to a condition over which they have no control," Hall said. "And unless we turn this thing around, we're all going down the drain."

President Clyde Webber of the Government Employees told the mediators that the reluctance of the federal government to accept bona fide collective bargaining has had its price.

"In terms of morale, efficiency and productivity, there has been a vast loss," he said, "as well as in hiring and training an army of personnel experts, consultants and lawyers who clutter the system with debilitating strategies."

In his keynote address to the conference, FMCS Director, W. J. Usery, Jr., noted that collective bargaining is steadily becoming more complicated.

"For example, with increasing frequency we are finding a third party at the negotiating table," he said. "And usually, the two parties in dispute have little control over this uninvited visitor.

"Who is this third party? In public-sector disputes, it is the taxpayer; in health-care bargaining, it is the insurance carrier; in trucking and airline negotiations, it is a ghostly group that determines what the price of petroleum will be sometime in the future; in the construction industry, it is the makers of interest rates, and in time of economic controls, it is the government," he said.

Usery said that collective bargaining "is no longer a tightly structured process limited in use to a specific segment of our society. Millions of workers have been demanding and getting admission to the collective bargaining club. Employes of the federal, state and local governments, workers from health-care facilities and the agricultural industry have poured into the ranks of union-represented employes."

"Doctors, nurses and orderlies; farm hands, street sweepers and garbage collectors; teachers, fire fighters and policemen—all are insisting that they be allowed to share in decisions affecting their lives through collective bargaining," he said.

Addressing himself to problems among employes at the state and local level, William Lucy, secretary-treasurer of the State, County & Municipal Employees, said that he believes the public-sector workers' primary demand "is for an equitable process, not for the right to strike."

He called for a redesigning of revenue-raising structures, and for reducing the bargaining power "of those who must run for office and pass on tax matters."

Leon J. Davis, president of District 1199, National Union of Hospital & Health-Care Employees—a division of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union — used the seminar to issue a call to "narrowly limit" the functions of the National Labor Relations Board.

Davis said that long delays permitted under NLRB procedures make efforts to gain union representation "an exercise in futility."

Another seminar speaker, Vice President Douglas Fraser of the Auto Workers, said that job security and a strengthening and restructuring of supplemental unemployment benefit programs would be among the key issues in 1976 negotiations with the major auto producers.

President Ford, in a telephoned message to the mediators, said that "the collective bargaining process is still by any standards the best means for labor and management to fairly share the fruits of their investment in time, talent and money."

Among the other guests were Labor Sec. John Dunlop, Commerce Sec. Rogers C. B. Morton, NLRB Chairman Betty S. Murphy, Michael H. Moskow, chairman of the Council on Wage & Price Stability, and San Francisco Mayor Joseph Alioto.

To Cut Off Filibusters:

3 Senate Rollcalls On Situs Picketing

Before the Senate could vote on the merits of the labor-supported construction site picketing bill, it had to break a filibuster by voting to limit debate. Under the Senate's rules, at least 60 senators must vote for cloture in order to set a time limit on debate.

On all three rollcalls, senators who voted for cloture are marked R for right and votes against cloture are marked W for wrong. Absent senators are indicated by A.

VOTE NO. 1, on Nov. 11, squelched the first stage of the filibuster — an attempt to keep the Senate from voting on the routine motion to begin consideration of the site picketing bill. A 66-30 vote overcame this procedural roadblock.

VOTE NO. 2, on Nov. 14, was the first attempt to limit debate on the bill and allow the Senate to vote on it. The 58-31 vote was two short of the 60 votes needed for cloture.

VOTE NO. 3, on Nov. 18, broke the filibuster with a 62-37 majority for cloture.

Change in Senate Rules Helps Break Filibusters

A compromise rules change adopted by the Senate last March made it possible to break a filibuster and reach a vote on the construction site picketing bill.

Under the previous rules, it required a two-thirds majority of senators present and voting to limit debate.

The new rules allow three-fifths of the total membership, 60 senators, to invoke cloture.

On the Nov. 14 vote to limit debate on the site picketing bill, 99 senators were present. Under the old rules, 66 votes would have been needed and the actual 62-37 vote would have fallen short. The filibuster could have continued until the Senate agreed to set aside the bill and move on to other matters.

Shift to Labor Dept. Sought:

Interior Dept. Hit for Laxity In Mine Safety Enforcement

Union witnesses asked Congress to strengthen job safety and health protection for miners and to shift enforcement of mine safety laws from the Interior Dept. to the Labor Dept. The Interior Dept. was criticized for being indifferent to worker safety.

Among the union groups testifying before a House Labor subcommittee were the Steelworkers, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers, the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the unaffiliated United Mine Workers. Most UMW members are covered by the Federal Coal Mine Health & Safety Act. Other types of mining operations are under a separate law, the Federal Metal & Nonmetallic Mine Safety Act.

The recent AFL-CIO convention called for passage of "a single mine safety law" covering all types of mining, with transfer of responsibility from Interior "to a separate safety division in the Dept. of Labor" where miners would be assured of "at least the same rights as workers in general industry."

Steelworkers Vice President John S. Johns told the subcommittee that the 100,000 iron ore, nonferrous and quarry mine workers represented by his union have fewer legal protections than either coal miners or workers in less hazardous industries.

He asked that the same procedures—although not necessarily the same standards—be applied to coal and non-coal mining. And while the Interior Dept. has a "conflict of interest" between its role as a promoter of the mining industry and its worker safety assignment, the Labor Dept. was established to "foster the interests of working people."

A grim example of the Interior Dept.'s laxity was cited by two other witnesses—Sheldon Samuels, the Industrial Union Dept.'s health, safety and environment director, and President Thomas Miechur of the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers.

The victims were workers at an asbestos quarry and mill operated until recently in Copperopolis, Calif., by the Pacific Asbestos Corp.

Although mandatory air quality standards had supposedly been in effect since 1969, it wasn't until 1972 that the Bureau of Mines sampled the concentration of deadly asbestos dust and found it "too high to even count," Miechur testified. But it took no action other than to issue "recommendations" to the company because the previous year it had delegated its enforcement authority to the State of California.

As Miechur noted, "the state refused to provide the union with any inspection reports, any orders issued to the company" and any deadline dates for compliance, asserting that this was "privileged communication between the state and the company."

Samuels testified that the IUD, at the request of the union, sent a professional health team which found high levels of asbestos in the homes of workers—presumably from workclothes exposed to asbestos dust—and in a nearby stream. Many of the workers never had been given a company medical examination, and only their union's initiative led to the uncovering of the early stages of asbestosis among a number of employes.

Earlier in the hearings, the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers urged consolidation of all worker safety and health programs. Steve Wodka, legislative representative of the union, said the law covering non-coal miners provides less protection for workers than the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

The Mine Workers legislative director, Robert Nelson, told the panel that the Interior Dept. has not effectively enforced either of the mine safety laws and urged that jurisdiction be moved to the Labor Dept.

The subcommittee's chairman, Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.), has sponsored a bill to strengthen the Metal & Nonmetallic Mine Safety Act and put its enforcement under the Labor Dept. A companion bill in the Senate, introduced by Labor Committee Chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), would also shift responsibility for the coal mine law's enforcement.

ECONOMIC ISSUES affecting workers in Tunisia were reviewed in a discussion between AFL-CIO President George Meany and Habib Achour, general secretary of the National Tunisian Labor Union, during Achour's visit to Washington. Meany and Achour have been acquainted since the early 1950s when American labor supported the Tunisian struggle for independence.

Labor Backs Concept Of Energy Authority

The AFL-CIO has endorsed the concept of the Ford Administration's proposed new Energy Independence Authority, a $100 billion federal program to gain energy independence for the United States in 10 years or less.

At the same time, Federation President George Meany stressed that "we expect to have a number of proposals for improvements in the specific terms of this measure."

Initiated by Vice President Nelson Rockefeller, the energy proposal was unveiled by President Ford at the biennial convention of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. in San Francisco.

Working with private enterprise and labor, the Energy Independence Authority would seek new technologies to support or directly produce or transport American energy, technologies to support U.S. nuclear development, and electrical power from American coal, nuclear and geothermal sources.

"Government must provide the initiative and incentive for development of energy projects that will place this nation on the road to energy independence," Meany observed in a statement.

AFL-CIO endorsement of the proposed energy authority was based on an analysis and recommendations of the federation's Energy Policy Committee. Members of the panel include Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, Vice Presidents Paul Hall, Martin Ward, William Sidell, A. F. Grospiron, Murray Finley and Joseph Keenan.

Meany noted that an estimated $600-$800 billion will be required in the next 10 years to finance investments for energy independence. While most projects would be capitalized from private sources, those deemed vital to the national interest but unable to secure private capital would be financed through the new government corporation.

The corporation would have authority to make direct loans, provide loan guarantees and other financial assistance to energy independence projects.

"Private industry, left to itself, cannot and will not resolve the energy crisis which still plagues this nation," Meany observed. "The American people should not be deluded by the current easy availability of energy supplies.

"While the gas lines have disappeared, the dependence of the United States on oil from insecure foreign sources still exists. This nation is more vulnerable to an Arab oil embargo today than in 1973."

Musicians Negotiate Recording Agreement

New York — A tentative agreement has been reached between the Musicians and the recording industry to cover the services of AFM members in the production of phonograph recordings.

The agreement is subject to approval of affected AFM members. Eligible to vote on the contract are approximately 4,000 musicians who have earned a minimum of $1,000 from recordings during calendar year 1974.

Wage Boosts End St. Louis Utility Strike

St. Louis — More than 1,500 members of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in a three-state area won basic wage increases totalling 15 percent in a new two-year agreement with Union Electric Co. to settle a 16-week strike.

The new contract, which expires July 1, 1977, boosts wages 7 percent in the first year and 8 percent the second year.

Improved retirement and medical benefits were also negotiated in the agreement covering members of IBEW Locals 1439, 309 and 649 in eastern Missouri, southern Illinois and southern Iowa.

Employes of the electric utility will continue to report to central work depots until Jan. 1, 1977, when they will report to worksites, unless future negotiations alter the agreement, the IBEW said.

Union Electric also has resumed negotiations with IBEW Local 1455 and Operating Engineers Local 148, whose members refused to cross picket lines during the strike.

Massachusetts AFL-CIO Hits Tax Law as Unfair

Boston—The Massachusetts AFL-CIO has assailed new budget-tax legislation that will sharply increase taxes for wage earners and disqualify many workers from unemployment compensation.

Delegates to the 18th annual state federation convention drafted a message protesting the enactment of the bill that was rammed through the legislature and signed by the governor despite earlier assurances the measure would be rejected.

Labor opposed the budget-tax package largely on the grounds that it will jack up the state sales tax from 3 to 5 percent and cut off jobless benefits for workers who voluntarily quit jobs.

The message of protest — sent to all members of the state legislature and to Gov. Michael S. Dukakis — also cited other "gross injustices," which would place an unfair tax burden on individuals while providing tax breaks for business interests.

In other action, the nearly 1,000 delegates voted to raise the state federation's monthly per capita payment from 11 to 13 cents.

The convention also went on record in support of federal legislation that would prohibit mandatory busing of school children to achieve racial integration, a position directly in conflict with national policy of the AFL-CIO.

President Joseph A. Sullivan and Sec.-Treas. James P. Loughlin were re-elected to new two-year terms.

Two new executive vice presidents elected at the four-day convention are William J. Cleary of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers to succeed retiring Daniel F. Murray of the Steelworkers, and Bertram C. Farnham of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, who defeated Joseph D. MacLaughlin of the Amalgamated Transit Union.

Delegates also elected Cecilia Leshyk of the Ladies' Garment Workers as vice president at-large to succeed Helen C. O'Donnell, who retired, and seven new vice presidents to the 37-member executive board.

Major speakers addressing the convention included both of the state's U.S. senators, Edward M. Kennedy (D) and Edward W. Brooke (R), Gov. Dukakis (D) and Sec.-Treas. Earl McDavid of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

State Council Sets Review of Busing Stand

The Massachusetts AFL-CIO has scheduled a special meeting of the state labor council's executive board for Nov. 24 to review an anti-busing resolution adopted in convention earlier this month.

AFL-CIO President George Meany informed officials of the state labor body that the resolution calling for active support of legislation or constitutional amendments to forbid mandatory busing of school children was in violation of national AFL-CIO policy.

State AFL-CIO President Joseph A. Sullivan and Sec.-Treas. James P. Loughlin scheduled the special board session after meeting with Meany. It will be held in Boston.

In a message to Sullivan earlier, Meany pointed out that the AFL-CIO convention in October reiterated the federation's position on the busing issue, specifically, "We will oppose the constitutional amendment approach because it will do a disservice to the quality integrated education which we support."

Despite abundant warning, Meany said in his message to Sullivan, the state labor council's convention adopted "a policy that is in direct conflict to national AFL-CIO policy."

The state federation officers were advised that instructions would be issued at the meeting in the AFL-CIO headquarters on immediate steps needed to bring the labor council into conformity with AFL-CIO policy. Otherwise the council would face disciplinary action under the federation's rules governing central bodies.

House Democrats Kill Amendment on Busing

The House Democratic caucus soundly defeated an attempt to force the Judiciary Committee to bring to the floor a proposed constitutional amendment that would bar busing children beyond the nearest school.

By a vote of 172-96, the caucus supported a move by House Speaker Carl Albert to table the motion, and thus kill it.

The motion had been endorsed by the AFL-CIO in a letter from Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller to House Democrats.

Biemiller cited the AFL-CIO convention action opposing such a constitutional amendment. And although busing to achieve integrated education is "a controversial and emotional issue," Biemiller urged that the motion to instruct the Judiciary Committee be rejected as "unwise and divisive."

Building Trades Hail Vote:

Site Picketing Right Approved by Senate

sultation with unions and management.

Employer organizations, in and out of the construction industry, have been pressing Ford to back away from his commitment to sign the picketing bill.

Dunlop, in a letter read to the Senate during the debate, reiterated his strong support of the site picketing bill and rejected assertions that it would be inflationary or would legalize picketing for any unlawful purposes.

As for the argument that it would keep non-union subcontractors from working on jobs employing union members, Dunlop suggested that this would be a most desirable result.

Mixing union and non-union operations on a single job "is not conducive to sound labor relations, to cooperation on a job, nor to increased productivity," Dunlop noted.

Writing from experience of many years dealing with construction industry labor relations issues, the Secretary of Labor told the Senate that "mixing labor policies tends more to stimulate disputes between workers operating under different wages and benefits doing the same or similar work."

One of the tasks for the House-Senate conferees will be to decide the fate of several amendments added to the bill over labor's opposition.

The Senate inserted an amendment by Sen. J. Glenn Beall (R-Md.) to exempt residential home construction—defined as structures with three or fewer floors and no elevators—from the site picketing bill. The House had narrowly rejected a similar amendment.

There were some other amendments in both the House and Senate versions that labor did not support. But both bodies rejected a series of clearly anti-labor amendments that were designed to make the final version of the legislation unacceptable to unions.

Opponents had put their chief hope for blocking the bill on a filibuster — the weapon successfully used a decade ago to prevent the Senate from acting on the House-passed bill to repeal the "right-to-work" Section 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Under the Senate's new rules, adopted earlier this year, 60 votes were needed to close debate and break a filibuster.

This was easily achieved when opponents first tried to keep the Senate from even debating the site picketing bill. But it took two tries to limit debate on the bill itself. The first effort fell two votes short. But another try, with all supporters present including several who cancelled important engagements to make the vote, succeeded by a 62-37 margin.

Georgine expressed the building trades thanks to other AFL-CIO unions and departments and to the congressmen and senators who resisted "some of the most extreme pressure ever applied on Capitol Hill" to support the legislation.

He urged local building trades unions, before the measure becomes law, to thoroughly familiarize themselves with its provisions "before any of us goes off prematurely and starts establishing construction site picket lines."

In both the House and Senate versions, a local union that has a dispute with a contractor or subcontractor would be able to picket the entire construction site provided it gives 10-day notice of its intent to do so and has received the approval of its international union.

The bargaining bill, which was joined to the Senate version of the site picketing bill as a means of avoiding another filibuster battle, would give national and international unions a greater involvement in the construction industry bargaining process.

It would establish a Construction Industry Collective Bargaining Committee of 10 union representatives, 10 management representatives and up to three neutrals, including the chairman. Both the Secretary of Labor and the director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service will be ex officio members.

A 60-day notice of contract expirations would be furnished to national unions and contractor associations and relayed to the Construction Industry Bargaining Committee.

The committee could take jurisdiction, in which case there could be no strike or lockout for 30 days past the expiration date. Alternatively, it could refer a dispute to a national craft board or comparable union-management body. Or it could ask the national labor and contractor organizations whose members are involved to participate in the negotiations. In that event, any new or revised collective bargaining agreement would have to be approved by the national union to take effect.

Prices Turn Upward, Buying Power Drops

translate into an annual inflation rate of 8.4 percent. Retail prices last month were 7.6 percent higher than year-ago levels.

In September, the CPI rose by five-tenths of 1 percent, by two-tenths of 1 percent in August.

On a seasonally adjusted basis, prices of grocery store foods jumped 1.5 percent in October, following a decline of two-tenths of 1 percent in September and no change in August. Such prices usually show a large decline in October, BLS said.

Beef and pork prices rose nine-tenths of 1 percent and 3.8 percent, respectively. Dairy products went up 2 percent over the month. In the processed fruits and vegetables category, dried bean prices rose sharply in response to tighter supplies resulting from rain damage to the Midwest crop, BLS noted.

Prices declined for some food items such as fresh fruit, poultry and eggs. Among cereal and bakery products, flour prices rose for the first time since April.

The index for restaurant meals and snacks away from home rose seven-tenths of 1 percent, continuing the accelerating trend evident since midyear, BLS said.

Prices of nonfood commodities rose by three-tenths of 1 percent in October, the same as in September. BLS said about 60 percent of the increase resulted in price hikes for apparel and new car prices. But there were price rises for a considerable number of items, including fuel oil, furniture, appliances, tires, housekeeping supplies, toilet goods, alcoholic beverages, and college textbooks.

Charges for services increased by six-tenths of 1 percent, compared to 1 percent in September. Rents went up by seven-tenths of 1 percent, the largest monthly increase this year. Charges for medical care services rose 1.2 percent, a larger increase than in recent months.

Among household services, mortgage interest rates increased by nine-tenths of 1 percent reflecting primarily higher rates for loans guaranteed by the Veterans Administration. After declining in the first five months of the year, the index for mortgage interest rates has risen more than 2 percent from May to October, BLS noted.

In a separate survey, the government found that the average worker with three dependents took home seasonally adjusted real spendable earnings of $91.66 a week last month, a slight drop of 4 cents from the previous month, and not much more than the $91.32 workers brought home in 1965.

The big American corporations, however, did much better in the July-September quarter, according to a survey by the First National City Bank of New York, which reported a "steep upturn" in corporate earnings over the period.

"With productivity gains offsetting higher wage costs, unit labor costs remained stable or slightly lower, and profit margins moved sharply higher," the Citibank survey noted.

Productivity increases were unusually sharp in the third quarter—close to an 11 percent annual rate—the report observed.

Veto Warning Stalls Action On N.Y. Aid

tee Chairman Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.) on the measure.

City, state and union leaders were disappointed at Ford's failure to support the bill. Albert Shanker, president of the Teachers, saw "no useful purpose" in Ford's "waiting game."

The AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., in an executive board statement before Ford's latest announcement, termed the President's "uncertainty in decision-making" evidence of the "lack of leadership from the national Administration" on the issue.

The department noted that Ford has sought "foreign aid to questionable friends of the United States, a continuation of low-cost interest rates to Russia in the name of detente and supported federal subsidies to financially-troubled corporations." Yet he refused to recognize any responsibility for helping New York out of a crisis brought about largely by "the federal government's tight-money, high-interest-rates economic policies."

In New York, municipal unions have reached agreement with Gov. Hugh Carey on representation for labor on two state agencies that have been set up to deal with New York City's financial crisis — the Emergency Financial Control Board and the Municipal Assistance Corp.

The control board would become a forum for any renegotiation of public employe contracts or pension plans and the Municipal Assistance Corp. is dependent on union approval for large-scale investment of pension funds to help keep the city solvent.

MAC Chairman Felix G. Rohatyn commented:

"It just seems to us that the unions, in terms of their fiduciary responsibility, should have representation on the various bodies where policy decisions are made."

High Jobless Rates Grip 134 of 150 Major Areas

Widespread unemployment continued to grip the nation in October, with 134 of the 150 major job markets surveyed each month by the Labor Dept. reporting substantial joblessness.

The government defines substantial unemployment as a jobless rate of 6 percent or more that is expected to continue for at least two additional months.

A year ago, there were 52 major labor areas experiencing substantial joblessness. In September, the number was 135, the highest since the government started its present classification system in May 1955.

The list of major job centers with substantial unemployment now excludes only the following areas: Denver, Boulder, Colo.; Davenport, Ia., and Rock Island-Moline, Ill.; Peoria, Ill; Cedar Rapids, Ia.; Des Moines, Ia.; Wichita, Kan.; Jackson, Miss.; Raleigh-Durham, N.C.; Tulsa, Okla.; Austin, Tex.; Dallas; Fort Worth, Tex.; Houston; Richmond, Va.; Madison, Wis., and Harrisburg, Pa.

Harrisburg was removed from the substantial unemployment list last month after a slight improvement in the job situation there. It had been classified in the substantial category since last April.

The improved situation in Harrisburg was due largely to withdrawals from the labor force of summer job seekers, along with slight payroll increases in local government coinciding with the reopening of school, the Labor Dept. said. There were also employment gains reported in retail trade, transportation and public utilities, and printing and publishing.

Areas that are classified on the substantial unemployment list may be eligible for first preference in bidding on certain federal procurement contracts, provided the firms in the area agree to hire 25 percent of the new hires each month from among the disadvantaged residents of the area.

Classifications are based on preliminary data on employment and unemployment provided by state employment security agencies.

State-County Wins Illinois Clerical Unit

The State, County & Municipal Employees won representation rights for 12,000 Illinois state clerical and paraprofessional workers in a statewide election.

AFSCME received 4,368 votes to 2,909 for the Illinois State Employees Association and 864 for no union in balloting conducted from Oct. 27 through Nov. 5.

In two earlier elections, AFSCME won bargaining rights for 12,000 workers employed in mental health institutions and 2,500 security workers in the state department of corrections.

Overall, AFSCME now represents about 30,000 state employes throughout Illinois.

Richard Wilson, coordinator of AFSCME operations in Illinois, said the union will shortly petition for elections for another 12,000-member unit of professionals and paraprofessionals in the state human services agencies.

Manpower Agency Gets New Name

It's no longer the Manpower Administration. The 13-year-old Labor Dept. agency has been renamed the Employment & Training Administration to "more accurately portray" its activities, Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop announced.

The new name "removes any reference to gender and thus better characterizes the organization which is the nation's focal point for employment and training programs for all citizens," Dunlop noted.

Ban Sought On Airlines Strike Pact

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to nullify the airline industry's Mutual Aid Pact as "incompatible" with collective bargaining goals and hostile to the public interest.

Under the controversial agreement, a struck airline is subsidized by other airlines for the duration of the strike.

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Kenneth Peterson and other union witnesses told a House Public Works & Transportation subcommittee that the pact hardens management's position at the bargaining table and removes pressure on a company to avoid or settle a strike.

Peterson, who testified on behalf of AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller, cited evidence that some airlines can actually gain financially by prolonging a strike.

Unions representing airline workers joined in urging approval of a one-sentence amendment to the Federal Aviation Act which would declare that the Airlines Mutual Aid Agreement "is adverse to the public interest and hereby terminated."

Subcommittee Chairman Glenn M. Anderson (D-Calif.) is a sponsor of the bill in the House, and a companion bill by Sen. Mike Gravel (D-Alaska) has been the subject of Senate hearings. Officials of the Machinists, Air Line Pilots, Railway & Airline Clerks and the Transport Workers have testified at the House and Senate hearings for the legislation.

The AFL-CIO noted that the airline pact began in 1958 as "a modest program" which applied only when the striking union had rejected the recommendations of a Presidential Emergency Board. All it provided then was that a competing firm that had windfall profits resulting from diversion of traffic from the struck airline would turn over its excess profits.

But subsequent amendments changed this formula to an assessment on all participating airlines, applicable to almost all strikes. The latest form of the pact was approved by a narrow 3-2 vote of the Civil Aeronautics Board, which overturned an administrative law judge's recommendation of disapproval.

Peterson, accompanied by AFL-CIO Special Counsel Laurence Gold, noted that companies which have been uncompromising at the bargaining table have drawn vast sums under the agreement. Since 1971, he said, United Air Lines, Pan American, Eastern and American have paid out $122 million, while receiving only $1.2 million in return. During that same period,

Labor Backs Amendments To Tax Bill

The AFL-CIO urged House members "to begin the much-needed job of tax reform and tax justice" by approving five of the seven amendments expected to be proposed to a bill the Ways & Means Committee will bring to the House floor during the first week in December.

In a letter to House members, Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller spelled out the AFL-CIO's position.

First, he urged that the House approve the rule that would allow the seven specified amendments—and no others—to be considered. Forcing an "open rule" on the tax bill, whatever the motive, would "doom House action on tax reform," Biemiller warned.

Changes Demanded:

Failures, Waste Hit In Revenue Sharing

Labor's "worst fears" about the federal revenue-sharing program have been borne out by the experience of the three years since its enactment, the AFL-CIO said.

It urged a House Government Operations subcommittee to initiate changes in the revenue-sharing law. Funds handed over to states and localities, the AFL-CIO said, should be used "in line with national needs, goals and priorities." Further, the assistance should be "more equitably channeled" to communities and people with the greatest need for federal help.

The AFL-CIO reiterated support for increased federal assistance to states and cities.

Labor's objection to the "no-strings" approach to revenue sharing is based on a well-founded concern "that the program would not result in any added federal money for the states and localities, but would be used as an excuse to underfund existing programs or block enactment of new measures," the federation said.

These fears were quickly borne out, the statement noted. When President Nixon signed the revenue-sharing law in late 1972, he hailed it as a "new American Revolution." Yet three months later, the statement pointed out, he proposed a budget that called for dismantling of "vital programs that created needed jobs and helped finance essential state and local public investment programs."

Currently, the AFL-CIO observed, with state and local governments generally in a financial squeeze, "the federal government has compounded the problems by failing to enact or adequately fund federal programs needed to create jobs, end the recession and help state and local governments meet escalating needs for essential public facilities and services."

The statement urged Congress, in revising the revenue-sharing program, to:

- Change the allocation formula to assure that the largest share of federal aid goes to the areas with

Quarterly Rise Tied to Productivity

The government confirmed earlier private surveys indicating a resurgence in third-quarter corporate profits as it reported that after-tax earnings in the July-September period rose 17 percent from the previous quarter, the steepest upturn in 25 years.

At the same time, the Commerce Dept. reported that real gross national product grew in the third quarter at a faster rate than was originally estimated. The revised government figures showed real GNP—gross national product adjusted for inflation—increased at an annual rate of 13.2 percent, instead of the 11.2 percent reported last month.

Underlying the huge profits increase was an unusually sharp rise in productivity during the third quarter. The productivity gains offset higher wage costs, stabilizing or pushing down unit labor costs and thus widening profit margins.

The after-tax earnings increase of 17 percent was the largest since a 22.1 percent rise in the third quarter of 1950. It was the second quarterly increase in a row, coming on top of a 12.8 percent rise in the April-June period.

Before-tax book profits in the third quarter were up $20.8 billion at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $134.1 billion, the Commerce Dept. noted in its preliminary estimate of third-quarter corporate earnings. The increase in book profits consisted of $17.6 billion in profits from current production and $3.3 billion in inventory gains.

"Most of the profits increase was accounted for by manufacturing

Illegal Alien Bill Pressed In Congress

The AFL-CIO has asked its state and local central bodies to help prod Congress to reduce the flow of illegal aliens into the United States by cracking down on employers who knowingly hire them.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller cited an estimate by the Immigration & Naturalization Service that more than 1 million jobs would be opened up for persons legally in the United States if penalties were imposed on employers who "knowingly" hire illegal aliens.

The House Judiciary Committee, in a report approving such a crackdown, concluded that illegal aliens

Consumers Win Right to Challenge Installment Debt Sold to 3rd Party

A long-awaited breakthrough in consumer protection—elimination of the so-called "holder-in-due-course doctrine"—is embodied in a new regulation adopted by the Federal Trade Commission.

The rule, which takes effect on May 14, 1976, will substantially limit the effect of the doctrine which organized labor and consumer groups have long considered among the most onerous and viciously anti-consumer practices.

The holder-in-due-course principle forces credit buyers who have been cheated by unscrupulous sellers to make full payment to third parties when their installment contracts are sold to financial institutions, even though the merchandise is defective and the seller refuses to fix or replace the goods.

The new FTC rule is intended to assure consumers of a continuing right to raise claims and defenses based on misconduct by sellers, including breach of contract or warranty, misrepresentation or fraud.

"In the past, many sellers have used credit contracts which can cut off consumers' rights by requiring consumers to continue payments to a financial institution despite whatever the seller does or fails to do to keep his side of the bargain," the FTC noted.

The commission said the holder-in-due-course doctrine can cut off consumers' rights in three ways. It permits sellers to insert promissory notes in installment sales contracts entitling the credit company to pay-

World Sea Unions Seek Curbs on Ship Hazards

Geneva—Maritime unions launched a concerted drive for a better deal for crews of the world's merchant ships at a 32-nation session called by the International Labor Organization.

The principal concern of the conference was the danger to the safety and health of seamen aboard the often substandard ships that penny-pinching owners operate under the "flags of convenience" of such countries as Panama and Liberia.

But the need to guarantee employment to qualified seamen, to insure that the protection and welfare of young seafarers are adequately guaranteed by international rules and the question of paid vacations were also covered by the union, shipowner and government delegates.

"We did not get as much as we had hoped for, particularly on the issue of substandard ships," said Vice President Earl Shepard of the Seafarers, who led the U.S. union delegation. The two-week technical discussions were held in preparation for a full-dress maritime conference the ILO is to hold next year.

"The shipowners put up strong opposition to many union demands and governments were afraid to act," Shepard said. "But we live in eternal hope that they will change their minds before the full conference."

The SIU official was elected by his fellow worker delegates as vice chairman of their group and as one of their four representatives on the preparatory session's key steering committee.

Also taking part in the conference from U.S. unions were Frank J. Boland and Eugene P. Spector of the National Maritime Union; Bert Lanpher of the Staff Officers Association; William R. Steinber and Harvey Strichartz of the American Radio Association; Capt. William L. Rich, Jr., of the Masters, Mates & Pilots; and Reinhold F. Schamann and Ronald Spencer of the Marine Engineers.

On the substandard ship issue, the worker delegates noted that 36 percent of all ships lost through shipwrecks and collisions flew flags of convenience although the vessels registered under these flags represented only 25 percent of the total world merchant marine.

Most of these losses were due to bad shipboard conditions and the incompetency of the officers, the seamen charged. For these reasons the union representatives demanded that the standards to be adopted next year be incorporated into an international pact binding on governments.

Under a proposed ILO "action program" governments would be called upon to discourage in every way possible their seamen from sailing on ships of those countries that fail to enforce the projected minimum standards.

For youths under 18 who elect the sea as a career it was agreed that the standards must protect their health, morals and safety.

Among the points to be included in the standards are a ban on night work and on hazardous assignments that only experienced seamen can handle safely. An eight-hour day and a 40-hour week must be the maximum work load for the young seamen, the meeting agreed.

The issue of paid vacations was left to the full-dress conference after the shipowners scuttled an apparent compromise reached in committee to guarantee an annual leave of no less than five full weeks after a year's service.

Fund Sharing Hit for Lack Of Standards

the greatest need.

"The present distribution formula has shortchanged many of the nation's large urban centers where the needs are greatest, and at the same time has breathed new life into archaic, anachronistic units of government which do virtually nothing," the AFL-CIO said.

● Provide enforceable federal standards "to assure that funds are used for programs that reflect national needs and priorities and fully comply with federal civil rights guarantees and labor standards and protections."

Citing a resolution adopted at the AFL-CIO's recent convention, the statement concluded:

"If the Congress in reviewing the experience to date of the program determines that the abuses cannot be corrected and that essential standards and safeguards cannot be enforced or enacted, the AFL-CIO recommends that the program be abolished and Congress redirect an equal amount of funds into appropriate categorical grant-in-aid programs."

First Anniversary Review:

New Law Brings Problems As Well as Pension Reform

One of the most complex pieces of legislation ever to go through Congress, the year-old Employees Retirement Income Security Act is still too new to permit a comprehensive evaluation.

"Many provisions will not be fully operative for some years," observes Lawrence T. Smedley, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, "and the final results depend on such factors as administration, regulations and court decisions."

Yet the new law, the culmination of ten years of effort on pension reform, could have a profound effect on the private-pension system, and though the law did not meet all of labor's objectives, "it is landmark legislation," Smedley declares in the AFL-CIO's monthly publication, the American Federationist.

Smedley, who specializes in retirement and pension benefits, notes that, "in spite of compromises, the law does come to grips with the major public criticisms of private pension plans."

Administration of the new law was a major issue during deliberations on the legislation. Debate centered on whether the Labor Dept. or the Treasury Dept. should carry out its provisions.

The AFL-CIO strongly supported administration by the Labor Dept. since the law concerned itself with employe, not employer, rights and benefits. The end result was a division of responsibilities with numerous possibilities for duplication and overlapping authority.

"Actual experience under the law has shown that administration is not working well," Smedley observes.

"Divided administrative responsibility between several federal departments has created serious problems," he adds.

Smedley notes that unless the administrative situation improves by the time the shakedown period of implementing the act is completed, it may be necessary to seek perfecting amendments from Congress.

The various effective dates of the law were designed to allow pension plans time to make conforming amendments and adjustments to the new law. The reporting and disclosure and fiduciary standards generally became effective for existing plans on Jan. 1, 1975.

For plans in existence on Jan. 1, 1974, the vesting, participation and funding standards generally will be applicable for the first plan year beginning after the date of the signing of the law, Sept. 2, 1974.

Collectively bargained plans may, under certain circumstances, postpone compliance with the funding standards beyond this date, but no later than Dec. 31, 1980.

Prior to World War II, pension plan coverage of American workers was limited. After the war, significant changes occurred. Today, more than 29 million workers are covered by private pension and profit-sharing plans. The growth and liberalization of the pension system dictated greater public responsibility in its regulation.

In many cases, Smedley's article notes, workers put in years of labor to earn pension benefits only to see their rights disappear because the employer went bankrupt or the pension fund was grossly mismanaged.

ERISA was enacted to provide greater protection to participants. Several of the law's many provisions are concerned with aspects of the greatest importance to union pension plans, Smedley stresses.

For collectively bargained plans in major industries and with large employers, the impact of the new law should be minor in both costs and plan changes, Smedley observes. Higher costs will occur in certain unionized industries characterized by small employers — the construction, trucking and garment industries.

Among highlights of the pension reform law, every defined benefit pension plan now must observe certain funding standards. Trustees of pension and health and welfare plans are required to meet new and strict standards of conduct in the administration of such plans.

The reporting and disclosure requirements of the new law are comprehensive, with detailed information provided to the Labor Secretary, plan participants and beneficiaries.

New standards concerning vesting, portability of rights, termination insurance and joint survivorship also are set forth in the law.

Thus, despite difficulties that are bound to arise with a law as complex as ERISA, the legislation is substantial, Smedley concludes.

Highlights of the Pension Reform Law

	Major Provisions	Effective Dates: Old Plans	Effective Dates: New Plans
Participation	Prohibits plans from requiring an age of eligibility greater than 25 or a period of service longer than 1 year, whichever is later.	Jan. 1, 1976	Date of enactment (Sept. 2, 1974)
Vesting	Plan vesting provision must not be less liberal than one of three following minimum standards: 1. 100 percent vesting after 10 years of service 2. 25 percent vesting after 5 years of service, increasing yearly until 100 percent after 15 years 3. 50 percent vesting as soon as the sum of age and years of service (after 5 years) total 45, reaching 100 percent 5 years later.	Jan. 1, 1976	Date of enactment
Funding	The plan must fund current year's benefit accruals and must amortize any unfunded costs over 30 years (40 years for existing plans and multi-employer plans).	Jan. 1, 1976 (For collectively bargained plans, the effective date is the plan year beginning after the expiration of the current contract, but not later than 1981).	Date of enactment
Fiduciary Standards	Establishes the "prudent man" rule as the basic standard of conduct, outlaws various transactions between parties-in-interest, and prohibits investment of more than 10 percent of fund assets in employer securities or real estate.	Jan. 1, 1975 *
Reporting and Disclosure	Requires the plan to provide participants with a comprehensive booklet describing pension plan provisions and to report annually to the Secretary of Labor on numerous operating and financial details of the plan.	Jan. 1, 1975 *
Plan Termination Insurance	Creates a federal insurance organization to protect beneficiaries against loss of vested pension on plan termination where assets are inadequate. Protects benefits up to $750 per month. Initial annual premium for this coverage is $1 per participant (50¢ for multi-employer plan participants) and began on date of enactment for both single- and multi-employer plans.	July 1, 1974 (Jan. 1, 1978, for multi-employer plans).	Phased in over 5 years
Portability	Encourages some voluntary portability by allowing a worker, if the employer agrees to it, to transfer his or her pension rights tax free from one employer pension fund to another by establishing a tax free individual retirement account.	Date of enactment
Joint and Survivorship Option	Unless a married worker specifically requests the plan's normal retirement benefit, the worker is required to receive a pension payable for his or her lifetime and continuing in 50 percent of that amount to the spouse if the spouse survives the employee. The worker's normal retirement benefit may be actuarially reduced to pay for the cost of this provision.	January 1, 1976	Date of enactment

* Effective dates on some provisions have been delayed by regulations.

Follow-Through Pressed:

Farm Vote Criticism Presented to State

Sacramento, Calif.—Recommendations of a special subcommittee of the AFL-CIO Executive Council calling for steps to improve implementation and enforcement of the California farm labor law have been submitted to state officials, including Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr.

In submitting the report, Executive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning of the California AFL-CIO requested an early meeting with the state Agricultural Labor Relations Board to review the 20 key recommendations.

Walter Kintz, general council of the labor board, responded in a letter to Henning saying he would "welcome the opportunity to consider these recommendations and the constructive criticisms."

In its report, the AFL-CIO panel stressed that the farm labor law should be aggressively enforced to assure that representation elections are conducted free of intimidation.

When the report was released earlier this month, AFL-CIO President George Meany said in a covering letter that the panel's conclusions were "both distressing and heartening."

Meany said he was distressed by the inadequate and even incompetent enforcement of the law, but found encouragement in the election victories scored by the United Farm Workers despite adversity.

The subcommittee said that the ultimate victory the workers and the UFW are seeking could be achieved if the labor board properly enforces the law and if the labor movement provides the needed assistance to the union.

As of Nov. 14, 315 elections had been conducted throughout the state on representation rights for 49,709 workers.

The UFW reported that it has won 167 of the elections to represent 24,334 workers, or 49 percent of the total, while the Teamsters won 95 to represent 11,802 workers, or 23.7 percent.

Another 17 elections involving 2,200 workers or 4.4 percent, went "no union." Still undecided are 36 elections covering 11,373 workers, about 23 percent of the total.

Meanwhile, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops commended California for enacting the law which it suggested could be a model for federal legislation to assure farm workers union rights throughout the nation.

But the bishops stressed that the full cooperation of state officials, growers and unions is essential to fully implement the law.

"It would be a tragedy if the purpose of the law, which holds out such promise for the future of sound labor relations in the agricultural industry, were to be thwarted in practice, for whatever reasons," the resolution observed.

Union Reports Mounting Support For Plan to Acquire, Revive REA

Chicago—Support gathered for a plan by the Railway & Airline Clerks to acquire control of the bankrupt REA Express, Inc., and to rehire its 7,000 laid-off employes.

BRAC President C. L. Dennis said the union's proposal received a "very sympathetic hearing" from executives of four major railroads. In addition, a number of leaders in government and in Congress have endorsed the plan, Dennis said.

Dennis outlined the proposal to President Lawrence Provo of the Chicago & North Western and executives representing the president of the Burlington Northern, the Union Pacific and the Norfolk & Western at a meeting at BRAC headquarters here. He predicted benefits both to the carriers and to employes from a takeover of REA by a corporation formed by the union.

BRAC Employes Express Co., as the new union-formed corporation is called, could develop a vastly expanded "piggy-back" service in which loaded trucks could be shipped by rail to a degree far above present levels, Dennis observed.

"In a period of energy crisis, with the cost of fuel rising steadily," he said, "an expansion of piggyback truck and rail service could benefit the national effort to conserve energy, would help the railways and the express company, and bring lower costs to consumers."

Dennis is one of three BRAC officials who formed the new corporation earlier this month. Others are Vice President Robert Devlin and Walter Williamson, a BRAC headquarters staff member specializing in express service.

Stock in the new company has been placed in trust for the laid-off employes. If successful in gaining control of the bankrupt firm, the new company would sell the stock to employes.

The corporation filed a request for a declaratory order with the Interstate Commerce Commission Nov. 21 to seek to determine whether the temporary operating rights held by the bankrupt REA Express are transferable.

Encouragement for the BRAC proposal also came from several members of Congress who signed a joint letter to a trustee in bankruptcy urging that the union-formed corporation be allowed to buy REA.

In a letter to Judge John J. Gilgay, the legislators said REA Express has been "vitally important to the smaller shippers in this country and it has provided an important link in intermodal operations. Because of the uniqueness of the type of service it provides, we believe that action should be taken to preserve the integrity of that service.

"One manner in which that could be accomplished is for the operating rights of REA to be transferred to one entity," the letter said.

It was signed by Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.) and three congressmen who head House subcommittees dealing with transportation matters: Rep. James Howard (D-N.J.), Public Works & Transportation; Rep. Fred Rooney (D-Pa.), Interstate & Foreign Commerce, and Rep. John J. McFall (D-Calif.), Appropriations.

Dennis also revealed that John W. Snow, U.S. deputy undersecretary for transportation, had filed an affidavit in U.S. District Court for the southern district of New York, noting "there does appear to be merit in BRAC's proposal."

"REA has developed an extensive specialized network for small shipment handling, which stays intact under BRAC's proposal," Snow said.

In an earlier statement, Dennis attributed REA's closing to the "greed and shortsightedness of the firm's creditors. A creditors' committee refused to accept reasonable proposals for averting the bankruptcy, including the union's offer of an $8 million loan guarantee to keep the firm in business, he said.

Massachusetts Board Nullifies Busing Stand

Boston—The executive board of the Massachusetts AFL-CIO voted unanimously to declare null and void a state convention resolution backing moves for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the busing of school children to achieve racial integration.

The 39-member executive board took the action following a meeting of the state labor council's executive officers with AFL-CIO President George Meany.

Meany had advised the officials that the Massachusetts federation was in violation of national AFL-CIO policy by adopting the anti-busing resolution at its convention earlier in November.

After a two-hour special board meeting, State AFL-CIO President Joseph A. Sullivan announced, "We have declared this resolution is null and void," and directed the state federation staff and affiliates to refrain from implementing it.

The national AFL-CIO has been on record in support of "quality integrated education" since 1972, a position that was reaffirmed by national conventions in 1973 and this year. The 1975 convention specifically opposed a constitutional amendment to bar busing.

Political Role Stressed At Maine Convention

Lewiston, Me.—Stepped-up efforts to spur greater union participation in state and national political affairs were outlined at the Maine AFL-CIO's 10th biennial convention.

State federation President Benjamin J. Dorsky told the 193 delegates that next year's state COPE conference should focus on developing an effective legislative program as well as endorsing responsible candidates.

He cited labor's continuing efforts to bring about tax reform to ease the burden on workers, protections for public employes and extension of minimum wage coverage.

Dorsky, who has headed the state federation since 1957, was re-elected to a new four-year term. Delegates also elected Marvin Ewing of the Paperworkers to the new post of vice president and three new executive board members—all women. They are Sylvia Blanchard of the Paperworkers, Dorothy Cochrane of the Clothing Workers, and Jane Weed of the State, County & Municipal Employees. Nine other board members were re-elected.

The term of Sec.-Treas. Gary B. Cook still has two years remaining.

The convention voted to increase the monthly per capita payment from 25 to 30 cents to finance a new pension program for officers and staff members of the state federation.

In a major address to delegates, Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.) assailed the Ford Administration's handling of the national economy. He zeroed in on high unemployment, inflation and the President's long string of vetoes on legislation to increase jobs and bring the nation out of recession.

Other major speakers at the three-day convention included Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and President William H. McClennan of the Fire Fighters.

HEW Issues Rule On Aiding Jobless

In conformance with a Supreme Court ruling, the Dept of Health, Education & Welfare has issued a final regulation that says unemployed fathers of dependent children have the option of receiving either unemployment compensation or cash welfare assistance, whichever is the greater.

The Supreme Court had upheld a U.S. District Court decision affecting unemployed fathers of dependent children who are not only eligible for unemployment compensation but also cash welfare assistance under the unemployed fathers section of the aid to families with dependent children (UF-AFDC) program.

The court ruled that such fathers could take either unemployment compensation or cash welfare assistance, whichever is bigger.

Airlines' Pact Called Barrier to Bargaining

Northwest, National and TWA collected $123 million.

"It is apparent that four carriers, who can ill afford it, are paying three other carriers so that the latter can maintain extremely poor labor relations," the AFL-CIO testified.

Machinists Vice President John Peterpaul told the subcommittee that Eastern Airlines, facing financial problems, has asked the IAM to agree to forgo a pay raise for part of the union's next contract. But at the same time, he noted, Eastern is paying MAP benefits to National Airlines, whose flight attendants are on strike and whose mechanical employes, represented by the Machinists, have been furloughed because of the shutdown.

Under such circumstances, Peterpaul said, it's difficult to ask Eastern employes to agree to a wage freeze.

As for suggestions that the airlines pact was the same as strike benefits to workers, union witnesses noted that strikers always are under financial pressure to reach a settlement because their benefits seldom recoup more than a very small portion of lost wages.

8-Cent COL Boost Set At Aluminum Plants

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers announced that about 30,000 USWA members employed by three major aluminum companies will receive a cost-of-living wage increase of 8 cents an hour effective Dec. 1.

The COL adjustments are provided in the USWA contracts with Aluminum Co. of America, Reynolds Metal Co. and Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp. Earlier adjustments under the contracts amounted to 74 cents an hour.

A Merger Milestone

ON DEC. 5, 1975, the AFL-CIO will mark the 20th anniversary of its birth—the merger of the AFL and the CIO into a single trade union center.

Federation President George Meany told the recent 11th convention of the AFL-CIO that the only reason to look back is to benefit from the experience of the past to meet the problems of tomorrow.

Looking back to the very beginning—the merger convention in New York City—the road ahead was clearly marked by Meany in his address to the convention after his election to the presidency. This is how he saw the basis for success of the new trade union center in 1955:

WE MUST THINK in terms of the true meaning of a trade union movement, a movement that has for its sole, definite and single purpose the advancement of the welfare and interest of the great mass of workers who are part of this movement.

That must be the motivating influence and manner in which we move forward. Let all of our actions be keyed into that simple, plain principle that a trade union has no other reason for existence than the job of carrying out and carrying forward and advancing the interests and welfare of its members.

In building and advancing the cause of our union, let us not think in terms of personal prestige, of having a big union for the sake of having a big union. Let us not think in terms of a great big financial structure and of great power. Let us think in terms of the simple philosophy of those who founded this movement of advancing the cause of workers.

As we go forward together in the movement, let us stop thinking in terms of prior labels. Let us make up our minds that from this moment on there is just one label on all the organizations and all of the membership of this great organization, and that label is AFL-CIO and nothing else. Let us apply this philosophy in terms of good faith, determination to live together, to work together and to think together for one united organization.

Let us understand that despite the many advances, despite the great achievements of the organized labor movement over the years, we still have those who believe that we would be better off without unions; those who believe in the archaic traditions of the 1880s and 1890s; those who believe that America is built from the top down, that if you keep the great corporations fat and wealthy, enough will trickle down to keep those at the lower level of our economic structure happy and contented. We still have this opposition.

I TELL YOU NOW I will never surrender principle for expediency. I tell you now that, insofar as it is my place to influence decisions, those decisions will be made without regard to where the union formerly was and without regard to how big or how little a union is.

Let us remember that on this very, very happy occasion we have merely taken the first step, that we have created a tool, an instrumentality, something that we can use to carry forward for the people we represent; and if we carry forward in good faith in our relations with one another, and true to the principles and traditions upon which our movement was founded, I am sure that we can succeed.

So let us face the future, confident beyond question that the cause we espouse, confident beyond expression that the things we ask for are just and proper.

A Word Edgewise:

Watergate Conspiracy Exposed Flaws in U.S. Justice System

By John P. Roche

YOU MAY HAVE NOTICED that diseases are not the only things that come in epidemics—so do books. I have, for example, a full bookcase of good studies of Southeast Asia and the Vietnam war, and I could have filled two more with the junk that I read and sent off to the town dump. Right now there are probably at least 25 works on the CIA in process.

But first prize in the book epidemic competition undoubtedly goes to Watergate and related issues; volumes on the sins of Richard Nixon & Co. could fill a library.

After reading Teddy White's superb "Breach of Faith," I swore a silent oath to go off Watergate. But, mea culpa, I have sinned: somebody sent me George V. Higgins's "The Friends of Richard Nixon" and the first chapter was like that proverbial first drink. Indeed, the analogy is more than appropriate—that first little drink led to a binge: I couldn't put the book down until I finished it.

Higgins brought to his chronicle some remarkable credentials. A former newspaperman, he was also a state and federal prosecutor in Massachusetts and has written several novels about the seamier side of law enforcement. He has the special argot of the criminal, the cop, the bondsman, the prosecutor, and police-blotter journalists down pat. In "The Friends of Eddie Coyle," he wrote a novel showing his mastery of this genre; in "The Friends of Richard Nixon," he has produced a semi-novel of the same high order.

His premise is simple: to treat Watergate properly you have to realize that it was a criminal conspiracy which any Mafia "capo" would consider a bad joke. But nonetheless it was a criminal conspiracy, not just old-fashioned fun and games in the great American tradition of dirty politics.

Using the Nixon tapes and other materials of record, Higgins attempts to plumb the mind of the various principals as the whole thing began to unravel. This stream-of-consciousness technique leads on occasion to some non-stop sentences worthy of Sir Walter Scott, but by and large it comes off very well.

There are a number of lines which gave me the best laughs I've had in years, for which I gather Higgins has picked up some flak from reviewers for not being serious about the fate of the republic. But in fact this is a very serious book about the vagaries of the American system of justice. Confessedly, some bias in favor of Higgins arises from his emphasis on the paradoxes about Watergate I explored here at "that point in time."

Take this, for instance: discussing "Maximum John" Sirica's conduct in the trial of the burglars, "the man" (representing the collective wisdom of the courthouse regulars) says, "That really wasn't much of a trial, you know. It was more like an inquisition. If you gave, say, Daniel Ellsberg that kind of trial, the whole faculty of the Yale Law School would be down carrying signs in front of the White House." Higgins (like me) resents this kind of moral double-bookkeeping, whoever employs it.

ELSEWHERE HE FLAYS the comic opera that "Uncle Sam" Ervin presided over, the Senate Investigating Committee, noting (correctly) that the only senator who wasn't playing to the gallery was Daniel K. Inouye of Hawaii, but that the preposterous rules (which made filibustering by lawyers and committee members into an art form) frustrated Inouye's penetrating questions.

True to his prosecutor's training, Higgins is horrified that the committee put John Dean on first and got his testimony on record, thus making it much easier for Haldeman and Ehrlichman to know what they were up against. This would never have happened in grand jury proceedings.

In essence, he makes the case for the professionals, like Earl Silbert, the original Watergate prosecutor, against the amateurs—like Ervin and his inept chief counsel, Sam Dash—who wanted to turn a legal prosecution for conspiracy to obstruct justice into a morality play. The point, as "the man" would say, is to get the (expletives deleted) safely in the slammer, not give sermons on civics.

My substantive argument with Higgins concerns his implicit assumption that had Watergate blown before November 1972, it would have influenced the outcome of the presidential election. As I noted then, the voters consciously chose thieves over theocrats, figuring we know how to cope with thieves. The outcome justified this faith. But that's a trivial complaint about a fine book.

Both Sides 'Off Beam':

Critics on Right, Left Attack Labor as Too Weak, Too Strong

By Msgr. George G. Higgins

RALPH de TOLEDANO, a Washington-based syndicated columnist, has probably written as many anti-union books and articles as any living journalist. He never tires of writing, in season and out of season, that union leadership in this country is interested solely in power, at the expense of the common good, and cannot possibly claim to represent the American wage earner.

Toledano grinds out another variation on this hackneyed theme in his latest book, "Let Our Cities Burn," which purports to show that the unionization of government employes is a dangerous threat to the American way of life. The trouble is, however, that the two specific examples he cites to support his oft-stated claim that the majority of American workers are opposed to unions (and join them only under compulsion) prove exactly the opposite.

Toledano says that the farm workers in California and the Farah garment workers in El Paso, Tex., were so strongly opposed to unionism that "the unions in question, to prevail, were compelled to mount campaigns of economic blackmail and labor violence against employers and workers alike—simultaneously blocking all attempts at representation elections."

Toledano has every reason to know that that statement is contrary to fact—to put it as politely as possible. The unions he refers to (the United Farm Workers and the Clothing Workers) have not engaged in economic blackmail and labor violence against either employers or workers. They have simply exercised their constitutional right to call for a boycott of their employer's products. Their purpose in doing so was not to block representation elections but, on the contrary, to compel the other side to agree to such elections.

Furthermore, in both cases, the workers, when given an opportunity to state their preference in supervised elections, have voted in favor of unionization, even though, under the law, they could have voted with absolute impunity in favor of "no union."

In the case of the Farah garment workers, this is ancient history. They have long since negotiated a collective bargaining contract with the Farah company. As Toledano knows perfectly well, this could not have happened under the National Labor Relations Act unless the majority of the workers had voted in favor of the union which now represents them, the Clothing Workers.

In the case of the California farm workers, representation elections are now under way. As of early November, the United Farm Workers has won 146 elections, involving 20,870 workers, and the Teamsters had won 89 elections, involving 10,874 workers. In only 14 elections out of a total of 275 did the workers (less than 2,000 in all) vote "no union," and this in spite of the fact that many growers had tried very hard to persuade their workers to vote against both of the contending unions. If these statistics prove that farm workers, as Toledano persistently claims, are opposed to unionization, then words have lost their meaning.

It would appear, however, that Toledano's opposition to the American labor movement and to the very concept of unionism is so completely doctrinaire and runs so deep in his psyche that it is probably a waste of time to try to counter it with factual evidence of the kind I have cited above. Toledano is convinced that "by its very nature, a union is an instrument of class war" and that organized labor not only has "contempt for government" but also holds to the "devout conviction that it is, and should be, above the law." He has also persuaded himself that organized labor "is the single most powerful political force in the United States." To try to talk a "true believer" out of such a compulsively anti-union position would be an exercise in futility.

The leadership of the American labor movement must have the feeling at times that it is caught in the middle between two sets of critics and that never the twain shall meet. While Toledano, on the one hand, is constantly warning the nation that organized labor is too strong, a number of self-styled "radical" observers are saying just the opposite.

Sidney Lens, a former labor leader who is now a full-time writer, is a case in point. In a recent article in "New Politics," a journal of socialist thought, Lens says that labor's current leadership is "behind the times by at least a generation or two." In his opinion, the labor movement, as now constituted, has reached dead end and is ready for the ash heap. "Nor is the movement," he says, "equipped to deal with government. Its lobbying and electoral activities, greatly magnified by the press, are picayune compared with those of big business."

In summary, Toledano and Lens, in assessing one and the same labor movement, have come to conclusions which are a million miles apart. I think both of them are slightly off the beam. I say this with apologies to Lens, for, while I find his criticism of the labor movement too doctinaire for my own taste, I would have to admit that, by comparison with Toledano's frenetic writings on this subject, Lens's books and articles are models of objective scholarship.

Health Security Pressed:

Congressional Debate Drags As Health Care Needs Grow

CONGRESS has been talking about national health insurance far too long — nearly 30 years — AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman said as he called for a stepped-up push for legislation to meet the nation's urgent health needs.

"The facts are known, the needs are clear," Seidman asserted, and warned that while opponents string out debate on the issue, the top-quality health care that Americans should have as a matter of right falls further out of reach. He said the most comprehensive and effective national health insurance proposal—the widely supported Health Security bill—would also be a cost-saver on the nation's total health bill.

Under Health Security, Seidman said, "costs will be much less than they would have been with no 'national health insurance' that the American Medical Association, the insurance industry and the Administration are supporting."

Seidman said on Labor News Conference that the money spent for the Health Security program would be "money we are already spending" in a poorly organized and often inefficient and wasteful health care system. He said the key to increased efficiency and decreased costs of Health Security is a different allocation of health care costs, so that they will bear a much closer relationship to the ability of people to pay. He said it would also make possible the "rationalizing of the patchwork quilt of health care and health services that exists now."

Turning to the issue of health manpower legislation, Seidman said the AFL-CIO favors the use of federal funds for the education and training of physicians, dentists and other health professionals, and thinks a good bill will come out of this year's congressional session. He said he expects the legislation to focus on the primary needs, underserved areas and on the distribution of specialties, while putting more emphasis on primary care and family doctors.

Reporters questioning Seidman on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Jerome Brazda of Washington Report on Medicine & Health and Robert Cooney of Press Associates.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

ONE OF THE TOUGHEST human problems confronting the American government—and the labor movement—is what to do about the estimated eight to ten million illegal aliens now in the United States. The government is not sure how many "illegals" there are because they cannot be counted unless they are apprehended.

The AFL-CIO convention recently adopted a resolution that calls for the government to take steps to "assure that only immigrants who can become a part of the full social fabric of this country, with all the rights and responsibilities of permanent, legal residents, are able to live and work here."

The federation wants Congress to act soon on legislation introduced by Rep. Peter Rodino (D-N.J.) that would, in essence, make employers responsible and provide criminal penalties for those who "knowingly and willfully hire illegal immigrants."

The resolution states that the government should develop effective methods for patrolling U.S. borders to curb illegal entry and to investigate applicants for entry to ensure compliance with existing laws and regulations designed to admit only productive, needed workers.

The federation also calls for administration of all laws so as to curb abuses by foreign companies operating in the United States and to assure that foreign nationals here temporarily "do not take jobs that rightfully belong to American workers."

RODINO'S LEGISLATION got through the House in 1973 but died in the Senate judiciary subcommittee because of the opposition of Sen. James Eastland (D-Miss.). Eastland wanted the United States to go back to a "bracero" program that would permit employers to use alien workers when the Labor Dept. was unable to provide, within a certain time, American workers "able, qualified and willing" to do the work. Labor opposes this and a similar program was abolished in 1962.

Now, for the first time, the government has made a preliminary study of the illegal alien problem. The study is based on voluntary interviews with 793 apprehended aliens.

Of those interviewed, 481 were Mexican nationals, 237 were from other Western Hemisphere nations and 75 were from Eastern Hemisphere nations.

Most of those interviewed had been in the United States more than two years; 10 percent had been here six years and more. Three-fourths of the illegals are supporting or helping to support persons in their home countries with an average of $105 a month being sent home. Most of the illegals cannot speak English. There is a 10 percent unemployment rate among the illegals.

The average wage of the apprehended illegals was $2.71 but 51 percent of them earned less than $2.50 an hour. And, the study found, some 25 percent appear to have been paid less than the minimum wage. The average hourly wage of illegals working in the border counties with Mexico was $1.74—which is below the minimum wage.

The study found that 17 percent of the illegals were union members. Seventy-seven percent had social security taxes deducted from their wages; 73 percent had federal income taxes withheld; 44 percent paid hospitalization insurance. More than 30 percent of them filed federal income tax returns. Twenty-seven percent used American hospitals and clinics. Of the 389 parents interviewed, 7.6 percent had children in American schools. About 4 percent collected one or more weeks of unemployment compensation. Less than 2 percent secured food stamps and five-tenths of 1 percent received welfare payments.

Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop feels that the government must sooner or later decide in what direction it wants to go as a matter of policy on the illegal alien question. In order to make such a decision, he says, the government needs more basic information, such as that contained in the new study. After the government makes that policy decision, Dunlop says, it must then decide how to implement the policy. One obvious way to get the matter off dead center would be for the House to move ahead on the Rodino legislation.

AFTER NEARLY 30 YEARS of debate, Congress should begin to act on comprehensive health care legislation to meet peoples' needs, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, center, declared on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Robert Cooney, left, of Press Associates, Inc. and Jerome Brazda of Washington Report on Medicine & Health.

Key House Rollcall on Budget Ceiling

The House on Nov. 12 voted 213-203 to increase the spending ceiling that had been proposed by its Budget Committee. The labor-supported amendment included funds for the Near East agreement, TVA bonding authority, and raised the spending total for jobs and education programs by $235 million during the remainder of this fiscal year. It also increased budget commitments that can be made for jobs and education programs through June 1976 by $1.4 billion.

On the AFL-CIO scorecard, right votes (R) were cast by 196 Democrats and 17 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 84 Democrats and 119 Republicans.

Labor Unity Proves Key:

Teachers Win Gains In New Haven Strike

New Haven, Conn.—City teachers ended their two-week strike after winning a new two-year contract providing wage and benefit increases and a reduction in class sizes.

An end to the bitter contract dispute followed the threat of a sympathy strike by affiliated unions of the New Haven Central Labor Council. The council, representing 92 unions, called for a one-day strike to protest the wholesale jailing of teachers.

The teachers' group, Local 933 of the American Federation of Teachers, began the strike Nov. 10 after 12 months of negotiations failed to produce a new contract. The board, arguing that it did not have money for pay raises, refused even to allow the teachers their earned increments.

Under the new contract, which was approved by voice vote at a Nov. 23 meeting, the union retained its 15-step increase schedule, and won a $200 increase over the increments. Teachers at the top of their salary grades will get $300.

In the second year of the agreement, all salaries will rise by 4 percent.

While full details of the pact were not immediately reported, both teachers and the school board said the agreement reduces maximum class sizes from 32 to 31 pupils this year and to 30 in the second year of the pact.

Labor solidarity was credited with breaking the bargaining impasse. Two days before the settlement, President Vincent J. Sirabella of the Central Labor Council sent out the call for a citywide demonstration by members of the council's affiliates unless some 90 jailed teachers were released.

The teachers, including 12 leaders of the union, were jailed for refusing to obey an order by Superior Court Judge George A. Saden to return to work and end the walkout. A state law prohibits teacher strikes.

"In spite of what Judge Saden says," Sirabella declared, "they are not lawbreakers. We regard it as a law that doesn't deserve to be respected."

While the new agreement provided for the release of the jailed teachers, some of whom were held for more than a week, $253,000 in fines against them and their union still stand.

Bill Pressed to Stem Tide of Illegal Aliens

"take jobs which could be filled by American workers; depress the wages and impair the working conditions of American workers; reduce the effectiveness of employe organizations; compete most directly with unskilled and uneducated American citizens, and constitute for employers a group highly susceptible to exploitation."

Similar conclusions were reached in a study made for the Labor Dept., which found that nearly one-fourth of the illegal aliens were paid less than the federal minimum wage and 65 percent earned less than $2.50 an hour.

This supply of "cheap labor," the study noted, comes "at a time of widespread unemployment among disadvantaged legal residents of the United States."

The bill approved by the House committee would eliminate the exemption of employers from criminal penalties imposed on persons who "harbor" illegal aliens.

Under the labor-endorsed bill, an employer who knowingly hired an alien would be warned for a first offense, fined up to $500 for each illegal knowingly employed for a second offense within two years, and subjected to a fine of up to $1,000 and imprisonment for up to one year for subsequent offenses.

The bill authorizes an amnesty for illegal aliens who have lived in the United States since mid-1968 under certain conditions.

Biemiller's letter to central bodies and to AFL-CIO affiliates cited these "formidable problems" created by illegal aliens:

"Their willingness to accept low-paid jobs directly undercuts area wages as well as working conditions, making unionization of non-union shops impossible.

"Illegal aliens are also often employed as strikebreakers in labor disputes, thus weakening collective bargaining rights of union workers. Those unions shortsighted enough to enlist 'illegals' into their ranks ignore the ability of unscrupulous employers to cajole or intimidate the illegals with the threat of deportation."

Biemiller said a recent study for INS estimated that at least 8 million are still in this country.

FTC Allows Challenge to Credit Debts

ment from the consumer without regard to any dispute the consumer may have with the seller.

Secondly, sellers can insert "waivers-of-defense" clauses in the contracts. They have the same effect as a promissory note except that they represent the consumer's written agreement to pay a credit company despite any dispute he may have with the merchant.

Finally, sellers can arrange direct loans for consumers stipulating the lender's right to payment without regard to the seller's conduct.

The FTC rule would prohibit these three practices. The agency said in a statement that it is an unfair practice for a seller to use form contracts to separate a buyer's duty to pay for goods or services from a seller's duty to perform as promised.

"Consumers are clearly injured by a system which forces them to bear the full risk and burden of sales-related abuses," the FTC said.

The commission noted that the record of more than two years of public proceedings on its new rule shows that the holder-in-due-course doctrine "is a problem of considerable magnitude," and that the retail seller's capacity to cut off buyers' rights has been exercised in a broad spectrum of retail sales activities.

As long ago as 1969, the AFL-CIO urged the federal government to abolish the holder-in-due course doctrine. Consumer groups, including the labor-supported Consumer Federation of America, joined in the fight.

December Schedule Set By Labor Studies Center

A select group of new union representatives will spend two weeks at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, Silver Spring, Md., during December learning how others before them have made the adjustment to full-time union responsibilities.

Two other December institutes are scheduled for the Silver Spring campus with a fourth at Michigan State University, East Lansing. The Machinists and the Bakery & Confectionery Workers will also use the campus for leadership training during the month.

Here is the center's full schedule for December:

Pensions and Insurance—This institute for labor trustees of jointly administered pension and insurance funds will review problems and trends in negotiated plans. On the agenda: analysis and interpretation of fund reports, problems of investment of trust funds, requirements of the new federal pension reform law and the special role of the labor trustees in overseeing the administration of such funds. At Michigan State University, Nov. 30 to Dec. 4.

Machinist Editors—IAM local union editors will study elements of readable writing, trade union policies and programs and AFL-CIO legislative goals and participate in workshops on editing union newsletters. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Nov. 30, to Friday, Dec. 5.

New Staff—A two-week program for newly elected and newly appointed union representatives in which participants will focus on personal and institutional adjustments of those new to full-time union responsibilities. They will study the techniques of collective bargaining, organizing methods and the role of a union staff member. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Nov. 30, to Friday, Dec. 12.

Bakery & Confectionery Workers—The union will hold its annual staff conference at the center using the center's specialists for leadership training during the week. Nat Goldfinger, AFL-CIO research director, will address the group. From Monday, Dec. 8, to Friday, Dec. 12.

Collective Bargaining—An institute for union negotiators and bargaining chairmen who will review economic arguments in negotiations, sources of information, trends, the costing of benefits, cost of living clauses, health and welfare benefits, eye care and dental plans, pensions and the impact of the Equal Employment Opportunity and Equal Pay Acts. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Dec. 14, to Friday, Dec. 19.

Building Trades—An institute for business agents planned in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. Participants will address problems they face in such areas as labor law, safety and health, and jurisdictional disputes. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Dec. 14, to Friday, Dec. 18.

Further information about these and other programs may be obtained from Fred Hoehler, executive director, AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Phone 301/431-6800.

5 Unionists On New Trade Panel

President Ford has named five labor representatives to the White House Advisory Committee for Trade Negotiations. They are among 36 persons appointed for two-year terms, including 26 business or employer group executives.

The labor representatives include four union presidents—I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers, Charles Pillard of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Murray H. Finley of the Clothing Workers and Leonard Woodcock of the Auto Workers — and Research Director Nat Goldfinger of the AFL-CIO.

A law enacted earlier this year provides for a panel of 45 members to include representatives from government, labor, consumers, industry, agriculture, small business, service industries, retailers and the general public.

Rollcall Vote in Senate On Site Picketing Bill

The Senate on Nov. 19 passed the construction site picketing rights bill, 52-45. Labor's position was strongly for passage of the bill.

5.9 Million Cases:

Job Injuries, Illness Hit 10% of Workers

About one in every 10 full-time workers in private industry was injured on the job or suffered a job-related illness during 1974 even though the number of minor injuries decreased slightly from 1973, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

At the same time, on-the-job fatalities rose to 5,900, an increase of 200, and about 31 million workdays were lost because of injuries and illnesses, up 2 percent.

The BLS survey found that 5.9 million occupational injuries and illnesses occurred in 1974, a decrease of 163,000 from 1973. But that decrease was entirely in cases that did not involve lost worktime, BLS pointed out.

It also noted that fewer workers were exposed to job hazards because of layoffs in high-risk industries, such as manufacturing and contract construction, while total workhours increased in industries with relatively low rates of injury and illnesses.

"As much as one-third of the drop in the all-industry rate could be attributed to exposure differences among the industries between 1973 and 1974," BLS said.

The 1974 injury-illness rate in contract construction was 18.3 per 100 workers and 14.6 in manufacturing. This compares with an incidence rate of 10.4 per 100 workers in all industries, down from 11 per 100 in 1973.

The BLS injury-illness survey is based on records employers are required to maintain under the Occupational Safety & Health Act. Although about five million workplaces come under the federal safety law, the BLS survey involves a national sample of about 200,000 private employers.

All but 3 percent of the 5.9 million cases reported in 1974 involved occupational injuries. With about 200,400 occupational illness cases estimated last year, BLS said the incidence rate was four per 1,000—about the same as 1973.

The BLS report pointed out that occupational illnesses are slow in developing and are usually not noticed until disability occurs—at times, many years after the worker has left the job.

Some workers had more than one injury or illness during 1974, the report noted, as the number of lost workdays increased from 29.3 million in 1973 to 31.1 million last year. This also reflects the possibility that injuries were more severe as the incidence rate of lost workdays per 100 full-time workers rose from 53.3 in 1973 to 54.6 in 1974.

Approximately 65 percent of the 5,900 work-related fatalities occurred in contract construction, manufacturing and in the transportation and public utilities industries.

The BLS study showed that worker deaths increased in contract construction, services, and in agriculture, forestry and fishery industries. Fatality rates remained level in manufacturing, transportation and public utilities and mining, while declining slightly in less-hazardous industries.

BLS also observed that the proportion of illness-related deaths to all occupational fatalities more than doubled over the year, rising from 300 in 1973 to 700 last year.
bill with the five labor-supported

Workplaces having between 100 and 249 employes appeared to have the highest overall incidence rate of injuries and illness, the report said. Establishments with fewer than 50 or more than 1,000 workers appeared to have better safety records.

17% Surge in Profits Steepest in 25 Years

industries, especially in durables as earnings of motor vehicles producers rose sharply," the government observed. "Strong advances were also recorded for railroads and for electric and gas utilities."

Corporate profits from current production represented a 16.8 percent surge, the largest rise since a 22.9 percent advance in the second quarter of 1946.

Book profits after adjustment for inventory gains came to a seasonally adjusted $122.5 billion figured at an annual rate. After deduction of corporate profits taxes, which accrue on both profits from current production and inventory gains, earnings were estimated at $82.2 billion, an $11.9 billion jump over the second quarter rate.

While soaring 17 percent over the previous quarter, third-quarter profits were 13 percent below the peak $94.3 billion annual rate in the same quarter of 1974.

The only sectors of the economy showing profit declines in the third quarter were petroleum-refining and primary metals, Commerce said.

Profits of American branches or subsidiaries in foreign countries rose to a $5.7 billion annual rate from a rate of $5.5 billion in the previous quarter.

Dividend payments, at $34.5 billion, were up half a billion dollars over the second quarter level. Retained earnings, at $47.7 billion, were up $11.4 billion.

The GNP revision—one of the largest ever made in preliminary estimates of the real gross national product—showed real economic output rose to an adjusted annual rate of $808.3 billion last quarter, compared with a $783.6 rate in the second.

The revised GNP was $3.7 billion higher than the preliminary estimate issued a month earlier, Commerce said.

Prices, as measured by the GNP chain price index, rose at an annual rate of 7 percent, compared with 5.4 percent in the second quarter.

Labor Backs Tax Reform Amendments

The labor-supported amendments would curb real estate tax shelters, eliminate a capital losses loophole that is a "giveaway" to rich investors, expand minimum tax coverage, further restrict tax avoidance of profits from exports, and continue the withholding tax on dividends paid to foreign investors.

Biemiller asked the defeat of an amendment sponsored by Rep. James R. Jones (D-Okla.) to weaken the minimum tax obligation and an amendment by Rep. Neal Smith (D-Iowa) to loosen restrictions on tax deductible farm losses claimed by agricultural business and nonfarm investors.

Biemiller also wrote to the officers of AFL-CIO state and local central bodies, urging them to let their congressmen know of the concern of union members in their districts and help offset an intensive campaign by real estate, gas and oil lobbyists trying to block reform.

He said passage of the tax bill with the five labor-supported amendments would signal the clear intention of the House "to close tax loopholes, end tax gimmickry and pave the way for prompt consideration by the Ways & Means Committee of Phase II of tax reform."

The bill sent to the House floor includes extension through 1976 of most of the tax cuts enacted earlier this year to stimulate the economy toward recovery. It does not carry the spending ceiling demanded by President Ford as the tradeoff for extension of the income tax cuts.

Senate Confirms 2 in NLRB Posts

The Senate confirmed the nominations of Peter D. Walther and John S. Irving as member and general counsel, respectively, of the National Labor Relations Board.

The board has been functioning with only four of its five members since the end of July when Ralph Kennedy resigned. The general counsel's post has been vacant since Peter Nash left in mid-August.

Walther, 47, has been a partner in a Philadelphia law firm. Irving, 35, has been deputy general counsel of the board the past three years.

Walther was sworn in to his new office on Nov. 26, while Irving was scheduled to take the oath of office on Dec. 1.

GOP Senator Assails 'Work' Group For 'Threats' on Site Picketing Bill

A lavishly-financed campaign by the National Right to Work Committee to defeat the construction site picketing bill may have boomeranged in the case of one target senator.

The campaign—priced at close to $1 million—included full-page advertisements in 50 newspapers aimed at influencing the votes of certain senators the open shop committee hoped to sway.

One of them was Connecticut Republican Lowell P. Weicker, Jr., who wasn't amused by the advertisement in the Hartford Courant, headed "An Open Letter to Senator Weicker on Beatings, Bombings, Shootings."

The dominant illustration, Weicker told the Senate, was a shadowy figure holding a club and threatening a group of workers. The text of the "open letter" is flanked by headlines of "labor violence . . . arson . . . labor civil war."

All this, an indignant Weicker said in a speech before the Senate voted to close debate and pass the site picketing bill, is part of "the stench of the National Right to Work Committee's contribution to the political process."

The R-T-W committee "makes it toilet clear that their target is not common situs picketing legislation but the entire concept of trade unionism," he said, adding:

"Let no one get fooled by names and jargon. The right to work for a majority of Americans did not exist prior to the labor movement. There was instead the right to be abused, the right to be underpaid . . . to sweat 15 hours a day. And there was the right to take it or starve."

Weicker told his Senate colleagues that the right-to-work committee "played the politics of threats" and "this is to tell them they lost."

He said that, after deliberating long and hard on the merits of the issue, he had concluded that building trades unions were being discriminated against by the curtailment of their picketing rights and "all of us will be better off when such is no longer the case."

Figures quoted by the Wall Street Journal and Congressional Quarterly magazine indicated that the Right-to-Work Committee spent between $750,000 and $1 million on its campaign to try to defeat the construction site picketing bill.

Besides the newspaper advertisements, it included mailing some 4 million letters which in turn were supposed to generate a flood of mail addressed to both Congress and the White House. This is in addition to the massive campaign that has been mounted by construction industry employer groups and business organizations such as the National Association of Manufacturers.

Now that the bill has passed both the House and Senate, awaiting only a House-Senate conference agreement and a final vote after the Thanksgiving recess, the employer pressure has shifted to the White House.

President Ford is being asked to renege on his public commitment to sign the site picketing bill along with its companion, the construction industry collective bargaining bill.

The message, from both the "right-to-work" committee and the more respectable employer groups, is that conservatives will flock to GOP challenger Ronald Reagan if the President should keep his word on site picketing rights.

Electric Boat Strikers Vote on New Contract

Groton, Conn.—The Metal Trades Council here has reached tentative agreement on a new contract with the Electric Boat Division of the General Dynamics Corp. that could resolve a 22-week strike.

The 43-month agreement was to be submitted to the 10,000 workers involved in the strike the day before the Thanksgiving holiday for a secret-ballot vote. If the settlement is ratified, the workers would return to their jobs on Dec. 1. Eleven unions make up the Metal Trades Council.

Reached with the aid of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, the pact provides an immediate 13 percent wage increase, followed by raises of 6 percent at the start of both the second and the third years of the agreement. In addition, an 18-cent hourly cost-of-living pay increase would become effective July 1, 1976, and a 10-cent adjustment would be paid 30 months after the agreement is signed.

Other improvements include an increase from $6.50 to $10 a month in pension benefits; a first-time dental plan with costs split 50-50 between worker and employer; an increase in major medical insurance from $15,000 to $75,000, and increases in hazard pay ranging from 15 to 50 percent.

During the on-again, off-again negotiations, the major issue for the first 16 weeks of the strike was related to work practices, as the unions accused the company of attempting to break craft lines. The issue was resolved by agreement on a series of union-management committees to review individual job assignments.

House Votes '76 Tax Cut To Spur Ailing Economy

Downturn Continues 2nd Month

By James M. Shevis

A key government statistic indicating future trends in the economy turned down for the second consecutive month in October, lending weight to labor's contention that full recovery from the country's worst post-World War II recession still is nowhere in sight.

The Commerce Dept.'s composite index of leading indicators fell five-tenths of 1 percent in October to 102 percent of its 1967 average. The month before, the index declined by a revised one-tenth of 1 percent.

It was the first time the index had declined two months in a row since it began to rise last March. The September decline was originally reported as nine-tenths of 1 percent.

"The behavior of the index in September and October, together with other recent developments, suggests a moderation in the pace of the overall economic recovery following a strong and unsustainable initial upsurge," said James L. Pate, assistant secretary of commerce for economic affairs.

Other signs of a sluggish economy following a third-quarter rebound in real gross national product included the following:

- A large increase in the number of persons claiming jobless benefits. In the latest reporting period, the Labor Dept. said, 5,573,200 persons received unemployment insurance benefits, an increase of 311,100 from the week before. In the week ended Nov. 22, a total of 453,000 workers filed initial claims for benefits, an increase of 50,800 from the previous week.
- Industrial companies operated at only 72 percent of capacity in October—9.5 percentage points below that of October 1974 at the height of the recession, McGraw-Hill Publications noted.
- McGraw-Hill's F. W. Dodge division, which keeps tabs on construction activity, reported that October contracts for future construction fell 12 percent below year-ago levels. Most of the decline was due to a sharp curtailment in electric-power plant construction.

While real GNP rose at an annual rate of 13.2 percent in the third quarter, the sharpest upturn in 25 years, the production rise was not accompanied by a reduction in unemployment, nor is the nation's economic output expected to continue at that rate.

The jobless rate, at 8.6 percent in October, is not likely to drop significantly through 1977, according to the Ford Administration's own projections.

Ford Loses Demand For Spending Ceiling

By David L. Perlman

The House passed and sent to the Senate a labor-supported tax bill designed to keep the economy from another tailspin and to make a very modest start towards tax reform.

It would continue through 1976 the $1 billion-a-month injection of purchasing power that began with the income tax cut enacted last spring under a temporary law that expires Dec. 31. Without new legislation, withholding taxes will shoot up in January and pinch a still fragile economy.

Before passing the bill by a 257-168 vote, the House adopted three of the five tax reform measures urged by the AFL-CIO. They would narrow some of the loopholes now available to wealthy individuals and corporations, and in the process bring in millions of dollars in additional revenue.

The biggest battle came over President Ford's demand that Congress "pay" for any tax cut by agreeing in advance to a spending ceiling for the 1977 fiscal year. Otherwise, the President warned, he will veto any tax cut bill.

The President's position was that Congress would have to commit itself now not to spend more than $375 billion in the next fiscal year, a figure based on a budget that won't even be submitted until late January. But House Republicans leaped on the proposal as a way to cast a supposedly politically useful vote against "spending."

The House voted 219-197 against changing the rule for taking up the tax bill so as to allow the spending ceiling amendment to be considered. Before passing the bill it defeated another Republican attempt to impose a spending ceiling, 220-202.

Of the amendments considered by the House, five were supported

N.Y. Loan Bill Moves To Senate

The House agreed to a short-term federal loan to enable New York City to avoid bankruptcy and the Senate was expected to approve it despite a filibuster that prevented an immediate vote.

Even though the terms of the bill had been largely dictated by President Ford, most House Republicans voted against the loan. On the 213-203 vote, the bill was supported by 175 Democrats and 38 Republicans. Opposed were 103 Democrats and 100 Republicans.

Ford had earlier threatened to veto any "bailout" of New York City, despite warnings that the economic collapse of the nation's largest city would spread hardship far beyond New York's borders.

After the city and state acted to increase the tax burden and impose economies that included heavy layoffs and a construction freeze, Ford agreed to short-term seasonal loans of up to $2.3 billion to tide the city over between tax collections.

The loan will carry an 8 percent interest rate—returning a profit to the federal treasury — and future revenue-sharing funds will serve as

Senate Study Confirms:

Foreign Investment Cuts Income, Jobs

Direct investment abroad by large U.S. corporations has resulted in a reduced national income and losses of American jobs, technology and management skills, a new study prepared for the Senate Subcommittee on Multinational Corporations confirms.

Carried out by Prof. Peggy Musgrave of Northeastern University, the study has startling implications for labor as reflected in these highlights:

- Foreign investment by U.S. corporations has meant a drop of 4 percent or $25 billion annually in U.S. labor's share of national income.
- In 1970, U.S. firms paid their foreign labor wages which were less than half as much as they paid their U.S. workers.
- Foreign investment is largely concentrated in high-technology and research and development-intensive industries, thus decreasing the U.S. worker's precious advantage of technological superiority.

Prof. Musgrave, who is one of the nation's leading tax economists, focuses particularly on the distribution of economic returns between capital and labor that results from foreign investment by U.S.-based multinational corporations.

"Our analysis suggests that if the capital accumulated abroad as of 1968 had been invested domestically, labor income after tax would be 4 percent larger, while after-tax capital income would have been 17 percent smaller," she notes in the study.

"This is not an insignificant shift, and a factor which should be allowed for in determining public policy toward foreign investment."

Since the domestic capital stock in the United States is reduced by foreign investments, the rate of return on capital will be higher while wage rates will be lower, the Musgrave analysis observes.

"The opposite holds for the foreign host country where the capital stock has increased. It follows that U.S. labor loses while labor in the host country gains," the study adds.

The size of American investments abroad has reached "very

Rail Accord Resolves Subcontracting Issue

A year of difficult negotiations between four railroad shopcraft unions and the nation's major railroads ended with a tentative agreement resolving the key issue of subcontracting.

The agreement, subject to ratification by union members, provides "substantial improvements" in rules governing working conditions along with the economic pattern agreed to earlier this year by other rail unions. The package of wage increases and fringe-benefit improvements amounts to a 41 percent boost over a three-year period, retroactive to Jan. 1.

Announcement of the settlement came at a Washington press conference called by federal mediators. The four shop unions representing 75,000 workers, that make up the AFL-CIO Railway Employes' Dept. are the Boilermakers-Blacksmiths, Firemen & Oilers, Carmen and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The main obstacle in the long-standing dispute was the issue of outside subcontracting of mainte-

2-Union Alliance Wins Units Totaling 43,000

Boston—An alliance of two AFL-CIO affiliates won bargaining rights for 43,000 state workers in representation elections held under the year-old Massachusetts collective bargaining law.

The successful joint campaign was mounted by the State, County & Municipal Employees (AFSCME) and the Service Employees (SEIU). They appeared on the mail ballots as the Alliance, operated out of a joint headquarters—and won in every head-on competition with the unaffiliated Massachusetts State Employees Association.

Of the nine statewide bargaining units where votes were held last month, the Alliance won clear victories in five units containing more than 85 percent of the workers involved.

A nurses' association won an expected victory in a unit of 3,000, an unaffiliated correction officers group led the ballot for a 1,350-member unit, but the Alliance has challenged the vote. In two other small units, runoffs will be necessary.

Two law enforcement units were not involved in this round of elections and will vote in February.

Both AFSCME and the SEIU started off with a substantial membership base in a number of state departments and agencies. When

Histadrut Dinner Address:

Kirkland Warns Tilt in UN, Detente Threaten Freedom

By John R. Oravec

The basic values of justice and human rights are being jeopardized by the growing anti-Israeli sentiment in the United Nations and by the American policy of detente, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland warned in accepting the Histadrut Humanitarian Award.

Kirkland noted in an address to 400 guests attending a dinner in his honor that the ties between the American trade union movement and Histadrut, the Israeli labor federation, go back to 1928.

That was before fascist and communist despots emerged with a thirst for scapegoats and easy answers for simple minds, he said.

"Those who remained committed to the idea of democracy, justice and human rights were timid, careful, tolerant even of terror and blackmail—and very, very diplomatic," Kirkland observed.

He suggested that that part of history, which appeared as tragedy, is now in danger of being repeated as farce.

"What is more disturbing in the world today is not so much the territorial advances of despotism," Kirkland said, "but the softening-up process—the erosion of will, and the political and psychological accommodations taking place in the remnants of the free world."

Occasionally, the U.S. government will deliver a mild rebuke to totalitarians, he noted.

"Every now and then there is a gentle suggestion to the Soviet Union that there may be a limit to our forebearance, that the sacred cow of detente may not forever survive the repeated, massive assaults on our interest and values," he said.

But those "slaps on the wrist" are mainly for domestic consumption, Kirkland said, and are not really directed at the enemies of the free world.

He said the setting for the emerging historical farce is in the UN, an instrument that America helped create. These "tools of peace conceived by us in good will for the benefit of all men are now turned against us — their purposes twisted and perverted by a reactionary global elite of sheiks, commissars and tin-horn despots."

The atmosphere in the UN now reeks with blackmail, cowardice and lies, Kirkland stressed, and the only good thing left in the UN is U.S. Ambassador Daniel P. Moynihan.

The future of the U.S. role in the UN and in the International Labor Organization will depend on whether American representatives get the needed support of their government "when they speak out the plain unvarnished truth, or whether we undercut them, or tut-tut them to death, like the umbrella-wielder from Britain," Kirkland declared.

He said future participation will also depend on whether our "alleged allies" take a stand for human rights, rather than seeking refuge in compromise and abstention.

"Israel stands as a model of human and social values which our other allies would do well to emulate—not for our sake, or for Israel's, but for their own," he stressed.

He pledged continuing AFL-CIO support for Histadrut, Israel and the struggle for democracy in the Middle East.

The award presentation was made by Uzi Bloch, Histadrut representative to the United States and Canada, with the assistance of Israeli Ambassador Simcha Dinitz.

Kirkland is the 15th noted American to receive the award since 1950. Previous recipients include Harry S. Truman, Eleanor Roosevelt, AFL-CIO President George Meany, A. Philip Randolph and Walter P. Reuther.

The selection of Kirkland was made by the National Council for Labor Israel, the American Trade Union Council for Histadrut and the National Public Service Council for Histadrut.

Kirkland was cited for his "outstanding efforts in fostering sympathetic understanding between the people of the United States and the people of Israel, and his warm encouragement to the cause of Histadrut."

Oregon Officers Seated, Election Ruled Valid

Portland, Ore.—Officers and executive board members of the Oregon AFL-CIO took office here Dec. 1 after Federation President George Meany ruled that their election was valid.

A number of challenges had been filed at a two-day state executive board meeting here Nov. 6-7, alleging that the federation's constitution was not strictly adhered to in the seating of convention delegates, the election process and in executive board action involving the eligibility of certain candidates. The election had been held at the state federation convention in September.

Following a request from the state executive board to settle the controversy, Meany ruled on Nov. 26 that the challenges were not timely in that they had not been raised at the time the convention accepted its election committee report. He directed that the election results should stand.

The new state AFL-CIO president is Robert Kennedy of the Machinists, who had defeated incumbent Dean Killion of the Woodworkers. The latter had held office since 1973. Kennedy has been directing business representative of Machinists District Lodge 24 in Portland. His eligibility as a candidate was one target of the challenges.

Another new officer whose eligibility had been challenged is Nellie Fox of Retail Employees Local 1092 in Portland, who was elected executive director of legislation and political education for the Oregon AFL-CIO. She previously had been the state federation's women's activities director and prior to that was second vice president. She defeated Lloyd Knudsen of Portland Electrical Workers Local 48, who had held the political-legislative post since 1969.

Kennedy is the first member of the Machinists to head the state federation and Fox is the first woman elected to one of the three full-time posts.

Also sworn in on Dec. 1 was Glenn (Pat) Randall of the Carpenters, who was re-elected secretary-treasurer. His candidacy was not among those challenged.

At the Dec. 1 meeting, following the ruling by Meany, pleas for unity within the state federation were voiced by Kennedy, Killion, Fox and Knudsen.

Frank Emig, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, administered the oaths of office to the state officers and executive board members. In addition to Randall, other re-elected officers are Earl Kirkland, Columbia Pacific Building & Construction Trades Council, first vice president, and Inez McPherson, Portland Waitresses Local 305, second vice president. Of the 18 district members of the executive board, 11 are newly elected.

Senate Nears Action on Loan To New York

collateral for the federal government.

If opponents continue to seek to delay the bill in the Senate, the vote of 60 senators will be needed to invoke cloture and limit debate. Supporters think cloture can be achieved unless absenteeism holds down the vote.

A strong indication of Senate support was a 57-23 vote rejecting an attempt to delay action by sending the House-passed bill to committee instead of taking it up immediately.

Earlier, the House Banking Committee had approved a bill calling for a $7 billion loan guarantee for New York bonds to be sold on the private market. But when Ford announced his approval of a smaller direct-loan plan, that was substituted for the loan guarantee bill.

Meanwhile, purchases of state and city bonds by municipal pension funds with the concurrence of union trustees have enabled the city to keep one step ahead of actual default.

ILGWU Opens Talks With Dress Industry

New York—The Ladies' Garment Workers opened talks on a new dress industry contract that seeks a "substantial" wage increase for some 60,000 workers in the metropolitan New York area and in nearby states.

ILG President Sol C. Chaikin told delegates at a meeting of the Dressmakers' Joint Council and executive boards of its locals that a specific figure had not been set because "we don't know what's going to happen" to prices in the next couple of months.

The union's current three-year agreement with the industry expires on Jan. 31, 1976. Chaikin noted that so far this year, the cost of living has gone up at an annual rate of 7 or 8 percent.

There are five major employer groups involved in the negotiations, representing dressmakers in New York, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Maryland.

The dress negotiations generally set the pace for bargaining in other women's apparel fields, including sportswear, children's dresses, coats and suits.

Chaikin said the union would seek new and higher minimum guarantees; additional employer contributions for pensions, health and welfare funds, and other improvements.

Vice President Murray Gross, pinpointing some of the specific contract goals, said the union would ask for an increase of 2 percent in employer contributions to the retirement fund. He said the nation's economic recession has caused an increase in the rate of retirements, with fund outgo exceeding fund income and new federal legislation regarding vesting rights adding to the financial obligations of the retirement fund.

Other matters to be dealt with, Gross said, include additional holidays; the setting of an expiration date that will bring the new contract closer to a common expiration date with other outerwear contracts; elimination of area differentials; a determination of the status of cut-up shops, and a simplification of contract language.

Funds Increase Backed For Education Institute

The AFL-CIO declared its support of a bill to authorize additional appropriations for the National Institute of Education.

Walter G. Davis, director of the federation's Dept. of Education, told a House subcommittee the agency is a "vital component" in providing the leadership "to quickly resolve those remaining questions for which important research is needed."

Davis lauded the priority research and development needs set forth in the bill. The three-year-old agency seeks to improve education in the United States by concentrating its resources in the following areas:

- Improving student achievement in basic educational skills, including reading and mathematics.
- Overcoming problems of finance, productivity and management in educational institutions.
- Helping schools meet their responsibilities to provide equal opportunities for students who speak limited English, women and students who are socially, economically or educationally disadvantaged.
- Improving means of disseminating the knowledge gained from basic educational research and development.
- Preparing youths and adults for entering and progressing in careers.

Commenting upon the section of the bill on career education, Davis noted the AFL-CIO has "serious reservations about some plans which have been put forward in the education marketplace of ideas to implement this goal."

For example, he said, "the notion that secondary school students should enter the work force to gain needed 'hands on' experience in communities with high levels of unemployment reflects an insensitivity to the problems of the unemployed and to the heads of households affected by the downturn in the nation's economy."

The legislation would authorize the appropriation of nearly a quarter-billion dollars to fund the agency over the next three years.

OEIU Member Named Mine Safety Adviser

Jerry Martin, safety and training director of Operating Engineers Local 3 in San Francisco, has been named to the safety and health advisory committee of the Metal & Nonmetal Mine Safety Administration.

Martin succeeds Alan Burch, safety and health director of the IUOE, who served on the advisory committee since July 1974.

As Spur to Economy:

Tax Cut Extension Approved by House

by the AFL-CIO and congressional liberals as genuine tax reform while two were opposed as weakening the bill.

The House Ways & Means Committee earlier this year had given tentative approval to a number of tax reform provisions. But under heavy pressure from business lobbyists, the committee majority backed down at the last minute and deleted most of the revenue-raising features of the bill.

Liberal Democrats on the committee demanded and got the procedural right to bring up for a vote in the full House five tax reform amendments. Those adopted in the bill sent to the Senate would:

- Drop from the committee bill an amendment that became known as "the H. Ross Perot giveaway" because it would have enabled that one wealthy Texan to collect a $15 million tax refund. It would enable wealthy individuals to carry back for three years capital losses above $30,000. That carried 379-27.
- Strengthen the minimum tax requirement so that the very wealthy will not be able to avoid virtually all federal income tax. That single amendment would raise an estimated $376 million in 1976 and more than $500 million in later years. It passed 314-107.
- Continue the 30 percent withholding tax that Middle East oil producers and other foreign investors now pay on dividends they receive from U.S. investments. The committee bill would have eliminated the withholding tax. The amendment carried, 301-119.

Rejected were two other labor-supported amendments. One would have prevented real estate investors from offsetting actual profits from one property with artificial "paper losses" from another. It was defeated, 226-192. Also beaten was a move to further tighten restrictions on tax breaks given companies under the DISC program—the Domestic International Sales Corp. The vote was 223-199.

There are strong indications that the Senate may set aside the tax law changes—both the reforms added in the House and the assortment of other changes incorporated in the Ways & Means Committee bill — until the second session which starts in January.

The tax cut provisions would then be handled as a separate bill and rushed to the President in time to avoid a January rise in withholding taxes.

House Republican Leader John Rhodes said before the vote on the tax bill that he had checked with Ford and was told the President still plans to veto any tax cut that lacks a spending ceiling.

The tax cut voted by the House is actually larger than the reduction currently in effect, even though the difference will not be reflected in withholding tables.

That's because the $8 billion individual income tax cut Congress enacted last March was actually compressed into nine months of the year as far as withholding tables were concerned.

To maintain the same impact in terms of purchasing power pumped into the economy, the income tax reductions in the House bill amount to about $13 billion over the year.

The tax bill enacted last spring, however, included a one-shot rebate on 1974 income taxes that amounted to more than $8 billion. There is no such rebate provision in the new legislation.

The House bill also continues a reduction in corporation taxes and the higher investment tax credit Congress enacted this year.

UNION SPIRIT of Massachusetts state workers was demonstrated in this Boston rally—and in the representation election victories for the Alliance, a coalition formed by the State, County & Municipal Employees and the Service Employees. It defeated a long-established unaffiliated association in statewide balloting to win bargaining rights for 43,000 workers.

Massachusetts Union Alliance Scores Gains

statewide bargaining units were set up under the collective bargaining machinery, the overlapping could have led to election battles between the two AFL-CIO unions as well as with the long-established employes' association, which represented about 10,000 state workers.

Instead, the Alliance was formed.

It was conceived by the Massachusetts locals of the two unions directly involved, proposed to their parent organizations and supported at the national level by AFSCME President Jerry Wurf, SEIU President George Hardy, and their top aides.

Its staff included consultants experienced in opinion polling and telephone bank techniques as well as organizers from both unions. A particular target was a unit of more than 12,000 clerical employes, where the unaffiliated association had been considered strong. When the ballots were tallied, the Alliance had nearly 58 percent of the unit's votes.

A big professional employe unit voted for the Alliance, and so did other units representing the great diversity of public employment—in institutions, shops and offices throughout Massachusetts.

The Alliance campaign focused heavily on the economic squeeze that has hit state workers, whose pay has not kept up with the cost of living rise. While living costs, especially in Boston where most state employes work, are among the nation's highest, the Alliance hammered at the fact that Massachusetts ranks a poor 21st in wages paid its employes.

A union coalition could do better than the state employe association, the Alliance contended—and most workers agreed.

Income, Job Cuts Laid To Foreign Investments

substantial" magnitudes, the study notes. Most of the capital outflow has gone into the highly developed, industrial countries of Western Europe and Canada.

The investments are heavily concentrated in the largest corporations in the manufacturing oligopolies and in natural-resource processing, particularly petroleum.

"U.S. direct investment abroad in 1973 amounted to well over $100 billion (book value), having tripled since the early '60s," the study notes. "The market value of these investments, furthermore, is of the order of $160 billion and the average annual increase over the past three years has been $10 billion."

The Musgrave analysis suggests that putting the capital to work at home rather than abroad on balance would increase the level of national income arising in the non-financial corporate sector of the economy.

The study also notes that capital outflow "cannot have anything but a weakening effect on the organizational power of labor." U.S. union strength tends to be reduced by foreign investment, the study observes. The reduction in union strength is a result of many factors, including the following:

- Multinational corporations' ability to play off their foreign workers against their U.S. workers.
- The reduced economic resources of U.S. labor.
- The increased wealth of multinational corporations.

The study suggests that tax reform is needed to encourage U.S. companies to invest more at home and less abroad, a position long advocated by organized labor.

The study finds that the great flow of U.S. investments abroad is a result not of neutral international capital markets, but of U.S. government incentives to invest abroad.

At its convention in October, the AFL-CIO reaffirmed its call for an end to preferential tax treatment that encourages U.S. firms to shift production and jobs abroad.

Rail Accord Resolves Subcontracting Issue

nance and repair work on railroad equipment. RED President James E. Yost said this issue was resolved and that the carriers had agreed to limit the practice.

Yost foresaw no problems in gaining approval of the pact by rank-and-file members. "We're going to make an all-out effort to get the agreement ratified, and we do not anticipate any difficulty," he said. One union, the Firemen & Oilers, does not require member ratification.

Yost said terms of the new contract would be sent out to leaders of the other three unions by this weekend. They in turn would put the proposed pact before the full memberships.

"We didn't get everything we wanted," Yost said, "but we achieved very substantial improvements." Along with the subcontracting issue, he noted, the unions resolved differences over wage inequities, work rules and several other matters.

"The fact we've reached agreement without a work stoppage shows that collective bargaining can work," Yost noted. He commended George S. Ives of the National Mediation Board and W. J. Usery, Jr., of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service for their help in settling the long contract dispute.

Chairman William H. Dempsey of the National Railway Labor Conference, which represents the carriers, described the settlement as "a satisfactory accommodation."

Negotiations on the new contract opened well over 12 months ago. While 11 other rail unions accepted the "pattern" settlement, RED unions rejected it, citing particularly thorny problems affecting their members.

In September, President Ford named an emergency fact finding panel, as provided by the Railway Labor Act, to look into the dispute. Among other proposals, the panel recommended language covering job protection.

The two sides differed in their interpretation of the proposal on subcontracting, however, and the unions threatened to strike. A deadline was set for Nov. 10, then twice postponed to allow the presidential panel to clarify its language on the subcontracting issue.

Members of the union negotiating team included Yost; Assistant President O. W. Jacobson of the Carmen; Wesley Gordon, special representative of the Boilermakers-Blacksmiths; Vice President Frank Gladney of the IBEW; Andrew Ripp, an assistant to Gladney; and George J. Francisco, secretary-treasurer of the Firemen & Oilers. Also participating was Edward J. Hickey, RED's counsel.

New Law Creates Productivity Center

President Ford signed legislation creating a National Center for Productivity & Quality of Working Life, an independent agency within the Executive Branch.

A board of directors, yet to be appointed, will include at least five representatives of organized labor, as well as individuals from the business community, state and local governments, academia, and the general public.

The center replaces the National Commission on Productivity & Work Quality which was established in 1970 to seek ways to improve the rate of productivity in the United States.

Roofers Spur Program To Revive Construction

Las Vegas, Nev.—Full cooperation of the Roofers to help resolve the problems of the nation's depressed building and construction industry was pledged by President Roy E. Johnson at the union's 20th triennial convention here.

Johnson stressed in his keynote address to the 340 convention delegates that the union must continue its efforts in the interest of those workers "who still have faith in the American dream."

He urged local unions to form task forces aimed at developing programs to curb the high unemployment rate and to revitalize stagnant construction projects.

Despite the recent sad state of the construction industry, Johnson noted that the Roofers have continued to grow in membership. The union has shown a steady growth rate since 1963 to achieve an average membership of 27,000 over the past two years.

President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., in an address to the delegates, traced the nation's economic problems to governmental inaction and the lack of strong leadership in the Administration and in Congress.

"The current recession has only increased the public's displeasure with government," Georgine declared. "Governmental policies are blamed for causing the recession and governmental inaction is blamed for lengthening the recession."

Because faulty policies have been allowed to continue, the nation's problems have grown, he observed, warning that "more inflation, another recession and additional cutbacks in much-needed construction all loom on the horizon."

Attempts by Congress to resolve the economic crisis have been met by vetoes and veto threats, which Congress has been unable to overcome, Georgine noted.

Delegates elected Johnson, who had been appointed by the Roofers executive board in January 1974, to a full three-year term as president. Sec.-Treas. Dale Zusman and 10 vice presidents were also elected to new terms.

The convention also voted to increase the monthly per capita payment by $1, in addition to adopting several constitutional amendments and 27 resolutions.

Dr. William J. Nicholson of the Mount Sinai School of Medicine reported preliminary findings of a health hazards study commissioned by the Roofers.

Other speakers included Fred J. Driscoll, Jr., chairman of the Impartial Jurisdictional Disputes Board, and Jim Arnold, secretary of the southern Nevada Building & Construction Trades Council.

Sharing the Squeeze

WE WOULD LIKE TO make it clear that our opposition to revenue sharing was never founded on any disagreement with the need for a stronger federal role in helping states and localities meet continuing and growing public investment needs.

To the contrary, our basic and most fundamental objection to revenue sharing was based on our judgment that the program would not result in any added federal money for the states and localities but would be used as an excuse to underfund existing programs or block enactment of new measures which would in fact increase the amount of federal funds flowing to the states and localities for specific, essential programs.

State and local governments generally, and larger cities in particular, are currently caught in a severe financial squeeze. Recession, inflation and unemployment have reduced revenues and sharply increased costs. The federal government has compounded the problems by failing to enact or adequately fund federal programs needed to create jobs, end the recession and help state and local governments meet escalating needs for essential public facilities and services.

State and local governments have cut costs by laying off workers, reducing hours, and putting "freezes" on personnel and wages resulting in a sharp deterioration of public service. Vital services such as trash collection, police and fire protection, education and public transportation have been cut back. Needed improvements and additions to public facilities have been postponed or cancelled, bond issues have been rejected by voters and buyers; and the nation's largest city has been on the brink of financial collapse for months.

Over the past two years, state and local tax receipts have grown by 8.9 percent and 8.7 percent respectively—substantially below the increases in inflation and at the same time recession-related social service costs have skyrocketed.

Significantly, the federal government's share of the public investment expenditures of state and local governments has been falling since 1973. In the year ended June 30, 1973, the federal aids to state and local governments accounted for 25.2 percent of state and local outlays. In 1974 and 1975, the proportion fell to 23.6 and 23.3 percent respectively.

It is obvious that at best the revenue sharing experiment has been a cruel disappointment—even to many of its most outspoken advocates and proponents.

We therefore call upon the Congress in considering renewal of the State & Local Fiscal Assistance Act to make changes in the allocation and entitlement formula which will assure that funds are targeted to areas in line with their need for essential public facilities and services. Particular emphasis must be placed on the needs of the nation's urban centers. The allocation formula should be weighted in a fashion which would encourage increased state use of fairer and more progressive income taxes and generally help to encourage more modern and responsible state and local government structures.

Congress must provide adequate and enforceable federal standards and safeguards to assure that funds are used for programs that reflect national needs and priorities and fully comply with federal civil rights guarantees and labor standards and protections.

A Word Edgewise:

Campaign to Recognize PLO Rerun of Viet Cong Scenario

By John P. Roche

BEGINNING AROUND 1965 the international Communist political warfare apparatus began orchestrating a worldwide campaign to "Recognize the Viet Cong." By 1967 the din was appalling: pickets outside the White House, visitations of scholars and clergymen, screamers on television, and marchers on the Pentagon assured all and sundry that American refusal to recognize the South Vietnamese National Liberation Front (NLF) guaranteed a continuation of the war.

It was a beautiful job—particularly since the vast majority of those involved didn't know the NLF from the NRA—and those of us on the receiving end often felt as though we were in a steel drum being showered with bricks.

So, eventually, after the great charade over the shape of the table at the "peace" negotiations in Paris, we admitted the NLF as an independent party to the discussions. Hardly a day passed without the extremely effective Mrs. Nguyen Thi Binh appearing on television news denouncing American intransigence.

Well, that was long ago and in a distant country . . . today it is quite clear that Hanoi doesn't recognize the NLF. We who said the whole thing was a fake from the outset are in the position of the cavalryman with an Indian arrow in his back: Asked by the doctor if it hurt, he said, "Only when I laugh, Doc, only when I laugh."

Ever since the fall of the Republic of Vietnam last spring, the NLF has been shunted to the sidelines. With characteristic ruthlessness, Pham Van Dong and Le Duan (himself a southerner) have thrown away a tool that lost its utility. Mrs. Binh still makes a speech from time to time, but her speechwriters now emphasize the unity of North and South Vietnam, not the autonomy of the NLF's Provisional Government.

In a classic bit of chutzpah, Hanoi did support the admission of two Vietnams into the United Nations—perhaps drawing a lesson from the Soviets who got the "independent states," the Ukraine and Byelorussia, admitted to the world organization. The Vietnamese ploy was vetoed by the United States.

Meanwhile, back in Indochina the order of the day is unification. From the day of victory the South has been effectively ruled by the North Vietnamese military led by Lt. Gen. Tran Van Tra. Symbolically Saigon was put on Hanoi time —it was formerly an hour off. Those governments that rushed to recognize the Provisional Government (technically the People's Revolutionary Government: PRG; the NLF wearing a different hat) were politely informed by Hanoi that consuls, not ambassadors, would suffice for Saigon.

FURTHER TO EMPHASIZE who won the war, the immense loot remaining after Saigon fell was not turned over to the PRG despite its purported sovereignty. It was shipped North and is now being auctioned off to various friendly purchasers and Asian liberation movements. A number of South Vietnamese escaped with aircraft to Thailand. Bangkok has received a number of demands that this equipment is stolen property and must be returned—from Hanoi, not from Mrs. Binh, the foreign minister of the PRG.

However, on Nov. 21 (according to the Hanoi news agency) Mrs. Binh was trotted out for a press conference in Saigon where she had the privilege of announcing that negotiations between the PRG and Hanoi over reunification had successfully been concluded. One can only imagine how strenuously Mrs. Binh held out for national autonomy in the south, but the communique simply reported agreement on a unified, independent, and socialist Vietnam. Nationwide elections, according to Radio Hanoi, will be held "in the first half of 1976." I suspect Mrs. Binh will get elected to this new national assembly.

I'm not sure there is any point in bringing this up. The simple-minded characters among the intelligentsia who fell for the ploy have long since tossed their participation into the mental dispose-all. (Indeed, I met one the other day with whom I gently raised the matter; he looked at me blankly.)

But it is relevant to the current Communist agit-prop scenario: "Recognize the Palestine Liberation Organization." And this, unfortunately, is doing very nicely.

Non-Violent Efforts Succeed:

Campaign to Destroy Dr. King Boomerangs on Hoover, FBI

By Bayard Rustin

IT IS NO SURPRISE that J. Edgar Hoover hated Martin Luther King, Jr. But even in this cynical age accustomed to dirty tricks and deceit it is shocking to learn the desperate and despicable lengths Hoover and the FBI went to in order to destroy King.

During the time when I worked with Dr. King, we knew that the FBI had sent spies into the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and we suspected that we had been bugged as well. In recent weeks it has been revealed that the FBI went much further—that they organized and carried out a campaign designed to destroy Dr. King. The FBI tried to prevent a college from giving King an honorary degree, they hatched a plan to keep the Pope from granting him an audience, and tried to undermine the financial support for the SCLC.

The FBI did not stop at trying to destroy King as a civil rights leader. Nor did they stop at a slanderous whispering campaign planned to destroy Dr. King's personal reputation. They went so far as to send a note and tape recording to King in late 1964 in an effort to drive him to suicide.

Paradoxically the revelations about Hoover's six-year campaign to destroy Dr. King make it clear that it was not King's reputation that was damaged by this effort but the reputation of Hoover and the FBI. Hoover's suspicions about King, if they could be called that, tell us more about him than about King.

Certainly in his later years Hoover was a petty man, jealous of his reputation, and deeply resentful of any criticism. It is unclear what aroused Hoover's suspicion of King, but perhaps it was the very largeness and charity of King's character.

If it could be said that King and Hoover were foes, the way in which they conceived of their contest and the manner in which they reacted to each other show the stark contrasts between the quality of man that each was. While Hoover used a federal agency to carry on a personal vendetta against King, Martin was engaged in a great battle for social justice through non-violence and Christian love.

One incident during my 10-year association with Dr. King illustrates this difference. Apparently angered by Dr. King's criticism of the FBI for appointing conservative agents to investigate civil rights violations in the South, Hoover publicly attacked King as the "biggest liar" in the country. Many of King's advisers, myself included, urged Martin to make a counterblast at Hoover, demanding that Hoover produce evidence to back his charge.

But public denunciation was completely alien to Martin's character. Whenever someone was in error and especially when they wrongly attacked him, Martin always sought a personal conference to attempt to reconcile the differences.

Thus he met with Hoover and asked the FBI chief to explain just what he had done that Hoover considered deceitful. Hoover, of course, was unable to supply any basis for his attack.

I don't imagine that Martin would have been too alarmed at the knowledge that the FBI was out to destroy him. What would have disturbed him and what should disturb us today is that all the time and effort devoted to tearing down King could have saved the lives of many people who were killed during the great crusade to gain civil rights.

THE GOOD THAT MEN DO does live long after they have died. Dr. King did much good in his life. It is our responsibility to make sure that that good continues and that it be expanded. For what King did will be regarded one hundred years from now as one of the greatest contributions to mankind.

Martin took the strategy of non-violence a step even beyond Gandhi. He showed that it is possible for a minority using the principles and tactics of non-violence to win concessions from the majority. He showed that it is possible to secure justice and realistic to dream of a better world.

Widespread Abuses:

Farm Labor Law Violations Fail to Deter UFW Advances

THE FARM WORKERS are posting major representation election victories in California, despite widespread violence and intimidation against them, AFL-CIO Organizing Director Alan Kistler said.

Kistler said the recent in-the-field investigation by a special subcommittee of AFL-CIO vice presidents bore out the union's charges that its members were victims of assaults, arrest, firings and blacklistings that severely handicap the effectiveness of the state's new farm labor law designed to guarantee that farm workers are represented by the union they—not their employers—choose. He said that short funding and incompetent administration have opened the door to those abuses.

He laid major blame for the crippled operation of the new law on the failure of the legislature and the responsible state agencies "to recognize the dimensions of the task." But, he stressed, most people—including the AFL-CIO—think "it is a good law . . . it at least provides some mechanics for workers to demonstrate whether or not they want collective bargaining and whom they want to represent them."

Kistler charged that the failure of the labor board's representatives to enforce the law effectively "has permitted the continuation of the collusion and coalition of the growers and Teamsters. That distorts the elections."

If there are assurances the elections can be conducted in a fair atmosphere, Kistler said, "in time, the Farm Workers will demonstrate to everybody's satisfaction that they are the dominant union in the California fields."

Kistler cited recent election results showing 167 victories for the UFW to represent 24,334 workers, compared with the Teamsters' 95 for 11,373 workers. He also noted that there have been 54 elections in which workers formerly represented by the IBT switched to the Farm Workers, but there have been no switches from the UFW to the Teamsters.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Kistler said the AFL-CIO has spelled out a series of steps that the state should take to boost the law's effectiveness and eliminate "conditions that almost inherently prevent the act from doing what it is supposed to do."

Turning to union organizing in general, Kistler said "the state of organizing is pretty healthy—there is a great deal of organizing activity . . . all over the country among all industrial groups." He said the economic decline has had a mixed effect on union organizing. He pointed out that "it's easy for employers to exploit the economic fears of people" and fend off unions, but at the same time, he added, "workers increasingly realize that in times of economic distress they need someone to represent them—for security."

Kistler was questioned by Dale McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine. The program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

YEARS OF EFFORT to enact programs to meet long-neglected needs of children and to strengthen family life are in danger of being swamped by conservative propaganda.

More than a thousand letters have poured into congressional offices in a coordinated effort to block the proposed legislation. The drive has developed such momentum in recent weeks that Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.), a leading advocate, denounced it as "a vicious and totally inaccurate propaganda campaign."

Mondale said the bill is the target of "one of the most distorted and dishonest attacks" he has ever seen.

Mondale made a point-by-point rebuttal of the more irresponsible charges in the Congressional Record, Nov. 19.

"Wild and completely false allegations are being made," Mondale said, "that this legislation would somehow give children the legal right to disobey their parents; somehow prohibit parents from providing religious training to their children; somehow give the government authority over child rearing, and somehow give children the right to complain about their parents and teachers 'without fear of reprisal.'

"These allegations are absolutely and completely false," Mondale declared. "There is not a shred of truth in any one of them."

Mondale said the allegations in the unsigned propaganda are derived from a "Charter of Children's Rights"—a document circulated in Britain and cited by Sen. Carl T. Curtis (R-Neb.) during Senate debate in 1971. One item in the charter says that children have the right to resist "excessive claims" by parents—such as being ordered to take out the garbage.

To combat the distortions, Mondale restated the need for the Child & Family Services Act:

"Forty percent of the young children in the United States have not been immunized fully against childhood diseases. The infant mortality rate in this country is shockingly and unnecessarily high—higher than that of 13 other nations.

"Almost two-thirds of pre-school children with handicaps are not receiving the special services they need. An estimated 200,000 children are struck each year by handicaps that could have been prevented if their mothers had received early health care.

"While there are almost six million pre-school children whose mothers are working, there are only one million spaces in licensed day-care homes and centers to serve them."

MONDALE LISTED the key elements of the proposed program: totally voluntary access to health, education and child care services; pre-natal care and early screening to detect and remedy handicaps in children; nutrition assistance; day care for children of working mothers.

He stressed that the bill explicitly recognizes that "the family is the primary and most fundamental influence on children" and its programs "must build upon and strengthen the role of the family."

The changing role of women has pointed up the great need for quality day care facilities. Women in the child-bearing and child-rearing age range of 25 to 44 entered the labor force in large numbers since 1960. While this is partly due to rising divorce and separation rates, many younger women in recent years have chosen to pursue career ambitions while also raising children.

In 1971, the child development program passed Congress as part of an extension of the Office of Economic Opportunity. President Nixon vetoed it and the Senate failed to override.

The completion of Senate hearings this past summer spread fear among conservatives that the Child & Family Services Act might clear an "ultra-liberal" Congress—in the words of the Conservative Digest—with enough votes to override a possible Ford veto.

This may explain the scare campaign by conservative writers and the appeal by a group called the National Coalition for Children to its 300 member bodies in 40 states "to generate a flow of mail to Congress that will grow to an avalanche."

MAJOR VICTORIES are going to the Farm Workers in representation elections under California's new farm labor law despite widespread violence and intimidation against the union, Director Alan Kistler, center, of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services reported on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Tom Joyce, left, of Newsweek magazine and Dale McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

ILO Agrees to Explore Public Employe Issues

Geneva—A worker-backed proposal for an international guarantee of trade union and civic rights for public employes will be considered by the International Labor Organization.

The ILO's Governing Body agreed to put the issue on the agenda of the 1977 ILO Conference. It acted at the urging of the worker members. The Governing Body, like the ILO itself, is made up of worker, employer and government representatives.

Irving Brown, U.S. worker delegate to the ILO and a member of the Governing Body, said the rights of civil servants should include the "ultimate weapon" of the strike.

The Governing Body also approved further studies by the ILO into the impact of multinational corporations on workers. Joseph Morris, chairman of the ILO workers' group and president of the Canadian Labor Congress, urged expansion of the studies into additional industries.

Brown, who is also the AFL-CIO's European representative, said the ILO studies should encompass the multinational combines of "the so-called Socialist bloc" of Eastern Europe and not be limited to the West.

In a discussion of a forthcoming maritime conference to develop international standards on the working and living conditions of seamen, the issue of runaway shipping arose.

Employers sought to delete the term "flags of convenience" from conference documents dealing with substandard conditions on board ships registered in countries such as Liberia and Panama in order to evade safety, tax and labor regulations. But the phrase was kept in the documents, as the worker group urged.

In action strongly supported by worker delegates, the Governing Body pressed its demand on the military government of Ethiopia to receive an ILO delegation to inquire into the arrest of Beyene Solomon, president of the Ethiopian Trade Union Confederation, and two of his aides.

The Governing Body session was the first following the notice served by the United States of its intention to withdraw if the ILO continues on the political course of recent years. Brown noted that the Governing Body did not get diverted by purely political concerns.

2 Unionists Named To Job Safety Panel

Two trade unionists have been appointed to the Federal Advisory Council on Occupational Safety & Health. They are John A. McCart, executive director of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., and George Taylor, executive secretary of the federation's standing committee on job safety and health.

Talks Stalled, Teachers Walk Out in Pittsburgh

Pittsburgh—Little headway was reported in contract negotiations involving some 3,700 city teachers who struck early this week for higher wages and improved working conditions.

While perfunctory bargaining sessions were held between Local 400 of the American Federation of Teachers and the Pittsburgh Board of Public Education, the two sides remained far apart.

Local President Albert R. Fondy observed, "It certainly looks like a very long strike." The walkout, approved by a 2,600 to 6 vote of union members, was completely effective and resulted in a shutdown of all schools, he said.

The third teachers' strike here in eight years, the walkout hinges on the board's refusal to negotiate certain issues as well as the gulf that separates the two sides on economic matters.

The Teachers are seeking a two-year contract with annual wage increases ranging from $1,300 to $3,500. Teachers now are paid between $8,700 and $16,700 a year. The board's latest pay-raise offer was a flat $300 for all.

The city has taken the position that issues such as class size, discipline policies and other items are non-negotiable even though they were dealt with in the old contract. Disagreement over the school board's position has gone before the Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board.

The school closings have resulted in the city's lay-off of 1,150 non-academic workers, including food-service employes, bus drivers and custodial personnel.

Negotiations on a new contract opened last July 2.

Economic Index Shows New Decline

by the industry-financed Conference Board forecast that unemployment in 1976 will average 7.8 percent. That would be the highest for any year—except 1975—since 1942.

Of the 11 leading indicators available for the government's October report on the economy, four showed declines from September while five increased and two were unchanged. Contributing most to the overall decline was a change in total liquid assets such as cash and checking account balances.

Other falling indicators were net business formation, the nation's money supply and building permits. Indicators that showed increases were vendor performance, changes in sensitive prices, stock prices and new orders for consumer goods. The layoff rate and the average workweek remained unchanged.

In a revised report, the Labor Dept. said that productivity in the nation's private economy rose 11 percent during the third quarter instead of 9.5 percent as earlier estimated.

Meanwhile, in a separate report, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said that unit labor costs in non-financial corporations declined at the seasonally adjusted annual rate of 4.5 percent in the third quarter.

The decline was the steepest in more than 10 years and came atop a 3.2 percent drop in the previous quarter. BLS said the decline was due to a rise in productivity and a slowing in the rate of wage-rate increase.

Non-financial corporations include all U.S. firms except banks, credit agencies, stock and commodity brokers and insurance companies. BLS noted that unit profits in such corporations soared at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 95.9 percent over the July-September period, the largest quarterly gain since 1958 when the agency began compiling the series.

As a result, BLS said, unit profits were at an all-time high, and 27.8 percent above a year ago.

In other economic news, the government's wholesale price index for November remained unchanged from the October level. The Bureau of Labor Statistics said the index stayed at 178.2 percent of its 1967 base.

The report was the best news on the price front since June, when wholesale prices fell by one-tenth of 1 percent. In October, the index soared 1.8 percent from the previous month.

Ten-Year Growth:

37 Million Women In U.S. Workforce

Women workers now make up nearly 40 percent of the nation's labor force, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The 37 million women in the workforce as of mid-1975 represent an increase of more than 11.5 million in the last ten years.

Forty-six percent of all women 16 years of age and older held jobs in mid-1975, BLS reported in its magazine, Monthly Labor Review.

The labor force participation rate for women in the 16-24 age group increased from 43 percent in 1964 to 57 percent in 1974. Participation of women in the 25-54 age bracket rose from 44.5 percent to 54 percent. Among women 55 and older the participation rate dropped from 24 percent to 23 percent during the ten-year period.

BLS attributes the rise in participation of women aged 16-24 to such factors as the larger proportion of women who "either remained single, held a job after marriage, postponed childbirth, or joined the labor force before their children started school." In addition, many younger women were able to take advantage of the greater number of job opportunities in the expanding economy of the 1960s and the benefits from equal opportunity legislation, the survey suggests.

Changing attitudes toward women's role in society contributed to the rise of participation in women between ages 25 and 54. A drop in the birth rate during the past decade, rising divorce and separation rates, and the strengthening of "career aspirations and commitments of younger women" as a result of increases in education also influenced he rate rise, the report observes.

The report notes that despite sharp increases in the percentage of women in the labor force, they still suffer inequities. Women are "clustered in the same industries and occupations as women 35 years ago," BLS observes. In 1974, 40 percent of all women workers were employed in service industries, 20 percent in manufacturing, 20 percent in trade, and the remainder distributed throughout other industries.

Average salaries of women workers in all age groups are much lower than those of males in the same occupational categories. But "the gap between the earnings of men and women tends to be smaller for the younger women," BLS reports, "particularly among the better educated." Last year, 25-to-34-year-old female college graduates earned 70 percent of the salaries of their male counterparts, whereas among 45-to-54-year-olds the figure was only 56 percent.

Women also encounter higher unemployment rates than men. Overall unemployment rose from 4.7 percent in late 1973 to 8.9 percent in mid-1975. During the same period, unemployment of teenage women rose from 15 percent to 19.6 percent, and unemployment of women, ages 20-24, rose from 8.1 percent to 12.8 percent. The unemployment rate for women between 25 and 54 averaged 4.9 percent in 1974, compared to 3.1 percent for males in the same age group. The average unemployment rate for women 55 and over was 3.3 percent compared to 2.7 percent for older men.

Meany Names McCaughan to Women's Post

Cynthia McCaughan has been appointed by AFL-CIO President George Meany as Coordinator of Women's Activities in the federation's Dept. of Civil Rights, effective with the beginning of the new year.

The appointment of McCaughan as a staff assistant is a follow-up on the strong commitment to the rights of women workers voted by the recent AFL-CIO convention, including an amendment to the federation's constitution making explicit the responsibilities of the Dept. of Civil Rights in this area.

McCaughan currently is community services representative of the Los Angeles AFL-CIO and has been labor coordiantor with the United Way in that city since March 1953. She has been president of Office & Professional Employees Local 30 in Los Angeles for 20 years and is a past president and board member of the Western Labor Press Association.

She has also served the Los Angeles AFL-CIO on numerous committees, including those dealing with consumer affairs, civil rights, and women in the workforce, and has represented the central body on various community organizations.

She is married to Don McCaughan, a vice president of the Printing & Graphic Communications Union.

NEW NLRB MEMBER Peter D. Walther, right, chats with Board Chairman Betty Southard Murphy and the agency's new general counsel, John S. Irving, at swearing-in ceremonies. Walther, a Republican, continues the board's membership of three Republicans and two Democrats. Mrs. Murphy administered the oath of office to both men on separate dates at National Labor Relations Board headquarters in Washington.

Near All-Time Peak:

High Jobless Rates Grip 132 Key Areas

The number of major labor areas with "substantial" unemployment remained near the all-time high level last month, the Labor Dept. noted, as it reported 132 of the country's 150 big job markets experienced high jobless rates.

Substantial unemployment is defined by the government as a rate of 6 percent that is expected to stay at that level or higher for at least two more months.

A year earlier, only 53 major areas were classified as having substantial joblessness. In September, the number peaked at 135, the highest since the Labor Dept. began its present classification system in 1955.

The November total represented the second consecutive monthly decline in the number of areas with substantial unemployment. The October total was 134.

Last month, Chattanooga, Tenn., and Charleston, W. Va., were removed from the list because of an improved employment situation in those areas.

The Labor Dept. said the improved situation in Chattanooga was due to an increase in manufacturing hiring. Job gains also were reported in local government.

In Charleston, significant employment gains were reported in the fabricated metals industry, along with smaller gains in the stone-clay-glass, chemicals, mining, construction and transportation-communications-public utilities industries, the government noted.

In addition to the major areas, 32 smaller job centers were added to the government's substantial unemployment list in November.

Also last month, two additions were made to the government's list of areas with "persistent" joblessness. Such an area is defined by the Labor Dept. as one whose jobless rate has averaged 6 percent or more during the most recent calendar year and which has exceeded the national average by either 50 percent in three of the last four calendar years, 75 percent in two of the last three calendar years, or 100 percent in one of the last two calendar years.

There are now 1,119 areas classified as regions of either substantial or persistent unemployment. Of these, 829 are considered areas of substantial unemployment and 290 are on the persistent joblessness list.

Areas on these lists may be eligible for first preference in bidding on certain federal procurement contracts.

Electric Boat Strikers Okay New Contract

Groton, Conn.—Members of the Metal Trades Council here returned to their jobs at General Dynamic's Electric Boat Division following ratification of a new 43-month contract providing wage increases and benefit improvements for some 10,000 workers.

Approval of the settlement ended a 22-week strike at the submarine-building works. The ratification vote, completed the day before Thanksgiving, showed a ratio of better than 4 to 1 in favor of the pact.

Eleven unions make up the Metal Trades Council. The new agreement, which runs through July 1, 1979, calls for wage increases of about 41 percent over the life of the pact. Cost-of-living adjustments and fringe-benefit improvements over the term of the contract would bring the package increase to about 47 percent.

The chief obstacle to the agreement was the issue of worker productivity. The unions accused the company of trying to break craft lines. The dispute was resolved by an agreement to review individual job assignments at a series of union-management committees.

Farm Workers Ratify Minute Maid Contract

Tampa, Fla.—The Farm Workers have signed a new three-year agreement with the Minute Maid division of Coca Cola Co. providing for basic wage increases of 20 cents an hour and improvements in pension and medical plans.

The agreement covering 1,200 citrus grove workers was reached after a year of negotiations and was ratified unanimously, UFW Florida Director Mack Lyons reported.

Retroactive to Jan. 3, the date the old contract expired, the new agreement provides for an immediate across-the-board wage increase of 15 cents an hour and an additional 5-cent raise next Jan. 3. It also contains provisions for reopening on wages next Aug. 1 and on Aug. 1, 1977.

With the 15-cent wage increase, hourly rates will range from $2.60 to $4.55 an hour for the grove workers, Lyons noted. The piece rate for citrus fruit was also increased 5 cents a box.

UFW President Cesar Chavez said that although the negotiations were long and difficult, the new contract makes the Minute Maid farm workers the highest paid in the South.

Under the agreement, Minute Maid will for the first time contribute to the UFW pension plan, increase contributions to the workers' medical plan and provide the right of access to UFW representatives to the groves.

Chesser Is Co-Chairman Of Rail Safety Panel

President Al H. Chesser of the United Transportation Union was named co-chairman of the newly created Railroad Research Safety Board. The management co-chairman is Larry Cena, vice president for operations of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe.

The 11-member panel, organized by railroad unions and management, the rail supplies industry and the federal government, will concentrate on specific causes of railroad accidents and safety problems rather than on compiling statistics about them.

BICENTENNIAL PROJECT site where the Cleveland Building & Construction Trades Council will erect a log cabin is inspected by Mrs. Frank Kosich, president of Heritage Park, and BCTC Executive Sec. Charles R. Pinzone.

Unions Ask Safeguard In New U.S. Rail Plan

Chicago—Rail union leaders, at a meeting of the Railway Labor Executives' Association here, generally supported the new federally financed ConRail system—a restructuring of seven bankrupt railroads in the Northeast and the Midwest—and urged Congress to enact implementing legislation.

But, in a resolution, they called for continued operation of some 5,700 miles of the bankrupt carriers' "light-density" lines under 100 percent federal subsidy for at least a two-year period. They also made their approval contingent upon satisfactory negotiation of workers' rights under the new system.

ConRail—shorthand for Consolidated Rail Corp.—was drawn up by the U.S. Railway Association, an agency created by Congress to take over the troubled railroads and streamline them into a working system.

The "final system plan" for ConRail came into effect Nov. 9 when Congress failed to object to the reorganization plan. Either house of Congress had until then to order it back to the drawing board.

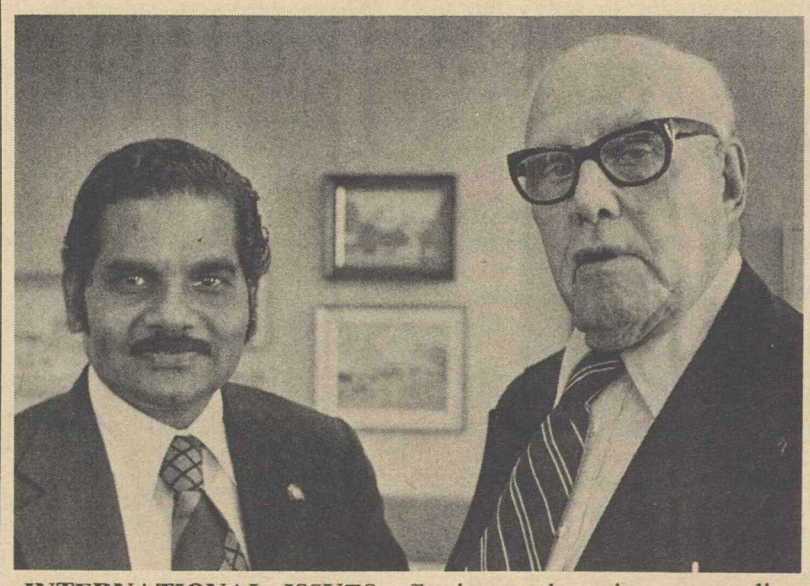
Under USRA's final plan, some 5,700 miles of rail lines would be discarded out of 21,000 miles of right-of-way operated by the seven bankrupt carriers.

Involved in the reorganization are the Erie-Lackawanna, Ann Arbor, Reading, Lehigh Valley, Central of New Jersey, Lehigh & Hudson River and the Penn Central. ConRail would operate in a 17-state area, hauling mostly freight.

The new system is scheduled to start operations around the end of February if funds are appropriated by Congress. Bills pending would provide $2.5 billion in start-up money.

Some 90,000 rail workers are involved in the new operation. USRA has set Feb. 27, 1976, as the deadline for ConRail to make "employment offers" to the bankrupt carriers' employes and also to "establish arrangements to make necessary employe protection payments."

By next Apr. 27, ConRail should "commence negotiations on new collective-bargaining agreements."



INTERNATIONAL ISSUES affecting trade unions were discussed at a meeting in Washington by AFL-CIO President George Meany and P. P. Narayanan, who recently was elected president of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in Mexico City. Narayanan also heads the Malaysian Trade Union Congress.

Crafts to Erect Log Cabin for Bicentennial

Cleveland—A log cabin, similar to the type used by early settlers here, will be constructed by building trades craftsmen as part of the bicentennial celebration.

The museum project is sponsored by the Cleveland Building & Construction Trades Council, representing 35,000 members, and the Women's City Club of Cleveland.

Tradesmen are donating their services in erecting the log cabin in Heritage Park on the banks of the Cuyahoga River, near where the city's founder, Moses Cleaveland, landed.

"It will be a new experience for our members to work with logs in the old manner, but we look at it as our contribution to the bicentennial celebration," said Charles R. Pinzone, council executive secretary.

The museum, which will include a utility building and comfort station, will cost $36,000. The unions have raised $2,500 toward the cost.

The construction unions were praised by Mrs. John Huey, club executive secretary. "They all have been wonderful in supporting this work that will benefit so many, especially school children who will learn something of their past history."

Pinzone said one of the biggest problems is trying to figure out how to provide the heating without distracting from the design. The cabin will be authentic in all other ways, he added.

Mrs. Frank Kosich, Heritage Park president, said the log cabin museum is being built with a "fine union spirit combined with a fine community spirit."

The foundation has been laid and the logs are expected to be notched and set in place soon.

The early settlers found Cleveland a forest city. Today, the logs had to be secured from Ashtabula, a city 50 miles east of Cleveland.

Flight Engineers Hit 'Laxity' on Air Hijacking

Sydney, Australia—Delegates to the Flight Engineers convention here, representing union members in 15 nations, condemned the "laxity" of some nations to the threat of air hijacking and terrorism.

The convention pledged "to take whatever action is necessary to achive uniformly high aviation security standards throughout the world."

The union, with about half of its 3,500 members in the United States, re-elected William A. Gill, Jr., from Pan American World Airways, to a sixth two-year term as president. Frank Durkin of British Airways was re-elected first vice president. Also re-elected were Vice Presidents Jack Wahle and Donald F. Thielke. Harry S. O'Brien, the union's secretary-treasurer and executive vice president, has another year remaining in his term.

The convention urged Congress to outlaw the airlines' Mutual Aid Pact, citing its "disruptive effects" on collective bargaining and the public interest. It also opposed the Ford Administration's proposal to deregulate airlines, recently introduced in Congress as the Aviation Act.

Australia's Minister for Transport, C. K. Jones, in an address to the delegates termed hijacking the most deadly threat to the world's civil aviation. He used the term to include "bomb threats, extortion demands and politically inspired actions against passengers, airlines and governments."

Delegates approved an increase in the union's per capita tax from the present $6.50 to $7 per month. The three-day convention was preceded by committee meetings in which many of the delegates participated. The union's 29th annual convention next year will be held in Las Vegas, Nev.

To Aid Elderly, Handicapped:

Ford Backs Down, Accepts 'Costly' Bills

President Ford backed away from two veto confrontations with Congress that he almost certainly would have lost. But the Administration continued to sound veto threats about other bills.

Ford signed into law a three-year extension of the Older Americans Act, a labor-backed program of grants for local and state agencies providing services for the elderly, community service jobs programs for older workers and other measures intended to enable the elderly to remain self-sufficient.

But the President complained as he signed the bill of the higher spending levels authorized "at a time when we are struggling to restrain growth in the federal budget."

Ford also put his signature on legislation establishing a new program of federal grants to help assure free and adequate education for the nation's 8 million handicapped children. The Administration had opposed the bill, contending that education of the handicapped should remain a state responsibility.

Both bills had passed the House and Senate by such one-sided margins that the two-thirds majority needed to override a veto was virtually assured.

A new veto threat surfaced on the ConRail bill, which would authorize $3 billion in federal financing for the Consolidated Rail Corp. that will take over operations of seven financially failing Northeast railroads.

Transportation Sec. William Coleman, Jr., told a news conference that the measure sent to the Senate floor by the Commerce Committee is "totally unacceptable" to Ford. He said that if Congress approves it, the President will veto the bill and summon Congress to work during the Christmas holidays on a less costly version. Congressional leaders are working towards a Dec. 19 adjournment.

The fate of two other major bills remained uncertain:

• A comprehensive energy conservation bill, including a partial oil price rollback, has been approved by a House-Senate conference committee in a compromise version endorsed by the President's energy administrator, Frank Zarb.

Despite Zarb's endorsement, influential Republicans from oil producing states have been pressing Ford to veto the bill.

• A House-Senate conference committee that has been long deadlocked over a school busing issue agreed to report an appropriations bill containing funds for the Labor Dept. and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare. An anti-busing amendment that the Senate had tacked on the bill will be reported in disagreement—a procedure that will allow the House to vote on whether to accept, reject or rewrite the amendment.

There is no dispute over other provisions of the bill and the conferees dropped a Senate-added amendment which would have exempted establishments with three or fewer workers from enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

The veto possibility has nothing to do with any of these controversies, however. The Administration considers the aid to education funding level too high, and the President may veto the bill for budget reasons.

Scheduled for House action after the vote on the tax bill is a labor-supported measure extending for 10 years the Nuclear Indemnity Act, a combination of no-fault government and private liability insurance protecting the public against loss in the event of an accident at a nuclear power plant site.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller wrote House members urging approval of the measure, noting that it has helped make possible the development of nuclear power from the experimental stage to where it now supplies nearly 10 percent of the nation's electric energy capacity.

During the 18 years the law has been in effect, he said, not a single claim has been filed under it.

3 Hazardous Industries Targets of OSHA Drive

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration is developing a special enforcement program aimed at curbing job hazards in iron and steel foundries, non-ferrous casting plants and metal stamping shops, the Labor Dept. announced.

Worker injuries, illness and deaths in these three industries have been running at an extremely high rate—from 23 to 36 cases per 100 employes a year, OSHA noted. These levels compare with the national average incidence rate in 1973 of 11 per 100 workers for all private non-farm industry.

An estimated 500,000 workers face potential job hazards in the selected industries, OSHA pointed out. The occupational injury dangers include electrical shocks, burns, scalds, cuts and amputations, while the health hazards cover such areas as extreme noise and exposure to toxic substances.

The agency said that from 60 to 70 of its 1,200 safety inspectors will be assigned to the national emphasis program (NEP) covering the foundry, casting and metal stamping occupations. Similar efforts are being planned for other high-hazard industries, OSHA reported.

Bert Conklin, deputy assistant secretary of labor for OSHA, said the agency will work closely with union, employer, professional groups, insurance companies and the states to develop guides, training courses and informational materials in an effort to identify and to correct hazards before the stepped inspection activity gets under way.

The new NEP effort is an outgrowth of OSHA's earlier "target industry" program to curb occupational injuries and illness in several other high-hazard industries.

That program concentrated on roofing and sheet metal, meat cutting, lumber and wood products, and water and miscellaneous transportation. Conklin noted that the effort had reduced injury rates from 3 to 5 percent, but had mixed results in lowering the number of lost workdays.

In other developments, OSHA also has called for changes in exposure levels on sulfur dioxide and ammonia.

Under the proposal, exposure to sulfur dioxide would be cut to two parts per 1 million parts air (2 ppm) from the current permissible level of 5 ppm for an eight-hour period.

The recommended change on ammonia calls for retaining the ceiling at 50 ppm, but limting exposure to a five-minute period from the present eight-hour time weighted average. It also would prohibit worker exposure to any amount of liquid ammonia.

Longshoremen Hit Canal Plan To Hike Tolls

New York — Longshoremen's President Thomas W. Gleason has urged President Ford to reject a proposed change in Panama Canal vessel rules, charging that the revision would be "arbitrary, discriminatory and against the interests of the national economy."

According to maritime interests, the effect of the rule change would be to increase toll charges for American containerships by more than 50 percent.

The proposed revision would redefine the rules for measuring ships using the inter-ocean canal to determine the toll. The ILA and American-flag shipping interests contend that this would result in a de facto increase in tolls that would escalate the cost of ocean freight moving through the canal between the Far East and Atlantic and Gulf Coast ports.

In a letter to Ford urging rejection of the rule change in the national interest, Gleason noted that the increased costs would fall heaviest on American containerships and other types of general cargo vessels because they are the prime users of the waterway.

He said the impact of the rule change on foreign tankers, bulk and other all-purpose ships would be minimal because the new rule would hardly affect the measurement of such vessels.

"The Panama Canal will raise over $20 million in new tolls and almost all of it from general cargo and container ships," Gleason noted. "It is our position that any toll adjustments—if necessary at all—should be made without the mischief inherent in the present changes which . . . must have a direct effect on the American consumer."

R.I. Union Plan Gets Go-Ahead For HMO Aid

Providence, R.I. — The Rhode Island Group Health Association is the first labor-sponsored prepaid health plan to qualify for federal assistance under the 1973 Health Maintenance Organization Act.

RIGHA, sponsored by the Rhode Island AFL-CIO, provides health care services for 15,000 prepaid members and 2,000 others on a fee-for-service basis.

With the certification by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, unions that have members enrolled in prepaid health plans can negotiate with their employers on "dual choice" options of HMO services or conventional plans providing reimbursement for payments.

New Federal 'Consumer' Programs Seen Excuse for Veto of Agency Bill

Government agencies promised to become "more responsive to the needs of the American consumer" in what appeared to be a White House effort to minimize any political backlash from President Ford's threat to veto the labor-backed consumer agency bill.

At a White House news briefing, reporters were given 181 pages of agency proposals to keep the public better informed and give "consumers" more of an opportunity to be heard in the shaping of policies and regulations.

Reporters were told that Ford gave instructions "to proceed at once to put these plans into effect."

Groups that have been fighting for greater consumer representation generally saw the program as window-dressing to justify the anticipated veto. Ford, who once voted for a consumer agency bill as a congressman, now attacks the concept with the argument that "we don't need yet another federal bureaucracy."

Carol Foreman, executive director of the Consumer Federation of America, termed the agency programs announced by the White House a "pathetic sham" and "nothing more than a devious attempt to undercut the Agency for Consumer Protection" bill, which has passed both the House and Senate and is now in conference committee to be put into final shape.

Some of the agency proposals involve creating new offices and positions, such as an assistant secretary for consumer affairs. Others involve nothing more than continued speech-making and pamphlet-writing explaining the mission of the department or agency.

Where added costs are involved, the White House indicated that the money would be diverted from other agency functions. As the President's consumer adviser, Virginia H. Knauer, put it: "It is hoped that present resources will be used, that new priorities will be set for the same resources."

The Dept. of Labor announcement said its consumer representation plan is intended "to identify and enhance opportunities for client groups and individual consumer participation at decision points in policy formulation, rulemaking activities and program evaluation."

Its "client groups" are further defined as including unions and employer associations.

A large part of the consumer program announcements of the various departments and agencies consisted of an account of procedures already in effect to keep the public informed and to solicit suggestions from interested public groups.

Congress Votes to Nullify State 'Fair Trade' Laws

A labor-supported bill nullifying state "fair trade" laws has cleared Congress and will take effect 90 days after it is signed by President Ford.

Consumer groups have long opposed such laws, which allow manufacturers to set the minimum retail price of their products without being subject to antitrust prosecution.

Although about half the states still have "fair trade" laws on the books, the controversy has abated somewhat in recent years since most manufacturers have given up trying to control retail prices.

The repeal measure had Administration support, passed the House overwhelmingly and was approved by voice vote in the Senate. It does not apply to liquor prices, however. When the prohibition amendment to the Constitution was repealed, Congress gave the states very broad power over liquor sales and any state laws affecting liquor prices will remain valid.

Meany Calls for Foreign Policy Reform

Asks Drive To Extend Democracy

AFL-CIO President George Meany called for a new foreign policy that would be based on the twin principles of "extension of democracy" and "defense of freedom."

He told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that America's one-sided "detente" with the Soviet Union has been "a great big flop." The United States has abandoned moral values out of fear of offending the Soviets, Meany charged. But the USSR "makes no secret" of its continuing efforts to impose its system on the world.

Meany welcomed the Senate hearings as a means of bringing public opinion to bear on policies of "secrecy and deceit" that have left Americans bewildered about their country's role in the world.

The only discernible U.S. foreign policy goal appears to be to maintain things as they are, Meany said. But even this "uninspiring purpose" appears to be losing ground to "an obsequious accommodation to a steadily growing totalitarian imperialism."

Meany read to the Senate committee a memorandum from the State Dept. to the White House warning against any presidential meeting with exiled Nobel Prize laureate Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn during his visit to Washington as a guest of the AFL-CIO. (Text, Page 7.)

The memo, from Secretary of State Henry Kissinger's top aide, said the President and White House officials should shun Solzhenitsyn because any welcome would be construed by the Russian government as "a sign of Administration weakness in the face of domestic anti-Soviet pressures."

Meany termed such reasoning "incredible." In the name of detente, the State Dept. is not concerned about "weakness in standing up to the Soviets" but instead expresses fear of showing "weakness in standing up to the anti-Soviets at home."

Thus, he told the committee, "not communism but anti-communism is now the enemy to be resisted."

Such thinking, Meany said, "is at the root of everything that is wrong with our foreign policy."

Meany said in reply to questions that the United States "can deal with the Soviets" but only on a "tit-for-tat" basis in which con-

Full Employment Act Set As 'Must' Goal in Congress

3% Target Urged For Joblessness

A "realistic, achievable and workable" full-employment law, guided by the principle of good jobs at decent wages for everyone able and seeking to work, is a "must" item for early action by Congress next year, the AFL-CIO declared.

Full employment — a major goal of the American labor movement from its earliest beginnings—is a necessity because "jobs are the lifeblood of the American economic system," the federation's Economic Policy Committee noted in a statement outlining "fundamentals" that should be included in proposed full-employment legislation.

"Congress must establish full employment as the top-priority objective of national economic policy to maintain the strength of American society," the committee said in the statement released by AFL-CIO President George Meany.

The concept of a full-employment law was strongly endorsed at this year's AFL-CIO convention. Noting that the Employment Act of 1946 contained "more promise than action," a convention resolution insisted:

"We need legislation which provides that the President and Congress spell out specific programs to create jobs for every American willing to work."

The AFL-CIO policy statement, drawn up by the committee under the chairmanship of Vice President I. W. Abel, president of the Steelworkers, declared that Ford Administration forecasts of unemployment—7.9 percent in 1976, 7.2 percent in 1977, 6.5 percent in 1978,

Workforce Declines:

Joblessness Sticks At 6-Month 'Plateau'

Unemployment fell three-tenths of 1 percent to 8.3 percent in November, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported, but a corresponding drop in the size of the workforce indicated the decline may have been due to an increase in the number of "discouraged" workers.

The government's regular monthly report on employment and unemployment also showed the number of persons holding jobs in November was little changed for the third straight month, indicating recovery in production may be stalled.

While the number of jobless workers fell by 301,000 to 7,701,000, seasonally adjusted, the labor force dropped by 464,000. BLS offered no explanation for the decline in the total workforce, noting only that "this decline moderated the relatively strong growth in the labor force that has been evident since March."

When workers become discouraged by the lack of job prospects and give up looking for work, they are no longer counted as part of the workforce and, as a result, the jobless rate is affected.

The nation's civilian labor force totaled 92,979,000 last month, of which a total of 85,278,000 held jobs. The number of employed was 163,000 fewer than in October.

BLS observed that unemployment has been on "a virtual plateau" for the past six months, hovering within a range of 8.3 to 8.6 percent.

"While the employment situation in November shows substantial improvement over the levels of last spring when recovery got under way, employment has been essentially flat for a month or two," BLS Commissioner Julius Shiskin told a congressional panel. The jobless rate peaked last May at 9.2 percent.

The drop in unemployment last month returned the jobless rate to October's level of 8.3 percent. Over-the-month declines were reg-

Final Action Near on Site Picketing Bill

A construction site picketing and collective bargaining bill moved towards final congressional approval after a House-Senate conference agreement on its provisions.

The House quickly adopted the conference version, 229-189. The Senate was expected to do likewise, whether or not opponents again resort to a filibuster. When the legislation was first before the Senate, last month, the Senate invoked cloture to limit debate.

Anti-union groups have already swung their campaign to the White House, to persuade President Ford to renege on his pledge to sign the legislation. Typical was the full-page newspaper advertisements of the National Right to Work Committee featuring an open letter to the President attacking the bill.

U.S. Job Losses Tied To Technology Drain

The big United States-based multinational corporations are virtually giving away America's future technological base in their worldwide search for profits, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller warned in an appearance before Congress.

"Today, so-called 'package' or 'turnkey' technology—the whole plant, building the facility, installing the machinery, training the workforce and providing skills for marketing and managerial know-how—is sold to foreign countries by American firms," Biemiller observed.

The effect of this wholesale transfer of American technology and direct investment abroad is the loss of more American jobs and skills, he declared. Furthermore, the transfer is flowing even faster than the rate predicted by U.S. economists and policymakers, he told the Senate Subcommittee on Multinational Corporations, which is studying the impact of the multinationals on the U.S. economy.

The multinationals justify this practice on the grounds that "if they don't get the 'sale,' the Japanese or the French or the Germans will," Biemiller said. "But the Japanese and almost every other nation have regulations to make sure they have a technological future

Loan to New York City Approved by Congress

Congress agreed to a short-term loan program to enable New York City to avoid immediate bankruptcy and President Ford signed it into law.

The legislation, tailored to President Ford's specifications to avoid a veto, will provide up to $2.3 billion in seasonal loans to tide the city over between tax collections. The loans carry stringent provisions to assure repayment and bear an interest rate that is 1 percent higher than the federal government pays on its borrowings.

To get the bill to the President's desk, the Senate had to break a filibuster by hard-core opponents who wanted the nation's largest city more severely punished for its budget deficits.

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield sharply criticized the "punish New York" attitude, noting that aid to foreign countries carries fewer restrictions than the bill before the Senate. "These are

Turner Elected as Head Of Operating Engineers

The executive board of the Operating Engineers has elected J. C. Turner as president effective Jan. 1 to succeed Hunter P. Wharton, who is resigning. Turner, 59, has served as IUOE secretary-treasurer for the past three years.

Wharton, 75, has been president of the 417,000-member international since 1962 and a vice president of the AFL-CIO since 1965. His resignation was accepted "with profound regret," the IUOE executive board said.

In other action, the IUOE board elected two new vice presidents—Frank Hanley, now assistant to Wharton, and Dale Marr, business manager of IUOE Local 3 in San Francisco. They were named to succeed Thomas A. Maguire of Local 15, New York, and Al Clem of Local 3, San Francisco.

The terms of the new officers will run until next April, when elections will be held at the IUOE convention.

Turner, a native of Beaumont, Tex., has been associated with IUOE Local 77 in Washington, D.C., since 1934. He served as business manager of the local, president of the Greater Washington AFL-CIO, president of the Washington Building & Construction Trades Council and a vice president of the Maryland-D.C. AFL-CIO.

He also has been active in political and civic affairs, including service as a member of the District of Columbia city council and as a Democratic national committeeman.

Turner was elected secretary-treasurer by the IUOE board in 1972 to succeed Newell J. Carman.

Wharton has been a member of the Operating Engineers since 1926, joining IUOE Local 66 in Pittsburgh after he was graduated from Carnegie Institute of Technology. Wharton served as local assistant business agent and business manager before he was appointed assistant to the president of the IUOE in 1950. He was elected a vice president in 1957 and named secretary-treasurer the following year. He became president of the union in 1962.

Senate Votes Metrics Shift As 'Voluntary'

The Senate has joined the House in approving a bill to facilitate voluntary conversion to the metric system of weights and measures.

Both bills are similar and meet the AFL-CIO's insistence that conversion to the metric system be "entirely voluntary" and not imposed on any industry, and that possible hardships or losses to workers be taken into consideration.

The legislation would establish a U.S. Metric Board with representation from various interested groups, including labor. Its function would be "to coordinate the voluntary conversion to the metric system."

In convention resolutions and in congressional testimony, the AFL-CIO has opposed bills that would have set a mandatory timetable for conversion to the metric system under the concept that costs of conversion should "fall where they lie" and that workers with large investments in tools of their crafts should absorb their loss.

The Senate-passed bill and the similar House measure direct the new board to study the problems of conversion and to recommend action to Congress and the President. The recommendations "may include . . . the impact on workers (such as costs of tools and training) and on different occupations and industries, possible increased costs to consumers" and other matters.

A House-Senate conference is expected to reconcile minor differences between the bills.

New York—The labor movement paid tribute to one of its finest photographers when an exhibit by Sam Reiss opened in New York City. Reiss had covered the labor scene for 27 years, until he recently became too ill to continue his work.

The exhibit, titled "Sam Reiss: An Eyewitness to Labor History, 1948-1975," is being held at the Manhattan headquarters of District Council 37 of the State, County & Municipal Employees. It will be on view until Feb. 6, 1976. After that it will be displayed at other unions around the city.

With 40 photos and a slide show of 140 shots, the exhibit depicts labor's struggles in demonstrations and strikes, its victories and the dignity of working people doing their jobs. The deep social commitment of Reiss also is evident in photos depicting the slums and the plight of the poor.

The exhibit was organized by the Labor Press Council of Metropolitan New York and Reiss's daughter Jesse. It was sponsored by 36 local and national unions that have employed Reiss's talents over the years. AFL-CIO President George Meany is honorary chairman of the exhibit.

At a reception opening the exhibit, Reiss expressed his gratitude to those who helped make it possible. "I feel privileged," he said, "to have been a eyewitness to such an exciting period of labor history, and I'm gratified that many who helped to make this history are here tonight."

Robertson Elected To Los Angeles Post

Los Angeles—William R. Robertson has been unanimously elected executive secretary-treasurer of the Los Angeles county AFL-CIO to fill the unexpired term of the late Sigmund Arywitz.

Robertson, 58, had been serving as interim executive officer of the County Federation of Labor since shortly after Arywitz's death Sept. 9.

Job Health Emphasized:

OSHA Gets Funds To Add Inspectors

Congress voted funds to improve the enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act as part of a multi-billion dollar appropriations bill that had been blocked for more than two months by a House-Senate conference deadlock over school busing.

If the President signs the bill—still a question mark since it exceeds his budget request—OSHA will be able to hire an additional 330 safety and health inspectors and supporting staff. The bill also includes money for a separate no-penalty program of "consultation services" for employers.

The House-Senate conferees dropped from the bill a Senate-adopted amendment that would have barred inspection of small establishments with up to three workers. That would have excluded 4 million workers.

Also discarded was another Senate provision that would have limited the fine for first-time "non-serious" violations by smaller firms.

The conferees did, however, voice some dissatisfaction with OSHA's performance. It directed the Labor Dept. to take "immediate steps to dramatically upgrade the skills of OSHA inspectors through intensive retraining."

Its report stressed occupational health hazards and cited statistics that deaths from occupational illness exceed 100,000 a year—nearly ten times the toll from job accidents. It said also that inspections should focus on serious hazards in industries with the most problems.

The overall appropriation bill carries $36.1 billion, most of it for the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare. It is about $1 billion over the President's budget, largely from money added for health programs the Administration wants to cut back.

The Senate had added amendments to bar HEW from requiring any busing to achieve school integration. The House had no such restriction in its bill.

Finally, agreement was reached for a procedure that would allow the House to vote on the conference agreement without any busing restriction, and then separately on one of the Senate's busing amendments.

The House adopted the conference report, 321-91, and agreed to the anti-busing language on a separate 260-146 vote. The rider bars HEW from requiring busing beyond the nearest school but does not affect busing required by court orders. The Senate concurred on a voice vote.

In other congressional action:

● A House-Senate conference agreement paved the way for final approval of a complex energy conservation bill that would combine measures designed to conserve oil, gas and electric power with continued controls over oil prices. The final version was a compromise worked out by Democrats in Congress with the President's energy administrator, Frank Zarb. But there has been speculation that the President might overrule Zarb and veto the bill, which is opposed by the big oil companies.

● A job-creating public works bill the House passed last May as a major anti-recession weapon finally emerged, in somewhat reduced form, from a House-Senate conference committee.

The conference bill would authorize $2.5 billion for accelerated public works construction programs—half the amount the House had voted. But it would pump new money into an economic development program adopted a year ago by adding $500 million for small-term projects that can be quickly started and put unemployed persons on a payroll. Also included in the conference agreement is a Senate-passed "counter-cyclical" program of aid to cities that have had revenue shortfalls because of high unemployment.

● The House passed and the Senate prepared to take up a labor-supported 10-year extension of the Price-Anderson Act, a form of no-fault insurance against claims arising from nuclear accidents. The insurance program is administered by a combination of private insurance and government underwriting. While no payment has ever been necessary under the program, its existence has encouraged development of nuclear power plants.

In a letter to senators urging approval, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller termed the program "an essential step in the national quest for energy independence."

Loan to New York City Approved by Congress

our own people," he said. "Why do we treat them like trash?"

The Senate invoked cloture to break the filibuster by a 70-27 vote—10 more than the required 60 votes. It then stayed in session until 1 a.m. the following morning to consider and reject an assortment of pending amendments, finally passing the measure by a 57-30 margin.

On a follow-up bill to actually appropriate the money, opponents abandoned plans for a filibuster in the face of certain cloture.

Supporters of help to New York City stressed that the short-term loan acceptable to the President was at best a half loaf in terms of the city's needs and is part of a combination of bone-deep slashes in city services and substantially higher taxes for the city and state.

The threat of bankruptcy still hangs over the city, and Congress followed up its loan bill with separate legislation providing procedures to deal with bankrupt municipalities.

In a byproduct of the New York City crisis, Gov. Hugh Carey asked the state legislature for a budget-cutting, revenue-raising combination to balance the state's budget. He proposed a $597 million spending cut in programs such as Medicaid, education and local assistance, plus $555 million in permanent tax increases and $320 million in a temporary corporate tax surcharge.

A further warning that New York's financial problems are far from over came from Teachers President Albert Shanker, who stressed in a statement that "the city's problems have their roots in national policies."

Big cities are victims of unemployment, falling revenues and crumbling tax bases, Shanker said.

Teamsters Lose Ground:

Farm Workers Score Gains In Imperial Valley Elections

Keene, Calif.—The Farm Workers are beginning to roll up a commanding lead over the Teamsters in the campaign to win representation rights for California's agricultural workforce as the UFW recorded six key victories in the Imperial Valley.

Despite concerted opposition from the Teamsters and growers, the UFW reported winning six of 10 elections in the valley to represent 791 workers. The Teamsters managed to pull off three victories with 330 workers, and one election for about 400 workers is undecided.

In five head-to-head elections between the UFW and the IBT in the Imperial Valley, the Farm Workers won three and the Teamsters one. The fifth is the undecided election.

A special task force of attorneys and investigators appointed by Gov. Edmund Brown, Jr., was assigned to oversee the elections in the valley, located in the southeastern sector of the state, which is now in peak harvest.

Brown set up the task force in response to numerous complaints—from the UFW, a special subcommittee of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, and others—that the staff of the state Agricultural Labor Relations Board has failed to enforce the new farm law effectively.

The complaints stemmed from questionable ALRB practices during the first two or three months of the elections after the law went into effect Aug. 28. During that period, the UFW charged that their union representatives were often denied access to workers, who also had been intimidated by Teamsters and the growers.

The task force, which was established with the purpose of improving the enforcement of the law under ALRB jurisdiction, continued to uncover irregularities in the Imperial Valley election campaigns.

Charges were brought against three growers and the Teamsters, citing illegal firings and surveillance, intimidation and grower favoritism to the Teamsters. The task force also issued charges of "false peaks" against the three growers in their attempt to have elections held when most of the workers were not employed.

Despite the roadblocks to fair and free elections, the UFW pointed out that it has made steady progress in its efforts to bring the workers into the UFW fold.

As of mid-November, the UFW had won 171 of the 318 elections conducted throughout the state by the ALRB. These give the union representation rights for 24,902 workers, compared with 96 election wins for the Teamsters to represent 12,802 workers, the UFW reported.

In 17 other elections involving 2,200 workers, the majority vote was for no union. There are 34 elections still undecided involving 11,105 workers.

At 165 ranches that had been under Teamster contracts, 55 ranches employing 7,652 workers switched to the UFW. The IBT won elections at 89 ranches, but the number of workers it had represented was heavily cut back by the UFW victories from 27,313 to 12,313.

The shortcomings of the ALRB activities that led to numerous election irregularities were brought out in the report of the AFL-CIO subcommittee issued last month.

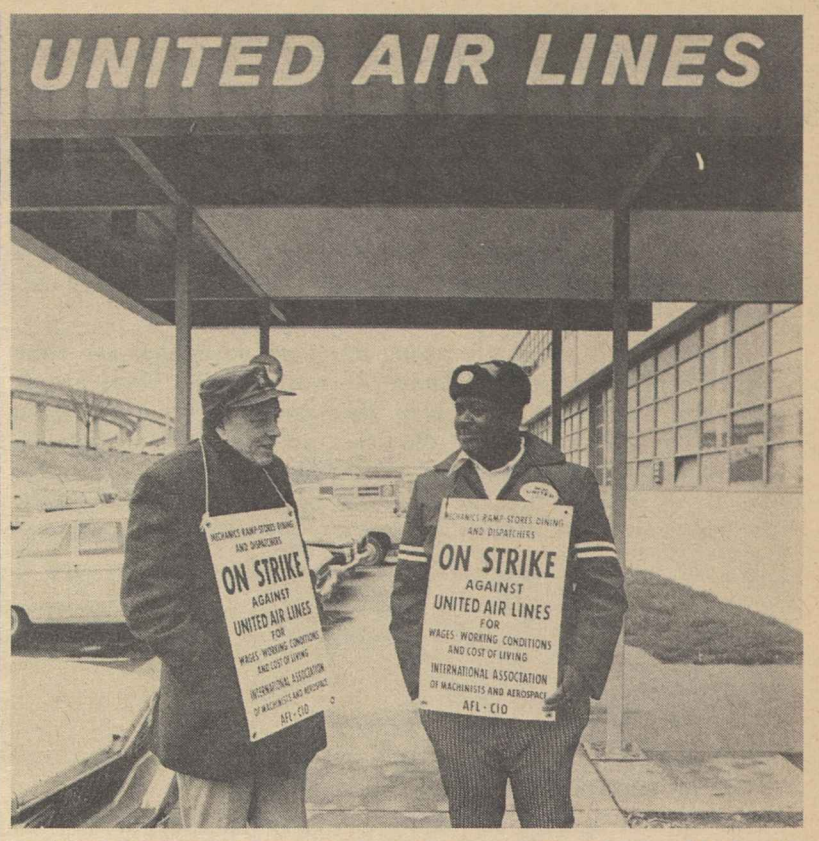
The UFW also issued a 63-page white paper titled "The Sabotage and Subversion of the Agricultural Labor Relations Act."

The UFW paper directs sharp criticism at the farm labor board's general counsel, Walter Kintz, charging that he and his staff have failed to curb a Teamster-grower conspiracy directed against the UFW and the right to free elections.

Despite the many problems the UFW has encountered in the elections, the union has reaffirmed its support of the law at recent hearings before the state legislature.

The UFW said it has lived up to its promise to the governor to refrain from unnecessary strikes. While the UFW engaged in numerous strikes in 1973 and 1974 before the law was enacted, thus far in 1975 only one minor wildcat strike occurred, the union noted.

While the UFW continues to support the ALRA, it charged that the Teamsters and growers are now working to undermine the law by opposing additional funding for the labor board's operations and for enforcement of the law.



MACHINISTS PICKET United Airlines at Washington National Airport in the union's dispute over a new contract. Nearly 17,000 IAM members are involved in the walkout that began Dec. 6. The union represents United's mechanics, flight dispatchers, ramp-service and food-service workers. All United flights are grounded.

United Airlines Struck By 17,000 Machinists

Nearly 17,000 members of the Machinists employed as ground-service personnel struck United Airlines Dec. 6 in a contract dispute over wages, fringe benefits and work-related problems.

As the walkout neared the end of its first full week, talks were suspended indefinitely and the airline—the nation's largest—canceled all of its 1,400 daily scheduled flights through Christmas eve.

Earlier, United laid off 13,000 non-striking employes and put 19,000 management and other non-union workers on half-pay.

Both sides agreed to break off talks while they re-evaluated their positions. David H. Stowe, chairman of the National Mediation Board, said negotiations could resume—at the request of either party — when federal mediators feel progress can be made.

Negotiations have gone on through the fall. The strike involves 16,700 mechanics, dispatchers and ramp, storage and food-service workers whose contract expired last Oct. 31.

Last summer, the two sides agreed to an expedited negotiating procedure under which negotiations were to continue through the end of the old agreement.

Both sides then could ask the National Mediation Board to proffer arbitration, which they did, thus triggering a 30-day cooling-off period. The countdown began on Nov. 6 and expired at midnight, Dec. 5.

During the 30-day countdown, the union workers authorized their negotiating team to call a strike at the end of the period if it was deemed necessary. Approval was by a 93 percent vote.

Only hours before the Machinists struck United, IAM negotiators announced a tentative agreement on a new contract covering 3,200 mechanics and other personnel employed by Northwest. Terms of the settlement were withheld pending ratification by the workers involved.

A tentative settlement with Continental Airlines in late November was rejected by the 1,800 union employes involved. That agreement would have raised the pay of top-rated mechanics from the present $7.84 hourly rate to $8.20 immediately and then in four steps to $9.50 an hour by Nov. 6, 1977.

In addition, two cost-of-living raises of 12 cents each would have raised the hourly wage to $9.74. Employes in other classifications would have received similar raises under the pact.

United's top mechanics, like those at Continental, now earn $7.84 an hour. The talks with all three airlines are part of the union's current round of bargaining with the industry. IAM represents about 50,000 ground-service personnel employed by seven air carriers.

Estimates of United's benefits under the industry's so-called Mutual Aid Pact were made by the Air Line Pilots which, along with other airline unions, has long argued that MAP gives the industry an unfair advantage in collective bargaining.

ALPA estimated that United stands to collect as much as $3.09 million a day during the first two weeks of strike. After that, the airline's maximum daily benefits would drop to $2.78 million in the third week, $2.47 million in the fourth week, and $2.1 million thereafter.

Women's Coalition Maps Program, Affirms Ties to Union Movement

Detroit—More than 1,000 participants in the first constitutional convention of the Coalition of Labor Union Women voted decisively to keep CLUW a trade union organization.

Women from 43 states and the District of Columbia, members of 63 national and international unions, took part in the three-day program. They rejected by big margins efforts to open up CLUW membership to non-union members, and they reaffirmed the coalition's main goal of developing action programs within the framework of the labor movement in four key areas:

- To strengthen the role and participation of women within their unions and the trade union movement as a whole.
- To seek affirmative action in the work place.
- To organize the millions of unorganized women workers.
- To encourage union women to play an active role in the legislative and political processes of their unions and the nation.

Founded in March 1974, CLUW now has 5,100 members in 47 chapters throughout the nation.

In a message to the convention, AFL-CIO President George Meany noted CLUW's "consistent progress" and stated that "as the AFL-CIO convention made clear, we are ready to cooperate with CLUW on programs of common interest, particularly passage of the Equal Rights Amendment—a priority matter to the entire trade union movement."

In her keynote speech, CLUW president Olga Madar, a retired vice president of the Auto Workers, traced CLUW's role in mobilizing support for ERA and cited the AFL-CIO convention action urging that the votes of legislators on ERA be used as one of the principal criteria for their endorsement by the Committee on Political Education (COPE) or by individual unions. She outlined a stepped-up program of lobbying in key states next year to win ratification of ERA.

"Our efforts during the last 21 months are only the beginning," Madar said. "Through unity, through our unions, working women will become full and equal partners—not only in our unions, but in every aspect of our daily lives. We demand no more than that," she declared. "We will accept no less."

CLUW's newly adopted constitution sets up a national council of five top officers and a national executive board with proportional representation from unions, regions and chapters.

Madar was returned to office as national president. Also re-elected were Vice President Addie Wyatt of the Meat Cutters and Treas. Gloria Johnson of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. Joyce Miller of the Clothing Workers was elected corresponding secretary and Patsy Fryman of the Communications Workers recording secretary.

The 12 CLUW regions are in the process of electing 15 regional vice presidents.

A yearly membership fee of $10 was established with $1 going to a special travel expense account. This travel fund will help defray the expenses of national executive board members who have no sources for reimbursement and thus increase their participation in meetings. The dues rate for retirees who maintain union membership was set at $5 per year.

Convention delegates heard Rep. Bella Abzug (D-N.Y.), introduced as "the patron saint of the Millinery & Hat Workers' Union," hail CLUW's efforts and said the coalition "should usher in a new era of equality for working women. We have an enormous responsibility to help our nation fulfill its commitments to all of the people," she said, and urged the coalition "to work toward adoption of National Health Security and child-care legislation."

Rockefeller Heads Productivity Center

Vice President A. Rockefeller has been named to head the new National Center for Productivity & Quality of Working Life, which absorbed the old National Commission on Productivity & Work Quality.

President Ford, who announced Rockefeller's appointment as chairman of the center's board, is not expected to name other board members until after Christmas.

The board, which may not consist of more than 27 persons by law, must include at least five representatives of organized labor. Other members will represent the business community, academia and the general public.

Job Training Pact Renewed In Appalachia

The Labor Dept. has awarded the AFL-CIO Appalachian Council a new $1.3 million contract to provide on-the-job training to about 1,400 unemployed and underemployed workers in a 12-state area.

Under the 12-month contract, the council will promote job development and training opportunities with employers in the region who have collective bargaining agreements with AFL-CIO unions.

The Labor Dept. said that about 640 persons will be placed as new job entrants and about 560 unemployed workers will receive 26 weeks of skill conversion training. An additional 200 will be given pre-job classroom courses of up to eight weeks and will receive allowances equivalent to unemployment benefits in their states.

The AFL-CIO Appalachian Council's programs under government contracts have helped train and place 21,089 workers in jobs since 1967, the Labor Dept. noted.

'One Basic Value'

WE HAVE GOT TO reassess the premises of our foreign policy. We have got to restore both our strength and our sense of purpose.

The Communists openly proclaim—Brezhnev has said it time and again—that detente does not imply the end of ideological warfare. On the contrary, it implies an acceleration of ideological warfare.

But how can we compete with the Soviets ideologically if we have given up our purposes and our traditional values as inimical to detente?

There is only one basic value, one basic idea, that can form the basis of our American strategy in world affairs. There is only one basic value, one basic idea, that can form the basis of an appeal by Americans to all the other peoples of the world—an appeal that will be heard and answered. That basic idea is the defense of freedom and the extension of democracy. Not merely the preservation of democracy, but the extension of democracy.

We will never rally the peoples of the world to our side with the slogan "Leave Me Alone!" We ought not to be afraid of shaking up the status quo. We ought not to be afraid of a new world order—a world order in which democracy and decency are on the offensive.

I believe that the adoption of a new world view based on the defense of freedom and the extension of democracy will go far toward restoring the sense of moral purpose that has evaporated from our foreign policy.

It is obvious that the abandonment of our moral purpose abroad is undermining our moral purpose at home—that the democratic ideal is weakened within our own borders whenever we turn our backs on it elsewhere.

WE IN THE AFL-CIO are not isolationists. We are internationalists. We reach out our hands to workers everywhere. We want all workers everywhere to enjoy a standard of living comparable to ours. We want all workers everywhere to enjoy the freedom, imperfect though it may be, that we have struggled to win in this country.

In the final analysis, the workers of the world must fight their own battles. We cannot fight them for them. But to be able to fight, wherever they are, they must have elementary rights. The right to assemble and associate freely. The right to speak. The right to vote. The right to strike—to withhold their labor when the conditions of their employment are not acceptable.

Because these rights are the prerequisites of social and economic progress for the working man, we hold that any system that would deprive the worker of these rights is his worst enemy.

Communist totalitarianism represents such a system in the world today. It takes away the worker's right to struggle—and there is no place on this earth where communism has ever taken away those rights and then returned them.

Democracy does not guarantee the worker a larger share of the pie. It just guarantees him the means to struggle—win or lose. But those means are crucial, for I know of no place where workers have advanced their conditions of life without struggle.

As we enter the last quarter of the Twentieth Century, a shaken but still strong America stands as democracy's best defender and probably last hope. As such, this country is the last best hope of workers everywhere.

A Word Edgewise:

Political Realists Essential To Supreme Court's Balance

By John P. Roche

PRESIDENT FORD'S NOMINATION of Circuit Judge John Paul Stevens to replace William O. Douglas involves more than an ideological shift—it puts another grey man on the court replacing a pirate. Douglas could—particularly in his later years—be exasperating, brittle and (in my professional judgment) just plain wrong. But there was an element of panache about the man: He once blandly cited an article of mine as evidence for precisely the opposite position of the one I had documented.

When the greatest judicial broken-field runner of them all, Chief Justice John Marshall, found himself in a corner, he would denounce "well-digested, but refined and metaphysical reasoning" designed to "explain away the Constitution of our country." Douglas, like Marshall, seldom allowed "metaphysical reasoning" to hinder the achievement of his goals.

This sort of behavior bothers the professional lawyers and particularly law professors. They emphasize—with a good deal of merit—the need for a judicial "temperament," for rigorous attention to precedent, and, above all, judicial experience as prerequisites for appointment to the bench. (Law professors have their own shtick: They think the Supreme Court should be populated with—you guessed it—law professors.)

I happen to think that a court composed of nine Douglases would be a disaster area—the Constitution of the United States is not play clay to be remolded weekly on an inspirational basis.

Yet I am equally convinced that a court made up of nine pure professionals (drawn from federal or state courts or from the law schools) would simply be out of touch with one crucial aspect of American constitutionalism: political reality.

If the Senate approves Judge Stevens, six of the nine justices will have primarily judicial backgrounds. Nothing said here is a denigration of Judge Stevens's talents, but doesn't the court need a healthy admixture of individuals who could find their way from the White House to the Hill without a seeing eye dog? Not necessarily an Abe Fortas, whose relationship with President Johnson was a bit too cozy, but a Robert Jackson or, to be non-partisan, a Charles Evans Hughes.

Let me give a couple of examples of what I mean. In the depths of the Great Depression, as banks attempted to foreclose farm mortgages, the American yeomanry were practically in open insurrection. Attempted foreclosures were simply aborted by force. Various states, responding to the inflamed electorate, passed mortgage moratorium laws which in essence postponed mortgage obligations.

In 1934 the Minnesota statute was brought to the Supreme Court as a violation of the contract clause of the Constitution (which, given existing doctrine, it clearly was), and Chief Justice Hughes (who had earlier served on the court, then run for President in 1916, and been Secretary of State under Harding) had the task of meshing reality with the contract clause.

He succeeded (though it was a 5-4 decision) with a masterpiece of constitutional improvisation which I termed the "secret drawer theory": The emergency, he held, did not create new constitutional authority, but it did make possible the exercise of powers previously unused.

Like Marshall, he took a side-shot at those who "attempt to draw a fine distinction between the intended meaning of the words of the Constitution and their intended application." Would Chief Justice Burger, or Judge Stevens have the savvy to engage in this vital creativity?

THEN THERE WAS Justice Jackson's remarkable dissent in the Korematsu case, where the court had before it the constitutionality of the incarceration of Japanese-Americans in concentration camps during World War II. Justice Black, sounding like an American Legion keynoter, upheld the abomination (Douglas agreeing). Frank Murphy wrote a passionate dissent on the merits. Justice Owen Roberts dissented in legal needlepoint.

Then came Jackson with some extraordinary advice to his brethren: In wartime, he indicated, we all know you can't win against the Commander-in-Chief, but this decision sets a fearful precedent for the future. When we know, he concluded, that we are boxed, rather than leave "a gun behind the door" for future repression, we should simply take a dive and refuse to reach any determination. Extremely good advice from a former Attorney General. Would it impress Judge Stevens or the other "professionals" now on the bench?

Alternative to Deficits, Recession:

Full Employment Economy Essential to Nation's Future

The following statement was adopted by the AFL-CIO Economic Policy Committee on Dec. 5, 1975. Vice President I. W. Abel is chairman of the committee.

FULL EMPLOYMENT has been a major objective of the American labor movement since its inception. A job opportunity at a decent wage for each person able and seeking work—the only definition of full employment that is acceptable to the labor movement—is an economic necessity, for jobs are the lifeblood of the American economic system.

From jobs come the wages that generate mass purchasing power. A job is a key measure of a person's place in society—whether as a full-fledged participant or on the outside looking in. Work is the source of individual fulfillment. It is positive, constructive activity.

It was in this spirit that the recent AFL-CIO convention reiterated its support for programs to achieve full employment and urged "the immediate adoption of a national full employment policy" by the Congress.

The convention resolution further declared: "The Employment Act of 1946 contained more promise than action. We need legislation which provides that the President and Congress spell out specific programs to create jobs for every American willing to work. At long last we must recognize that in our modern society a worker is entitled to a job as a matter of right and the total society, including government, must assume this responsibility and must guarantee its fulfillment."

The convention entrusted this committee with the responsibility of studying proposals pending in Congress and determining those fundamentals that must be included in planning a Full Employment Act to make it both achievable and workable. We consider the following to be essential:

1. Full employment must mean, in fact, job opportunities at decent wages for all those who are able to work and seek employment. This means that the unemployed, at any time, would be only persons who are temporarily jobless—such as entrants into the labor force, people moving from one job to another or from one part of the country to another, or people who are temporarily jobless as a result of seasonal fluctuations in their specific industry.

2. The Congress must declare, as we do, that the Administration forecasts of unemployment—7.9 percent in 1976, 7.2 percent in 1977, 6.5 percent in 1978, 5.8 percent in 1979 and 5.1 percent in 1980—are completely unacceptable. The Congress must undertake an immediate and sustained campaign to reduce unemployment to 3 percent of the civilian labor force and keep it from increasing, in the future, to more than 3 percent.

3. The Congress must require the President annually to submit to it targets, policies and programs to achieve full employment and to meet national needs.

4. The President must be required to propose specific federal tax, expenditure, budget and monetary policies and programs to meet the targets he proposes for full employment, balanced economic growth and national needs.

5. The Congress should establish a consultative body, composed of major groups in the economy, to review the President's goals and policies.

6. The Congress should provide procedures for prompt congressional review and action on the President's economic goals and policies.

7. The Federal Reserve, as a key government agency in the economic area, should be required to justify to the President and the Congress the manner in which its policies concerning interest rates, the money supply and availability of credit will help meet the targets and objectives that are established.

8. The full-employment goal must be good jobs at good pay. To the extent that the economy's regular channels of private and public employment fail to achieve that goal, the government must maintain a public employment program to provide additional jobs at prevailing rates of pay, but in no case less than the federal minimum wage. Such a program should be of sufficient size to keep unemployment below 3 percent.

9. The Congress must establish full employment as the top-priority objective of national economic policy to maintain the strength of American society. The Congress must realize that an obsession with budget deficits ignores the benefits of a full employment economy—increased jobs and increased earnings, reduced unemployment benefits and welfare costs, increased sales for business, increased savings and investment, and increased tax receipts.

The way to cut the deficit, quickly and substantially, is to put America back to work. Any other proposal means continuing deficits, continuing high unemployment, continuing hardship, continuing recession.

Those who put deficits before people have no faith in America. They would condemn America to continued idle plants, idle machinery, idle productive equipment, and idle manpower.

It is precisely because the AFL-CIO is so opposed to this negative thinking that we support a Full Employment Act. We consider it an early "must" item for consideration by the next session of the Congress.

There are many friends of the concept of full employment in the Congress who have demonstrated their concern through the introduction and support of legislation. We trust they will combine to push for a realistic, achievable, workable measure containing the fundamental points we have outlined.

It is the recommendation of this committee that this statement be immediately conveyed to every member of the Congress and that the help and assistance of the AFL-CIO be extended to members in the drafting of legislation that will meet our objective—jobs at decent wages for everyone able to work and seeking work.

TWUA's Stetin Charges:

J. P. Stevens Earns Reputation As Leading Labor Law Violator

THE GIANT J. P. Stevens textile company was branded as the nation's "number one labor law violator" by President Sol Stetin of the Textile Workers Union of America.

Citing a pattern of anti-unionism stretching back to the early Sixties, Stetin noted that even when the union wins representation rights in Stevens plants—despite the company's intimidation and coercion—the employer turns to long delays in negotiations and other processes that frustrate attempts to reach agreement on a contract.

He pointed out that at Roanoke Rapids, N.C., TWUA won bargaining rights in seven J. P. Stevens plants in August 1974. But after 15 months of bargaining the union has been unable to wind up contract talks with the company.

J. P. Stevens's tactics are more than hard labor relations efforts, Stetin said, charging that Stevens "heads up a conspiracy that is determined to keep unions out of the South."

He pointed out that the recent conventions of both the AFL-CIO and its Industrial Union Dept. pledged full support for the TWUA effort in J. P. Stevens—perhaps even a nationwide boycott of Stevens products—"if they don't agree to live up to the law of the land and enter into a collective bargaining agreement with our union."

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Stetin said that although the union's victory in J. P. Stevens's Roanoke Rapids operations hasn't yet brought that employer even close to solid labor-management relations, it was a significant breakthrough in the 13-year battle to organize Stevens. And, he added, the victory could be an indication of a changing tide in the South that will see expansion of the organized workforce in the years ahead.

DECEMBER 15 IS KNOWN as Bill of Rights Day. It is the anniversary of the date 184 years ago when the Bill of Rights became the first 10 amendments to the U.S. Constitution.

The original Constitution, consisting of seven articles, was sent to Congress on Sept. 28, 1787. Nine states were needed to ratify the document. New Hampshire became the ninth state on June 21, 1788. The Constitution was declared in effect on Mar. 4, 1789.

The First Congress, at its initial session in New York City, Sept. 25, 1789, submitted to the states 12 amendments to clarify rights not spelled out in the original Constitution. Ten of the 12 amendments were ratified and have since been known as the Bill of Rights.

I—Religious Establishment Prohibited. Freedom of Speech, of the Press, and Right to Petition.

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

II—Right to Keep and Bear Arms.

A well-regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms, shall not be infringed.

III—Conditions for Quarters for Soldiers.

No soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

IV—Right of Search and Seizure Regulated.

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

V—Provisions concerning prosecution. Trial and Punishment—Private Property not to Be Taken for Public Use Without Compensation.

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

VI—Right to Speedy Trial, Witnesses, etc.

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

VII—Right of Trial by Jury.

In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

VIII—Excessive Bail or Fines and Cruel Punishment Prohibited.

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

IX—Rule of Construction of Constitution.

The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

X—Rights of States Under Constitution.

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

J. P. STEVENS & CO., a giant textile firm operating in the South, was branded the nation's top labor law violator by President Sol Stetin, center, of the Textile Workers Union of America. He was questioned on Labor News Conference by Lloyd Schwartz, left, of Fairchild Publications and Donald Barnes of Press Associates, Inc. The program is aired Tuesday on Mutual radio.

Key House Rollcall Votes on Tax Bill

These five rollcalls on the tax bill show how House members voted in terms of the AFL-CIO's position.

Column I is the 219-197 vote establishing the ground rules for considering amendments to the bill. This was a key procedural issue that allowed votes on labor-supported tax reforms without the spending ceiling sought by the Administration. Right votes (R) were cast by 219 Democrats. Voting wrong were 139 Republicans and 58 Democrats.

Column II shows the 226-192 defeat of a labor-supported tax reform amendment to limit the artificial losses that could be claimed on income tax transactions in order to avoid taxes on actual profits from other properties. Right votes for the amendment were cast by 177 Democrats and 15 Republicans. Voting wrong were 125 Republicans and 101 Democrats.

Column III shows the 223-199 defeat of an amendment to shorten to three years from five years the closing of a big tax loophole for firms that defer export profits through the Domestic International Sales Corp. program (DISC). Voting right (for the amendment) were 194 Democrats and 5 Republicans. Voting wrong were 136 Republicans and 87 Democrats.

Column IV is the 220-202 rejection of a labor-opposed motion to send the bill back to committee with instructions to add to it the spending ceiling President Ford wants to impose. Right votes against the amendment were cast by 218 Democrats and 2 Republicans. Voting wrong were 139 Republicans and 63 Democrats.

Column V shows final passage of the bill by a 257-168 vote. Right votes for passage were cast by 225 Democrats and 32 Republicans. Voting wrong were 111 Republicans and 57 Democrats.

The House did approve by one-sided margins three reform amendments the AFL-CIO endorsed. By a 379-27 vote, it deleted from the bill a giveaway allowing wealthy individuals to use past capital losses to avoid current taxes. It approved, 314-107, an amendment tightening the minimum tax on persons whose income would otherwise be exempt from taxation. And it voted, 301-119, to retain a withholding tax on earnings of foreign investors in U.S. firms.

*Other symbols: A—absent. Asterisk * indicates paired right; X indicates paired wrong. Numerals show congressional districts; AL—at large.*

To Extend Democracy:

New Foreign Policy Pressed by Meany

cessions are met with concessions and closed doors are answered the same way.

Thus, he suggested, Soviet oil needed by the United States could be part of a government-to-government agreement to sell U.S. grain to Russia.

But detente, under the Nixon-Ford-Kissinger policy, has become "another name for appeasement."

Meany traced the long list of Soviet violations of the detente agreement of May 1972 in which both nations pledged to cooperate in the interests of world peace. It includes such blatant moves as Soviet encouragement of the sneak Arab attack on Israel in the Yom Kippur war to the latest intervention by the Soviet Union and Cuba in the Angola conflict.

"Why, then, was President Ford so eager to enter still another agreement with the Soviet Union at Helsinki?" Meany asked.

In return for U.S. recognition of the Soviet conquest of Eastern Europe, the "great concession we got from our Soviet partners in detente" was a promise to respect human rights "including the freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief."

Meany reminded the Senate committee that these same principles had been spelled out in 1948 in the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights, which the Soviet Union "signed with great fanfare."

And only a few months after signing the Helsinki agreement, Meany noted, the Soviet government has refused to let the distinguished physicist, Andrei Sakharov, leave the country to accept his Nobel Prize in Oslo, Norway.

Meany expressed concern that the United States, accepting rhetoric and promises at face value, is allowing the military balance of power to shift to the Soviets.

"We in the AFL-CIO know something about collective bargaining," he reminded the committee. "And I can tell you that any union president who brought back a package like the one Mr. Ford signed in Helsinki wouldn't survive the next union election."

As for the United Nations, it has become "an ugly joke" that demonstrates vividly the bankruptcy of American foreign policy.

"The only thing we have to be proud of in connection with this sorry organization is our ambassador, Pat Moynihan," Meany said. "He has begun to restore some sense of what this country stands for in world affairs—or ought to stand for."

If the UN has become merely a debating society, Meany said, "then let us enter the debate vigorously, or get out."

Meany raked the business groups that have rushed to sell technological advances to the Soviets—in at least one case at a price less than that demanded for a sale to the U.S. Navy. And the bribes paid by American corporations for foreign government officials have brought discredit on the United States, Meany said. Such acceptance of corruption, he suggested, "helps to explain the near disappearance of moral purpose from our foreign policy."

The only American appeal that will draw a response from the peoples of the world, Meany said, is "defense of freedom and the extension of democracy—not merely the preservation of democracy."

Jobsite Picketing Bill Nears Final Passage

The picketing portion of the bill would restore to construction unions the right to picket a common construction site where various subcontractors are working on the same job, even if the union only has a dispute with one of the contractors.

A 1951 Supreme Court decision barred such picketing, based on what unions consider lack of understanding of the close relation between a general contractor and the subcontractor he hires.

There were only a few differences between the House and Senate versions of the site picketing bill. Here's how the conferees reconciled the principal items in dispute:

- The Senate had exempted most homebuilding, specifically housing of no more than three stories without elevators. The House had narrowly rejected such an amendment. The conference modified the Senate exemption by applying it only to smaller contractors, those doing a gross annual business of less than $9.5 million.
- The Senate had exempted construction on which work had actually started not later than Nov. 15, 1975. The conference said such exemptions could run for no more than one year on projects involving less than $5 million in construction and no more than two years on larger projects.

There was also some clarification of language excluding common site picketing on certain public projects where state law requires that subcontracts be awarded by public agencies on the basis of bids, instead of through a general contractor.

The conferees followed the Senate pattern of including the construction industry collective bargaining bill as part of the site picketing legislation. The House had passed it as a separate bill.

Both measures had the endorsement of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. and of the AFL-CIO convention. Ford had said he would sign the site picketing bill if it reached his desk along with the collective bargaining bill, which was drafted largely by Labor Sec. John Dunlop out of his extensive knowledge of construction industry collective bargaining.

State Dept. Memorandum On Solzhenitsyn's Visit

This memorandum was cited by AFL-CIO President George Meany at Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearings, as an "incredible" document demonstrating Secretary of State Kissinger's insistence that the President shun Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn so that the Soviet government would not be offended. The memorandum was sent by George Springsteen, Kissinger's executive secretary at the State Dept., to Lt. Gen. Brent Scowcroft at the White House. It refers to Solzhenitsyn's visit to Washington as the guest of the AFL-CIO.

"George Meany has invited the President to attend a June 30 banquet in honor of Solzhenitsyn, which will be an occasion for outspoken anti-Soviet rhetoric. The Soviets would probably take White House participation in the affair as either a deliberate negative signal or a sign of Administration weakness in the face of domestic anti-Soviet pressures. We recommend that the invitation to the President be declined and that no White House officials participate.

"During Solzhenitsyn's Washington visit (June 27-July 1) another problem may arise: Pressure may be generated by Meany, members of Congress or others for the President to receive Solzhenitsyn in the White House. He is a Nobel Prize winner, he is widely admired in the United States and the Senate has passed a resolution granting him honorary U.S. citizenship (if the House follows suit he would be the only person except Churchill so honored). Advocates of a meeting would argue that the President has received a whole range of Soviet visitors ranging from journalists and trans-polar fliers to the Minister of the Food Industry. They would ask: since the White House doors are open to Soviets of this sort, why not also to Solzhenitsyn, the most admired of all Russians? The arguments against such a meeting are as compelling as those against accepting the banquet invitation, but more difficult to defend publicly.

"Solzhenitsyn is a notable writer, but his political views are an embarrassment even to his fellow dissidents. Not only would a meeting with the President offend the Soviets but it would raise some controversy about Solzhenitsyn's views of the United States and its allies (as expressed, for example, in the attached New York Times article). Further, Solzhenitsyn has never before been received by a Chief of State and such a meeting would lend weight to his political views as opposed to his literary talent.

"We recommend that the President not receive Solzhenitsyn. If significant pressures develop which make it imperative that the White House do something for Solzhenitsyn, we would suggest inviting him to any large social function taking place at the White House while he is in town, or arranging for him to be at a social function attended by the President during that period."

Recording Fee Pact Ratified By Musicians

New York—Musicians employed by manufacturers of phonograph recordings overwhelmingly approved a new two-year contract providing an across-the-board 10 percent increase in wage scales.

AFM President Hal C. Davis said the pact was ratified by a vote of 1,243 to 116 in a mail referendum. The new agreement, which is retroactive to Nov. 1, also provides for an increase from 9 to 10 percent in employer contributions to the Musicians pension fund.

Under the terms of the contract, the fee for a basic 3-hour recording session rises from $100 to $110. For a special 90-minute session, the fee increases from $66 to $72.60.

Also, the scale for recording in Canada, for Canadian sale only, will increase to $91 from $83 for a regular session. The scale for recording in Puerto Rico, for Puerto Rican sale only, increases to $66 from $60.

The new agreement covers about 4,000 musicians who earned a minimum of $1,000 from recordings during the 1974 calendar year.

Canada's Jobless Rate Edges Up to 7.3 Percent

Ottawa — Canada's jobless rate inched up one-tenth of 1 percent to 7.3 percent in November, equaling the 14-year high reached last August.

The government announced the number of unemployed workers rose by 9,000 to 734,000. Total employment increased by 15,000 to 9,388,000.

A year earlier, the jobless rate was only 5.5 percent. Hardest hit last month were youths. Their unemployment rate climbed four-tenths of 1 percent to 13.3 percent. The jobless rate for adult women was 4.5 percent, while adult men had a 5 percent unemployment rate.

Steel Parley Spurs Income, Job Measures

Geneva — Special measures to protect the jobs and income of workers in the iron and steel industry need the immediate attention of the International Labor Organization, the ILO's Iron & Steel Committee declared.

A resolution adopted unanimously by the committee's 200 worker, government and employer delegates called on the ILO to promote an exchange of information on methods to aid workers affected by recession in a number of countries.

Key measures outlined in the committee resolution include the abolition of overtime, equal distribution of available work, additional holidays and rest days, accelerated investment projects, and retraining of workers.

The committee also called for the development of programs to guarantee income and provide for early retirement with the right to full benefits in plant shutdowns, along with government measures to prevent the loss of employment and compensation for the loss of income.

John S. Johns, a vice president of the Steelworkers, served as chairman of the worker delegation at the committee's session.

Other USWA representatives on the panel are Howard Strevel, director of District 36; Dean Clowes, director of political action, and Canadians Mike Fenwock, director of District 6, and Don Taylor of the USWA's Canadian national office.

Delegates also urged the development of effective methods to forecast manpower needs, stressing that such policy is the joint responsibility of governments, employers and workers.

All parties should play a full role in designing and carrying out manpower programs, the committee said in urging wider cooperation in this area by management and labor.

Exploring the hazards of the working environment, the committee also focused on safety and health problems stemming from shift work. It said that workers and their representatives should have the opportunity to meet with employers on safety and health matters.

Courses Held In 100 Cities To Aid Jobless

Local conferences to alert area labor representatives to programs and services for the jobless have been conducted in 100 cities throughout the country, AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis reported.

The 120 seminars and counselling sessions sponsored by the federation's Dept. of Community Services since late 1974 drew a total attendance of 15,000, including numerous unemployed trade unionists.

Perlis said the conferences focused on a broad array of topics to help the jobless workers take advantage of services and program available to them.

Among the major areas covered were unemployment compensation, public assistance, food stamps, health care, school lunch programs, legal aid and family counselling. The sessions also explored ways to extend payments on utility bills, mortgages and credit.

Centers were also set up in union halls in some areas to expedite applications for food stamps and other assistance, Perlis reported.

3% Jobless Rate Targeted:

Full Employment Law Set As 'Must' Goal in Congress

5.8 percent in 1979 and 5.1 percent in 1980—are "completely unacceptable."

Instead, the Economic Policy Committee urged Congress to undertake an "immediate and sustained campaign" to reduce joblessness to 3 percent. The rate now is 8.3 percent.

Full employment must mean that "the unemployed, at any time, would be only persons who are temporarily jobless — such as entrants into the labor force, people moving from one job to another or from one part of the country to another, or people who are temporarily jobless as a result of seasonal fluctuations in their specific industry," the AFL-CIO policy stated.

Other essential provisions of an acceptable full-employment law, the committee said, should:

- Require the President to submit annual "targets, policies and programs" to Congress detailing ways to achieve full employment and to meet national needs.
- Require the President to propose specific federal tax, monetary and budget policies to be pursued for full employment, balanced economic growth and national needs.
- Set up a consultative body, composed of major groups in the economy, to review the President's goals and policies.
- Establish procedures for prompt congressional review and action on the President's economic programs.
- Require the Federal Reserve Board to "justify" to the President and Congress the manner in which its monetary policies will help meet full-employment targets.

In addition, when the economy's regular channels of private and public employment fail to bring about full employment, the government must maintain a public-employment program to provide jobs "at prevailing rates of pay, but in no case less than the federal minimum wage." Such a program should be of sufficient size to keep unemployment below 3 percent.

The Economic Policy Committee attacked the Ford Administration's "obsession" with keeping down budget deficits at the expense of American workers, calling such a philosophy "negative thinking."

"Those who put deficits before people have no faith in America," the committee declared. "They would condemn America to continued idle plants, idle machinery, idle productive equipment and idle manpower."

The way to cut the deficit, the committee observed, is to create jobs. "Any other proposal means continuing deficits, continuing high unemployment, continuing hardship, continuing recession."

The committee said Congress must realize that an obsession with budget deficits ignores the benefits of a full-employment economy — more jobs and higher earnings, reduced unemployment benefits and welfare costs, increased sales for business, increased savings and investment and greater tax receipts.

"From jobs come the wages that generate mass purchasing power," the committee statement observed. In addition, it said, a job is a key measure of a person's place in society. "Work is the source of individual fulfillment. It is positive, constructive activity."

In releasing the committee's recommendations, Meany said the federation will start immediately to implement them. The panel called for distribution of the policy statement to every member of Congress and offered the AFL-CIO's assistance to legislators in drafting a proposed full-employment law that will meet labor's goal of "jobs at decent wages for everyone able to work and seeking work."

"There are many friends of the concept of full employment in the Congress who have demonstrated their concern through the introduction and support of legislation," the committee added.

"We trust they will combine to push for a realistic, achievable, workable measure containing the fundamental points we have outlined."

Musicians Set Holiday Calls For Military

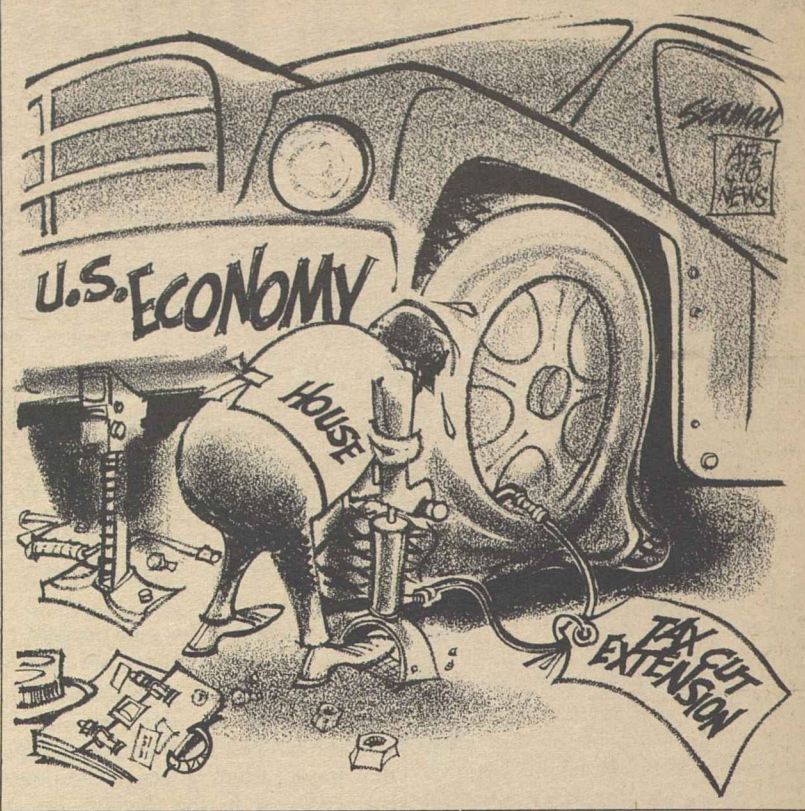
New York—For the eighth consecutive year, the Musicians' union is offering armed forces personnel overseas free holiday calls to their families in the United States during the three day period, Dec. 24-26.

Calls originating from overseas will be transmitted by the Military Affiliate Radio Service (MARS) to an amateur radio station in Mansfield, Ohio, manned by Robert Altomonte, president of AFM local 159. Altomonte will route the calls to their destination through regular telephone wires—the cost of which is paid by the Musicians.

Last year, Altomonte handled calls from such diverse places as Liberia, Japan, Germany, Iceland, Paraguay, Grand Turk Island, the Canal Zone, Diego Garcia, Antarctica, and Vieques Island, a tiny strip of land in the Caribbean.

The Musicians reported that in 1974 more than 800 calls were placed to every state in the nation and that more than 8,300 calls have been completed since the program began in 1967.

To Keep It Going



Senate Unit Approves Tax Cut Compromise

Senate Democrats and a big bipartisan majority of the Senate Finance Committee endorsed a compromise tax bill that would temporarily extend this year's tax cuts for six months — without the spending ceiling that President Ford has demanded.

If the tax cut is not extended, consumer purchasing power will drop in January as higher withholding taxes take a bigger bite out of workers' paychecks. Economists warn this could abort the start of recovery and push the nation into a new economic decline.

The House has passed a somewhat different one-year extension of the tax cut in a bill that included some reform provisions intended to make the tax system more equitable and increase revenue.

Because of the short time left to act—current tax rates expire Dec. 31 and Congress is planning a Dec. 19 adjournment — the Senate Democratic caucus acted with rare unanimity to back a compromise approach that would avoid a tax hike without shutting the door on the concept of a future spending ceiling.

Congress this year has launched an intricate budget review and budget ceiling procedure, and Senate Budget Committee Chairman Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.) told the Democratic conference that it would destroy the entire concept for Congress to agree to a spending ceiling on a fiscal 1977 budget that it hasn't even seen.

The bill, approved the same day by the Finance Committee on a 14-4 vote, would continue present withholding taxes through the first half of 1976. That would bring the issue of further extension of the rate cut before Congress after its initial review of the fiscal 1977 budget.

Four of the seven Republicans on the Finance Committee voted gainst linking Ford's spending ceiling to the tax bill and for approval of the six-month tax rate cut without a spending ceiling.

Before the committee vote, Administration officials insisted that Ford would not accept such a compromise. Treasury Sec. William Simon said the principle of a spending ceiling is more important than the "small economic impact" of letting tax rates rise.

Committee Chairman Russell Long (D-La.) warned that Congress would not back down in a game of "chicken" with the President.

If the Senate adopts the committee bill, it must then be reconciled in conference with the House-passed tax bill.

Long said if the President were to veto the tax cut extension and call Congress into special session on the issue, as the White House has threatened, Congress would "just send him an identical bill again. Maybe we should run off a Xerox just in case," he suggested.

Of the 44 senators attending the Democratic caucus, one abstained and the others voted to support the tax bill strategy.

The Finance Committee bill included only individual income tax reductions except for renewal of lower rates for the first $50,000 in corporate earnings. Other business tax reductions enacted last spring do not expire until 1977.

The individual tax cuts in the Senate bill were somewhat reshuffled from both the present schedule and the House-passed bill. The final version presumably will be shaped by the House-Senate conferees.

Job Losses Linked to Exportation Of Technology by Multinationals

and that they can maintain productive capacity."

The AFL-CIO has urged action to regulate the export of American technology over the years, Biemiller said. In addition, organized labor has asked an end to the tax bonanzas enjoyed by U.S.-based corporations which use the tax subsidies to expand their foreign operations, he noted.

U.S. multinationals are indiscriminate in their business dealings, Biemiller charged. They are willing to sell technology even to nations with closed economies and oppressed labor forces.

12-13-75

"In Communist and other closed economies," he said, "the transfer is a one-way street for the United States and its workforce, with some quick returns for the multinational managers.

"If they enter into a partnership with a Communist country, however, the multinational gets a chance to 'compete' for the U.S. market from abroad. The production, jobs and new technology are behind the walls of a Communist state. Such a deal is competition against the U.S. economy to increase the profits of the multinational managers, stockholders and Communist states."

Biemiller explained how multinationals receive special privileges under three tax preferences that "encourage U.S. investors to choose foreign expansion at the expense of investing in a stronger American economy." The time to end them is overdue, he added.

The three preferences are the deferral privilege, the foreign tax credit and the DISC (Domestic International Sales Corp.) program.

The tax deferral on the profits of foreign subsidiaries so long as they are kept abroad "is no less than an interest-free loan, courtesy of Uncle Sam," Biemiller said. He noted that a congressional committee estimated the U.S. tax loss through this loophole at $365 million a year.

The foreign tax credit costs the U.S. an estimated $9 billion a year, and provides an unfair advantage for firms operating abroad over those operating in the U.S. which only receive a deduction for state and local taxes, Biemiller said.

"It all adds up to huge amounts of U.S. tax dollars being sacrificed to benefit overseas activities of U.S. corporations," he added.

DISCs permit U.S.-based companies to set up dummy corporations to handle exports. They pay taxes only on 50 percent of their profits and cost the Treasury Dept. an estimated $1.6 billion a year, Biemiller noted.

The nation can no longer afford this continued drain on its resources, he added. Investment at home is far more productive of jobs and capital than excessive investments abroad, he said.

Coal Slurry Pipeline Opposed by Dennis

A bill to give right-of-way privileges to coal slurry pipelines was criticized by President C. L. Dennis of the Railway & Airline Clerks at House Interior Committee hearings.

Dennis said a pipeline program would duplicate the coal-carrying capacity of the railroads and cause further layoffs and bankruptcies.

Jobless Rate Shift Slight In 6 Months

istered among teenagers and adult men. The rate for the latter category dropped to 6.9 percent from 7.1 percent in October.

On the other hand, the rate for adult women held steady at 7.8 percent, after having risen from 7.5 percent in September. The jobless rate for married men fell to 4.9 percent from 5.2 percent the previous month. The rate for full-time workers declined from 8.6 to 8.1 percent.

Although jobs were up slightly in the transportation equipment sector, a steady increase in manufacturing employment of the past four months came to a halt in November.

Since June, industry payroll employment has grown by 1.2 million. Nevertheless, BLS noted, the November job total remained 1.3 million below the all-time high of 78.8 million reached in September 1974.

Employment increases occurred in 57 percent of the 172 industries in the government's sampling, compared with 62 percent in October and 82 percent in September.

Meany Hits 'Political Veto' As Endangering Economy

Congress Clears Measure:

Ford Pledge Cited On Situs Picketing

The AFL-CIO and its building trades unions looked to President Ford to keep his word and sign into law a construction site picketing and collective bargaining bill.

Robert A. Georgine, president of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., said the legislation passed by Congress meets all the conditions imposed by Ford. Georgine predicted at a news conference that it will bring needed stability to the construction industry's labor-management relations.

Ford is under heavy pressure from his party's right wing to back away from his repeated pledges and veto the legislation. But Georgine told reporters he can't conceive of Ford caving in to such "political blackmail" because he considers the President "an honest man."

Passage of a common site picketing bill has been the top legislative goal of the building trades for 25 years, Georgine stressed. After a "tremendous effort," which included breaking a Senate filibuster, the last hurdle was overcome. The House vote on final passage was 229-189; the Senate margin was 52-43.

As cleared for the President, the legislation had two distinct parts. The section dealing with common site picketing would restore basic trade union rights that were lost a quarter-century ago through a controversial Supreme Court decision. The court ruled illegal a building trades picket line in Denver that protested the fact that a non-union subcontractor working on the same project as union craftsmen was paying his workers 42 cents an hour less than union scale. The court said such picketing was a secondary boycott and barred by the Taft-Hartley Act.

Under the bill sent to the President, such picketing would be allowed if certain conditions were met. A local union planning to picket a construction site at which several subcontractors were work-

Proposals On Federal Pay Scored

A special presidential panel's proposals for revamping the present federal pay systems drew a strong attack from government employe leaders, who charged they would "turn back the clock on labor-management relations in the federal government."

The recommendations, based on a six-month study of federal salaries, could affect more than 1.4 million workers—a large number of whom are members of AFL-CIO unions.

William H. McClennan, president of the federation's Public Employee Dept., described the panel's 20 recommendations as "the latest effort in a concerted campaign by the Ford Administration to destroy the federal pay comparability principle."

President Clyde M. Webber of the Government Employees called the recommendations "unacceptable" to AFGE and its members and said the report confirmed the union's worst fears.

"As we anticipated, the principal beneficiaries of the panel's recommendations are the executive-level employes, none of whom earns less than $37,800," Webber said.

McClennan said careful examination of the recommendations

CONSTRUCTION SITE picketing bill passed by Congress will bring labor-management stability, President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. told a news conference. Georgine said he expects President Ford to keep his promise and sign the bill.

Post Strike Rallies Washington Labor

Organized labor in the Washington metropolitan area rallied behind striking Washington Post workers as the newspaper's management carried out its threats to import strikebreakers.

The Greater Washington AFL-CIO and Post Unions United—a coalition of 11 unions representing the newspaper's 2,000 employes—sponsored a mass demonstration Dec. 13, the day before the Post management's deadline on its "final offer" before hiring "non-union replacements" for striking pressmen.

The pressmen, members of Local 6 of the Printing & Graphic Communications Union, voted down the ultimatum 245 to 5.

President Robert E. Petersen of the Greater Washington Central Labor Council warned that the Post's move to import strikebreakers would severely set back labor-management relations in the area and could well provoke future confrontations.

The strike, now in its 12th week, began when pressmen and stereotypers walked out Oct. 1 after their contract expired. Photoengravers and newspaper mailers, whose contracts also ran out, later joined the walkout. Other crafts are honoring the picket lines, as are about 250 of the 800 Newspaper Guild members employed at the Post.

Meanwhile, attorneys for the District of Columbia were investigating charges that the Post is hiring strikebreakers in violation of D.C. law. The newspaper had been using helicopters to ferry in replacements

Tax Bill Vote Poses Hardships

AFL-CIO President George Meany accused President Ford of having endangered America's economy "for political reasons" by his veto of a bill that would have kept taxes from rising in January.

Ford's veto—and the failure of the House to achieve the two-thirds majority needed to override it — means that "millions of Americans will have their take-home pay cut," Meany said.

With the buying power from 1975 tax cuts wiped out, "the economy will again slide downhill." Meany termed the temporary tax reduction enacted in March and expiring on Dec. 31 "a prime factor in the mild upturn of the last few months."

He said "a stubborn President" who insisted on unattainable conditions must bear responsibility for "the hardship that is sure to come" to America's families.

Ford had repeatedly warned that he would veto any tax cut unless Congress coupled it with a spending ceiling for the 1977 fiscal year—even though the President will not submit his proposed budget until late January and Congress will not complete even the first step in its budget review procedure until next spring.

In a compromise move designed to head off a confrontation, the Senate adopted by a big bipartisan majority a tax cut bill that would continue present withholding rates for the first six months of 1976. That would have allowed more negotiating time without endangering the fragile economic recovery. A House-Senate conference committee adopted the six-month extension concept.

But Ford, playing what Senate Finance Committee Chairman Russel Long (D-La.) had described as

ILO Explores Jobless Aid, Social Security

Geneva—Social security and unemployment insurance issues were scrutinized by trade union and government experts from 20 nations at a meeting here under the auspices of the International Labor Organization.

AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, a participant in the sessions, welcomed the call for an early upgrading of minimum social security standards embodied in the international conventions that have been adopted by the ILO.

In discussions of unemployment, special attention was given to the problems of young people seeking to enter the workforce and women who want to return to employment after having left temporarily for family reasons.

For these groups, emphasis was put on training, retraining and vocational guidance in addition to cash benefits.

A report from the meeting, to be submitted to the ILO's Governing Body for action, took note of the general lack of unemployment insurance for these groups.

It said the delegates "agreed that existing gaps in protection had increasingly become less tolerable and the administrative arguments, however plausible, for excluding specific groups from coverage could no longer be sustained."

The committee said agricultural, seasonal and migrant workers should be among those eligible for unemployment compensation.

The assembled experts said the fact that women often must interrupt their working careers for family reasons should not result in loss of social security credits.

Also endorsed was the concept that the non-working wife is entitled to social security protection in her own right rather than only as a dependent of her husband. They noted the special problems of women who lose their "dependent" status through divorce.

Seidman termed the discussions useful and the issues important. He noted that the meetings brought out both the desirability of expanding social security protection to meet the problems of the unemployed and of women not in the workforce, while also making clear "the difficulty of achieving these goals."

Seidman, a former U.S. worker delegate to the ILO and a veteran of many ILO meetings and conferences, noted that the sessions were mostly free of politicial polemics. Worker delegates successfully insisted that a self-serving statement by the Soviet government delegate be clearly identified as his views alone, and the positive record of western nations on social security was in the record to offset it.

SOCIAL SECURITY and unemployment problems were discussed by experts from 20 nations at an International Labor Organization meeting in Geneva. AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, left, consults with Werner Elsner of the West German Confederation of Trade Unions.

Meany Scores Tax Veto As Danger to Economy

a dangerous game of "chicken," would have none of it.

He vetoed the bill and went on television to demand again that every dollar of a tax cut be matched by a dollar subtracted from government spending — a move that would largely nullify the economic stimulus of a tax cut while reducing government services.

Even though Congress has been notoriously unsuccessful in overriding presidential vetoes, many Capitol Hill observers believed that in this case there would be enough Republican switches to override the veto.

The alternative was a jump in withholding taxes in January that would increase the tax deduction from the average factory worker's pay by $4.50 a week, or 43 percent, and drain more than $1 billion a month in buying power from the economy.

But the House vote of 265-157 to override the President's veto was 17 short of the needed two-thirds majority.

Democrats voted 246 to 32 to override. But Republicans played the game of "chicken" to its disastrous end. Only 19 voted to override, while 125 backed the President's veto.

In contrast to the more than 6-1 Republican support for the President's position in the House, Senate Republicans had split down the middle on the tax cut bill that Ford vetoed. It was conceded on both sides that the Senate would have easily met the two-thirds test if the House had voted to override. Since the House acted first, no Senate vote was taken after the veto.

The vetoed bill would have given taxpayers a slightly higher reduction than they have this year. If no new legislation is enacted, a couple with two children and an adjusted gross income of $10,000 a year will have a tax bill of $867 for the 1976 calendar year—$158 more than would be owed on the same income for this year, and $216 more than would have been owed under the bill vetoed by the President.

Oregon Hails Labor Press Anniversary

Portland, Ore.—The Oregon Labor Press, one of the nation's most honored labor publications, marked its 75th anniversary with a 44-page edition that amounts to a chronicle of the state's labor movement.

The 64,000-circulation weekly newspaper was born in 1900 as the Portland Labor Press, founded by the city's Federated Trades Assembly for the same reason so many other union papers were established —lack of fair and adequate coverage of labor by the commercial press.

The paper's first board of directors was made up of officers of the Cigarmakers, Barbers, Millworkers, Brewery Workers, Pressmen, Typographers, Clerks, Machinists, Letter Carriers and Beer Truck Drivers.

Its proclaimed objective was "to publish a weekly newspaper and to give to the wage-earners as well as to the general public of this city reliable information concerning the local and international labor movements."

In the modern era, the newspaper has won 36 awards for various aspects of editorial excellence from the International Labor Press Association and also was honored by the American Political Science Association for "distinguished reporting of public affairs."

Editors Gene Klare and Frank Flori reproduced in the diamond anniversary issue a front page from 75 years ago and noted that during its early years "editors came and went as through a revolving door."

A history of the Oregon labor movement in its early years took note of the birth of the newspaper as "the most important single event of the year 1900."

Step Backward:

Federal Employes Hit Pay Proposals

shows that lower-grade workers would be most affected if the proposals were enacted into law.

"White-collar workers, for example, would suffer from proposed locality wage surveys which include the lower-pay statistics of small businesses and state and local governments," he said. "And repeal of the Monroney Amendment would drastically lower pay for wage-grade employes."

The Monroney Amendment assures blue-collar federal workers of a degree of equity for levels of work difficulty, irrespective of locality.

President Ford must now consider the recommendations of the panel with an eye toward possible legislation. More than half of the proposals would require congressional action.

Chaired by Vice President Nelson A. Rockefeller, the President's Panel on Federal Compensation was charged last June with studying the federal pay systems to assure that they are "fair and equitable both to the employes and to the public."

The panel's recommendations include the following:

- The principle of comparability between federal employes and those in the private sector would be extended to include fringe benefits as well as pay.

AFGE observed that the panel's definition of comparability differs from labor's. "Looking at all the recommendations as a whole, it is clear that to the panel comparability means turning back the clock to the situation which existed prior to enactment of the pay laws," the union charged. "It means destroying equity as well as the laws themselves."

The union also noted that recent budget documents indicated employes would be assessed with interest payments on the unfunded liability of the federal retirement fund as a part of employe benefits, thus reducing direct pay proportionately.

- Federal workers would be separated into two categories—clerical-technical and professional-administrative-managerial-executive.
- "Merit rather than length of service" would govern within grade pay increases for professionals, administrators, managers and executives.
- The level of pay for top federal employes, such as nuclear physicists and administrators, would be increased above the comparability rate for GS-18 employes.
- Clerical, technical and service category employes would be paid on locality-based surveys of the private sector; professionals, administrators, managers and executives would remain on the present nationwide General Schedule system.
- Pay surveys would be conducted less frequently, with interim adjustments between surveys.

Webber, who promised that AFGE would fight the proposed changes, observed that the recommendations would take away all the important gains made for federal employes over the past 15 years and lessen the role of federal employe unions.

He accused the panel of paying lip service to the principle of comparability and noted a major contradiction in its report. One of the panel's proposals cites the need for a review of the various federal pay systems now in existence "with the objective of proposing legislation to eliminate or combine separate plans wherever appropriate," he noted.

Yet, "in contradiction to this recommendation, the balance of the panel report advocates programs and actions fragmenting the General Schedule," Webber observed.

McClennan charged that the report "obviously will be used as justification for seeking to grant the Chief Executive absolute control over federal employe wages."

He also pointed out that while 57 percent of the non-postal federal workforce is covered by union contracts, not a single labor representative sat on the Rockefeller panel.

Each committee participant was a handpicked member of the Ford Administration, accurately reflecting the Administration's concept of an 'equitable' federal pay system," he observed.

Contract Talks Resume In United Airlines Strike

Contract negotiations in the two-week-old strike of some 17,000 Machinists against United Airlines were scheduled to resume Dec. 19, but federal mediators cautioned that this did not necessarily indicate progress toward a settlement.

David H. Stowe, chairman of the National Mediation Board which summoned the striking union and the carrier to a bargaining session in Washington, said: "We may find a chink, or the positions may be as hard as ever."

Talks were broken off Dec. 10, four days after the strike began. United, the nation's largest air carrier, subsequently announced cancellation of all its scheduled and charter flights through Jan. 5.

The walkout involves IAM members employed as mechanics, dispatchers and ramp, storage and food-service workers whose contract expired last Oct. 31.

Besides wages and pension benefits, a key issue in the contract dispute is the union's request for greater job security.

George J. Robinson, president of IAM's District 141 in San Francisco, said United's wage offer was inadequate and did not match proposed pay raises in the Continental Airlines agreement that was rejected by the union last month.

During the strike, which has forced United to halt all of its 1,400 daily flights to 113 cities, the carrier has qualified for more than $42 million in payments under the airline industry's so-called Mutual Aid Pact.

National Airlines, whose Flight Attendants have been on strike for 17 weeks, has qualified for more than 17 weeks in mutual aid benefits.

Mutual aid payments are based on percentages of a struck carrier's normal daily operating expenses. Since United is a much larger airline than National, its normal operating expenses are much greater, amounting to $3.09 million a day.

Text of Meany Statement On President's Tax Veto

Following is the text of a statement by AFL-CIO President George Meany on President Ford's veto of the tax cut extension:

A stubborn President, for political reasons, has raised the taxes of most Americans, endangered the economy and ensured hardship for millions.

Come next Jan. 1, millions of American workers will have their take-home pay cut. The economy as a whole will suffer because the incentive tax cut—that has been a prime factor in the mild upturn of the last few months—will be wiped out. With this incentive gone, there is no doubt that the economy will again slide downhill.

American families, who will be affected by this increase in their taxes next Jan. 1, can thank President Ford for the hardship that is sure to come as a consequence of his action.

Strikebreaking Move Denounced:

Post Strike Rallies Washington Unions

for a number of weeks, the PUU charged.

The Post ran a classified advertisement in its Dec. 16 editions announcing that it "is now hiring experienced and inexperienced personnel to work in its pressroom." The ad further noted that the pressmen's local was on strike and said "we are seeking replacements for the strikers."

But the PUU coalition has charged that the Post had trained replacements for the pressmen and other crafts long before the strike began. The Post resumed publishing after the first day of the strike with management personnel and some Guild members who chose to work in other jurisdictions.

The Post had recruited additional replacements for the pressmen and other craft employes that were trained at a "scab school" in Oklahoma City, the PUU said.

"More than 60 of these recruits were flown into the Post from Oklahoma City on Dec. 9 and 10," the PUU said in a full-page ad in the Washington Star.

"Post management claims that they are beginning to advertise for pressmen today are false, as they already have more men than they say they need to run the pressroom," the PUU ad charged.

It also noted that while the Post stopped using high school students as strikebreakers in the mail room after receiving protests from the Central Labor Council, it has since brought in young women from a local junior college to do the work of the striking mailers.

The D.C. ordinance that prohibits the hiring of strikebreakers defines them as persons who "customarily and repeatedly" seek employment as replacements during strikes.

Mark J. Meagher, a vice president of the Post, said the newspaper management was operating within the provisions of the ordinance, contending that the replacements that were brought in do not fit the definition of strikebreakers. But he refused to say where the replacements came from.

Mrs. Katharine Graham, publisher of the Post, insisted in a statement to Guild members continuing to cross the picket lines that the Post remains "a union paper."

Charges have been brought up against 268 Guild members still working at the Post by the local Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild.

Local Guild officials said that charges against an additional 200 members at the Post will be brought shortly. Hearings before a trial board are expected to begin in January.

Guild members of the Post unit had voted on four occasions not to honor the picket lines.

In other developments, the Post reportedly has yet to file any insurance claims for damages that the newspaper company said were done to the presses the day pressmen walked out.

Using the press damage as a public relations rallying point, the Post had claimed that the repair of the presses would run as high as $2 million. The pressmen have continued to challenge the newpaper's claims, insisting that the damage was far less extensive.

A representative of the Goss Co., the firm that manufactured the Post presses, told a Washington television station, WTTG-TV, that the newspaper has ordered only $12,920 worth of replacement parts to repair the damage.

The day after the Post began taking applications for replacement of the striking pressmen, management negotiators rejected a new counterproposal submitted by the union's bargaining representatives. Federal mediators said that no further contract talks had been scheduled.

TRADE UNIONISTS from the Washington area rally at McPherson Square to protest a move by the Washington Post to hire permanent replacements for striking workers and the company's refusal to continue negotiations with pressmen involved in the 12-week strike. Unions have charged that the Post has violated the city's anti-strikebreaking law.

Labor's Full Employment Goal Pressed at Black Officials' Parley

The goal of a full employment economy can be achieved if a concerned Congress responds to measures outlined by the AFL-CIO and works to reverse the Administration's outdated economic policies, the nation's black elected officials were told.

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard declared in an address to the National Institute for Black Elected Officials that full employment is an "economic and social imperative."

He said the nation's economy has been grossly mismanaged by Presidents Nixon and Ford, stressing that not only has the full employment goal been ignored and neglected, but that "Administration officials and many academic economists have even tried to cover up the failure to meet the goal by redefining it."

Pollard told the nearly 1,000 institute participants in Washington that the nation can expect high unemployment through 1980 if Nixon-Ford policies are allowed to continue.

He cited the wide social and economic impact when workers lose their jobs and purchasing power.

"When there are not enough jobs, the federal government, the states and cities lose tax revenue and gain welfare clients."

"They are forced to cut back the services that are essential to immediate health and safety needs and to shortchange programs such as manpower training, housing, urban renewal and social welfare that can adversely affect the lives of Americans for generations."

Citing the rise in the nation's unemployment rate over the past seven years from a little over 3 percent to the current 8.3 percent, Pollard pointed out that the rates run consistently higher for the minority workers—13.8 percent for all black workers and a "shocking" 33.8 percent for black teenagers.

In addition to the 7.7 million workers officially listed as unemployed, Pollard cited Labor Dept. statistics showing that 1.2 million other workers have given up on their search for work because no jobs are available. Another 3.3 million are working part-time because no full-time jobs can be found, he said.

"That adds up to over 12 million workers—one out of every eight—unemployed or underemployed."

Pollard spelled out the objectives outlined by the AFL-CIO convention for the nation's economy, including immediate extension of the tax cut, full implementation of government housing programs, extended public service jobs, an accelerated public works program and special emergency financial aid to states and cities hard pressed by unemployment.

Full employment was a major theme of the three-day conference. The participants also focused on efforts to increase the turnout of black voters in coming elections.

Other representatives from organized labor who took part in institute workshops included Earl W. Davis, national field coordinator for COPE; Director Walter G. Davis of the federation's Dept. of Education; Sec.-Treas. William Lucy of the State, County & Municipal Employees; Executive Director Norman Hill of the A. Philip Randolph Institute; Lois Felder, co-director of community relations for the Retail Clerks; Vice President Marc Stepp of the Auto Workers, and Civil Rights Director Alex Fuller of the Steelworkers.

Ford Policies Blamed For Prolonging Slump

Detroit—The worst economic crisis since the 1930s is far from over, AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger warned in a speech here, and the Ford Administration is doing little to end it.

The Administration's record this year is one of "utter negativism," Goldfinger charged in an address before the Detroit chapter of the Industrial Relations Research Association. Goldfinger is a recent past president of the IRRA.

"Even the rather timid, job-creating measures adopted by the Congress have been vetoed one after another in sickening succession," Goldfinger noted.

The justification for President Ford's negativism is the size of the budget deficit, but this is no defense at all, Goldfinger observed.

"There is no denying the fact that federal budget deficits in the past several years have been huge," he said. "But these deficits were the direct result of over six and one-half years of misguided economic policies — two deliberately engineered recessions, bridged by a short-lived politically inspired pick-up."

The only sensible way to reduce the budget deficit is to get the country back to work, Goldfinger declared. That would mean more incomes, more purchasing power, more sales, more profits, more tax receipts and lower social costs of unemployment.

"It would also mean more savings and more business investment in plants and machines," Goldfinger said, "and that, in turn, would add to the advance of productivity in the future."

High unemployment, now at 8.3 percent, is likely to continue throughout the '70s, even by the Administration's own forecasts, Goldfinger noted. Ford's economic advisers project about 6 to 8 million jobless workers for the rest of this decade.

"The persistence of such unemployment conditions until 1980 can rip apart the fabric of American society," he declared. "Yet the Administration seems doggedly determined to do no better than these frightening predictions."

Government measures are required to provide a sorely needed forward momentum for the economy, Goldfinger said. This means extension of the reduced federal withholding tax rate through 1976, government housing programs, an accelerated public works program, lower interest rates, expansion of the money supply and federal financial aid to state and local governments, he said.

"A genuine commitment by the government to full employment and its rapid achievement is a must," Goldfinger added. "And there are many other measures that are needed to strengthen the economy at home and in its international economic and financial relationships.

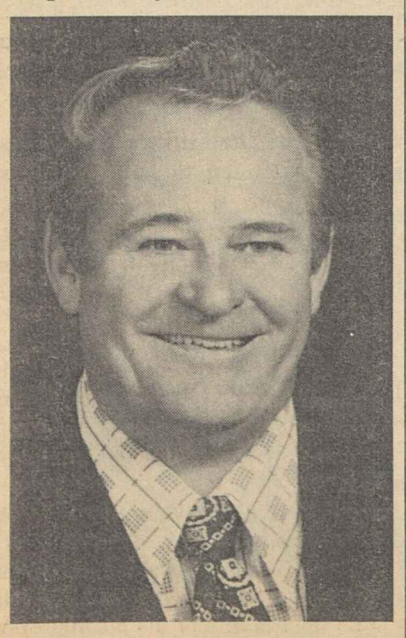
"It is certainly time to provide the American economy with badly needed strength."

R. J. Petersdorf Elected To Painters' No. 2 Post

The executive board of the Painters has elected Robert J. Petersdorf as secretary-treasurer to succeed Michael DiSilvestro, who is retiring Dec. 31.

The board also appointed James B. Cox to replace Petersdorf as vice president of District 6, which comprises several midwestern states.

DiSilvestro, an active member of the Painters since 1926, has served in the union's number two post for the past four years.



ROBERT J. PETERSDORF

He had been financial secretary and business representative of Local 874 in New York before becoming secretary-treasurer of District Council 9. He also was a district representative and vice president of District 3 when he succeeded O. T. Stare as secretary-treasurer of the international in 1972.

Petersdorf, a member of the Painters for 30 years, has served as business representative of Local 681 in Rochester, Minn., and secretary-treasurer of the Minnesota Building & Construction Trades Council.

He was an international organizer and representative from 1955 until his election as vice president of District 6 in 1966. Petersdorf's term as secretary-treasurer will run until the Painters convention in 1979.

Cox, who was initiated in Painters Local 9 in Kansas City 25 years ago, was appointed an international representative in 1966 and has served as organizing director of District 6 since 1970.

Jobless Benefit Rolls Post Sharp Increase

The number of persons drawing benefits under various federal unemployment insurance programs rose by 649,800 to 5,842,300 during the week ended Nov. 29, the Labor Dept. reported.

Initial claims for benefits filed in the week ended Dec. 6 totaled 527,600, an increase of 95,800 over the previous week.

Christmas 1975

ON THIS CHRISTMAS 1975 the quest for peace continues in Southern Africa, Northern Ireland, the Middle East—wherever the whine of gunfire and the boom of bombs are taking lives and bringing death, fear and despair.

In the more than a quarter century since the holocaust of World War II, the striving for peace has continued unabated with but limited success. For there are nations to whom power and control are more important than peace—the nations that have refused to condemn terrorism or torture as political weapons.

Nevertheless, the struggle to establish peace and freedom on a lasting basis must continue without letup. For it is as clear as it was in 1945 that there is no alternative to peace in this age of missiles and satellites; peace today is a condition of survival.

The free world has the resources, the manpower and the ability to rid the world of hunger and disease and to provide the basis of social justice so that all men can taste of bread and freedom.

Yet as we move farther along in the 1970s, repression and dictatorship are still prevalent for most of the world's peoples, and the battle against hunger and disease and want goes slowly.

But the struggle goes on because there is the eternal hope for a better tomorrow, another opportunity to try to bring to fruition the ancient message of peace and goodwill.

IN OUR OWN COUNTRY there is a sense of unease and frustration as the problems of unemployment and inflation, poverty and discrimination and injustice persist, albeit in small measure when compared to the problems elsewhere in the world.

It is time, perhaps, to shed the self-indulgence, the hedonistic lifestyles, and turn with vigor and determination to solving the ills still besetting us, the problems still unsolved.

As we make the turn into 1976 the trade union movement, operating as it has always as the people's lobby, will take up anew the battle to bring a sense of dignity and worth and well-being, a fair share of the wealth they produce, to America's workers and to the nation as a whole.

The issues change little: a good job, decent housing, proper health care, quality education, assistance against the hazards of unemployment, injury, old age, and above all an atmosphere in which freedom—civil rights, civil liberties—and peace can flourish.

Peace and goodwill, bread and freedom—these are the goals that express the essence of the trade union movement and for which it will expend all its efforts and resources.

Moynihan First U.S. Official To 'Bell the Cat' on Detente

By John P. Roche

I DON'T KNOW HOW LONG Pat Moynihan will last as Ambassador to the United Nations, but it's sure great fun. I don't think the President would have the guts (or, hopefully, the wish) to fire him, but Pat might just go up in smoke. The British delegate to the UN, Ivor Richards, gave him a rather snooty lecture on diplomatic niceties, but that can be written off: The British never have appreciated Irishmen who did not know their place.

However, the State Dept. must be in a state of shock. At the same time President Ford and Sec. Kissinger were being instructed on Soviet perfidy by their Chinese hosts, Ambassador Moynihan publicly announced that detente with the USSR is a body-contact sport.

The question is the open support by Moscow, with Cuban mercenaries, of the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA). The stakes in Angola are enormous. Not only does the country have vast natural resources, but strategically it would provide the Soviet navy—which is growing at a tremendous clip—with a South Atlantic toehold. I suspect that somebody in the Soviet admiralty read a copy of Adm. Alfred T. Mahan's "Influence of Seapower on History"—shortly after the British lost their control of the Red Sea, the Russians moved into a comparable location in Somalia. Angola similarly would provide them with the equivalent of the former British bases at the Cape of Good Hope and Walvis Bay.

When Sec. of State Kissinger realized what his detente-mates were up to, he delivered what I would call a Grade 4 admonition: "Time is running out; continuation of a (Soviet) interventionist policy must inevitably threaten other relationships." Since at the moment the Soviets have stalled the Conference on Mutual and Balanced Force Reductions in Europe and are stonewalling on SALT, the question arises: What "other relationships" had Kissinger in mind? Will he refuse to have lunch with Ambassador Dobrynin?

Well, Moynihan belled the cat. He flatly accused Moscow of planning to "colonize Africa." It was a neat rhetorical job too: at crucial points in his remarks he cited Chairman Henry! Probably the most interesting aspect of Moynihan's speech was that for the first time a high American official has echoed the continuing Soviet view that detente is a form of political warfare.

Indeed, the persistent American refusal to accept this reality is utterly incomprehensible. "The policy of peaceful coexistence firmly and consistently pursued by the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and other fraternal parties is a component part of the world strategy aimed at the consolidation of the forces of world socialism." Thus the Soviet ideologue, A. I. Sobolev, writing last spring in a theoretical journal.

Only a week ago "Izvestia"—the government newspaper—denounced the notion that "the process of detente in the world and support of the national liberation struggle (in Angola) are incompatible things." Detente, it concluded, does not mean "the cessation of anti-imperalist struggles of the people for a better and just fate and against foreign interference and oppression."

WHAT MOSCOW is saying—and in fairness has always said—is that detente means what's ours is ours and what's yours is up for grabs.

Any renewed war against Israel, for example, can be justified and supported as a "national liberation struggle" designed to achieve "a better and just fate" for the Palestinian people. Yet Kissinger, despite the Middle East and the Southeast Asian debacle, persists in his theory of "linkage"—that is, if we do something nice for them (like participating in that Helsinki charade), they will call off their wolves in Africa, the Middle East, or wherever.

At any rate, Up the Moynihan! My only fear is that he may be nipped to death by bureaucratic ducks and tell the Secretary of State to take detente and. . . .

How to Buy:

FTC Rule on Consumer Credit Helps Close Glaring Loopholes

By Sidney Margolius

THE RECENT ACTION by the Federal Trade Commission to bar the "holder in due course" clause in installment finance contracts soon will eliminate one of the most coercive legal loopholes long used to trap unsuspecting buyers.

The "holder in due course" law presently allowed by most states lets a finance company take over your installment contract from a dealer, but absolves the finance company from any responsibility for making good on the purchase if anything goes wrong.

Suppose you buy a used car and the dealer guarantees it for 30 days. But it conks out. Meanwhile the dealer turns over your installment to a finance company. He has his money and can refuse to do anything about the car. In most states you still have to pay the finance company although some may allow a period such as 10 days in which you can assert claims.

Some of the most serious incidents have occurred in home improvements where contractors have done poor work or even failed to complete jobs. We've even witnessed such outright frauds as a homeowner signing an installment contract to have 12 storm windows installed by a "contractor" who turned over the contract to a finance company and abandoned the job after installing just one window. But the homeowner had to pay the finance company.

Many of the notorious food-freezer plans that soon folded up after selling families high-priced freezers also were enabled to raid consumers' pocketbooks by the holder in due course law. Undoubtedly many millions of dollars have been extracted from moderate-income families by other widespread exploitations of "holder in due course," such as carpet referral selling plans and house-siding promotions.

An especially shocking aspect of the hard-sell promotions based on this legal loophole has been the participation of not only local finance companies who specialized in this kind of transaction but also many of the nation's largest and most reputable banks.

The FTC's new ruling barring holder in due course clauses doesn't go into effect until next May 14. Meanwhile you can safeguard yourself by avoiding signing such contracts. You can insist that any such clause be crossed out.

Typically, the holder in due course clause in a contract will read something like this: "If the seller should assign this contract in good faith to a third party, I shall be precluded as against such third party from attacking the validity of the contract on grounds of fraud, duress, mistake, want and consideration."

Also look for any other clauses or sentences in the contract or installment note which say you "waive" your defenses against the finance company in case the dealer fails to deliver agreed-upon satisfactory goods or services.

The forthcoming FTC rule also will require sellers to insert a clause in installment contracts to this effect: "Notice. Any holder of this consumer credit contract is subject to all claims and defenses which the debtor could assert against the seller of goods or services obtained pursuant hereto or with the proceeds hereof. Recovery hereunder by the debtor shall not exceed amounts paid by the debtor hereunder."

THE FORTHCOMING RULE applies only when the dealer or seller arranged for the financing. On loans you arrange yourself with a lender to make your own purchases; you do, of course, have to pay back the loan even if the purchase was misrepresented or is defective.

Nor will the FTC's new rule completely assure you of dependable service or merchandise. You still need to be sure to get written rather than merely verbal statements of the seller's promises. But at least now you have the right to raise against the third party (the lender) any legal claims and defenses you may have of breach of contract or warranty or defective merchandise or misrepresentation by the seller.

Too, the new rule will make finance companies and banks more cautious than they sometimes have been about providing financing for high pressure or fly-by-night sellers.

The FTC is to be congratulated by consumers for having taken this courageous step to eliminate this long-standing inequity. Meanwhile, of course, many millions of dollars have been transferred from the pockets of innocent consumers to those of dealers, traveling contractors and lenders.

After Slow Start:

Effectiveness of Pension Law Tested in Shakedown Period

IMPLEMENTATION of the new Pension Reform Act, bogged down for months by budget fights and bureaucratic squabbles in the Administration, may now finally be moving ahead, Associate Director Lawrence Smedley of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security said.

Smedley said the labor movement is cautiously optimistic that the stalemate that has slowed issuance of regulations and the assignment of personnel to administer the new law may be ending. But, he stressed, this is a shakedown period for "one of the most complex laws to ever go through Congress," and experience with the measure is too limited to say now what changes, if any, are needed.

"We do not say it's a perfect law—it doesn't accomplish all of the objectives of the AFL-CIO," Smedley said, but the AFL-CIO will delay suggestions for improvements until there has been a chance to "evaluate the law . . . see how it works, where the problems are, what hasn't worked, what changes are needed."

Appearing on the AFL-CIO produced network radio interview Labor News Conference, Smedley said that Congress and the Administration must soon turn their attention to the whole question of investment of pension funds.

He pointed out that "pension funds are really deferred wages of workers, yet workers have very little say over how they are invested." He noted that more than half of the total pension funds in the nation are invested with the trust departments of the big banks.

The AFL-CIO strongly believes that pension funds, as the deferred wages of workers, "should be invested in more socially-useful objectives than is now the case," the union pension expert declared. He singled out housing as one of the areas of critical need for greater investment "where we think pension funds could be doing a better job."

Smedley noted that private pensions supplement the benefits that workers derive from the social security system to provide a better retirement than can be gotten from social security alone. But he warned that it would be difficult to combine the two programs under some sort of integrated government policy.

He also expressed opposition to any regulated limitations on benefits workers could negotiate in their private pension plans.

Smedley pointed out that only about one-half of the nation's workforce is covered by private pensions and that most of the private pensions provide benefits of about 25 percent of a worker's final salary.

"Workers should have a right to bargain for pensions," he stressed. They should have the right to evaluate their situation and their expected social security benefits so they can determine what they need in retirement protection and then negotiate to meet that need, Smedley said.

Reporters questioning Smedley on Labor News Conference were Sara Fritz of United Press International and Ben Rathbun of Daily Labor Report, a publication of the Bureau of National Affairs. The program is broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

By Press Associates, Inc.

A STUDY RELEASED by the U.S. Office of Education, estimates that 23 million adult Americans are "functionally incompetent."

That is, one of every five adults is simply unable to cope adequately with the practical problems of everyday living. The study also estimates that another one-third of the adult population can function, but not proficiently.

Only 46 percent of adult Americans are estimated to have the literacy and skills to handle the decisions and problems of an increasingly complicated society.

The University of Texas team which conducted the $1 million, four-year study calls the results "surprising, perhaps shocking."

U.S. Commissioner of Education Terrel H. Bell, in releasing the study, called the findings "rather startling." He said the study should cause a reshaping of adult education, a re-evaluation of school content from elementary grades on up and a review of high school graduation requirements.

In the old days, it was commonly agreed that a person who signed his name with an "X" was "illiterate." Today, experts may not agree on a definition of illiteracy, but they are carrying on a good deal of research in terms of skills a person needs to cope, if not succeed.

The Adult Performance Level Study carried out by the Texas team defined functional literacy as the ability to apply skills to several major areas important to adult success.

The skills included communication, computation, problem-solving and international relations. These skills were measured as applied to job knowledge, consumer economics, health, community resources, government and law.

Some 7,500 adults were tested, selected to reflect the national population.

The biggest failure was in consumer economics. For example, 28 percent of the adults given an itemized list of drugstore purchases could not figure out the right change due after paying with a $20 bill.

Nearly 35 million Americans were estimated to be functionally incompetent in consumer affairs. Another 39 million adults are functional but not proficient in money management, comparison shopping, figuring sales and income taxes and how to tip in a restaurant.

Other areas were nearly as depressing. Asked which states on a map of the U.S. had the most senators in Congress, only half the adults knew that each state has two senators. Presented with an airline schedule, one-third of the adults could not figure out a round-trip flight correctly.

THE AREAS OF GREATEST competence were in community resources—knowing where to go and how to apply for social security and Medicare, for example—and in occupational knowledge—how to seek and apply for a job. One-half of the adults were proficient in these areas.

Still, 20 percent of adults—one in five or about 23 million—proved incompetent in the skill of seeking and applying for a job.

The worst scores on the test were registered by those with the least education and from low-income groups. The lowest-scoring were from minority groups, the Spanish-surnamed and, regionally, from the South.

This shocking report should shake up the apathetic. The issue of mass illiteracy should be taken to the educational bureaucracy. National leadership will be necessary to effectively carry on the fight against what is a social as well as an educational problem.

The President vetoed the $7.9 billion appropriation for federal education programs last summer because it exceeded his budget request. It took a grassroots campaign and Washington teacher union lobbying to inspire Congress to override Ford's veto.

BUDGET FIGHTS and bureaucratic struggles that have stalled implementation of the new Pension Reform Act may be winding down, Associate Director Lawrence Smedley, center, of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Ben Rathbun of the Bureau of National Affairs and Sara Fritz of United Press International. The AFL-CIO public service program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

House Rollcall on Site Picketing Bill

The House on Dec. 11 voted 229-189 for final passage of the construction site picketing bill and a companion construction industry collective bargaining measure. The legislation was a major goal of the AFL-CIO and its Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Right votes (R) for passage of the conference report were cast by 206 Democrats and 23 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 118 Republicans and 71 Democrats.

Numerals show districts; AL—at large; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not paired.

Congress Clears Measure:

Ford Pledge Cited On Situs Picketing

ing would have to give 10 days notice of intent to picket and get the written approval of its international union.

A substantial amount of homebuilding would be exempt from common site picketing, and projects begun before last Nov. 15 would be exempt for up to two years.

Georgine announced that the presidents of the affiliated building trades unions have also agreed to take further voluntary action to minimize picketing that might halt construction. They have agreed that the Building & Construction Trades Dept., representing all the unions affected, would have to give its approval before an international union would authorize one of its locals to picket a job site. And they said no authorization will be given before July 1, 1976, so that procedures can be worked out to minimize disputes.

As for the other section of the legislation, dealing with collective bargaining procedures, Georgine stressed that it was jointly developed by labor and management representatives and has the full support of both groups as well as of Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop.

It spells out procedures to bring national unions and contractor associations into the bargaining picture and establishes a national union-management Collective Bargaining Committee that can make recommendations for settlement of disputes in cases where it assumes jurisdiction.

The recommendations are not binding, but Georgine told reporters that "the building trades unions are prepared to negotiate arrangements under which their affiliates will settle disputes without work stoppages within the framework of the recommendations of the committee."

If signed by Ford, the site picketing portion of the bill would put the building trades on the same plane as unions in other industries in terms of picketing rights. President I. W. Abel of the Industrial Union Dept. noted this in a letter urging Ford to sign the legislation "despite the pressure from some extreme groups."

During the House debate, some Republicans sought to provide an out for the President by contending that his promise to sign the legislation applied only if it had the support of management as well as labor.

Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), floor leader for the legislation, read to the House direct statements by the President on various occasions, including news conferences, declaring that he "will support" the legislation with the amendments that have since been incorporated into the bill.

Ford took the same position at White House meetings attended by both Democrats and Republicans interested in the legislation, Thompson told the House from first-hand knowledge. And he stressed that "every single" condition set by the President has been met.

In a speech to the National Press Club, Secretary of Labor Dunlop reiterated that he had testified in support of the legislation at the "instruction" of the President.

Georgine told reporters that Ford would become the captive of the most reactionary elements in the Republican Party if he caved in to the pressures for a veto.

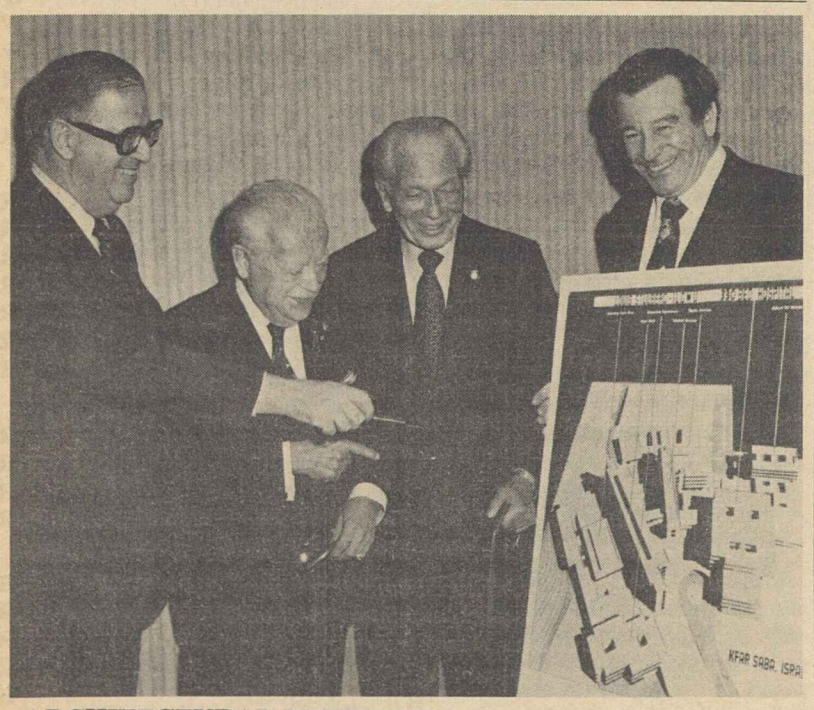
"This week they are demanding President Ford's veto of energy, tax reform and situs picketing, and no one should be fooled they are going to stop here," Georgine said. "The President can never appease a group of people that in essence don't want Gerry Ford in the White House."

Two Unions Press Radio, TV Talks

New York—The Television & Radio Artists and the Screen Actors Guild resumed their joint negotiations with producers of radio and TV commercials, and talks continued on a day-to-day basis.

The two unions put off a scheduled Dec. 7 strike when it appeared progress was being made in reaching a new contract to replace one that expired Nov. 15. AFTRA and SAG began their bargaining last Oct. 20.

Both unions are looking for cost-of-living wage boosts and improved language covering "residuals," fees paid to an actor for each time one of the commercials in which he appears is aired on TV or radio.



ARCHITECTURAL RENDITION of a new hospital that Histadrut, the Israeli labor federation, will build at Kfar Saba is discussed by Abba Eban, former foreign minister of Israel, and leaders of the Ladies' Garment Workers. The ILGWU is donating $1 million for the hospital project. From left, besides Eban, are past presidents of the ILGWU David Dubinsky and Louis Stulberg, and President Sol C. Chaikin.

Dunlop Warns Ford Veto Would Disrupt Bargaining

Labor Secretary John T. Dunlop told reporters he foresees "unmitigated hell" in construction industry labor-management relations if President Ford vetoes the jobsite picketing and collective bargaining bill.

Dunlop termed the legislation an opportunity to establish industrial peace and stability in the construction industry, where local agreements affecting some 800,000 workers expire next spring. As for right-wing charges that the bill will lead to more strikes, "I can tell you categorically that is untrue," he said.

"On the merits" of the issue, Dunlop said there is no reason for the President to veto the legislation. The bill includes "carefully drawn and reasonable" safeguards against abuse, he noted. In fact, Dunlop said, "they are far more restrictive than those for which the Administration indicated support earlier this year."

Flight Engineers Battle Pan Am Furlough Plan

Three unions with members employed by Pan American World Airways have joined in a campaign to prevent the mass furlough of 337 flight engineers and to avert the probable furlough of other Pan Am employe groups.

The unions — the Flight Engineers, the Transport Workers and the unaffiliated Teamsters—issued a joint statement describing the imminent furlough of the engineers as a "shocking development."

The statement said the scheduled furloughs represent "a betrayal of the furlough-cancellation agreement which the company and the Flight Engineers signed just two months ago."

The furloughs are set to begin Mar. 1, 1976, with the layoff of 100 engineers. Another 168 would be laid off by June 1, and the company held open the possible termination of 69 more employes by mid-1977.

Pan Am's explanation of the engineer furloughs is its intention to cut operating expenses by reducing its complement of smaller aircrafts. The airline, which recently experienced financial difficulty, plans to shift from 707 and 727 aircraft to the larger 747, a move that would require fewer flight engineers.

Even without the agreement on furloughs, the unions noted, the reduction in the number of engineers — a full one-third of their total number at Pan Am—would represent "a betrayal of a spirit of trust and confidence that the Pan Am flight engineers have strived, at great cost, to build up by means of a concerted and expensive campaign" to help the firm get on a sound financial basis.

Belt-tightening is a commendable goal these days, and the firm has every right to tighten its operations, the unions noted. But the manner in which the company has gone about achieving this goal is "indefensible," they declared.

The statement pointed out that the Flight Engineers had agreed to participate in a rollback of wage gains to ease the company's financial plight. The union also has fought for continuation of Pan Am's mail-carrying rights on the West Coast and for congressional oversight hearings into the deep problems of Pan Am and other American-based international carriers.

"The company has a responsibility to protect the jobs of its exceptionally loyal employes," the union statement said. "Surely the company has other alternatives at its disposal than the one it has chosen."

Schneider Heads JLC Rights Unit

New York—Edward Schneider, a vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, has been named chairman of the National Trade Union Council for Human Rights, an arm of the Jewish Labor Committee. The appointment was announced by JLC President Jacob Sheinkman, secretary-treasurer of the Clothing Workers.

Schneider succeeds Charles Zimmerman, a former ILGWU vice president, who served as chairman for 20 years until his recent resignation.

Labor Fights Move to Lift Gas Controls

AFL-CIO President George Meany expressed labor's strong opposition to any deregulation of natural gas prices in a letter sent to all House members.

A bill dealing with natural gas pricing is scheduled for House action early in the second session of Congress, and the Rules Committee agreed to allow an amendment to be offered that would lift federal price controls on new natural gas wells. The bill as sent to the House floor would allow industrial firms facing a natural gas shortage to pay higher prices for gas that is not under interstate price controls.

Meany termed deregulation "unwise and unwarranted," and an abdication of government's "rightful responsibility of assuring American citizens just and reasonable natural gas prices."

As for the bill sent to the House floor, Meany noted that several months ago government agencies were warning that many industrial plants would be forced to shut down and workers thrown out of jobs because of a natural gas shortage.

He said it was "understandable" that Congress would want to avert such a situation.

But more recent studies, Meany noted, indicate the shortage warning was "significantly overstated" and that any shortages "would be minimal and have little effect on employment."

Meany said, labor opposes passage of the bill even if the decontrol amendments are defeated.

Final Senate Rollcall On Site Picketing Bill

The Senate on Dec. 15 voted 52-43 approval of the conference report on the construction site picketing and collective bargaining bill, the final step in the legislative process. Labor strongly supported its passage.

As Congress Nears Adjournment:

Comprehensive Energy Bill Awaits President's Decision

Congress completed nearly a year of struggle with energy problems by sending to the President a comprehensive Energy Policy & Conservation Act that is intended to conserve fuel while holding down prices to consumers.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, President Ford had not yet announced whether he will sign or veto it.

Federal Energy Administrator Frank Zarb, presumably representing the Administration, had worked closely with Congress in the final shaping of the legislation and pronounced it acceptable.

But oil interests and ultra-conservatives with political influence have been urging a veto. Their objection is to a partial rollback of oil prices—a prelude to a gradual lifting of price controls on petroleum products.

If the President should veto the bill, producers would be free to charge whatever the market would bear for oil.

Almost lost sight of in the debate over the oil pricing provisions is the extensive authority given for allocation and even rationing of fuel oil and gasoline during any period of extreme shortage—as during the 1973 Arab oil boycott.

The bill requires auto manufacturers to meet constantly rising miles-per-gallon standards, subject to penalty for failure to do so. The standards would apply to the average for all cars produced that year, so that larger vehicles using more gasoline could still be produced if the bulk of production was in models with the biggest fuel savings.

Manufacturers of major household appliances would have to improve energy efficiency by 20 percent from 1972 levels by 1980, and appliance labels would disclose energy information.

The President would be required to lift the $2 oil import fee, which has helped push prices up. New oil from the Alaska slope would be exempt from controls by the time it starts flowing and oil price controls would expire after 40 months unless renewed.

The legislation had AFL-CIO support as pointed in the general direction of labor's energy policy.

Congress stopped a step short of sending the President another major labor-sought bill—a job-creating public works bill designed as a "get America back to work" program.

The Senate approved a conference agreement on a bill intended to pump $650 million into the economy over the next six months and up to $6 billion over several years if unemployment should continue high.

As a job-creating measure, the federal government would provide full financing for local public works projects that can be gotten under way within 90 days. Priority would go to areas of highest unemployment.

The legislation also provides "counter-cyclical" funds to allow communities with heavy unemployment—over 6 percent—to maintain normal services despite revenue shortages.

To avoid the risk of a presidential pocket veto after Congress has adjourned, the House was not expected to act on the measure until the January session.

In other developments as the first session of the 94th Congress neared a close:

- Congress agreed to a 10-year extension of a combined government and private insurance program to protect firms against unlimited liability in the event of a nuclear accident. While it has never been necessary to pay a claim under the program, the law is credited with having helped the development of nuclear power plants.

The AFL-CIO has termed its renewal "essential" to achieving energy independence.

- The House and Senate adopted a mortgage disclosure bill designed to discourage banks from "redlining" entire neighborhoods as poor risks for home purchase loans. The legislation relies on public disclosure to get lending institutions to stop discriminatory practices.

- A House-Senate conference committee put together a compromise railroad reorganization bill to finance the new Conrail system, a consolidation of the Penn Central and six other financially ailing railroads. The Administration had threatened a veto of the Senate-passed version, contending it was too costly. It was uncertain whether the President would sign the compromise bill.

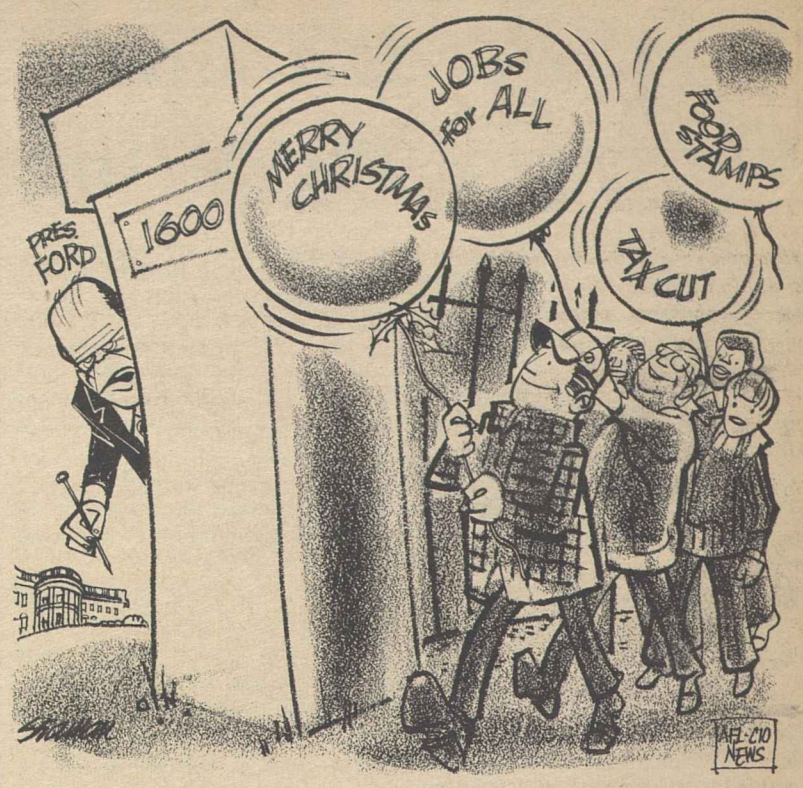
- The Senate confirmed the nomination of Appeals Court Judge John Paul Stevens to the Supreme Court by a 98-0 vote. He fills the vacancy left by the retirement of Justice William O. Douglas.

- The Senate Armed Services Committee voted 12 to 4 to recommend confirmation of George Bush as director of the Central Intelligence Agency—but only after President Ford sent up a letter saying that Bush would not be considered for the Republican vice presidential nomination.

- Congress completed final action on an appropriations bill containing the loan funding promised New York City in legislation passed earlier this month.

- Congress planned to adjourn Dec. 19 and set Jan. 19, 1976, for the start of the second session.

'Bah, Humbug!'



NLRB Task Force Set To Improve Procedures

A 26-member blue-ribbon task force, which includes a number of present and former attorneys for organized labor, has been named by the National Labor Relations Board to improve the agency's case-handling procedures.

Panel members, announced by NLRB Chairman Betty Murphy, include AFL-CIO Associate General Counsel Robert C. Mayer and Special Counsel Laurence Gold.

Others from labor are Louis Sherman, counsel for the Building & Construction Trades Dept., and Stephen I. Schlossberg, general counsel of the Auto Workers.

The group, which will be headed by Mrs. Murphy, also includes Theodore St. Antoine, formerly a member of the AFL-CIO legal staff and now dean of the University of Michigan Law School, and David Previant, chief labor counsel to the Teamsters and immediate past chairman of the labor law section of the American Bar Association.

"We must find ways for the NLRB to do a faster job—with continued fairness—in the face of a constantly rising case-load," Mrs. Murphy said.

In a resolution at its convention this fall, the AFL-CIO charged that excessive delays between the time a complaint is filed and a decision is issued by the NLRB constitute a major stumbling block for workers seeking to exercise their rights to organize.

The newly appointed task force is composed of prominent representatives of management, academia and the public in addition to labor.

"Experienced in the complexities of collective bargaining, familiar with procedures and practices of the NLRB, and aware of the need for swift resolution of labor disputes, the task force has a difficult assignment," Mrs. Murphy observed.

She emphasized that the panel will be concerned with how the NLRB handles its cases — not with the decisions it renders. It will meet for two days once each quarter, but with its study continuing during the intervals.

Among the other members of the task force is Theodore W. Kheel, administrative director of the Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations in New York City.

Its members were nominated by the American Bar Association, the Federal Bar Association, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, the Business Roundtable, the Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations, the Teamsters, the Auto Workers, the NLRB and its general counsel and the AFL-CIO.

The next issue of the AFL-CIO News will be published on Jan. 3, 1976, because of holiday schedules.

Extension of Jobless Aid Coverage To 9.5 Million Voted by House Unit

The House Ways & Means Committee approved a bill extending unemployment insurance coverage to nearly 9.5 million additional workers and strengthening financing of the program. But it rejected by a single-vote margin any federal minimum standard for benefits, a major AFL-CIO goal.

Under emergency legislation passed during the height of the recession, workers not covered by state unemployment compensation law are entitled to up to 39 weeks of federal payments if they lose their jobs. But that entitlement will be phased out after next year.

The Ways & Means Committee bill would bring most of them under the regular unemployment insurance program. Those who would be covered include an estimated 7.7 million local government employes, 710,000 agricultural workers, 600,000 state employes, and 400,000 domestics.

The benefits standard amendment on which the committee voted was pared down to an almost token level in an unsuccessful bid to recruit votes.

The AFL-CIO convention had urged benefits keyed to two-thirds of lost wages, up to a ceiling of 75 percent of the average wage in the state.

The Administration has endorsed a benefit standard of 50 percent of lost wages up to a ceiling of two-thirds of average weekly wages in a state.

The amendment proposed by Rep. James C. Corman (D-Calif.) didn't even go that far. It would have set the benefit standard at 50 percent of lost wages to a ceiling of only 60 percent of the state average wage.

All 12 committee Republicans voted against the benefit standard and so did six Democrats, including Chairman Al Ullman (D-Ore.). Seventeen Democrats voted for the amendment, and there were two Democratic absentees.

The committee subsequently voted 23-13 to support bringing the bill to the House floor under a no-amendment "closed rule." It is not expected to be acted on until the second session of Congress, which begins in January.

Three Democratic committee members expressed their disagreement with omission of federal benefit standards in "supplemental views" attached to the committee report on the bill.

The average unemployment compensation benefit in 1974 was only 36.4 percent of the average weekly wage in covered employment, they noted. And while the maximum weekly benefit when the program started in 1939 was above two-thirds of the average wage in 22 states and above three-fourths in 12 states, by 1975 only eight states met the two-thirds standard and none had reached the 75 percent mark.

Signing the supplemental statement were Representatives James A. Burke (Mass.), William Ford (Tenn.) and Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.).

On the plus side, the bill would replenish depleted funds for unemployment benefits by raising the federal tax rate on employer payrolls and increasing the taxable wage base. Employers would be taxed on the first $8,000 of each worker's wage, starting in 1977, up from the present $4,200. And effective in 1976, the tax would rise from five-tenths of 1 percent to seven-tenths of 1 percent.

The permanent program of up to 13 weeks of extended benefits during periods of high unemployment would be somewhat improved. The extended benefits would still be paid only when "triggered" by a national rate of insured unemployment of 4.5 percent or higher or state rates of 4 percent. But the requirement that joblessness must also be 20 percent above the average of the past two years would be dropped.

The permanent program brings the customary 26 weeks of state benefits to a maximum of 39 weeks when unemployment is high. A temporary program, which the AFL-CIO had urged be incorporated into the permanent structure, now allows up to 65 weeks of total benefits for persons covered by state unemployment insurance.

However, this starts to drop in January, and will be completely phased out the following year. In January, it will apply only in states that have an insured unemployment rate of 6 percent or more. (The insured rate is usually about one-third lower than the actual jobless rate.)

During 1976, the maximum duration will drop to 52 weeks in states with between 5 and 6 percent insured unemployment and to 39 weeks in states with less than 5 percent.

As of the week of Nov. 22, only 18 states and Puerto Rico had insured jobless rates above 6 percent, although the list included such big industrial centers as California, New York, Illinois and Michigan.
